

The background of the cover is a photograph of the interior of a large, ornate Catholic cathedral. The view is from the back of the nave, looking down the central aisle towards the altar. The floor is made of light-colored stone tiles. On either side of the aisle are rows of wooden pews with red upholstered seats. The walls are white with classical architectural details like columns and pilasters. At the far end, there is a large, ornate altar with a dark wood structure. Above the altar is a large, oval-shaped painting depicting a religious scene. The ceiling is a massive dome with a green and gold patterned interior. The overall atmosphere is one of grandeur and historical significance.

GENESIS

THE BOOK OF GENESIS

INTRODUCTION

The Hebrews now entitle all the Five Books of Moses, from the initial words, which originally were written like one continued word or verse; but the Sept. have preferred to give the titles the most memorable occurrences of each work. On this occasion, the Creation of all things out of nothing, strikes us with peculiar force. We find a refutation of all the heathenish mythology, and of the world's eternity, which Aristotle endeavoured to establish. We behold the short reign of innocence, and the origin of sin and misery, the dispersion of nations, and the providence of God watching over his chosen people, till the death of Joseph, about the year 2369 (Usher) 2399 (Sal. and Tirin) B.C. 1631. We shall witness the same care in the other Books of Scripture, and adore his wisdom and goodness in preserving to himself faithful witnesses, and a true Holy Catholic Church, in all ages, even when the greatest corruption seemed to overspread the land. H.

This Book is so called from its treating of the Generation, that is, of the Creation and the beginning of the world. The Hebrews call it Bereshith, from the word with which it begins. It contains not only the History of the Creation of the World, but also an account of its progress during the space of 2369 years, that is, until the death of Joseph.

Ver. 1. Beginning. As St. Matthew begins his Gospel with the same title as this work, the Book of the Generation, or Genesis, so St. John adopts the first words of Moses, in the beginning; but he considers a much higher order of things, even the consubstantial Son of God, the same with God from all eternity, forming the universe, in the beginning of time, in conjunction with the other two Divine Persons, by the word of his power; for all things were made by Him, the Undivided Deity. H.—Elohim, the Judges or Gods, denoting plurality, is joined with a verb singular, he created, whence many, after Peter Lombard, have inferred, that in this first verse of Genesis the adorable mystery of the Blessed Trinity is insinuated, as they also gather from various other passages of the Old Testament, though it was not clearly revealed till our Saviour came himself to be the finisher of our faith. C.—The Jews being a carnal people and prone to idolatry, might have been in danger of misapplying this great mystery, and therefore an explicit belief of it was not required of them in general. See Collet. &c. H.—The word bara, created, is here determined by tradition and by reason to mean a production out of nothing, though it be used also to signify the forming of a thing out of pre-existing matter. 21. 27. C.—The first cause of all things must be God, who, in a moment, spoke, and heaven and earth were made, heaven with all the Angels; and the whole mass of the elements, in a state of confusion, and blended together, out of which the beautiful order, which was afterwards so admirable, arose in the space of six days: thus God was pleased to manifest his free choice in opposition to those Pagans who attributed all to blind chance or fate. Heaven is here placed first, and is not declared empty and dark like the earth; that we may learn to raise our minds and hearts above this land of trial, to that our true country, where we may enjoy God for ever. H.

Ver. 2. Spirit of God, giving life, vigour, and motion to things, and preparing the waters for the sacred office of baptism, in which, by the institution of J. C., we must be born again; and, like spiritual fishes, swim amid the tempestuous billows of this world. v. Tert. &c. W. H.—This Spirit is what the Pagan philosophers styled the Soul of the World. C.—If we compare their writings with the books of Moses and the prophets, we shall find that they agree in many points. See Grotius. H.

Ver. 3. Light. The sun was made on the fourth day, and placed in the firmament to distinguish the seasons, &c.; but the particles of fire were created on the first day, and by their, or the earth's motion, served to discriminate day from the preceding night, or darkness, which was upon the face of the deep. H.—Perhaps this body of light might resemble the bright cloud which accompanied the Israelites, Ex. 14:19, or the three first days might have a kind of imperfect sun, or be like one of our cloudy days. Nothing can be defined with certainty respecting the nature of this primeval light. C.

Ver. 4. Good; beautiful and convenient:—he divided light by giving it qualities incompatible with darkness, which is not any thing substantial, and therefore Moses does not say it was created. C.—While our hemisphere enjoys the day, the other half of the world is involved in darkness. S. Augustine supposes the fall and punishment of the apostate angels are here insinuated. L. imp. de Gen. H.

Ver. 6. A firmament. By this name is here understood the whole space between the earth and the highest stars. The lower part of which divideth the waters that are upon the earth, from those that are above in the clouds. Ch.—The Heb. Rokia is translated stereoma, solidity by the Sept., and expansion by most of the moderns. The heavens are often represented as a tent spread out, Ps. 103:3. C.

Ver. 7. Above the firmament and stars, according to some of the Fathers; or these waters were vapours and clouds arising from the earth, and really divided from the lower waters contained in the sea. C.

Ver. 11. Seed in itself, either in the fruit or leaves, or slips. M.—At the creation, trees were covered with fruit in Armenia, while in the more northern regions they would not even have leaves: Calmet hence justly observes, that the question concerning the season of the year when the world began, must be understood only with reference to that climate in which Adam dwelt. Scaliger asserts, that the first day corresponds with our 26th of October, while others, particularly the Greeks, fix it upon the 25th of March, on which day Christ was conceived; and, as some Greeks say, was born and nailed to the cross. The great part of respectable authors declare for the vernal equinox, when the year is in all its youth and beauty. H. See T. and Salien's Annals, B.C. Christ 4053.

Ver. 14. For signs. Not to countenance the delusive observations of astrologers, but to give notice of rain, of the proper seasons for sowing, &c. M.—If the sun was made on the first day, as some assert, there is nothing new created on this fourth day. By specifying the use and creation of these heavenly bodies, Moses shows the folly of the Gentiles, who adored them as gods, and the impiety of those who pretend that human affairs are under the fatal influence of the planets. See S. Aug. Confes. iv. 3. The Heb. term mohadim, which is here rendered seasons, may signify either months, or the times for assembling to worship God; (C.) a practice, no doubt, established from the beginning every week, and probably also the first day of the new moon, a day which the Jews afterwards religiously observed. Plato calls the sun and planets the organs of time, of which, independently of their stated revolutions, man could have formed no conception. The day is completed in twenty-four hours, during which space the earth moves round its axis, and express successively different parts of its surface to the sun. It goes at a rate of fifty-eight thousand miles an hour, and completes its orbit in the course of a year. H.

Ver. 16. Two great lights. God created on the first day light, which being moved from east to west, by its rising and setting made morning and evening. But on the fourth day he ordered and distributed this light, and made the sun, moon, and stars. The moon, though much less than the stars, is here called a great light, from its giving a far greater light to earth than any of them. Ch.—To rule and adorn, for nothing appears so glorious as the sun and moon. M.—Many have represented the stars, as well as the sun and moon, to be animated. Ecclesiasticus 16, speaking of the sun says, the spirit goeth forward surveying all places: and in Esdras 9:6, the Levites address God, Thou hast made heaven and all the host thereof; and thou givest life to all these things, and the host of heaven adoreth thee. S. Aug. Ench. and others, consider this question as not pertaining to faith. See Spen. in Orig. c.

Cels. v. C.—Whether the stars be the suns of other worlds, and whether the moon, &c. be inhabited, philosophers dispute, without being able to come to any certain conclusion: for God has delivered the world to their consideration for dispute, so that man cannot find out the work which God hath made from the beginning to the end, Eccles. 3:11. If we must frequently confess our ignorance concerning the things which surround us, how shall we pretend to dive into the designs of God, or subject the mysteries of faith to our feeble reason? If we think the Scriptures really contradict the systems of philosophers, ought we to pay greater deference to the latter, than to the unerring word of God? But we must remember, that the sacred writings were given to instruct us in the way to heaven, and not to unfold to us the systems of natural history; and hence God generally addresses us in a manner best suited to our conceptions, and speaks of nature as it appears to the generality of mankind. At the same time, we may confidently assert, that the Scriptures never assert what is false. If we judge, with the vulgar, that the sun, moon, and stars are no larger than they appear to our naked eye, we shall still have sufficient reason to admire the works of God; but, if we are enabled to discover that the sun's diameter, for example, is 763 thousand miles, and its distance from our earth about 95 million miles, and the fixed stars (as they are called, though probably all in motion) much more remote, what astonishment must fill our breast! Our understanding is bewildered in the unfathomable abyss, in the unbounded expanse, even of the visible creation.—Sirius, the nearest to us of all the fixed stars, is supposed to be 400,000 times the distance from the sun that our earth is, or 38 millions of millions of miles. Light, passing at the rate of twelve millions of miles every minute, would be nearly 3,000 years in coming to us from the remotest star in our stratum, beyond which are others immensely distant, which it would require about 40,000 years to reach, even with the same velocity. Who shall not then admire thy works and fear thee, O King of ages! Walker.—Geog. justly remarks, “we are lost in wonder when we attempt to comprehend either the vastness or minuteness of creation. Philosophers think it possible for the universe to be reduced to the smallest size, to an atom, merely by filling up the pores;” and the reason they allege is, “because we know not the real structure of bodies.” Shall any one then pretend to wisdom, and still call in question the mysteries of faith, transubstantiation, &c., when the most learned confess they cannot fully comprehend the nature even of a grain of sand? While on the one hand some assert, that all the world may be reduced to this compass; others say, a grain of sand may be divided in infinitum! H.

Ver. 20. Creeping: destitute of feet like fishes, which move on their bellies. M.—Fowl. Some assert that birds were formed of the earth, but they seem to have the same origin as fishes, namely, water; and still they must not be eaten on days of abstinence, which some of the ancients thought lawful, Socrates v. 20. To conciliate the two opinions, perhaps we might say, that the birds were formed of mud, (C.) or that some of the nature of fish, like barnacles, might be made of water and others of earth, C. 11. 19.—Under: Heb. on the face of the firmament, or in the open air. H.

Ver. 22. Blessed them, or enabled them to produce others.—Multiply: the immense numbers and variety of fishes and fowls is truly astonishing.

Ver. 26. Let us make man to our image. This image of God in man, is not in the body, but in the soul; which is a spiritual substance, endued with understanding and free-will. God speaketh here in the plural number, to insinuate the plurality of persons in the Deity. Ch.—Some of the ancient Jews maintained that God here addressed his council, the Angels; but is it probable that he should communicate to them the title of Creator, and a perfect similitude with himself? C.—Man is possessed of many prerogatives above all other creatures of this visible world: his soul gives him a sort of equality with the Angels; and though his body be taken from the earth, like the brutes, yet even here the beautiful construction, the head erect and looking towards heaven, &c. makes S. Aug. observe, an air of majesty in the human body, which raises man above all terrestrial animals, and brings him in some measure near to the Divinity. As Jesus assumed our human nature, we may assert, that we bear a resemblance to God both in soul and body. Tertullian (de Resur. 5.) says, “Thus that slime, putting on already the image of Christ, who would come in the flesh, was not only the work of God, but also a pledge.” H. See S. Bern. on Ps. xcix. W.

Ver. 27. Male and female. Eve was taken from Adam’s side on this same day, though it be related in the following chapter. Adam was not an hermaphrodite as some have foolishly asserted. C.—Adam means the likeness, or red earth, that in one word we may behold our nobility and meanness. H.

Ver. 28. Increase and multiply. This is not a precept, as some protestant controvertists would have it, but a blessing, rendering them fruitful: for God had said the same words to the fishes and birds, (ver. 22) who were incapable of receiving a precept. Ch.—Blessed them, not only with fecundity as he had done to other creatures, but also with dominion over them, and much more with innocence and abundance of both natural and supernatural gifts.—Increase. The Hebrews understand this literally as a precept binding every man at twenty years of age (C.); and some of the Reformers argued hence, that Priests, &c. were bound to marry: very prudently they have not determined how soon! But the Fathers in general agree that if this were a precept with respect to Adam, for the purpose of filling the earth, it is no longer so, that end being sufficiently accomplished. Does not St. Paul wish all men to be like himself, unmarried? 1 Cor. 7:1. 7. 8. H.

Ver. 29. Every herb, &c. As God does not here express leave to eat flesh-meat, which he did after the deluge, it is supposed that the more religious part of mankind, at least, abstained from it, and from wine, till after that event, when they became more necessary to support decayed nature. H. M.—In the golden age, spontaneous fruits were the food of happy mortals. C.

Ver. 1. Furniture, ornaments or militia, whether we understand the Angels, or the stars, which observe a regular order and obey God. M.

Ver. 2. He rested, &c. That is, he ceased to make any new kinds of things. Though, as our Lord tells us, John 5:17. He still worketh, viz. by conserving and governing all things, and creating souls. Ch.—Seventh day. This day was commanded, Ex. 20:8 to be kept holy by the Jews, as it had probably been from the beginning. Philo says, it is a the festival of the universe, and Josephus asserts, there is no town which does not acknowledge the religion of the sabbath. But this point is controverted, and whether the ancient patriarchs observed the seventh day, or some other, it is certain they would not fail, for any long time, to shew their respect for God's worship, and would hardly suffer a whole week to elapse without meeting to sound forth his praise. The setting aside of stated days for this purpose, is agreeable to reason, and to the practise of all civilized nations. As the Hebrews kept Saturday holy, in honour of God's rest, so we keep the first day of the week, by apostolic tradition, to thank God for the creation of the world on that day, and much more for the blessings which we derive from the Resurrection of J. C. and the sending down of the Holy Ghost, which have given it a title above all other days. H. On the seventh day, at the beginning of this verse, must be taken exclusively, as God finished his work on the 6th, whence the same Sept. and Syr. have here on the 6th day. H.—But the Heb. and all the other versions agree with the Vulgate. C.—The similarity of v. 6 and v. 7 in Heb.

may have given rise to this variation. H.

Ver. 4. Day. Not that all things were made in one day: but God formed in succession; first, heaven and earth, then the ornaments of both. Every plant, &c. which on the first day did not spring up, (as water covered the surface of the earth,) on the 3d, by the command of God, without having any man to plant, or rain to water them, pushed forth luxuriantly, and manifested the power of the Creator. H.—Thus Christ founded his Church by his own power, and still gives her increase; but requires of his ministers to co-operate with him, as a gardener must now take care of the plants which originally grew without man's aid. D.—By observing that all natural means were here wanting for the production of plants, God asserts his sole right to the work, and confounds the Egyptian system, which attributed plants, &c. to the general warmth of the earth alone. C.

Ver. 7. Breath of life or a soul, created out of nothing, and infused into the body to give it life. H.

Ver. 8. Of pleasure, Heb. Eden, which may be either the name of a country, as C. 4:16 or it may signify pleasure, in which sense Symmachus and S. Jerom have taken it.—From the beginning, or on the 3d day, when all plants were created, Heb. mikedem, may also mean towards the east, as the Sept. have understood it, though the other ancient interpreters agree with S. Jerom. Paradise lay probably to the east of Palestine, or of that country where Moses wrote. The precise situation cannot be ascertained. Calmet places it in Armenia, others near Babylon, &c. Some assert that this beautiful garden is still in being, the residence of Henoah and Elias. But God will not permit the curiosity of man to be gratified by the discovery of it. C. 3:24. How great might be its extent we do not know. If the sources of the Ganges, Nile, Tigris, and Euphrates, be not now changed, and if these be the rivers which sprung from the fountains of Paradise, (both which are points undecided) the garden must have comprised a great part of the world, H., as the Ganges rises in Judea, and the Nile about the middle of Africa. T.

Ver. 9. The tree of life. So called, because it had that quality, that by eating of the fruit of it, man would have been preserved in a constant state of health, vigour, and strength, and would not have died at all. The tree of knowledge. To which the deceitful serpent falsely attributed the power of imparting a superior kind of knowledge beyond that which God was pleased to give. Ch.—Of what species these two wonderful trees were, the learned are not agreed. The tree of knowledge, could not communicate any wisdom to man; but, by eating of its forbidden fruit, Adam dearly purchased the knowledge of evil, to which he was before a stranger. Some say it was the fig-tree, others an apple-tree. Cant. 8:5. But it probably agreed with no species of trees with which we are acquainted, nor was there perhaps any of the same kind in paradise. T.

Ver. 10. A river, &c. Moses gives many characteristics of Paradise, inviting us, as it were, to search for it; and still we cannot certainly discover where it is, or whether it exist at all at present, in state of cultivation. We must therefore endeavour to find the mystic Paradise, Heaven and the true Church; the road to which, though more obvious, is too frequently mistaken. See S. Aug. C. D. xiii. 21. Prov. 3:18. H.

Ver. 15. To dress it. Behold God would not endure idleness even in Paradise. H.

Ver. 17. The death of the soul, and become obnoxious to that of the body; thou shalt become a mortal and lose all the privileges of innocence. Though Adam lived 930 years after this, he was dying daily; he carried along with him the seeds of death, as we do, from our very conception. He had leave to eat of any fruit in this delicious garden, one only excepted, and this one prohibition makes him more eager to taste of that tree than of all the rest. So we struggle constantly to attain what is forbidden, and covet what is denied, cupimusque negata. God laid this easy command upon Adam, to give him an opportunity of shewing his ready obedience, and to assert his own absolute dominion over him. Eve was already formed, and was apprised of this positive command, (C. 3:3) and therefore, transgressing, is justly punished with her husband. True obedience does not inquire why a thing is commanded, but submits without demur. Would a parent be satisfied with his child, if he should refuse to obey, because he could not discern the propriety of the restraint? If he should forbid him to touch some delicious fruits which he had reserved for strangers, and the child were to eat them, excusing himself very impertinently and blasphemously, with those much abused words of our Saviour, It is not what enters into the mouth that defiles a man, &c. would not even a Protestant parent be enraged and seize the rod, though he could not but see that he was thus condemning his own conduct, in disregarding, on the very same plea, the fasts and days of abstinence, prescribed by the Church and by God's authority? All meats are good, as that fruit most certainly was which Adam was forbidden to eat; though some have foolishly surmised that it was poisonous; but, the crime of disobedience draws on punishment. H.—Even when the sin is remitted, as it was to Adam, the penalty is not of course released, as some have pretended. This also clearly appears in baptized infants, who suffer the penalties due to original sin, as much as those who have not been admitted to the laver of regeneration. S. Aug. W. T. &c.—If on this occasion, Eve had alone transgressed, as she was not the head, her sin would have hurt only herself. But with Adam, the representative of all his posterity, God made a sort of compact, (Ose. 6:7) giving him to understand, that if he continued faithful, his children should be born in the state of innocence like himself, happy and immortal, to be translated in due time to a happier Paradise, &c. but if he should refuse to obey, his sin should be communicated to all his race, who should be, by nature, children of wrath.—S. Aug. C. D. xvi. 27. Bede in Luc. xi. &c.—H. C.

Ver. 20. Names, probably in the Hebrew language, in which the names of things, frequently designate their nature and quality. See Bochart.—C.

Ver. 21. A deep sleep. Sept. “an ecstasy,” or mysterious sleep, in which Adam was apprised of the meaning of what was done, and how the Church would be taken from the side of Christ, expiring on the cross. M.

Ver. 23. Of my flesh. God did not, therefore, take a rib without flesh, nor perhaps did he replace flesh without a rib in Adam’s side, though S. Aug. thinks he did. These words of Adam are attributed to God, Matthew 19, because they were inspired by him.—Woman. As this word is derived from man, so in Hebrew Isha (or Asse) comes from Iish or Aiss; Latin vira woman, and virago comes from vir. H.—But we do not find this allusion so sensible in any of the Oriental languages, as in the Hebrew, whence another proof arises of this being the original language. C.

Ver. 24. One flesh, connected by the closest ties of union, producing children, the blood of both. S. Paul, Eph. 5:23 discloses to us the mystery of Christ’s union with his church for ever, prefigured by this indissoluble marriage of our first parents. C.

Ver. 25. Not ashamed, because they had not perverted the work of God. Inordinate concupiscence is the effect of sin. H.

Ver. 1. Why hath God? Heb. “Indeed hath God, &c.” as if the serpent had overheard Eve arguing with herself, about God’s prohibition, with a sort of displeasure and presumption. S. Augustine thinks, she had given some entrance to these passions, and the love of her own power, and hence gave credit to the words of the serpent, de Gen. ad lit. xi. 30. She might not know or reflect that the serpent could not reason thus, naturally; and she had as yet, no idea or dread of the devil. Lombard, 2 Dist. 21. This old serpent entered into the most subtle of creatures, and either by very expressive signs, or by the motion of the serpent's tongue, held this delusive dialogue with Eve. Moses relates what happened exteriorly; but from many expressions, and the curse, v. 15, he sufficiently indicates, that an evil spirit was the latent actor. H.—Of every tree. Satan perverts the word of God, giving it an ambiguous turn: in doing which, he has set heretics a pattern, which they follow. M.

Ver. 3. Not touch it. She exaggerates, through dislike of restraint, S. Amb. Or through reverence, she thought it unlawful to touch what she must not eat, lest perhaps, as if there could be any doubt. “God asserts, the woman doubts, Satan denies.” S. Bern. Thus place, like Eve, between God and the devil, to whom shall we yield our assent? H.—Perhaps we die, Heb. “lest ye die.”

Ver. 5. God. The old serpent's aim is, to make us think God envies our happiness. H.—Or he would have Eve to suppose, she had not rightly understood her maker, who would surely never deprive her of a fruit which would give her such an increase of knowledge, as to make her conclude she was before comparatively blind. M.—As gods, Heb. Elohim, which means also princes, angels, or judges. It appears, that our first parents had flattered themselves with the hopes of attaining a divine knowledge of all things. C.

Ver. 6. Woman saw, or gazed on with desire and fond dalliance. M.—Consulting only her senses, which represented the fruit to her as very desirable, and caused her to give credit to the devil's insinuations, rather than to the express word of God. Do not unbelievers the like, when they refuse to admit the real presence and transubstantiation, thought they cannot be ignorant, that this way of proceeding always leads to ruin.—Her husband, who, instead of reproving her for her rashness, did eat, through excessive fondness, not being able to plead ignorance, or that he was deceived. “Earth trembled from her entails, sky loured, and muttering thunder, some sad drops wept at completing the mortal sin.”—Original, &c. Paradise Lost, ix. 1000. H.—Gen. 2:14. In what light soever we consider the fault of this unhappy pair, it is truly enormous: the precept was so easy and just, the attempt to be like God in knowledge so extravagant, that nothing but pride could have suggested such woeful disobedience. By the disobedience of one man many were made sinners, Rom. 5:19. This ruin of himself, and of all his posterity, Adam could not hide from his own eyes. C. 2:17. C.

Ver. 7. And the eyes, &c. Not that they were blind before, (for the woman saw that the tree was fair to the eyes, ver. 6) nor yet that their eyes were opened to any more perfect knowledge of good; but only to the unhappy experience of having lost the good of original grace and innocence, and incurred the dreadful evil of sin. From whence followed a shame of their being naked; which they minded not before; because being now stript of original grace, they quickly began to be subject to the shameful rebellions of the flesh. Ch.—Behold the noble acquisition of experimental knowledge! This is supposed to have taken place about a week after they had enjoyed the sweets of innocence and of Paradise, that they might afterwards be moved to repentance, when they contrasted their subsequent misery with those few golden days. They saw that they had received a dreadful wound, even in their natural perfections, and that their soul was despoiled of grace, which, of themselves, they could never regain. O! what confusion must now have seized upon them! “Confounded long they say, as stricken mute.” Milton— H.

Aprons, or they interwove tender branches covered with leaves round their middle; a practice, which even the wild Indians and Americans observed, when they were discovered by Columbus. They will rise up in condemnation of those pretended civilized nations, who, like the Greeks, could wrestle or bathe quite naked, without any sense of shame. H.—Adam’s fig-tree, in Egypt, has leaves above a yard long, and two feet broad. C.

Ver. 8. Afternoon air. God’s presence has often been indicated by an unusual wind. 3 Kings 19:12. Act. 2:2. The sovereign judge will not suffer the day to pass over, without bringing our first parents to a sense of their fault. They hid themselves, loving darkness now, because their works were evil.

Ver. 9. Where. In what state have thy sins placed thee, that thou shouldst flee from thy God? S. Amb. C. 14. Some think it was the Son of God who appeared on this occasion, S. Aug. &c. or an Angel. C.

Ver. 10. Afraid. The just man is first to accuse himself: but Adam seeks for excuses in his sin: he throws the blame on his wife, and ultimately on God. M.—Thou gavest me. Heretics have since treated the Sovereign Good with the like insolence; saying plainly, that God is the author of sin, and that the crime of Judas is no less his work than the conversion of S. Paul. See Calvin's works, and many of the first reformers, Luther, &c. cited. Ex. 8:15. H.

Ver. 13. The serpent, which thou hast made so cunning, and placed with us, deceived me. God deigns not to answer their frivolous excuses. M.

Ver. 14. Cursed. This curse falls upon the natural serpent, as the instrument of the devil; who is also cursed at the same time by the Holy Ghost. What was natural to the serpent and to man in a state of innocence, (as to creep, &c. to submit to the dominion of the husband, &c.) becomes a punishment after the fall. S. Chrys.—There was no enmity, before, between man and any of God's creatures; nor were they noxious to him. T.—The devil seems now to crawl, because he no longer aspires after God and heavenly things, but aims at wickedness and mean deceit. M.

Ver. 15. She shall crush. Ipsa, the woman: so divers of the fathers read this place, conformably to the Latin: others read it ipsum, viz. the seed. The sense is the same: for it is by her seed, Jesus Christ, that the woman crushes the serpent's head. Ch.—The Hebrew text, as Bellarmine observes, is ambiguous: He mentions one copy which had ipsa instead of ipsum; and so it is even printed in the Hebrew interlineary edition, 1572, by Plantin, under the inspection of Boderianus. Whether the Jewish editions ought to have more weight with Christians, or whether all the other MSS. conspire against this reading, let others inquire. The fathers who have cited the old Italic version, taken from the Sept. agree with the Vulgate, which is followed by almost all the Latins; and hence we may argue with probability, that the Sept. and the Hebrew formerly acknowledged ipsa, which now moves the indignation of Protestants so much, as if we intended by it to give any divine honour to the blessed Virgin. We believe, however, with S. Epiphanius, that "it is no less criminal to vilify the holy Virgin, than to glorify her above measure." We know that all the power of the mother of God is derived from the merits of her Son. We are no otherwise concerned about the retaining of ipsa, she, in this place, that in as much as we have yet no certain reason to suspect its being genuine. As some words have been corrected in the Vulgate since the Council of Trent by Sixtus V. and others, by Clement VIII. so, if, upon stricter search, it be found that it, and not she, is the true reading, we shall not hesitate to admit the correction: but we must wait in the mean time respectfully, till our superiors determine. H. Kemnitzius certainly advanced a step too far, when he said that all the ancient fathers read ipsum. Victor, Avitus, S. Aug. S. Greg. &c. mentioned in the Douay Bible, will convict him of falsehood. Christ crushed the serpent's head by his death, suffering himself to be wounded in the heel. His blessed mother crushed him likewise, by her co-operation in the mystery of the Incarnation; and by rejecting, with horror, the very first suggestions of the enemy, to commit even the smallest sin. S. Bern. ser. 2, on Missus est. "We crush," says S. Greg. Mor. 1. 38, "the serpent's head, when we extirpate from our heart the beginnings of temptation, and then he lays snares for our heel, because he opposes the end of a good action with greater craft and power." The serpent may hiss and threaten; he cannot hurt, if we resist him. H.

Ver. 16. And thy conceptions. Sept. "thy groaning." The multifarious sorrows of childbearing, must remind all mothers (the blessed Virgin alone excepted) of what they have incurred by original sin. If that had not taken place, they would have conceived without concupiscence, and brought forth without sorrow. S. Aug. C. D. xiv. 26.—Conceptions are multiplied on account of the many untimely deaths, in our fallen state. Power, which will sometimes be exercised with rigor. H.—Moses here shews the original and natural subjection of wives to their husbands, in opposition to the Egyptians, who, to honour Isis, gave women the superiority by the marriage contract. Diod. i. 2. C.

Ver. 17. Thy work, sin; thy perdition is from thyself: this is all that man can challenge for his own. H.

Ver. 18. Thorns, &c. These were created at first, but they would have easily been kept under: now they grow with surprising luxuriancy, and the necessities of life can be procured only with much labour. All men here are commanded to work, each in his proper department. The Jews were careful to teach their children some trade or useful occupation. S. Paul made tents, and proclaims, If any man will not work, neither let him eat. 2 Thess. 3:10. C.

Ver. 19. Dust, as to the visible part; and thy soul created out of nothing. This might serve to correct that pride, by which Adam had fallen; and the same humbling truths are repeated to us by the Church every Ash-Wednesday, to guard us against the same contagion, the worm of pride, to which we are all so liable. Thus Adam was again assured that he should die the death, with which God had threatened him, and which the devil had told Eve would not be inflicted. V. 4. God created man incorruptible, (inexterminabilem, immortal). But by the envy of the devil, death came into the world. Wisdom 2:23. H.

Ver. 20. The living. Heb. chai, one who brings forth alive, (Symmachus) or one who imparts life, in which she was a figure of the blessed Virgin. C.—Adam gives his wife this new name, in gratitude for not being cut off by death on the very day of his transgression, as he had every reason to expect and fear he would have been. C. 2:17. H.—The printed Hebrew reads here, and in many other place, Eva, he, instead of Eja, she; thus, He was the mother, v. 12. he gave, &c. an inaccuracy unknown to the Samar. and the best MS. copies. Kennicott.

Ver. 21. Of skins, which Adam took from the beasts which he offered in sacrifice to his merciful Judge, testifying thereby that he had forfeited his life, and uniting himself to that sacrifice of the woman's promised seed, by which alone he believed the sin of the world was to be expiated. H.

Ver. 22. Behold Adam, &c. This was spoken by way of reproaching him with his pride, in affecting a knowledge that might make him like to God. Ch.—“These are the words of God, not insulting over man, but deterring others from an imitation of his pride.” S. Aug. de Gen. xi. 39.—For ever. The sentence is left imperfect: (C.) but by driving man from Paradise, God sufficiently shewed how he would prevent from eating of the tree of life, (H.) which Adam had not yet found. As he was now condemned to be miserable on earth, God, in mercy, prevented him from tasting of that fruit, which would have rendered his misery perpetual. M.—He would suffer him to die, that, by death, he might come, after a life of 930 years, spent in sorrow and repentance, to the enjoyment of himself. H.—Lest perhaps. God does not exercise his absolute power, or destroy free-will, but makes use of ordinary means and precautions, to effect his designs. S. Aug. W.

Ver. 24. Cherubims. Angels of the highest order, and of a very complex figure, unlike any one living creature. Theodoret supposes that God forced Adam to retire from that once charming abode, by the apparition of hideous spectres. The devils were also hindered from coming hither, lest they should pluck the fruit of the tree of life, and by promising immortality, should attract men to their service. The flaming sword, might be a fire rising out of the earth, of which Grotius thinks the pits, near Babylon, are still vestiges. These dreadful indications of the divine wrath would probably disappear, when Paradise had lost its superior beauty, and become confounded with the surrounding countries—Thus we have seen how rapidly Moses describes the creation of all things, the fall of man, and the promised redemption. But in these few lines, we discover a solution of the many difficulties which have perplexed the learned, respecting these most important subjects. We know that the world is not the effect of chance, but created and governed by divine Providence. We are no longer at the loss to explain the surprising contrast of good and evil, observable in the same man. When we have attentively considered the Old Adam and the New, we find a clue to lead us through all the labyrinths of our Holy Religion. We could wish, perhaps, for a greater detail in Moses, but he left the rest to be supplied by tradition. He has thrown light enough upon the subjects, to guide the well-disposed, and has left sufficient darkness to humble and to confound the self-conceited and wicked, who loved darkness rather than the light. C.—Concerning the transactions of these early times, parents would no doubt be careful to instruct their children, by word of mouth, before any of the Scriptures were written; and Moses might derive much information from the same source, as a very few persons formed the chain of tradition, when they lived so many hundred years. Adam would converse with Mathusalem, who knew Sem, as the latter lived in the days of Abram. Isaac, Joseph, and Amram, the father of Moses, were contemporaries: so that seven persons might keep up the memory of things which had happened 2500 years before. But to entitle these accounts to absolute authority, the inspiration of God intervenes; and thus we are convinced, that no word of sacred writers can be questioned. H.

Ver. 1. Through God. Heb. may signify also: “even God,” as if she thought this was the promised seed, who, as Onkelos paraphrases it, would serve the Lord. C.—So little could she foresee the future conduct of Cain, whose name may be derived either from kone, possession and acquisition, or from kun, lamentation. The latter interpretation would have been better verified by the event, and the name of Abel, vanity, or sorrow, for which his parents allege no reason, might also have been reversed, on account of his justice, for which he is canonized by Christ himself, and declared the Just. Pious and significant names were imposed by either parent. Cain was the second man. He was not conceived till after the fall, and was therefore the first born in original sin. H.

Ver. 4. Had respect. That is, shewed his acceptance of his sacrifice (as coming from a heart full of devotion): and that we may suppose, by some visible token, such as sending fire from heaven upon his offerings. Ch.—The offerings of Cain are mentioned without any approbation: those of Abel are the firstlings and fat, or the very best; by which he testified, that he acknowledged God for his first beginning. Sacrifice is due to God alone, and to Him it has always been offered in the Church. We have the happiness to offer that truly eucharistic sacrifice to God, of which those of ancient times were only figures. What sacrifice can our erring brethren shew? W. C.

Ver. 7. Over it. This is a clear proof of free-will. To destroy its force, Protestants translate over him, as if Cain should still retain his privilege of the first-born, notwithstanding all his wickedness, and should rule over Abel, who would willingly submit, “unto thee his desire,” &c. But God had made no mention of Abel. The whole discourse is about doing well or ill; and Cain is encouraged to avoid the stings of conscience, by altering his conduct, as it was in his power, how strongly soever his passions might solicit him to evil. H.—The Hebrew is understood by Onkelos, and the Targum of Jerusalem, in the sense of the Vulgate. The latter reads, “If thou correct thy proceedings in this life, thou wilt receive pardon in the next world. But if thou do not penance for thy sin, it shall remain till the day of the great judgment, and it shall stay, lying at the door of thy heart. But I have given thee power to govern thy concupiscence: thou shalt sway it, either to embrace good or evil.” Calmet shews that the Hebrew perfectly admits of this sense. S. Augustine will not allow of the turn which the Manichees gave it. “Thou shalt have dominion over (illius.) What? thy brother! (absit) by no means: over what then, but sin? De C. xv. 7. Protestants formerly abandoned the translation of 1579, (which they have again resumed) and translated better, “unto thee shall be the desire thereof, and thou shalt rule over it,” which R. Abenezra explains also of sin. To which of these editions, all given by royal authority, will Protestants adhere? Luther wrote a book against free-will, and Calvin would not admit the very name. But we, with all antiquity, must cry out with S. Jerom, c. Jov. 2: “God made us with free-will, neither are we drawn by necessity to virtue or vice; else where there is necessity, there is neither damnation nor reward.” W. H.

Ver. 8. Let us go forth abroad. These words are now wanting in the Hebrew; being omitted, according to Kennicott, since the days of Aquila 130; they are found in the Samaritan copy and version, in the Sept. &c. H.—The Masorets place a mark, as if something were defective here, and in 27 other verses, or in 25 at least. H.—Abel’s violent death was a figure of that of Jesus Christ, inflicted for the like cause. See Heb. 12:2. C.—In consequence of these crimes, Cain separated from the Church, and the Jews became no longer God’s people: both Cain and the Jews became vagabonds. H.—The Targum of Jerusalem observes, that Cain talked against God’s providence and the future world, which Abel hearing with marked indignation, Cain took occasion to kill him. W.

Ver. 13. My iniquity, &c. Like Judas, Cain despairs. The Rabbins make him complain of the rigour of God's judgment, "My sin (or punishment) is too great to be borne." I must then be driven from the land of my nativity, from the society of my brethren and parents, from thy presence, for ever. Why do I then live? Let the first man I meet, kill me. Liran.

Ver. 14. Every one that findeth me, shall kill me. His guilty conscience made him fear his own brothers, and nephews; of whom, by this time, there might be a good number upon the earth: which had now endured near 130 years; as may be gathered from Gen. 5:3, compared with Chap. 4:25, though in the compendious account given in the Scripture, only Cain and Abel are mentioned. Ch.—Cain is little concerned about any thing but the loss of life. M.

Ver. 15. Set a mark, &c. The more common opinion of the interpreters of holy writ, supposes this mark to have been a trembling of the body; or a horror and consternation in his countenance. Ch.—God gave this first murderer a reprieve, allowing him time for repentance; but he neglected it, and died a reprobate; having been, during life, the head of an apostate church, and of the city of the devil, which has ever since opposed the city of God, and the society of the faithful. Though all his posterity were drowned in the deluge, some were soon found, even in the family of Noe, who stood up for the wretched pre-eminence in wickedness and rebellion, against the truth. See S. Aug. W. &c. H.

Ver. 16. A fugitive, according to his sentence. Heb. nod, which the Sept. have taken for a proper name. "In the land of Naid, over against Eden," (H.) or in the fields of Nyse, in Hyrcania, to the east of Eden and Armenia. C.

Ver. 17. His wife. She was a daughter of Adam, and Cain's own sister; God dispensing with such marriages in the beginning of the world, as mankind could not otherwise be propagated.—He built a city, viz. In process of time, when his race was multiplied, so as to be numerous enough to people it. For in the many hundred years he lived, his race might be multiplied even to millions. Ch.—The Hanuchta, which Ptolemy places in Susiana, (C.) may perhaps have been built after the flood, in the same place. Josephus says, Cain was the first who fortified a city; designing it for a retreat, where he might keep the fruits of his robberies. Ant. 1. 3. Peirere founds his ill-concerted system of Preadamites, or of men existing before Adam, on the history of Cain exercising husbandry, building a city, &c.; as if there were any difficulty in supposing, that the arts would have made some progress in the lapse of above a century. H.

Ver. 19. Two wives. Lamech first transgressed the law of having only one wife at a time. C. 11:24. None before the deluge is mentioned as having followed his example, even among the abandoned sons of men. Abraham, the father of the faithful, and some others, after that event, when the age of man was shortened, and the number of the true servants of God very small, were dispensed with by God, who tolerated the custom of having many wives at the same time among the Jews, till our Saviour brought things back to the ancient standard. Mat. 19:4. And why do we excuse the patriarchs, while we condemn Lamech? Because the one being associated with the wicked, gives us reason to judge unfavourably of him, while Abraham is constantly mentioned in Scripture with terms of approbation and praise, and therefore we have no right to pass sentence of condemnation upon him, as some Protestants have done, after the Manichees. Hence the fathers defend the one, and reject the other with abhorrence. H.—Tert. (Monog. c. 5.) and S. Jerom, c. Jovin. 1. says, “Lamech, first of all, a bloody murderer, divided one flesh between two wives.” It was never lawful, says P. Innocent III. c. Gaudemus, for any one to have many wives at once, unless leave was given by divine revelation;” and S. Aug. joins with him in defending the patriarchs, by this reason, “When it was the custom, it was not a sin.”

Ver. 22. Noema, who is supposed to have invented the art of spinning. C.—All these worthy people were distinguished for their proficiency in the arts, while they neglected the study of religion and virtue. H.—The inventors of arts among the Greeks lived mostly after the siege of Troy. C.

Ver. 23. Said. This is the most ancient piece of poetry with which we are acquainted. Fleury.—Lamech may be considered as the father of poets. H.—I have slain a man, &c. It is the tradition of the Hebrews, that Lamech in hunting slew Cain, mistaking him for a wild beast: and that having discovered what he had done, he beat so unmercifully the youth, by whom he was led into that mistake, that he died of the blows. Ch.—S. Jerom, 9. 1. ad Dam. acknowledges the difficulty of this passage, on which Origen wrote two whole books. W.

Ver. 24. Seventy times. A similar expression occurs, Mat. 18:22 to denote a great but indefinite number. God had promised to revenge the murder of Cain seven fold, though he had sinned voluntarily; so Lamech hopes that, as he had acted by mistake, and blinded by passion, in striking the stripling, the son of Tubalcain, he would deserve to be protected still more from falling a prey to the fury of any other. But many reject this tradition as fabulous, unknown to Philo, Josephus, &c. Moses nowhere mentions the death of Cain. Some, therefore, understand this passage with an interrogation; as if, to convince his wives that his sin was not so enormous as was supposed, he should say, Do not think of leaving me. What! have I killed a young man, as Cain did Abel, and still he is suffered to live unmolested; or have I beaten any one so that I should be punished? Onkelos, in effect, puts a negation to the same purport, "I have not killed, &c.:" (C.) others understand this passage, as if Lamech considered his crimes as much more grievous than even those of Cain.

Ver. 26. Began to call upon, &c. Not that Adam and Seth had not called upon God before the birth of Enos, but that Enos used more solemnity in the worship and invocation of God. Ch.—He directed all his thoughts towards heaven, being reminded by his own name, which signifies one afflicted, that he could look for no solid happiness on earth. Seth had brought him up, from his infancy, in these pious sentiments, and his children were so docile to his instructions, that they began to be known in the world for their extraordinary piety, and were even styled the Sons of God. C. 6:2. H.—Religion was not a human invention, but many ceremonies have been adopted, at different times, to make an impression on the minds of the people. Before Enos, the heads of families had officiated in their own houses; now, perhaps, they met together in places consecrated to the divine service, and sounded forth the praises of the Most High. Enos was probably most conspicuous for his zeal on these occasions: at least, a new degree of fervour manifested itself in his days. On the other hand, "the name of the Lord began to be profaned" about this time, as the Rabbin understand this passage, by the introduction of idolatry; which is a common effect of a dissolute life, which many began now to lead. Wis. 14:12. C.—The beginning of fornication is the devising of idols. We have, nevertheless, no certain proof of idols being introduced till many years after the deluge. H.

Ver. 2. Adam: the common name of mankind, made to the likeness of God. H.

Ver. 5. He died. Eccles. 14:12 says very justly, the covenant of this world is, he shall surely die. God prolonged the lives of the patriarchs to a more advanced age, that the world might be sooner filled. Their constitution was then more excellent, the fruits of the earth more nourishing, &c. But the sole satisfactory reason for their living almost a thousand years, while we can hardly arrive at 70, is, because so it pleased God, in whose hands are all our lots. There is a great difference in the number of years assigned by the Hebrew and Vulgate, from that which the Samaritan copy mentions; and the Sept. differs from both. Whether the difference be real, or only apparent, we shall not pretend to determine. The Church has not decided which system of chronology is the most accurate. In the Martyrology, she adopts that of the Sept. and placed the birth of Christ in 5199, after Eusebius and Bede, though Riccioli calculates the Sept. at 5634 years. H.—Adam died penitent, as we are assured by the Holy Ghost. Wis. 10:2.; and tradition affirms the same of Eve, insomuch that the heresy of the Encratites, who condemned our first parents to hell, was exploded with horror. Epip. S. Aug. in hæres. T.

Ver. 24. Walked with God. Sept. “was pleasing to God,” by continual recollection and watchfulness over himself. Thus he became perfect.—Was seen no more; or, as S. Paul reads, after the Sept. he was not found. Heb. 11:5.—God took him alive to some place unknown, which is commonly supposed to be Paradise, conformably to Ecclus. 44:16 though in Greek we do not read Paradise. Henoch pleased God, and was translated [into Paradise,] that he may give repentance to the nations. To him, that of Wisdom 4:10 may be applied: He ... was beloved, and living among sinners, he was translated. He will come again, when the charity of many of his children, (for we all spring from him) shall have grown cold; and shall at last suffer death for opposing Antichrist. Apoc. 11. H.—“Though it be not an article of faith, whether Henoch be now in that Paradise, from which Adam and Eve were driven, or in some other delightful place; yet the holy Scriptures affirm, that God translated him alive, that he might not experience death,” S. Chrys. hom. 21. with whom the other fathers agree, cited in the Douay Bible; so that it is a matter of surprise, how any Protestant can call it in question. He is the other witness, who will come with Elias, before the great day of the Lord, to perform the same office to the nations, as the latter will to the Jews. Malac. 4. God preserves these two alive, perhaps to give us a striking proof how he could have treated Adam and his posterity, if they had not sinned; and also to confirm our hopes of immortality, when we shall have paid the debt of nature. W.

Ver. 29. Noe means consolation, or repose. After he had beheld the most dreadful catastrophe or disturbance that ever happened in the world, he settled mankind once more in the friendship of God, and merited a blessing both for himself and for the whole earth. He gave, likewise, comfort to all, by useful inventions in agriculture, and in the art of making wine. He saw an end of the distractions caused by the wicked sons of Cain, and became the restorer of a new world: in a word, he was the progenitor of the Messias, who is the King of Peace, and our only solid comfort. M. H.

Ver. 31. Old. It is wonderful if Noe had no children before this time; but he might have had many, whom the Scripture does not mention, either because they were dead before the deluge, or taking evil courses with the daughters of men, deserved to perish with them. Noe kept the three, who were born after God had foretold the deluge, with the greatest care, under his own eyes. S. Augustine (C. D. xv. 20.) thinks, however, that many of the Patriarchs had no children till they were pretty far advanced in years. As Sem was born when Noe was 502, and Cham was the youngest, Japheth must have been the first-born. Comp. C. 10:21., with C. 9:24. There is no reason to suppose they were all born the same year. C.

Ver. 1. Daughters. These had borne equal proportion with the males from the beginning; but here they are particularized, because they were the chief instruments in corrupting the descendants of Seth. H.—Even the sons of these libidinous people were so effeminate, as to deserve to be called women. M.

Ver. 2. The sons of God. The descendants of Seth and Enos are here called Sons of God, from their religion and piety: whereas the ungodly race of Cain, who by their carnal affections lay grovelling upon the earth, are called the children of men. The unhappy consequence of the former marrying with the latter, ought to be a warning to Christians to be very circumspect in their marriages; and not to suffer themselves to be determined in choice by their carnal passion, to the prejudice of virtue or religion. Ch.—See S. Chrys. hom. 22, &c. Some copies of the Sept. having the angels of God, induced some of the ancients to suppose, that these spiritual beings (to whom, by another mistake, they attributed a sort of aerial bodies) had commerce with women, as the pagans derived their heroes from a mortal and a god. But this notion, which is borrowed from the book of Henoch, is quite exploded. C.—The distinction of the true Church from the synagogue of satan, here established, has been ever since retained, as heretics are still distinguished from Catholics. W. S. Aug.

Ver. 3. His days shall be, &c. The meaning is, that man's days, which before the flood were usually 900 years, should now be reduced to 120 years. Or rather, that God would allow men this term of 120 years, for their repentance and conversion, before he would send the deluge. Ch.—He spoke therefore to Noe in his 480th year. S. Aug.—Those who suppose, that he foretold this event 20 years later, think with S. Jerom, that God retrenched 20 years from the time first assigned for penance. The Spirit of the sovereign Judge was fired with contending; or, as others translate it, with remaining quiet as in a scabbard, and bearing with the repeated crimes of men. He resolved to punish them severely in this world, that he might shew mercy to some of them hereafter. S. Jer. 9. Heb. C.—If we suppose, that God here threatens to reduce the space of man's life to 120 years, we must say, at least, that he did it by degrees; for many lived several hundred years, even after the deluge. In the days of Moses, indeed, few exceeded that term. But we think the other interpretation is more literal, and that God bore with mankind the full time which he promised. W.

Ver. 4. Giants. It is likely the generality of men before the flood were of a gigantic stature, in comparison with what men now are. But these here spoken of, are called giants, as being not only tall in stature, but violent and savage in their dispositions, and mere monsters of cruelty and lust. Ch.—Yet we need not imagine, that they were such as the poets describe, tearing up mountains, and hurling them against heaven. Being offspring of men, who had lived hitherto with great temperance, but now gave full scope to their passions, and the love of the fair daughters whom they chose, we need not wonder that they should be amazingly strong and violent. Nephilim, rushing on, as Ag. translates. That there have been giants of an unusual size, all historians testify. Og, Goliath, &c. are mentioned in Scripture, and the sons of Enac are represented as much above the common size, as the Hebrews were greater than grasshoppers. Num. 13:33. If we should suppose they were four or five times our size, would that be more wonderful that they should live nine or ten times as long as we do? See S. Aug. C. D. xv. 9. 23. Calmet's Dissert. &c. Delrio affirms, that in 1572 he saw at Rouen, a native of Piedmont, above nine feet high. H.—Of old. The corruption of morals had commenced many ages ago, and some of the sons of Seth had given way to their lusts; so that we are not to suppose, that these giants were all born within a hundred years of the flood, as some might suppose from their being mentioned here, after specifying the age of Noe. C. 5:31. H.

Ver. 5. At all times. Hebrew: only evil continually. They had no relish for any thing else: as we may say of a glutton, he thinks of nothing but his belly. Yet some good thoughts would occur occasionally, and we may grant that they did some things which were not sinful. M.—If we follow corrupt nature, and live among sinners, we find a law within us warring against the spirit; and a very powerful grace is necessary to rescue us from such a dangerous situation. C.—Though the expressions in this place seem general, they must be understood with some limitations. W.

Ver. 6. It repented him, &c. God, who is unchangeable, is not capable of repentance, grief, or any other passion. But these expressions are used to declare the enormity of the sins of men, which was so provoking as to determine their Creator to destroy these his creatures, whom before he had so much favoured. Ch.—God acted outwardly as a man would do who repented. H.

Ver. 8. Grace. Notwithstanding the general denunciation against all flesh, we see here that God will not confound the just with the guilty, in the same punishment. Noe pleased God, by observing the most perfect justice, in the midst of a corrupt generation. S. Chrys. &c. W.

Ver. 12. Its way, being abandoned to the most shameful and unnatural sins. Liran.

Ver. 13. All flesh. I will destroy all these carnal and wicked people, and, because all other creatures were made only for man's use, and will be useless, I will involve them in the common ruin, reserving only what will be necessary for the support of the few who shall be preserved, and for the repeopling of the earth. H.

Ver. 14. Timber planks. Heb. “gopher wood,” which is no where else mentioned in Scripture. It was probably a sort of wood full of rosin, and being besmeared with something like our pitch, was capable of resisting the fury of the ensuing tremendous storm, for a length of time. C. H.—Rooms to separate the birds, various animals, provisions, &c.—Pitch, lit. “besmear it with bitumen,” which has a very strong smell, able to counteract the disagreeable odours arising from beasts confined. M.—It might be mixed with some other ingredients, naphtha, pitch, &c. C.

Ver. 15. Three hundred cubits, &c. The ark, according to the dimensions here set down, contained four hundred and fifty thousand square cubits; which were more than enough to contain all the kinds of living creatures, with all necessary provisions: even supposing the cubits here spoken of to have been only a foot and a half each, which was the least kind of cubits. Ch.—It is therefore unnecessary for us to have recourse, with Cappel, to the sacred cubit, which was twice as large as the common one, but which seems not to have been in use among the Jews before the Babylonian captivity. Still less need we adopt the geometrical cubit, which contains six ordinary ones, as we might be authorised to do by the great names of Origen and S. Aug. de C. D. xv. 27. q. in Gen. 1:4. These dimensions would make the ark as large as a city. Moses always speaks of the same sort of cubit, used probably in Egypt. Apelles and other heretics, with some modern infidels, have attempted to shew, that this account of Moses is fabulous. But they have been amply refuted by able calculators, John Buteo, Pelletier, &c. This amazing structure, for which God himself gave the plan, was divided with three stories, besides the lower part of the vessel, which might serve to keep fresh water. The different species of animals are not so numerous, as some imagine. Fishes, and such creatures as can live in water, would not need to come into the ark. Animals deprived of exercise, and allowed barely what may support nature, will live upon a very little. Even an ox, according to Columella, will live on 30 pounds of hay, or on a cubic foot, a whole day, so that 400 of these large creatures might be supported on 146,000 cubic feet. The middle story, for provisions, would alone contain 150,000 cubits. Noe's family, and the birds, would probably occupy the room above, in which was a window all around, of the height of a cubit, without glass or crystal, which were not yet invented, but defended with lattice work of wood, like our dairy rooms. H.

Ver. 16. In a cubit. This is understood by some, of the height of the window; by others, of the roof, which would be almost flat, like the top of a coach. Menoch supposes, that the whole ark was to be measured with the cubit in every part, from the bottom to the top; and the words of it, properly refer to the ark.—Side, or at the end, about the middle way, that the animals might be conveyed easily to their stalls. The door would open into the story allotted to the beasts, and all things might enter it by a sort of bridge, or by sloping planks. C.—Ordure might be thrown down into the lowest part of the ark, separated from the reservoir of fresh water, or might be brought up with ropes and buckets to the window at the top, which would easily open. T.

Ver. 18. My covenant, that thou shalt be saved, amid the general ruin. This is the second covenant of God with men: the first was with Adam, the third with Abraham, when circumcision was instituted, and the last with Moses. Ex. 19. All others were only ratifications of these; and even these were only figures of that which our Saviour entered into with men, when he undertook to make satisfaction for them to his Father. C.

Ver. 19. Two, intended for the propagation of their kind. God afterwards specifies what more Noe should preserve for food. C. 7:2. C.—Wild beasts forgot their savage nature, and became subject to the just Noe; and all came readily at his beck, in the same manner as domestic animals come when we offer them food. Yet, in all this we must acknowledge the work of God, and a sort of miracle. H.

Ver. 2. Of all clean. The distinction of clean and unclean beasts, appears to have been made before the law of Moses, which was not promulgated till the year of the world 2514. Ch.—Clean: not according to the law of Moses, which was not yet given, but such as tradition had described—fit for sacrifice; (M.) though they might be of the same species as were deemed clean in the law, which ratified the ancient institution.—And seven: (Heb.) simply seven, three couple and an odd female, for sacrifice after the deluge: one couple was to breed, the other two perhaps for food. H.—Some imagine, that there were fourteen unclean and four clean animals, of every species, in the ark, because the Sam., Sept., and Vulg. read, “seven and seven.” Origen, &c.—But our Saviour, sending the Disciples to preach two and two, did not appoint a company of four to go together, but only of two, as is generally allowed. Mark 6:7. C.

Ver. 11. Seventeenth day. On the tenth, God had given the last warning to the wretched and obstinate sinners, to whom Noe had been preaching, both by word and by building the ark, for 120 years; all in vain. This second month is, by some, supposed to be the month of May; by others, that of November. Usher makes Noe enter the ark on the 18th Dec. 1656. The waters decreased May 17, mountains appear July 31, he sends out the raven Sept. 8, and leaves the ark Dec. 29, after having remained in it a year and ten days, according to the antediluvian computation, or a full year of 365 days. The systems of those pretended philosophers, who would represent this flood as only partial, affecting the countries which were then inhabited, are all refuted by the plain narration of Moses. What part of the world could have been secure, when the waters prevailed fifteen cubits above the highest mountains? To give a natural cause only for this miraculous effect, would be nugatory: but as waters covered the earth at first, so they surely might again, by the power of God. H.—Fountains and flood-gates. These are the two natural causes which Moses assigns for the deluge, the waters below, and those above in the sky or firmament.

Heaven is said to be shut when it does not rain, (Luc. 4:25) so it is here opened, and flood-gates, or torrents of rain, pour down incessantly. But God attributes not the deluge to these causes alone; he sufficiently intimates that it would be miraculous, (v. 4. I will rain,) and still more emphatically, (C. 6:17.) Behold I. Heb. “I, even I myself, do bring on a flood of waters.” The idea which Moses give of the flood, corresponds with that which he before gave of chaos, when earth and water were undistinguished in one confusing mass. c. 1:6. The Hebrews look upon it as a continual miracle, that the earth is not always deluged, being founded, as they represent it, on the waters. Jer. 5:22. Calmet and others have proved, both from Scripture and from philosophical arguments, the universality of the deluge, against Isaac Vossius, &c. H.

Ver. 16. The Lord shut him in, by an angel besmearing the door with pitch, to prevent the waters from penetrating, while Noe did the like in the inside. C.—Thus God supplies our wants when we are not able to provide for ourselves, and though he could do all by himself, yet he requires us to co-operate with him, and often makes use of secondary causes. W.

Ver. 24. Days: counting from the end of the forty days, when the deluge was at its height. C.—In all the histories of past ages, there is nothing so terrible as this event. What became of all those myriads of human beings who perished on this occasion? We know not. Some have charitably supposed, that, although the far greater part perished everlastingly, a few who had been incredulous while Noe preached, opened their eyes at last, when it was too late to save their bodies, and by sincere repentance rescued their souls from the flames, and were consigned to do penance, for a time, in the other world. These heard the preaching of J. C., or believed in his redemption, while they were yet living, and so deserved to partake of his mercies, and joyfully beheld his sacred person when he came to visit them in their prison of purgatory. 1 Pet. 3:19. He came and preached to those spirits that were in prison: which had been sometime incredulous, when they waited for the patience of God in the days of Noe, when the ark was a building: wherein a few, that is eight souls, were saved from drowning by water. Whereunto baptism, being of the like form, now saves you also, &c. See F. S. Bellarmine, &c. In these last words of S. Peter, we may also notice, that the ark was a figure of baptism, which is so necessary, that without its reception, or desire of it at least, no man can be saved. It is also a figure of the cross, and of the one true Church, as the Fathers remark, with S. Aug. de C. D. xv. i. M. &c. S. Greg. hom. 12 in Ezech. &c.—This is so striking that it deserves to be seriously considered. It was only one, though God could have ordered many smaller vessels to be made ready, perhaps with less inconvenience to Noe, that we might reflect, out of the Church the obstinate will surely perish. S. Jer. ep. ad Dam.: In this ark all that were truly holy, and some imperfect, like Cham, were contained, clean beasts and unclean dwelt together, that we need not wonder if some Catholics be a disgrace to their name. The ark had different partitions, to remind us of the various orders of Clergy and Laity in the Church, with one chief governor, the Pope, like Noe in the ark. It was strong, visible, &c. and pitched all over with the durable cement, bitumen, and riding triumphant amid the storms, the envy of all who were out of it, till at last it settled upon a rock. So the Church is built on a rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail: she is not less obvious to the sincere seeker, than a city built on the top of the highest mountain, &c. We might here take a retrospective view of the chief occurrences and personages of the former world; we should observe the same order of the things from the beginning,—the conflict of virtue and vice, the preservation of the true faith and worship of God among a few chosen souls, who preferred to be persecuted by worldlings, rather than to offend God. They contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the Saints, to Adam and Eve, once innocent, and afterwards penitent. We behold original sin, and the promised remedy for mankind; while the rebel angels are abandoned, without redress. There was kept up a communion of saints: sacrifice to the one God was performed generally by the heads of families, who were priests in the law of nature. Even Cain, though a bad man, through hypocrisy, chose to offer sacrifice before he had quite broken off from the society of the faithful, and resolved to become the father of all excommunicated persons, and of all seceders. C. 4:16. He was admonished by God that he had free will, and might merit a reward by a different conduct. His sentence, as well as that pronounced upon Adam, and upon all mankind, before the flood, reminds us of the particular and general judgment; as the translation of Henoch sets before us the happy state of the blessed, and the immortality, of which it was an earnest. See Douay Bible, where the chief mysteries of faith are pointed out as the creed of the Antediluvians. Even the B. Trinity was insinuated, or shewn to them, at a distance, in various texts: the unity and indissolubility of marriage were clearly expressed; the true Church continued in Noe, while the chain of schismatics and heretics was broken, and Cain's progeny destroyed. In this period of time, we may discover what the ancients so often describe respecting the four ages:—the golden age is most perfectly found in Paradise; but only for a few days, or perhaps only a few hours, during which our first parents preserved their innocence. The silver age may have lasted rather longer, till the murder of Abel, or 128 years, when Cain began to disturb the peace of the world. From that time, till the giants make their appearance, we may reckon the age of brass. But that of iron had continued for many years before the flood. The like deterioration of morals we may discover after the deluge, and again after the renovation of the world, by the preaching of the gospel. For some time after these two great events, things bore a pleasing aspect; Noe was busy in offering sacrifice to God, Christians were all one heart and one soul, enjoying all things in common, and God gave a blessing to the earth, and confirmed his covenant with men. Then Cham, Nemrod, and Babel appear, heresies in the new law break forth, and disturb the lovely harmony of mankind: but still a sufficient number preserve their integrity, till about the days of Abraham and Arius, in their respective periods, and may be said to have lived in the silver age, when compared with the brazen insolence of the great majority of those who came after. The iron age of these two periods, may be dated from the persecution of Epiphaneus against the Jews, when so many apostatized from the faith, and from that much more terrible persecution which will be raised against Christians by Antichrist, the man of sin, (of which the former was a type) when the charity of many shall grow cold, and Christ will hardly find faith upon the earth. To that age may just be applied, those strong expressions of disapprobation which God made use of before the flood. G. 6:3. 6. 12. He will punish the crimes of that age with a deluge of fire, and say, The end of all flesh is come before me, &c. v. 13. Time shall be no longer. Apoc. 10:6. H.

Ver. 1. Remembered; not as if God had ever forgotten Noe, but he now shews his remembrance of him by the effects. M.—A wind, literally a spirit, which S. Amb. and Theodoret understood of the Holy Ghost, that, as he moved over the waters at first, (C. 1:2) to give them fecundity, and to exercise his power in establishing order, so he may shew the same care and providence for this new world, emerging, like the former, from the waters. H.—Most interpreters, however, understand this of a violent wind, (Prov. 25:23. Ex. 14:21) a strong blast, such as was sent to divide the Red sea. M.

Ver. 3. And the waters returned, &c. S. Jerom on this passage remarks, “that all waters and torrents repair to the womb of the abyss, through the hidden veins of the earth,” and by the abyss understands the sea: according to that of Ecclesiastes, 1:7, all the rivers run into the sea. But as the sea itself, on this occasion, exceeded its limits, (otherwise its waters would not have been higher than the land) the sense perhaps confined to this, that the waters by degrees were diminished; as we may say of the inundations of land, that the waters are gone off, not by the regular course of ditches, but from the effects of the sun and winds which dry them up. E.

Ver. 4. And the ark rested on the mountains of Armenia. The Hebrew word is Ararat, which also occurs in the 37th chap. of Isaias, and the 51st of Jeremias; for in these places our interpreter retained the Hebrew word, but in the 4th book of Kings, 19:37, where the same history is related, it is translated by the land of the Armenians. E.—Seventh month, of the year, not of the deluge, as appears from ver. 13, &c. M.—Seven and twentieth. So also the Sept., but the Heb. &c. have the 17th. It is not easy to decide which is right. On the seventeenth the waters only began to decrease, and some hence argue for the Vulgate, as they say it is not probable the ark would stop that very day. C.—This, however, might be the only mean by which Noe could discern that the waters were abating. H.—The ark being about fourteen cubits sunk in the water, might soon touch the summit of the highest mountains, such as M. Taurus, of which the Ararat, here mentioned in the Hebrew, a mountain of Armenia, forms a part, according to S. Jerom. The Armenians still boast that they have the remains of the ark. Berosus, the Pagan historian, says bitumen was taken from it as a preservative. Jos. Ant. 1. 3. Eus. præp. ix. 4. The Chaldee has Cordu for Ararat, whence some have supposed, that the ark rested on the Cordyeon or Gordiean mountains. The Armenians call the mountain near Erivan, Mesesonsar, or the mountain of the ark. C.

Ver. 7. Did not return. The negotiation Not, is not to be found in any Hebrew copy now extant; though it is still retained by the Septuagint, and several Latin manuscripts, according to the testimony of Liranus. If we add here, therefore, to the Hebrew text, we must translate it with S. Jerom, thus; It went forth, going and returning, (Egrediebatur exiens et revertens,) sometimes repairing to the mountains, where it found carcasses to feed on, and at other times returning not unto the ark, but to rest upon the top of it. E. Ch.—Or receded farther from it; as the Hebrew may be explained, agreeably to the Vulgate, Sept. Syr. &c. which admit the negation. C.—Till, as long as the waters covered the earth, not that it returned to the ark afterwards. M.

Ver. 9. Whole earth, excepting the mountains; so that the dove presently returned. H.

Ver. 11. Green leaves. The olive tree preserves its verdure and grows even at the bottom of the Red sea, and other seas in the East. Plin. xii. 25.—Many other trees and seeds will live for a long time under the waters. C.—This tender branch of the olive seems to agree better with the spring than autumn; whence Tirin infers, that the deluge began and ended in spring.

Ver. 13. Year of Noe's age, who, we may suppose, was born on the first day of the year. So that his 601st year corresponds with the 1657th of the world, B.C. 2343, on which day the deluge ended. Still Noe waited for God's order to leave the ark till the 27th of the ensuing month, when the earth was more perfectly dried. H.—Covering. Some think that the window was at the top, like a sky-light. C.

Ver. 17. Increase. Heb. "let them increase." This is spoken of the brute creation, the blessing is given to men. C. 9.—Neither Noe's family, nor any of the animals, had any young in the ark. C.

Ver. 20. Holocausts, or whole burnt offerings. In which the whole victim was consumed by fire upon God's altar, and no part was reserved for the use of priest or people. Ch.—This is the first time we read of an altar, though Abel had surely made use of one. M.—Noe delays not to shew his gratitude to God. S. Amb.

Ver. 21. Smelled, &c. A figurative expression, denoting that God was pleased with the sacrifices which his servant offered, (Ch.) and in this sense it is expressed in the Chaldee, "God received his offering gratefully." God requires sacrifices of us, to testify his dominion, and not for any advantage he derives from them; but rather to bless us, if we perform our duty with fervour.—For the sake of, or on account of men's sins. They are so prone to evil, that, if I were to punish them as often as they deserve, new deluges might be sent every day. I take pity on their weakness. I will punish the most criminal, but not as I have done, by cursing the earth. These words of God, are by some addressed to Noe, by others to God the Son. Heb. "he said to his heart;" Onkelos, "he said in his word;" Sept. "he said with reflection." C.—Noe was beloved by God, and therefore may be called his heart. To speak to the heart, often means to comfort. H.

Ver. 22. Seed-time, according to the Targum of Jonathan, is the equinox of September; harvest, that of March; winter and summer denote the solstice of December and of June. But the Hebrews probably divided the year into summer and winter; or perhaps they might also admit the season of spring, with the Egyptians and the ancient Greeks, who represented the seasons by the three hours, daughters of Jupiter. C.

Ver. 1. Blessed, with fecundity. Barrenness was deemed a curse. C.

Ver. 2. Fear, &c. God confirms the dominion of man over all the animals, though he must exercise it now by compulsion; they will not obey always without reluctance, as they would have done in the state of innocence. H.

Ver. 3. Meat. The more religious, at least, had hitherto abstained from flesh, being content with herbs, &c.: which had been expressly granted. Now, the salt waters of the deluge had vitiated the earth, its plants were no longer so nutritive. M.—God gives leave to eat flesh meat, but with some restriction, that we may still learn to obey. W.

Ver. 4. With blood. This was a matter of indifference in itself, like the forbidden fruit. But God gave the prohibition, to keep people at a greater distance from imbruing their hands in the blood of others, which nevertheless we know some have drunk! He would also assert his dominion over all things; the blood or life of animals being reserved to be offered in sacrifice to him, instead of the life of man. Lev. 17:11. Blood of brutes is gross and unwholesome. M.—The apostles required this law to be observed by the first Christians, that the Jews might not be disgusted: but, after a competent time had been allowed them, the Church thought proper to alter this discipline. S. Aug. c. Faust. xxxii. 13.

Ver. 5. At the hand; a Heb. idiom. God orders an ox to be stoned, which had slain a man. Ex. 21:28.—Man, (hominis) every man, (viri) brother. By these three terms, God inculcates a horror of bloodshed; because we are all of the same nature, ought to act like generous men, and to consider every individual as a brother, since we spring from the same stock. M.

Ver. 6. Shed. God had not subjected Cain to this law of retaliation, as he was the first murderer, and the earth was unpeopled. H.—Here he declares, that it is just to inflict such a punishment on the offender. M.—Judges are hence authorized to punish murderers with death. C.—The general law, thou shalt not kill, admits of exceptions, and forbids killing by private authority, or out of revenge. H.—The blood of your lives, may signify the blood on which your life depends; or, according to the Rabbin, it is a prohibition of suicide, which one would think is so contrary to the first law of nature, self-preservation, as to require no prohibition; and yet, to the scandal of philosophers, some have written in its defence! H.

Ver. 10. Soul ... in birds, &c. The covenant of God is made with animals, only in as much as they are subservient to man. D.—The Egyptians adored most of them; and many oriental nations, and even philosophers, pretended they had intelligent souls, and could speak a rational language, which some of them would have the people believe they could understand. C.—This was the case of those great impostors Apollonius of Tyena, Mahomet, &c. H.—Moses shews sufficiently that beasts were neither divinities nor rational. C.

Ver. 13. My rain bow. This had been from the beginning; but it was not before appointed for a sign that the earth should no more be destroyed by water. It is styled God's bow, on account of its beauty and grandeur. M. Ecclus 43:12.—“As the rain-bow, which makes its appearance in the clouds, borrows all its effulgence from the sun, so those only who acknowledge the glory of Christ in God's clouds, and do not seek their own glory, will escape destruction in the deluge.” S. Aug. c. Faust. ii. 21.

Ver. 16. Remember; or I shall cause men to reflect, when they see the rain-bow, of the horrors of the deluge, and of my gracious promises and covenant.

Ver. 18. Chanaan, who, it seems, is here mentioned to his shame, having first discovered and told his father that Noe was drunk. He was probably but young at the time, being born after the deluge.

Ver. 20. A husbandman. Heb. lit. “a man of the earth.” H.—To till, perhaps with a plough, which he is said to have invented. M.

Ver. 21. Drunk. Noe by the judgment of the fathers was not guilty of sin, in being overcome by wine; because he knew not the strength of it. Ch.—Wine, Though vines had grown from the beginning, the art of making wine seems not to have been discovered; and hence Noe's fault is much extenuated, and was at most only a venial sin. M.—His nakedness prefigured the desolate condition of Christ upon the cross, which was a scandal to the Jews, and foolishness to the Gentiles. But by this folly we are made wise; we are redeemed, and enjoy the name of Christians. Sem and Japheth represent the multitude of believers, Cham and Chanaan the audacity and impudence of all unbelievers. S. Aug. c. Faust. xii. 24. de C. D. xvi. 2. S. Cyp. ep. 63. ad Cæcil. W.—Like the Manichees, modern heretics are very free in condemning many innocent actions of the Patriarchs. H.

Ver. 23. Neither ought we to be so quick-sighted in discovering the faults of any: which we often represent as real, when they are only apparent. H.

Ver. 25. Cursed be Chanaan. The curses, as well as the blessings, of the patriarchs were prophetical: and this in particular is here recorded by Moses, for the children of Israel, who were to possess the land of Chanaan. But why should Chanaan be cursed for his father's fault? The Hebrews answer, that he, being then a boy, was the first that saw his grandfather's nakedness, and told his father Cham of it; and joined with him in laughing at it: which drew upon him, rather than the rest of the children of Cham, this prophetic curse. Ch.—Theodoret, q. 57. The children of Sem executed this sentence, in exterminating many of the Chanaanites under Josue. W.—They perished for their own wickedness, which God foresaw, and revealed to Noe. Cham was severely punished by this denunciation of his children's misery. See Milton, xi. 754. xii. 27. Deut. 9:4. H.

Ver. 27. Enlarge Japheth. His name signifies latitude or enlargement. W.—May he, God, according to some; but more probably Japheth, of whom the rest of the sentence speaks. H.—This was verified by the extensive dominion of the children of Japheth, both in the islands and on the continent; more particularly, when the Romans subdued the Jews, and posterity of Sem. M.—Referring all this to the Church, the Gentiles entered in, upon the refusal of the Jews, though preachers of that nation were the instruments of their conversion. Chanaan, in the mean time, cherished his slavery, and seeks not to obtain the liberty and glory of the sons of God, in which he is a figure of heretics, (H.) who serve to make Christians more upon their guard, and by persecuting them, exercise their patience and increase their crown. W.

Ver. 29. He died, having witnessed the attempt of his children to build the tower of Babel, (we may suppose with disapprobation) and having been concerned in the dispersing of nations. Some imagine he travelled eastward, and founded the empire of China, which is denied by others. H.—The fathers conclude that he had no children after the deluge, as the Scripture mentions the world was divided among his three sons and their offspring. Perhaps the fabulous account of Saturn is a perversion of Noe's history, as the three great pagan deities, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, to whom Saturn gave the empire of heaven, seas and hell, may have been intended for the three sons of Noe. The Egyptians have attributed to their Osiris the erecting of altars, cultivating vines, teaching agriculture, &c. for which we have seen Noe was so famous. C.—This great and virtuous patriarch had only been dead two years, when the faithful Abraham was born, as it were to succeed him in maintaining the cause of God. H.—The Rabbins assert, that God gave some general laws to Noe, which were necessarily to be observed by all who would obtain salvation: 1. To obey the laws. 2. Not to curse God. 3. Nor admit of any false god, nor of any superstition. 4. Not to marry one's mother, mother-in-law, sister by the same mother, or another person's wife, nor to commit sins against nature. 5. Not to shed blood, that of beasts must be buried. 6. Not to steal, or break one's word. 7. Not to eat the limb of a living creature. Maimonides thinks this last was given to Noe, the rest to Adam. C.

Ver. 2. Japheth. From his being placed first, some conclude that he was the eldest; and perhaps the famed Japetus of the Greeks is the same person. D.—Sem comes last, though elder than Cham, that the history of the true Church may be more connected. Though it would be a work of great labour to discover what nations sprung from the people here mentioned, yet some are sufficiently obvious; and the learned Bochart has given very plausible applications of the different names to the respective nations, in his Phaleg. or sacred Geography. Gomer is supposed to be the father of the Cimbri in Germany, from whom the French and English also probably sprung. H.—Magog, father of the Scythians, &c. Ezec. 26. Madai of the Medes, Javan of the Ionians in Greece, Thubal of the Iberians and Spaniards, Mosoch of the Muscovites, Thiras of the Thracians.

Ver. 3. Ascenez father of the Germans, Thogorma father of the Turks. M.

Ver. 5. The islands. So the Hebrews called all the remote countries, to which they went by ships to Judea, as Greece, Italy, Spain, &c. (Ch.) whether they were surrounded with water or not. Jer. 25:22. M.

Ver. 9. A stout hunter. Not of beasts, but of men; whom by violence and tyranny he brought under his dominion. And such he was, not only in the opinion of men, but before the Lord; that is, in his sight who cannot be deceived. Ch.—The Sept. call him a giant; that is, a violent man. According to Josephus, he stirred up men to rebel against the Lord, maintaining that all their happiness must come from themselves, &c. Ant. i. 4. Thus he broached the first heresy after the deluge. W.—He seems to have been the same as Bel, father of Ninus, and the author of idolatry. M.

Ver. 11. That land, of Sennaar, near the city of Babylon. Assur, or Ninus, who founded the Assyrian empire. M.—But many understand this of Nemrod, who, in his progress from Babylonia to conquer the world, and oppress the rest of his brethren, came forth into Assyria, as if it were written Assurah; the He signifying motion towards, being often omitted in names of places. See 2 Kings, 6:10. Bochart. There he built Ninive, on the Tigris. But the exact situation of this vast city is not even known. C.—And the streets, &c. which were amazingly extensive. Jonas 3:3. It may also signify the city Rohoboth. Pagnin.—Chale perhaps of Halah. 4 Kings 17:6 on the banks, or near the source of the river Chaboras.

Ver. 12. Resen, perhaps Larissa, here written without the La; as 1 Par. 5:26. Hala has the preposition, and is written Lahela. Bochart.—This, &c. It is doubtful which of these three cities is meant: but as we know that Ninive was remarkable for size and magnificence, we may suppose this is designated. C. M.

Ver. 19. To Lesa, or Laisa, to the north, on the Jordan, as Sodom was on the southern extremity of that river. Sidon and Gaza were on the Mediterranean sea, north and south; so that these four cities are like four points, determining the extent of the promised land, which, as it was important for the Israelites to know, Moses descends to these particulars in speaking of the Chanaanites.

Ver. 21. Of Heber. That is, of the nations beyond the Euphrates. Hebrews, &c. C.—The elder brother, fratre Japheth majore, may be rendered as well “Japheth being his elder brother,” which, as we have already observed, was probably the case. By mentioning him alone, we may gather that Sem was elder than Cham, who is called the less or younger son. H.—The Hebrew may be translated either way. But the Chald. Liran. and many excellent interpreters, make Jepheth the eldest. C.

Ver. 24. Begot Sale; either his son, or his grandson, by Cainan. See Luke 3:36 where we shall examine this question; also C. 11:12. The copies of the Sept. now extant, all assert that Cainan was the son of Arphaxad, in all the places where they are mentioned, both in Gen. and Chronicles; and though some endeavour to prove that this is an interpolation, inserted by a later hand, it is certain it was found in the Sept. in the days of S. Luke, who confirms it by his authority, as all the copies both Greek and Latin, except a very faulty one which belonged to Beza, and is now at Cambridge, testify. Beza was so bold as to expunge the name. But before we allow of this freedom, we must be informed how S. Luke could adopt such an error, being, as he was, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost! See Salien, &c. H.—Mariana asserts, that the Hebrew copies have been vitiated.

Ver. 29. Sons of Jectan; though not perhaps all born before the dispersion of nations, which may be said of some others, whom Moses here mentions, that he may not have to interrupt his narration. C.

GENESIS 11

Ver. 1. Speech. Probably Hebrew; in which language we have the most ancient book in the world, the work of Moses. This language has been preserved ever since, though with some alterations. Most of the oriental languages are but like dialects from it, as French, Italian, &c. are from Latin. The arguments which are brought to prove that other languages are more ancient, because the names of men, &c. have a proper significance in them as well as in Hebrew, do not invalidate the right of the latter. The most respectable authors have, therefore, always declared for it. H.

Ver. 2. The East: Armenia, which lies to the eastward of Babylonia, whither they directed their course in quest of provisions for themselves and cattle, being now grown pretty numerous. M.

Ver. 3. Each one: not that every individual joined in this undertaking, considered, at least, as a rash and presumptuous attempt to save themselves from a second deluge. Some might innocently give in to it, meaning only to leave a monument to their common origin and friendship, before they separated into distant countries. Slime: literally bitumen. H.—The Hebrew, chomer, means also slime, or mortar. Stone is very scarce in that country, but the earth is fat, and very proper to make brick; it also abounds in naphtha, bitumen, &c.: hence the ancients notice the brick walls of Babylon. C.

Ver. 4. Famous before; Heb. lest, &c.; as if they intended to prevent that event. H.—Their motive appears to have been pride, which raised the indignation of God. Nemrod, the chief instigator, might have designed the tower for a retreat, whence he might sally out and maintain his tyranny. M.

Ver. 6. In deed. This seems to be spoken ironically; though the effects of weak mortals, the sons of Adam, when pursued with vigour and unanimity, will produce great effects. These builders had conceived an idea of raising the tower as high as possible, hyperbolically, to touch heaven. H.

Ver. 7. Come ye, &c. As men seemed bent on taking heaven by storm, like the ancient giants, God turns their expressions, as it were, against themselves, and shews them an example of humility, let us go down. He acts the part of a judge, and therefore will examine all with the utmost diligence, as he denotes by these expressions; being really incapable of moving from place to place, on account of his immensity. H.—He seems nearer to men, by the effects or punishments which he inflicted. The address which he here makes is directed, not to the angels, but to the other co-equal powers of the Blessed Trinity. M.

Ver. 9. Babel, that is, confusion. This is one of the greatest miracles recorded in the Old Testament; men forgot, in a moment, the language which they had hitherto spoken, and found themselves enabled to speak another, known only to a few of the same family (C.); for we must not suppose that there were as many new languages as there were men at Babel. M.—The precise number of languages which were then heard, cannot be determined. The learned commonly acknowledge the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Teutonic, Slavonian, Tartarian, and Chinese languages, to be original. The rest are only dialects from these. English is chiefly taken from the Teutonic, (C.) with many words borrowed from the Greek and other languages. H.

Ver. 12. Sale, or Cainan. See C. 10:24. Chron. 1:18. in the Septuagint. The variation in the years of the Patriarchs, between this ancient version and the Hebrew, is here again very considerable, and perhaps inaccountable. H.

Ver. 20. Sarug: in whose days S. Epiphanius places the origin of idolatry; but Eusebius (Præp. i. v. & 9.) thinks it began in Egypt, among the posterity of Cham. C.

Ver. 27. Abram, the youngest of the three, being born only in the 130th year of Thare. v. 32, and G. 12:4. He is placed first, on account of his superior dignity in the church of God, in like manner as Sem, Moses, &c. In his youth, he is supposed to have followed the idolatrous worship of his fathers. S. Aug. de C. D. x. c. ult. Genebrard, A.M. 1949. C.—But being soon enlightened by God, he becomes a glorious witness of the truth, and, according to many, is preserved miraculously, when thrown into the fire by the Chaldees. v. 31. H.

Ver. 29. Jescha, whom many confound with Sarai, as if both Nacher and Abram had married the daughters of their brother Aran. But why then does Moses mention Sarai before, and then call her Jescha in the same verse? It seems as if he intended to designate two different women. H.—In effect, Abram himself says, Sarai was truly his sister, born of the same father. G. 12:13. See C. 20:12, where we shall give the reasons that seem to prove that she was the daughter of Thare, and not Aran. C.—Jescha does not accompany her grandfather, preferring, perhaps, to stay with Nachor, or to marry in her own country; if she were not already dead when Thare departed from Ur, a city of the Chaldees. H.—This city is probably Ura, in Mesopotamia, not far from Nisibis, which the Scripture often mentions is a part of Chaldea. Acts. 7:2. &c. C.—It is not, however certain that the rest of Thare's family remained behind; if they did, they removed soon after into the country about Haran, or Charraë, on the Charboras. C. 29:4. Josep. Ant. 1. 6. H.

Ver. 1. Said: not after his father's death, but before he left Ur; (M.) unless, perhaps, Abram received a second admonition at Haran, which, from his dwelling there with his father, &c., is styled his country. He leaves his kindred, Nachor and his other relations, except Sarai and Lot, who go with him unto Chanaan; and even his own house, or many of his domestics and effects, and full of faith, goes in quest of an unknown habitation. Heb. 11:8. H.—S. Stephen clearly distinguishes these two calls of Abram. From the second, the 430 years of sojournment, mentioned Gal. 3. Ex. 12, must be dated. C.—This is the third grand epoch of the world, about 2083, when God chooses one family to maintain the one faith, which he had all along supported. See W. &c.

Ver. 3. In thee, &c. or in the Messias, who will be one of thy descendants, and the source of all the blessings to be conferred on any of the human race. Gal. 3:16. Many of the foregoing promises regarded a future world, and Abram was by no means incredulous, when he found himself afflicted here below, as if God had forgot his promises. C.—He was truly blessed, in knowing how to live poor in spirit, even amid riches and honours; faithful in all tribulations and trials; following God in all things. v. 1.

Ver. 5. Gotten, (fecerant): made or acquired, either by birth or purchase, &c. M.

Ver. 6. Sichem. At the foot of M. Garizim, where Abram offered his first sacrifice in the land. Deut. 11:30. Ken.—Noble; on account of the many tall and shady oaks, whence the Sept. have the high oak. Heb. Elon more, the plain of Moreh, or of ostension, because God shewed Abram from this place, situated about the middle of the promised land, what countries he would give to him in his posterity, after having exterminated the Chanaanites, who then occupied the land as their own. The mentioning of these idolatrous nations here, gives us reason to admire the faith and constancy of Abram, who neither doubted of the fulfilling of this promise, nor hesitated to adore the true God publicly. v. 7. Hence there is no reason for accounting this an interpolation. H.

Ver. 8. Bethel, as it was called in the days of Moses, being the ancient Luza. C. 28. On the west, Hebrew, towards the sea or Mediterranean, which lay west of Palestine. Bethel signifies the house of God, being honoured with two altars. H.

Ver. 9. Proceeding to the south, Heb.: means also the desert, as the Sept. generally translate negeb: other interpreters agree with the Vulgate. C.

Ver. 10. Down into Egypt, which lies lower than Judea: here the famine did not rage. God would not allow him to go back to his friends. M.

Ver. 11. Beautiful: having yet had no children, though she must have been 65 years old. Abram acts with prudence, and does not tempt God: if he had made known that the woman was his wife, he would have exposed his life to imminent danger, amid a cruel and lascivious people; and being convinced of the chastity of Sarai, he did not, in the least, apprehend that she would consent to any violation of her conjugal engagements. He did not, therefore, expose her virtue as the Manichees pretended. S. Aug. c. Faust. xxii. 33. de C. D. xvi. 19. Ha. C. —The event proved the justice of Abram's suspicions, and God's interference shewed that he was not displeased with his concealing part of the truth. Who can be so simple as to suppose, that we are bound to explain all our concerns to a foe? Do not we every day act with the like caution as Abram did, when we have reason to fear danger? Do not we wish, when fleeing from an enemy's country, that he should conclude we were taking a walk of pleasure? H.

Ver. 13. My sister. This was no lie; because she was his niece, being daughter to his brother Aran, and therefore, in the style of the Hebrews, she might truly be called his sister; as Lot is called Abraham's brother. Gen. 14:14. See Gen. 20:12. Ch.—Others say, Sarai was the half-sister of Abraham, by another mother. H.

Ver. 15. Pharao: The usual title of the kings of Egypt, in Ezechiel's time. C. 32:2. Couriers are often too ready to flatter the passions of the prince: these are punished along with Pharao (v. 17); whence we may conclude, that they concurred with him, to take Sarai against her will.

Ver. 16. Well. Perhaps they made him some presents to gain his favour; (M.) or, at least, they suffered him to remain quietly among them.

Ver. 17. Scourged Pharaoh with unusual pains, sterility, &c. that he might easily perceive that his taking Sarai was displeasing to God. H.—He did not intend to commit adultery indeed, but his conduct was tyrannical and oppressive to the stranger, whom God protects. Ps. 44. M.

Ver. 20. Led him away: perhaps without allowing him time to vindicate his conduct, and with a degree of contumely, to shew the king's displeasure; who durst not, however, injure Abraham in his effects, nor suffer any of his subjects to hurt him. The holy patriarch received his wife untouched, and departed with joy. H.

Ver. 1. South. With respect to Judea, which the sacred writers have always in view.

Ver. 2. Rich in possession. Heb. may be “heavy laden with cattle, gold,” &c. M.

Ver. 6. To bear or feed their flocks, as well as those of the Chanaanites. C.

Ver. 8. Abram therefore, for fear of raising a quarrel with the Pherezites also, who might complain that these strangers were eating up what they had before taken possession of, suggests to his nephew the propriety of their taking different courses. Being the older, he divides, and the younger chooses, according to an ancient and laudable custom. S. Aug. de C. D. xvi. 20.

Ver. 11. From the east of Pentapolis to Sodom, (M.) or to the east of the place where Abram was, as Onkelos has it. The Hebrew may signify either. Grotius.

Ver. 13. Sinners before, &c. That is, truly, without restraint or disguise. Lot might not have been acquainted with their dissolute morals, when he made this choice; in which however he consulted only his senses, and looked for temporal advantages, which ended in sorrow. This God permitted for a warning to us; and to restrain the Sodomites, by the example of Lot's justice, contrasted with the abominable lives. H.—Ezekiel 16:49, explains the causes of their wickedness.

Ver. 15. And to: This is by way of explanation to the former words: (Ha.) for Abram never possessed a foot of this land by inheritance. Acts 8:5. Even his posterity never enjoyed it, at least, for any long time. S. Augustine gives the reason; because the promise was conditional, and the Jews did not fulfil their part by obedience and fidelity. q. 3. in Gen. It is better, however, to understand these promises of another land, which the people, who imitate the faith of Abram, shall enjoy in the world to come. C. Rom. 4:16.

Ver. 16. As the dust, an hyperbole, to express a very numerous offspring, which is more exact, if we take in the spiritual children of Abram. M.

Ver. 17. Through. Lot has chosen a part, I give the whole to thee. Thou mayest take possession of it, and go wherever thou hast a mind. C.

Ver. 18. Vale, or grove of oaks, where there was a famous one which was called the oak of Mambre, either from the neighbouring city, or from a man of that name. C. 14:13. M.—Hebron was on the hill above. C.

GENESIS 14

Ver. 1. Sennaar, or Babylon.—Pontus, Heb. Ellasar, perhaps Thalassar, as Jonathan writes, not far from Eden.—Elamites, or Persians.—Nations in Galilee, east of the Jordan, whither the conquered kings directed their course. Josue 12:23 mentions the king of the nations (foreigners) at Galgal. C.

Ver. 3. Now, in the days of Moses.—Salt sea; called also the vale of salts, and the dead sea.

Ver. 4. Served. Thus Noe's prediction began to be fulfilled, as Elam was the eldest son of Sem, to whose posterity Chanaan should be slaves. C. 9:26.

Ver. 5. Raphaim, Zuzim, and Emim, were all of the gigantic race, robbers, like the Arabs. D.—These dwelt in the land of Basan, or of giants. Deut. 3:13.

Ver. 6. Chorreans, or Horreans, who dwelt in one part of that extensive range of mountains, which took their name from Seir; perhaps about mount Hor, where Aaron died. C.—These also were auxiliaries of the five kings, and hence experienced the fury of the four confederates; who cut off all their opponents, before they made their grand attack upon Sodom. H.

Ver. 7. Misphat, or of judgment and contradiction, because there the Hebrews contended with Moses and Aaron: it was afterwards called Cadez. Num. 20:11.—Amalecites, that is which they afterwards possessed; for as yet Amelec was unborn. C. 36:16. M.—Amorrheans, to the west of Sodom. C.

Ver. 10. Of slime. Bituminis. This was a kind of pitch, which served for mortar in the building of Babel, Gen. 11:3 and was used by Noe in pitching the ark. Ch.—Moses does not make this remark without reason. This bitumen would easily take fire, and contribute to the conflagration of Sodom. C.—Overthrown, not all slain, for the king of Sodom escaped. v. 17.

Ver. 13. The Hebrew, or traveller who came from beyond the Euphrates, (C.) or who dwelt beyond the Jordan, with reference to the five kings. Diodorus.

Ver. 14. Servants, fit for war. Hence we may form some judgment of the power and dignity of Abram, who was considered as a great prince in that country. C. 23:6. He was assisted by Mambre, Escol, and Aner, with all the forces they could raise on such a short warning; and coming upon the four kings unawares, in four divisions, easily discomfits them, while they were busy plundering the cities, and pursues them to Dan; which is either the city that went by that name afterwards, or more probably one of the sources of the Jordan, (H.) which the people of the country call Medan. Neither did he suffer them to repose, before he had retaken all the plunder at Hoba, or Abila, north of the road leading to Damascus. C.

Ver. 18. Melchisedech was not Sem: for his genealogy is given in Scripture. Hebrew 12:6.; nor God the Son, for they are compared together; nor the Holy Ghost, as some have asserted; but a virtuous Gentile who adored the true God, and was king of Salem, or Jerusalem, and Priest of an order different from that of Aaron, offering in sacrifice bread and wine, a figure of Christ's sacrifice in the Mass; as the fathers constantly affirm. H.—See Pererius. S. Jerom ep. ad Evagrium, says, “Melchisedech offered not bloody victims, but dedicated the sacrament of Christ in bread and wine ... a pure sacrifice.” See S. Cyp. ep. 63, ad Cæcil. S. Aug. de C. D. xvi. 22. &c. Many Protestants confess, that this renowned prince of Chanaan, was also a priest; but they will not allow that his sacrifice consisted of bread and wine. In what then? for a true priest must offer some real sacrifice. If Christ, therefore, be a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech, whose sacrifice was not bloody, as those of Aaron were, what other sacrifice does he now offer, but that of his own body and blood in the holy Mass, by the ministry of his priests? for he was the priest: this is plainly referred to bringing forth, &c. which shews that word to be sacrificial, as in Judges 6:18. The Hebrew may be ambiguous. But all know that vau means for as well as and. Thus the English Bible had it, 1552, “for he was the priest.” W.—If Josephus take notice only of Melchisedech, offering Abram and his men corporal refreshment, we need not wonder; he was a Jewish priest, to whom the order of Melchisedech might not be agreeable. It is not indeed improbable, but Abram might partake of the meat, which had been offered in thanksgiving by Melchisedech; and in this sense his words are true. But there would be no need of observing, that he was a priest on this account; as this was a piece of civility expected from princes on similar occasions. Deut. 23:4. 2 K. 17:27. H.

Ver. 19. Blessed him, as his inferior, and received tithes of him. Heb. 4:7. This shews the antiquity of the practice of supporting God’s priests by tithes.

Ver. 21. The persons (animas), the souls subject to my dominion. H.

Ver. 22. I lift up. This is the posture of one swearing solemnly, by which we testify our belief, that God dwells in the heavens, and governs the world. C.

Ver. 23. Woof-thread. The first word is added by way of explanation. Abram declares he will not receive the smallest present for himself.

Ver. 24. Their shares, due to them on account of the danger to which they had exposed themselves. The king of Sodom could not but accept these conditions with gratitude. In a just war, whatever is taken by the enemy, cannot be reclaimed by the original proprietor, if it be retaken. Grotius, iii. 6. de Jure.

GENESIS 15

Ver. 1. Fear not. He might naturally be under some apprehensions, lest the four kings should attempt to be revenged upon him.—Reward, since thou hast so generously despised earthly riches. H.—Abram was not asleep, but saw a vision of exterior objects. v. 5.

Ver. 2. I shall go. To what purpose should I heap up riches, since I have no son to inherit them? Abram knew that God had promised him a numerous posterity; but he was not apprized how this was to be verified, and whether he was to adopt some other for his son and heir. Therefore, he asks modestly, how he out to understand the promise.—And the son, &c. Heb. is differently rendered, “and the steward of my house, this Eliezer of Damascus.” We know not whether Eliezer or Damascus be the proper name. The Sept. have “the son of Mesech, my handmaid, this Eliezer of Damascus.” Most people suppose, that Damascus was the son of Eliezer, the steward. The sentence is left unfinished, and must be supplied from the following verse, shall be my heir. The son of the steward, filius procurationis, may mean the steward himself, as the son of perdition denotes the person lost. C.

Ver. 6. Reputed by God, who cannot judge wrong; so that Abram increased in justice by this act of faith, believing that his wife, now advanced in years, would have a child; from whom others should spring, more numerous than the stars of heaven. H.—This faith was accompanied and followed by many other acts of virtue. S. Jam. 2:22. W.

Ver. 8. Whereby, &c. Thus the blessed Virgin asked, how shall this be done? Lu. 1:34 without the smallest degree of unbelief. Abram wished to know, by what signs he should be declared the lawful owner of the land. H.

Ver. 9. Three years, when these animals have obtained a perfect age.

Ver. 12. A deep sleep, or ecstasy, like that of Adam. G. 2:21, wherein God revealed to him the oppression of his posterity in Egypt, which filled him with such horror (M.) as we experience when something frightful comes upon us suddenly in the dark. This darkness represents the dismal situation of Joseph, confined in a dungeon; and of the Hebrews condemned to hard labour, in making bricks, and obliged to hide their male children, for fear of their being discovered, and slain. Before these unhappy days commenced, the posterity of Abram were exposed to great oppression among the Chanaanites, nor could they in any sense be said to possess the land of promise, for above 400 years after this prophetic sleep. H.

Ver. 13. Strangers, and under bondage, &c. This prediction may be dated from the persecution of Isaac by Ismael, A. 2112, till the Jews left Egypt, 2513. In Exodus 12 and S. Paul, 430 years are mentioned; but they probably began when Abram went first into Egypt, 2084. Nicholas Abram and Tournemine say, the Hebrews remained in Egypt full 430 years. from the captivity of Joseph; and reject the addition of the Sept. which adds, “they and their fathers dwelt in Egypt, and in Chanaan.” On these points, we may expect to find chronologists at variance.

Ver. 14. Judge and punish the Egyptians, overwhelming them in the Red sea, &c. H.

Ver. 16. Fourth, &c. after the 400 years are finished; during which period of time, God was pleased to bear with those wicked nations; whose iniquity chiefly consisted in idolatry, oppression of the poor and strangers, forbidden marriages of kindred, and abominable lusts. Levit. 18. Deut. 6 and 12. M.

Ver. 17. A lamp, or symbol of the Divinity, passing, as Abram also did, between the divided beasts, to ratify the covenant. See Jer. 34:18.

Ver. 18. Of Egypt, a branch of the Nile, not far from Pelusium. This was to be the southern limit, and the Euphrates the northern; the two other boundaries are given, Num. 34.—Perhaps Solomon’s empire extended so far. At least, the Jews would have enjoyed these territories, if they had been faithful. M.

Ver. 19. Cineans, in Arabia, of which nation was Jethro. They were permitted to dwell in the tribe of Juda, and served the Hebrews.—Cenezites, who probably inhabited the mountains of Juda.—Cedmonites, or eastern people, as their name shews. Cadmus was of this nation, of the race of the Heveans, dwelling in the environs of mount Hermon, whence his wife was called Hermione. He was, perhaps, one of those who fled at the approach of Josue; and was said to have sowed dragons’ teeth, to people his city of Thebes in Beotia, from an allusion to the name of the Hevites, which signifies serpents. C.—The eleven nations here mentioned were not all subdued; on account of the sins of the Hebrews. M.

Ver. 2. May have. Heb. “may be built up,” a metaphorical expression: so God is said to have built up houses for the Egyptian midwives. Ex. 1:21. M.

Ver. 3. Ten years after she was 65; which shews that she might reasonably conclude she would now have no children herself; and as she knew God had promised Abram a son, she thought he might follow the custom of those times, and have him by a second wife. Abram shewed no eagerness on this matter, but only yielded to his wife's petition, deprecanti, being well aware of the inconveniences of polygamy, which Sarai had soon reason to observe. This is the first time we read of polygamy since the deluge; but it is not mentioned as any thing singular or unlawful. This was a matter in which God could dispense; but it was never left to the disposal of any man. Hence, when Luther and his associates ventured to dispense with the Landgrave of Hesse, to keep two wives at once, he required him to keep it a secret, being ashamed of his own conduct. He still maintained it was a thing indifferent, even in the law of grace, though Christ has so expressly condemned it. See præp 62, 65. The practice, so common of late in this country, of marrying again after a bill of divorce has been passed, is no less contrary to the Catholic doctrine, which allows only a separation of the parties from bed and board, in cases of adultery; but never of a second marriage, while both the parties are living. 1 Cor. 7. S. Aug. de adult. conj. i. de C. D. xvi. 25, 38. and other fathers. H.—It was never lawful for one woman to have two husbands. W.—To wife. Plurality of wives, though contrary to the primitive institution of marriage, Gen. 2:24 was by divine dispensation allowed to the patriarchs; which allowance seems to have continued during the time of the law of Moses. But Christ our Lord reduced marriage to its primitive institution. S. Matt. 19.

Ver. 5. Despiseth. Few bear prosperity in a proper manner!—And thee. Sarai things it is the duty of her husband to restrain the insolence of Agar. She commits her cause to God, and does not seek revenge. M.

Ver. 6. Afflicted her, as she now resented even a moderate correction. H.

Ver. 7. In the desert; omitted in Heb. being a repetition of in the wilderness. C.

Ver. 9. Humble thyself. The angel, in God's name, does not blame Sarai; but gives Agar to understand that the fault was wholly on her side. H.

Ver. 11. Ismael, means "God hath heard" the groans and distress of Agar. C.

Ver. 12. Wild. Heb. like a wild ass, not to be tamed or subdued. The Saracens or Arabs, have almost all along maintained their independence.—Over against, ready to fight, without any dread of any one. C.

Ver. 13. Thou the God. She had imagined before that she was talking to some man; but perceiving, at parting, that it was some superior being, she invoked him thus.—The hinder parts, as Moses did afterwards. Ex. 33 to let us know, that we cannot fully comprehend the nature of an angel, much less of God. Hebrew may be: “what! have I seen (do I live) after He has seen me.” The Hebrews generally supposed, that death would presently overtake the person who had seen the Lord or his angel. Jud. 6:22. Ex. 32:20. C.

Ver. 15. Agar being returned home, and having obtained pardon.—Ismael, as the angel had foretold; an honour shewn to very few; such as Isaac, Solomon, Jesus, &c. H.

Ver. 1. Walk, &c. by assiduous meditation and advancement in virtue. This apparition was to inform Abram, that the promised seed should be born of Sarai. H.

Ver. 4. I am unchangeable, and faithful to my promises, the only God. D.—Nations. Jews, Saracens or Arabs, Idumeans, and, by faith, of all nations who shall believe in Christ, the King of kings. C.—The true Church will never then be reduced to a few unknown believers, as the Donatists and Protestants assert. W.

Ver. 5. Abraham. Abram, in the Hebrew, signifies a high father; but Abraham, the father of the multitude: Sarai signifies my Lady, but Sara absolutely Lady. Ch.—God thus receives them, as it were, into his own family. C.

Ver. 7. Perpetual; that shall last as long as they remain obedient. M. v. 9.

Ver. 11. You shall, either by yourselves, or by the ministry of others, with respect to infants. That part of the body was chosen, because the effects of sin first appeared there; and because a part of the Hebrews' creed was, that Christ should be born of the family of Abraham.—A sign that Abraham had agreed to the covenant with God, and to be a memorial of his faith and justice, Rom. 4:2.; to distinguish also the faithful from infidels; to purge away original sin in male children, eight days old; and to be a figure of baptism. M. T.—God always appoints some sign of his covenants, as Jesus Christ instituted the holy sacrament of his body and blood, under exterior appearances, to assure us of his new alliance with Christians. C.—The sacraments of the old law caused grace, only by means of faith in the Redeemer, of which they were signs. S. Aug. de Nupt. ii. c. ult. In this sense, the holy fathers assert, that circumcision remitted original sin to those who could receive it; though some think, it was only a bare sign or distinctive mark of the Jews. C.—It is far beneath our baptism, which is more easy, general and efficacious; as the Christian sacraments are not like those of Moses, weak and needy elements. Gal. 4:9. S. Aug. ep. 158, ad Jan. Ps. 73, &c. W.

Ver. 12. Days, when he will be able to bear the pain without danger. This might be deferred for a just reason, as it was in the desert. Jos. 5:6. In this case people might be saved, as younger children and all females might, by the application of the remedies used in the law of nature, sacrifice, the faith of parents, &c. M.—Of your stock, and, being arrived at years of discretion, is desirous of enjoying your privileges. Some think, that slaves had no choice left; but servants, and people who had a mind to live in the country, were not bound to submit to this rite against their will. It is even more probable, that none were under this obligation, except Abraham and his posterity by Isaac. His other children adopted it in part, but not with the exactitude of the Jews. C.

Ver. 14. Circumcised. Sept. adds, “on the eighth day,” with the Sam. and many Latin copies. C.—Destroyed, &c. lose the privileges of the Hebrews, or be put to death, when he grows up and does not supply this defect. S. Aug. reading on the eighth day, concluded that as a child of that age, could not, with reason, be put to death for an offense, in which he could have no share, the destruction here threatened is that of the soul, for transgression, in Adam, the original covenant, and dying in that state unclean, must be excluded from heaven, as people are now who die unbaptized. This difficult passage may, however, be explained as if the threat regarded the negligent parents. “He who shall not circumcise ... shall be destroyed.” Syr. or, as the Heb. may be rendered, “the male that doth not,” &c.; in which case, he becomes guilty of a transgression, when he is arrived at the years sufficient to understand his duty, and does not fulfil it. W.

Ver. 15. Sara, princess of all the nations of the faithful, not simply of one family. M.

Ver. 16. Bless, and enable her to have a son, who shall also have many children.—Whom. This is referred to Sara, in Heb. and Chal.; but to Isaac, in the Syriac. The blessing, at any rate, reverts to the mother; who was a figure of the blessed Virgin, and of the Church; both persecuted with their children; both, in the end, triumphant. Gal. 4:23. C.

Ver. 17. Laughed for joy and admiration at such unexpected news. “He rejoiced,” says the Chal.: the faith of Abraham is never called into question. Rom. 4:19.

Ver. 18. Before thee, under thy protection, and in a virtuous manner. M.—He seems to be satisfied, though God should not bless him with any more children, provided this one may live worthy of God. H.

Ver. 19. Isaac, “laughter,” alluding to the exultation of Abraham, more than to the laughter of Sara, which deserved some reprehension. G. 21:6.

Ver. 20. Nation of Arabs, who are still divided into twelve tribes. See G. 25:13. C.

Ver. 23. His house. All were kept in such good order by their master, that none was found unwilling to submit, if indeed it was left to their choice. H.—Abraham loses no time in complying with God’s commands. M.

Ver. 25. Full thirteen, or beginning his fourteenth year, at which age the Arabs and Mahometans still generally circumcise; but without any order from God. C.

Ver. 1. Sitting, &c. that he might lose no opportunity of exercising hospitality.

Ver. 2. Men in outward appearance, but angels indeed. Heb. 13:2. S. Aug. de C. D. xvi. c. 29. Some have supposed, that one of them was the Son of God, whom Abraham adored, and who bears throughout the chief authority. Tres vidit et unum adoravit. He saw three and adored one, as we read in the Church office. In the former supposition, which is generally adopted, this adoration was only a civil ceremony, if Abraham considered them as mere men; or it might be mixed with a degree of religious, though inferior veneration, if he imagined they were angels; or in fine, he adored God in his representatives. H.

Ver. 4. Wash ye, or let your feet be washed by me, or by my servants, lavatur. M.

Ver. 5. Therefore, Providence has directed you hither. Abraham promises but little, and gives much, in the true spirit of generous hospitality. C.

Ver. 6. Measures, or one epha; that is, three pecks and three pints, English corn measure.—Flour, of the finest quality, similæ.—Hearth, as being soonest ready.

Ver. 7. Himself. These rich and truly noble people, do not esteem it beneath them to wait on strangers. They provide abundance, but no dainties. H.

Ver. 9. Eaten apparently. Tob. 12:19 or perhaps they consumed the food, as fire may be said to eat. S. Justin's Dial.

Ver. 10. Time, or season of the year ensuing, if I be alive; which he says after the manner of men, as he had assumed also the human form. H.

Ver. 12. Laughed, as if the promise were incredible.—My lord, or husband, which title of respect, S. Peter i. C. 3:6, commends. D.

Ver. 13. Indeed. This was the import of Sara's words. By thus revealing what was secretly done in the tent, he shewed himself to be more than man.

Ver. 14. Hard. So Gabriel says to the blessed Virgin: there is nothing impossible to God.

Ver. 15. Afraid; which does not entirely clear her of sin: for though she might innocently laugh, if she thought the person who spoke was only a man, yet she ought not to have told an untruth; and if she reflected, that he had disclosed what she supposed no one knew, and thereby manifested his superiority over man, her denial was still more inexcusable. But she was taken, as it were, by surprise; and therefore the Lord reproves her very gently. H.

Ver. 21. I will go down, &c. The Lord here accommodates his discourse to the way of speaking and acting amongst men: for he knoweth all things, and needeth not to go any where for information.—Note here, that two of the three angels went away immediately for Sodom; whilst the third, who represented the Lord, remained with Abraham.

Ver. 25. With the wicked. God frequently suffers the just to be here the most afflicted; designing to reward them abundantly hereafter. But this was not so common in the days of Abraham and Job. C.

Ver. 32. Ten. Abraham's chief solicitude was for Lot; though, out of modesty, he does not mention him; trusting, however, in the divine goodness the he would be preserved, unless he had forfeited his justice, he proceeds no farther. God thus challenges Jerusalem to produce one virtuous man, and the city shall be saved for his sake. Jer. 5:1. H.

GENESIS 19

Ver. 1. Ground. Thus shewing himself a true relation and imitator of Abraham.

Ver. 2. My lords. He took them to be men.—No. They refuse at first, that he may have the merit of pressing them to accept the invitation. H.

Ver. 4. Together. The whole city was corrupt; even the children were taught iniquity, as soon as they came to the years of discretion. M.

Ver. 5. Know them. They boldly proclaim their infamous design.

Ver. 7. This evil, so contrary to the rights of hospitality, and the law of nature.

Ver. 8. Known man. They were neglected, while men were inflamed with desires of each other. See Rom. 1. H.—Abuse. Lot tries by every means to divert them from their purpose; being well assured, that they would have nothing to do with his daughters, who were promised to some of the inhabitants. He endeavours to gain time, hoping perhaps that his guests would escape by some back way, while he is talking to the people. H.—Some allow that, under so great a perturbation of mind, he consented to an action which could never be allowed, though it was a less evil. M.

Ver. 9. Thither; from whence thou camest, or into the house. Dost thou pretend to tell us what is wrong? We will treat thee more shamefully. M. While they are beginning to offer violence.

Ver. 10. Behold, &c. the angels not only secure Lot, but strike the whole people with blindness, so that they could neither find Lot's door nor their own homes. Indeed, if they had been able to get back into their own houses, it would have been but a small consolation to them; since in a few minutes, the whole city was buried in sulphur and flame. Wisd. 19:16.

Ver. 14. Sons-in-law. Perhaps they also were among the crowd, (v. 4,) and therefore deserved to be abandoned to their incredulity; though, if they would have consented to follow Lot, the angels would have saved them for his sake.—In jest. So little did they suffer God's judgments to disturb them!

Ver. 16. He lingered, intreating the Lord to save the city; and loath, perhaps to lose all his property, for the sake of which he had chosen that abode.—Spared him, and his wife and two daughters, for his sake. These four were all that were even tolerably just: for we find them all soon giving signs of their weakness, and of the danger to which even the best are exposed by evil communications. H.

Ver. 17. Look not back. Flee with all expedition; let no marks of pity for the wretched Sodomites, nor of sorrow for the lose of your property, be seen.

Ver. 18. My lord, addressing himself to the angel, who led him and his wife. M.

Ver. 19. The mountain above Segor. He is faint-hearted, and does not comply with readiness and exactitude; though, when he had obtained leave to remain in Segor, he still fears, and flees to the mountain, v. 30, (H.) on the south-east of the dead sea. C.

Ver. 22. Segor. That is, a little one. Ch.—In allusion to Lot's words, v. 20. As it was small, fewer sinners would of course be contained in it. God had resolved to spare it, and therefore inspired Lot to pray for its preservation. M.—Hence we may learn, how great a treasure and safeguard the just man is. H.

Ver. 23. Risen. It was morning when he left Sodom; (v. 15) so this city must not have been very distant. It was before called Bala, or swallowed up, and afterwards Salissa. Theodoret supposes it was destroyed as soon as Lot had left it; and it seems Lot's daughters thought so, since they concluded all men, except their father, had perished.

Ver. 24. The Lord rained ... from the Lord, in a miraculous manner. Sodom and the other cities did not perish by earthquakes and other natural causes only, but by the divine wrath exerting itself in a visible manner. Here is an insinuation of a plurality of persons in God, as the C. of Sirmich declares, c. 14.—And Gomorrha, and the other towns which were not so large, nor perhaps so infamous.—Brimstone and fire; to denote the bad odour and violence of their disorders. M.

Ver. 25. All the inhabitants, both the body and soul, (Jude v. 7): even the infants would probably die in original sin, as their parents were unbelievers, and careless of applying the proper remedies. H.—The women imitated the men in pride and dissolute morals, so that all deserved to perish. M.—All things; so that even now the environs are barren, and the lake dark and smoking. T.

Ver. 26. And his wife. As a standing memorial to the servants of God to proceed in virtue, and not to look back to vice or its allurements. Ch.—His, Lot's wife. The two last verses might be within a parenthesis. —Remember Lot's wife, our Saviour admonishes us. Having begun a good work, let us not leave it imperfect, and lose our reward. Lu. 17. Mat. 24.—A statue of durable metallic salt, petrified as it were, to be an eternal monument of an incredulous soul. Wisd. 10:7. Some say it still exists. H.—God may have inflicted this temporal punishment on her, and saved her soul. M.—She looked back, as if she distrusted the words of the angel; but her fault was venial. T.

Ver. 29. Lot. Even he owed his safety to the merits of Abraham.

Ver. 31. No man. If this had been true, Lot might have had children by them, without any fault. But they ought to have consulted him. H.

Ver. 35. Rose up; being oppressed with grief and wine, which would not excuse him from sin, particularly this second time. M.

Ver. 37. Elder. She first proposes: she is not ashamed to call her child Moab, “from father.” The younger is rather more modest, and calls her son Ammon, “my people,” not born of the Sodomites. Many reasons might be alleged to extenuate, or even to excuse the conduct of Lot and his daughters, as many of the fathers have done. But the Scripture barely leaves it upon record, without either commendation or blame. H.

Ver. 1. Gerara; at a greater distance from the devoted country of Sodom. H.

Ver. 2. He said to the king, and to all others who made inquiry, as it was his custom, whenever he came into a strange land, v. 13. He was encouraged to do this, by the protection which God had shewn him in Egypt.—Took her, against her will, as Pharaoh had done. H.—Though she was ninety years old, and with child, her beauty was still extraordinary, the Rabbins think miraculous. At that time people lived above 120 years; so that at the age of ninety, she would only be about as near the end of her life as our women are at forty; and we often see people sufficiently attracting at that age. C.

Ver. 3. Abimelech. This was an usual title of kings in Chanaan, and a very good one, to remind them and their subjects, of their obligations, (H.) as it means “my father the king.” The behaviour of the prince shews, that as yet all sense of duty and knowledge of the true God was not banished from the country. C.—Shalt die, unless thou restore the woman, whom thou hast taken by force; on whose account I have already afflicted thee, (v. 7. 17) and thus prevented thee from touching her. This testimony was more requisite, that there might be no doubt respecting Isaac’s legitimacy. H.

Ver. 5. He say, &c. The pronouns in Heb. are printed very incorrectly. —He is my sister; and she, even he, said. Ken.

Ver. 6. Sincere heart, abhorring adultery, but not altogether innocent. M.

Ver. 7. A prophet. One under my particular care, to whom I reveal many things.—He shall pray for thee. Behold, God will sometimes grant, at the request of his saints, what he would deny even such as Abimelech or the friends of Job. Is not this sufficient encouragement for us, to have recourse to the intercession of the saints? And can any one be so foolish as to pretend this is making gods of them, and shewing them an idolatrous worship? H.

Ver. 8. In the night, (de nocte) or “as soon as it began to dawn.” Sept.

Ver. 9. Why, &c. He expostulates with him in a friendly but earnest manner.—A great sin, or punishment, (M.) v. 18, and exposed me to the danger of committing adultery. Abraham might have answered, this would have been his own fault, as he could not have done it without offering violence to Sara, in whose chastity he could confide. Having an opportunity here to vindicate himself, Abraham speaks freely, which he was not allowed to do in Egypt. G. 12:20.

Ver. 12. My sister, or niece, according to those who say she was daughter of Aran, who thus must have had a different mother from Abraham; (M.) or, as we rather think, Sara was truly his half-sister, born of Thare by another wife. His adding truly, seems to restrain it to this sense; and we know that in those countries, marriages of such near relations were allowed, though not when both had the same parents. Why should we not, therefore, believe Abraham, who certainly knew the real state of the question, and who would not tell a lie, rather than seek for improbable and far-fetched solutions? Said, who lived eight hundred years ago, mentions the name of Jona, Abraham’s mother, as well as that of Tehevita, who bore Sara to Thare. The Hebrews, in general, give this explanation. C.—By calling Sara his sister without any addition, Abraham intended that the people should conclude he was not married; therefore he did not say she was his half-sister, as this would have frustrated his design, if, as Clem. Alex. asserts, such might and did marry under the law of nature. H.—Philo observes, the Athenian legislator, Solon, sanctioned the same practice, which was followed also by the Phœnicians. C.

Ver. 14. Gave, by way of satisfaction, for having detained his wife; as also to shew his respect for him who was a prophet. 1 Kings 9:7. H.

Ver. 16. Thy brother, as thou hast agreed to call thy husband.—Pieces, or sicles of silver, worth a little above 2s. 3d. each; total £113 sterling. —A covering, or veil, to shew thou art married, and prevent thee from being taken by any one hereafter. It was to be so rich, that all might know her quality. S. Paul (1 Cor. 11:5. 15) orders women to be covered. C.

Ver. 17. Healed. It is not known how God afflicted Abimelech; but the women could not be delivered during the short time that Sara was detained: on her being set at liberty, they bore children. M.

Ver. 1. Visited, either by the angel, C. 18:10, or by enabling her to have what he had promised, at the return of the season.

Ver. 3. Isaac. This word signifies laughter; (Ch.) or “he shall laugh,” and be the occasion of joy to many, as S. John was. Luke 1:14; and thus Sara seems to explain it, v. 6.

Ver. 7. Gave suck; a certain proof that the child was born of her. M.—His old age, when both the parents were far advanced in years, v. 2. The mother being ninety at this time, would render the event most surprising. H.

Ver. 8. Weaned. S. Jerom says when he was five years old, though some said twelve. The age of men being prolonged, their infancy continued longer. One of the Machabees suckled her child three years. 2 Mac. 7:27. 2 Par. 31:16. C.—Feast. The life of the child being now considered in less danger. From the time of conception till this place, the husband kept at a distance from his wife. S. Clem. Strom. iii. Samuel’s mother made a feast or present when she weaned him. 1 K. 1:24. M.

Ver. 9. Playing, or persecuting, as S. Paul explains it. Gal. 4:29. The play tended to pervert the morals of the young Isaac, whether we understand this term metsachak, as implying idolatry, or obscene actions, or fighting; in all which senses it is used in Scripture. See Ex. 32:6. G. 26:8. 2 K. 2:14. M.—Ismael was 13 years older than Isaac; and took occasion, perhaps, from the feast, and other signs of preference given by his parents to the latter, to hate and persecute him, which Sara soon perceiving, was forced to have recourse to the expedient apparently so harsh, of driving Ismael and his mother from the house, that they might have an establishment of their own, and not disturb Isaac in the inheritance after the death of Abraham. H.—In this she was guided by a divine light; (M.) and not by any female antipathy, v. 12. Many of the actions of worldlings, which at first sight may appear innocent, have a natural and fatal tendency to pervert the morals of the just; and therefore, we must keep as much as possible at a distance from their society.—With Isaac her son. Heb. has simply mocking, without mentioning what. But the sequel shews the true meaning; and this addition was found in some Bibles in the days of S. Jerom, as he testifies, and is expressed in the Sept. H.—Ismael was a figure of the synagogue, which persecuted the Church of Christ in her birth. D.

Ver. 11. For his son. He does not express any concern for Agar. But we cannot doubt but he would feel to part with her also. It was prudent to let both go together: and the mother had perhaps encouraged Ismael, at least by neglecting to punish or watch over him, and so deserved to share in his affliction.

Ver. 14. Bread and water. This seems a very slender allowance to be given by a man of Abraham's riches. But he might intend her to go only into the neighbourhood, where he would take care to provide for her. She lost herself in the wilderness, and thus fell into imminent danger of perishing. H.—This divorce of Agar, and ejection of Ismael, prefigured the reprobation of the Jews.

Ver. 17. Of the boy, who was 17 years old, and wept at the approach of death.—Fear not. Yare are under the protection of God, who will not abandon you, when all human succour fails; nor will he neglect his promises. G. 16. H.

Ver. 20. Wilderness, in Arabia Petrea.—An archer, living on plunder. C.

Ver. 22. Abimelech, king of Gerara, who knew that Abraham was a prophet, and a favourite of God. G. 20:7. H.

Ver. 23. Hurt me. Heb. “lie unto me,” or revolt and disturb the peace of my people.

Ver. 24. I will swear. The matter was of sufficient importance. Abraham binds himself, but not his posterity, who by God's order fought against the descendants of this king.

Ver. 27. Gave them; thus rendering good for evil. D.

Ver. 31. Bersabee. That is, the well of oath; (Ch.) or "the well of the seven;" meaning the seven ewe-lambs set apart. M.—This precaution of Abraham, in giving seven lambs as a testimony that the well was dug by him, was not without reason. See G. 26:15. C.

Ver. 33. A grove: in the midst of which was an altar, dedicated to the Lord God eternal; to testify that he alone was incapable of change. Thither Abraham frequently repaired, to thank God for all his favours. Temples were not probably as yet known in any part of the world. The ancient saints, Abraham, Isaac, Josue, &c. were pleased to shew their respect for God, and their love of retirement, by planting groves, and consecrating altars to the supreme Deity. If this laudable custom was afterwards perverted by the idolaters, and hence forbidden to God's people, we need not wonder. The best things may be abused; and when they become a source of scandal, we must avoid them. H. Jos. 24:26. Deut. 16:22. Jud. 6:25.

Ver. 1. God tempted, &c. God tempteth no man to evil, James 1:13. But by trial and experiment, maketh known to the world and to ourselves, what we are; as here by this trial the singular faith and obedience of Abraham was made manifest. Ch.

Ver. 2. Thy only begotten, or thy most beloved, as if he had been an only child; in which sense the word is often taken, 1 Par. 29:1. Ismael was still living; but Isaac was the only son of Sara, the most dignified wife.—Lovest. Heb. "hast loved" hitherto; now thou must consider him as dead. He has been to thee a source of joy, but now he will be one of tears and mourning.—Of vision. Sept. "high," being situated on Mount Moria, by which name it was afterwards distinguished, ver. 14. M.—Every word in this astonishing command, tended to cut Abraham to the heart; and thence we may the more admire his strength and disinterestedness of his faith. He could hope, in a manner, against hope, knowing in whom he had trusted, and convinced that God would not deceive him, though he was at a loss to explain in what manner Isaac should have children after he was sacrificed. H.

Ver. 3. In the night: de nocte, Heb. “very early in the morning.”—His son, 25 years old, without perhaps saying a word to Sara about the intended sacrifice; though some believe, he had too great an opinion of her faith and constancy, not to reveal to her the order of God. The Scripture is silent. C.

Ver. 5. Will return. He hoped, perhaps, that God would restore Isaac to life: (Heb. 11:19) and he could not well express himself otherwise to the men, who were not acquainted with the divine decree. C.

Ver. 7. Holocaust. These were probably the only sacrifices yet in use. C.—The conversation of Isaac could not fail to pierce the heart of his father. M.

Ver. 9. The place. Mount Moria, on part of which the temple was built afterwards; and on another part, called Calvary, our Saviour was crucified, having carried his cross, as Isaac did the wood for sacrifice. —His son: having first explained to him the will of God, to which Isaac gave his free consent; otherwise, being in the vigour of his youth, he might easily have hindered his aged father, who was 125 years old, from binding him. But in this willingness to die, as in many other particulars, he was a noble figure of Jesus Christ, who was offered because it was His will. H.

Ver. 10. To sacrifice; a thing hitherto unprecedented, and which God would never suffer to be done in his honour, though he was pleased to try the obedience of his servant so far. The pagans afterwards took occasion, perhaps, from this history, to suppose, that human victims would be the most agreeable to their false deities: (C.) but in this misconception they were inexcusable, since God prevented the sacrifice from being really offered to him, in the most earnest manner, saying, Abraham, Abraham, as if there were danger lest the holy man should not hear the first call. H.

Ver. 12. Hast not spared. Thus the intentions of the heart become worthy of praise, or of blame, even when no exterior effect is perceived. H.

Ver. 13. He took; God having given him the dominion over it. C.

Ver. 14. Will see. This became a proverbial expression, used by people in distress, who, remembering how Abraham had been relieved, endeavoured to comfort themselves with hopes of relief. Some translate the Lord will be seen, which was verified when Christ was crucified. M.—Or, he will provide, alluding to what was said, v. 8.

Ver. 16. Own self; as he could not swear by any one greater. Heb. 6:13.

Jer. 22:5.

Ver. 17. Stars and dust, comprising the just and sinners.—Gates, shall judge and rule. H.

Ver. 20. Children. These are mentioned here, to explain the marriage of Isaac with Rebecca, the grand-daughter of Nachor and Melcha.

Ver. 21. Hus, who peopled Ausitis in Arabia, the desert, where Job lived.—Buz, from whom sprung Elihu the Busite, the Balaam of the Jews. S. Jerom—Syrians, called Camiletes, to the west of the Euphrates; or father of the Cappadocians. C.

Ver. 24. Concubine, or wife, secondary in privileges, love, and dignity. Though Nachor did not, perhaps imitate the faith and virtue of his brother Abraham, but mixed various superstitions with the knowledge of the true God; yet we need not condemn him, for having more wives than one. H.

Ver. 1. Sara. She is the only woman whose age the Scripture specifies; a distinction which her exalted dignity and faith deserved. Gal. 4:23. Heb. 11:11. She was a figure of the Christian Church. C.

Ver. 2. City. Heb. Cariath arbah, Jos. 14:15.—Which is Hebron. Serarius thinks it took its name from the society (cherber) between Abraham and the princes of the city. Hebron the son of Caleb possessed it afterwards.—Came from Bersabee, (G. 22:19) or to the place where the corpse lay, at Arbee, which signifies four; as Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with their four wives, reposed there. C.—And weep. In the middle of this word, in the printed Hebrew, there is left a small c; whence the Rabbins ridiculously infer, that Abraham wept but a short time. But the retaining of greater, less, suspended and inverted letters in the Hebrew Bible, can be attributed to no other cause than a scrupulous veneration even for the faults of transcribers. Kennicott

Ver. 3. Obsequies, or solemn mourning, accompanied with prayer. Acts 8:2. Matt. 12. The Jews are still accustomed to say, when they bury their dead, “Ye fathers, who sleep in Hebron, open to him the gates of Eden;” herein agreeing with the Catholic doctrine, as they did in the days of Judas the Machabee. H.

Ver. 6. Prince of God, powerful and holy, and worthy of respect. H.—A great prince. See Acts 7:5 where S. Stephen says, that God did not give Abraham a foot of land, meaning as an inheritance; and that Abraham bought this double cave, for a sepulchre, of the sons of Hemor, the son of Sichem; (C.) from which latter he seems to derive the name of the place, which is here called Hebron. H.—Nothing is more common, than for men and places to have two names; though some think, the name of Abraham has been inserted in the Acts by a mistake of the copyists, when Jacob was meant. See G. 33:19. C.

Ver. 7. Bowed down to the people. Adoravit, literally, adored. But this word here, as well as in many other places in the Latin Scriptures, is used to signify only an inferior honour and reverence paid to men, expressed by a bowing down of the body.

Ver. 16. Sicles. About £50. H.—It was no simony to buy land for a sepulchre, as it was not blessed. M.—Current money, was such as passed among merchants, though probably not yet coined in any part of the world; and therefore we find, that Abraham and others weigh the pieces of silver or gold. In this manner were bargains concluded before witnesses, who in those days supplied the want of writings and lawyers. C.

Ver. 2. Servant. Eliezer, or Damascus, whom he had once intended for his heir. C. 15:2. H.—Under, &c. either to shew their subjection, (Sa.) or their faith in Christ, who should be born of Abraham, (S. Jer. ep. 140) or to testify that their oath shall be no less binding than the covenant of circumcision. For this last reason, the Jews still observe the custom of sitting upon the hand of the person who takes an oath. M. See C. 47:29 where Jacob imitates the action of his grand-father. These two patriarchs, progenitors of Christ are the only ones in Scripture whom we find practising it; whence S. Aug. and S. Ambrose conclude, that it had a reference to the mysterious birth of our Redeemer. Bonfrere.

Ver. 4. Country. Huran, where Abraham had dwelt with Thare, &c. There Nachor's family still resided, and had more respect for the true God than the Chanaanites, (H.) though they gave way to some sort of idolatry. M.—Hence Abraham was in hopes that a partner worthy of Isaac might be found among his relations, better than among those devoted nations; and thus he has left an instruction to all parents, to be solicitous for the real welfare of their children; and to dissuade them earnestly from marrying with infidels; a thing which God forbade in the old law, as the Church still does in the new. H.

Ver. 5. If the woman. Thus he shews his religious respect for an oath; and will not depend on his own explanation of the sense of it. C.

Ver. 7. He will send his angel before thee. This shews that the Hebrews believed that God gave them guardian angels for their protection. Ch.—Angel. A proof of the antiquity of our belief respecting angel guardians. C.

Ver. 14. By this. He chose a mark which would manifest the kindness and humility of the maid, who would be a fit match for the pious Isaac. This was no vain observation. God heard his fervent prayer. S. Chrys. C.—It is sometimes lawful to ask a sign or miracle of God. Acts 1:24. 4:30. 1 K. 14. &c.; but we must carefully avoid whatever the Church disapproves. S. Aug. de Gen. ii. 17. xii. 22. W.

Ver. 21. To know, though he was now almost convinced, that this obliging virgin was the person of whom he was in quest; and hence he proceeds to make her presents of great value. H.

Ver. 27. Mercy and truth: or a real kindness, so often mentioned in the Psalms. C..

Ver. 41. Curse, which always attends the person who does not endeavour to comply with a lawful oath. H.—The Hebrews commonly added in this sense, May God do these things to me, and still more, if I prove false. M.—In this sense, Abraham's steward gives the meaning of his master, as he had hitherto repeated his very words at full length. This perfectly agrees with the style of the heroic ages; such as we find expressed in the poems of Homer, the most ancient work of any heathen author. The account which he gives of the noble simplicity of those ages, when the ladies went for water, and princes prepared the entertainments for their guests, cannot fail to strike us, when we compare the works of that admired author with the inspired writings. H.

Ver. 49. Left, in quest of some other lady of my master's kindred; as some of Bathuel's brothers might also have children. He was the youngest. H.

Ver. 50. Laban is placed before his father, having perhaps the administration of affairs in Bathuel's old age; and he had first introduced the stranger. M.

Ver. 53. Present. Thus ratifying what he had already done, (v. 22) and obtaining full consent, both of the virgin, and of her father and brother.

Ver. 54. Morning. He loses no time to afford comfort to his masters, and to give proof that he was not esteemed by them without reason.

Ver. 57. Let us call the maid, and ask her will. Not as to her marriage, as she had already consented, but of her quitting her parents and going to her husband. Ch.

Ver. 58. I will go, without delay, being well convinced that the good steward was directed by God. Hence she was guilty of no imprudence or levity, in yielding herself up to the divine will, and consenting so readily to the proposed marriage.

Ver. 62. The well of Agar, not far from Bersabee.

Ver. 63. To meditate on the obligations of the state on which he was about to enter, and on other pious subjects, free from noise and distraction. H.—In profane authors, the word used by the Sept. means to talk about trifles, &c. C.—But the known piety of Isaac, and the authority of that version, forbid that we should take it here in that sense. H.

Ver. 65. Cloak, or summer veil, covering the whole body, and having an opening only for the eyes; such as the Eastern ladies use. S. Jer. in Isai. iii. Rebecca does this out of modesty. H.—She prefigures the Gentiles, whom Jesus calls by his servants laden with his gifts, to become his spouse, or his Church, (C.) at the fountain of baptism. He adorns her with the ear-rings of obedience, and the bracelets of good works. D.

Ver. 67. Mother's death, which happened about three years before. M.—Isaac was now forty years old, and yet he does not pretend to take a wife for himself; leaving the choice to his good father, and to God. D.

Ver. 1. Cetura, his third wife; the former two being perhaps both dead. This Abraham did in his 137th year, that God might have witnesses also among the Gentiles. Cetura was before one of his handmaids. M.—God enabled him to have children at this advanced age; or perhaps, Moses may have related his marriage in this place, though it had taken place several years before. S. Aug. c. Jul. iii. C. This learned father, de C. D. xvi. 34, supposes that the reason why Cetura is styled a concubine, though she was a lawful and only wife, is because her children prefigured heretics, who do not belong to the kingdom of Christ. W.

Ver. 6. Concubines. Agar and Cetura are here called concubines, (though they were lawful wives, and in other places are so called) because they were of an inferior degree: and such in Scripture are usually called concubines. Ch.—The solemnities of marriage were omitted on these occasions, and the children were not entitled to a share in the inheritance. Jacob's two wives consented that all his children, by their handmaids, should be placed on the same footing with their own. C.—Abraham contented himself with making suitable presents to the children, whom he had by these secondary wives, reserving the bulk of his property to Isaac. G. 24:36. He also provided for their establishment himself, that there might be no contest after his departure.

Ver. 8. Good old age. Because well spent: though he lived not so long as many of the wicked; decaying not by any violent disorder, but dropping off like a ripe apple.—Being full. The Heb. does not express of what; but the Sam. Chal. Sept. Syr. and Arab. agree with the Vulgate. See C. 35:29. H.—Days, not years, as Protestants wrongfully interpolate. Kennicott.—His people, the saints of ancient days, in limbo; while his body was placed near the remains of his wife, by the pious attention of his two chief sons, attended by their other brethren. H.—The life of Abraham was a pattern of all virtues, but particularly of faith; and it was an abridgment of the law. His equal was no where found. Eccli. 44:20. C.

Ver. 16. By their castles; or, the castles, towns, and tribes of principal note, received their names from these twelve princes, or phylarks, whose authority is still recognized among all the tribes of the Arabs. Thevenot. H.—The towns of these people were easily built, and more easily destroyed; for they consisted only of tents. Jer. 49:31. Their castles were perhaps only sheep-folds, as the original Tiroth may signify; or they were a sort of watch-towers, to prevent the sudden attack of an invading enemy, and to serve also for a retreat. C.

Ver. 18. In the presence, &c. As he was the eldest, so he died first; having lived unmolested and fearless among his father's children. G. 16:12. C.

Ver. 21. Barren. They had been married 20 years, (v. 26) during which time, S. Chrysostom says, Isaac had earnestly besought the Lord, (M.) and obtained by prayer what God long before decreed. See S. Greg. Dial. i. 8. W.

Ver. 22. To be so. That is, if I must die, and my children also. She feared the worst; and immediately had recourse to the Lord, either in her oratory, or at one of his altars erected by Abraham; and received a gracious answer from him by means of an angel. H.—Others think she consulted Melchisedech at Mount Moria. M.

Ver. 23. The younger. The Idumeans shall be subdued by the arms of David: and the Jews themselves shall yield to the Christian Church. S. Aug. de C. D. xvi. 35.) S. Paul, Rom. 9 draws another very important truth from this history, shewing the mercy of God to be gratuitous in choosing his saints. W.

Ver. 25. Red. Hence he was called Edom, as well as from the red pottage, v. 30. H.—Hairy like a skin. On which account Rebecca afterwards clothed Jacob's hands and neck with the skins of kids, to make him resemble Esau. Furry robes were not unusual among the Jews. Some imagine that the name of Sehar, was given to Esau, on account of his being hairy: but Esau was the title by which he was commonly known, and it means one made perfect; because he came into the world, “covered with hair like a man.”—Jacob: “a supplanter, or wrestler.” C.—From the birth of these twins, S. Gregory shews the folly of astrologers, who pretend that our actions are under the influence of the planets; and that two, born at the same moment, will have the same fate. How different were the lives of Jacob and Esau! H.

Ver. 27. A husbandman: a rustic, both in profession and manners, like Cain; while Jacob was a shepherd, in imitation of Abel, plain and honest. H.

Ver. 28. Loved Esau, as his first-born, who shewed him all attention, and whom he would naturally have appointed his heir, if the will of God had not afterwards been revealed to him. Rebecca, to whom this was already known, gave the preference in her love to Jacob. H.

Ver. 29. Pottage, of Egyptian lentiles, the most excellent in the world. C.

Ver. 30. Give me, &c. Heb. “make me devour this red;” which denotes, the very red quality of the pottage, and the greediness of Esau. C.

Ver. 31. Sell me. He had been informed by his mother, that God had transferred the birth-right to him; and, therefore, he takes this opportunity to obtain the consent of Esau quietly. The latter, who knew nothing of God's decree, shewed his little regard for that privilege. H.—He perhaps intended to assert his claim by force, notwithstanding this agreement. M.—It is not probable that he could plead in earnest, that he was famishing in the midst of his father's house. D.—The birth-right was a temporal honour; though some assert that the office of priesthood belonged also to it. This, however, does not seem to be certain; for we find Abel, Abraham, and other younger children offering sacrifice. The first-born were entitled to a double portion, Deut. 21:17. 1 Par. 5:2. 5 and to their father's peculiar blessing, Eccli. 3:12. To despise such advantages betrayed a bad disposition, for which Esau is condemned, Heb. 12:16. Rom. 9. C.—Jacob's conduct was perfectly innocent, whether we consider this transaction as serious or not. Isaac never ratified the bargain; nor do we find that Jacob rested his claim on it. H.—But it is recorded by Moses, to shew the disposition of these two young men. C.

Ver. 33. Swore; and still we find him enraged above measure, when Isaac had, by mistake, ratified the transfer of the birth-right to Jacob; (G. 27:41) whence we may gather, that he did not intend to perform what he promised, even with the solemnity of an oath; which renders him still more deserving of the title profane, which S. Paul gives him. H.

Ver. 5. Ceremonies of religion, observed under the law of nature. M.

Ver. 7. Sister, or niece. Though lawful at that time, it was not very common for people to marry such near relations; and therefore Isaac, by saying Rebecca was his sister, wished the people of Gerara to be ignorant of her being his wife; being under the like apprehension as his father had been twice before. He imitates his example, trusting in the protection of God, which had rescued Abraham from danger. C. 21. H.

Ver. 8. His wife; using greater familiarity than a grave and virtuous man, like Isaac, would offer to do with his sister, or with another person's wife.—Sin, or punishment, (M.) such as Abimelech's father had formerly experienced. H.

Ver. 11. Touch, or hurt, by offering to marry, &c. H.—Adultery was punished with death among these nations. C. 38:24, as it was by the law of Moses. C.

Ver. 12. And the Lord. This is not mentioned as a miracle; for Egypt and many other countries produced 100 fold. Pliny xviii. 10. says, some parts of Africa rendered 150 times as much as was sowed. The famine had now ceased. C.

Ver. 16. Depart. Instead of repressing the outrages of his subjects, the king enters into their jealousies, and banishes a wealthy person, (H.) as the Athenians so frequently did afterwards with respect to their best citizens. Arist. Polit. iii. 9.—And Pharao used the same pretext, when he persecuted the Hebrews. C.

Ver. 18. Servants. So the Sept. and Syr. versions, and the Sam. copy against the Heb. in the days, which is incorrect. Ken.

Ver. 19. Torrent. That is, a channel where sometimes a torrent, or violent stream had run. Ch.—In this vale of Gerara, a never-failing spring was found. H.

Ver. 22. Latitude. That is, wideness, or room. Ch.—Hebrew Reheboth, widely extended streams, latitudines. See C. 10:11.

Ver. 24. Of Abraham, who still lives before me, and for whom I always testified such affection, though I suffered him to be persecuted: hence, fear not. H.

Ver. 26. Ochozath. This name occurs in the Sept. as well as the other two; (C. 21:22) and means a company of friends. Phicol also signifies the mouth or face of all, being the general of the army, on whom the soldiers must be intent. These are, perhaps, therefore, the names of offices, not of persons; or if they be the same who lived with Abraham, they must have held their high command above 100 years. M. C.

Ver. 35. Offended. They were the daughters of princes of the Heathens, (Josephus) and being brought up in idolatry and pride, refused to give ear to the advice of Isaac, who never approved of the marriage of his son with them. Esau would not leave the choice of a wife to his father, as Isaac had done at the same age. H.

Ver. 1. Old: 137 years, when falling sickly and blind, at least for a time, he wished to bless Esau, who was 77 years old. T.

Ver. 4. That, &c. He does not mean, that the meat would induce him to give his blessing. Neither can we suppose, that he intended to pervert the order of God, in making the younger son subject to the elder, if he was informed by Rebecca, of that disposition of providence. C.—But of this he seems to have been ignorant, v. 29. 35. W.

Ver. 7. In the sight of the Lord, answers to my soul, &c. v. 4. I will bless thee with all earnestness and sincerity. H.

Ver. 12. Mocked him, taking advantage of his blindness and old age. M.

Ver. 13. This curse. Rebecca had too much confidence in God's promises, to think that he would suffer them to be ineffectual. Hence, Onkelos makes her say, "I have learnt by revelation, that thou wilt receive no curse, but only blessing." The sequel shewed, that she was directed by God in this delicate business. Theod. q. 78. C.

Ver. 15. Very good. Heb. desirable, kept among perfumes, v. 27. Such, the Hebrews say, were used by the first-born, when they offered sacrifice. S. Jerom, q. Heb.

Ver. 19. I am Esau, thy first-born. S. Augustine, (L. Contra Mendacium, c. x.) treating at large upon this place, excuseth Jacob from a lie, because this whole passage was mysterious, as relating to the preference which was afterwards to be given to the Gentiles before the carnal Jews, which Jacob by prophetic light might understand. So far is certain, that the first birth-right, both by divine election, and by Esau's free cession, belonged to Jacob: so that if there were any lie in the case, it could be no more than an officious and venial one. Ch.—Ignorance might also excuse them from any sin; as many good and learned men have thought an officious lie to be lawful. S. Chrys. hom. 52. Origen. Bonfrere. And even if we allow that they did wrong; the Scripture relates, but does not sanction what they did, Let him that thinks himself to stand, take heed lest he fall. 1 Cor. 10:12. C.—As our Saviour says of S. John, He is Elias, Matt. 11, so, Jacob says, I am Esau, not in person, but in right of the first-born. W.

Ver. 22. Of Esau. Thus, too often our voice contradicts our hands or actions! H.

Ver. 27. Plentiful. A word retained by the Sam. and Sept. though lost in the Hebrew copies. Grotius.—Hath blessed with abundance of fruit and odoriferous herbs; such as had probably been shut up in the drawers with Esau's robes. M.

Ver. 28. Wine. “By which Christ gathers together the multitude, in the Sacrament of his Body and Blood.” S. Aug.

Ver. 29. Worship thee, with civil respect, (H.) as the Idumeans, Philistines and Moabites did, with respect to David, Solomon, and the Machabees, acknowledging their dominion, though reluctantly.—With blessing. Thus Rebecca had not given her son a vain assurance. Isaac prays that God may ever by his protector, and avenge his cause. H.

Ver. 30. Fear. Sept. “Isaac was rapt into an ecstasy exceedingly great;” during which God explained to him the meaning of what had happened, that he might not think of revoking his blessing. S. Aug. q. 80. He permitted Isaac to be in darkness respecting this affair, that it might be more manifest, that the will of man had no part in preferring Jacob; (S. Chrys. hom. 53.) and that Esau might not direct his rage against his father. W.

Ver. 33. Be blessed. Thus he confirms what he had done; and shews that he bore no resentment towards his younger son, nor esteemed himself to be mocked, v. 12. H.

Ver. 34. Roared, through savage fury and envy of his brother. Euseb. M.

Ver. 35. Deceitfully. Heb. sily; directed by wisdom, as the Chal. has it. S. Chrysostom (de sacerd.) praises the address of Jacob on this occasion. C.

Ver. 36. Jacob. That is, a supplanter. Ch.—My blessing. Both Isaac and Esau speak of this blessing, according to the dictates of nature. But God had disposed of it otherwise. The profane and cruel manners of Esau rendered him unworthy of it; and he could not maintain his natural claim, after having freely resigned it even with an oath. He seems to distinguish the blessing from the birth-right, though one necessarily followed the other. H.

Ver. 37. Brethren, or relations; (M.) for Isaac had no other children but these two. He never married any other woman but the beautiful and virtuous Rebecca. H.

Ver. 39. Moved; yet not so as to repent of what he had done; for Esau found no place of repentance in his father’s breast, although with tears he had sought it, (Heb. 12:17) desiring to obtain the blessing of the first-born. H.—In the fat, &c. Idumea was a barren country; and hence some would translate the Heb. “far from the fat ... shall they dwelling be; but thou shalt live by the sword.” Thus min often means from, as well as for in: my flesh is changed on account of the want of oil, Ps. 109:24.

Heb. a pinguedine. C.—But all the ancient versions agree with the Vulg. So that we may say, the blessing of God made those barren regions supply the wants of the people abundantly; and so the Idumeans were to live by the sword, they would seize the rich habitations of their neighbours, (H.) and thus obtain a country rendered fertile without their labour. M.

Ver. 40. Thy brother, in the reign of David, 2 K. 8:14, and of the Machabees. Josep. Ant. xiii. 17.—Yoke. When the house of Juda shall rebel against the Lord, in the days of Joram, then the Idumeans shall regain their liberty for a time; (4 K. 8:20) to be subdued again after 800 years by John Hyrcan, the high priest. H.—All the blessing of Esau tends to confirm that already given to his brother; so that the apostle seems to have considered it unworthy of notice. C.—Jacob, in the mean time, never asserted his dominion; but still called Esau his lord, (C. 32:4) and behaved to him with the greatest deference. H.—Yet the Idumeans always hated the Jews, and assisted Titus to destroy Jerusalem. Joseph. T.

Ver. 41. My father. He has no regard for this mother. M.—Her love for Jacob filled him with greater indignation; and he resolved to murder him, in order, perhaps, to revenge himself on both. Though this cruel resolution was taken in his heart, with full deliberation, he was not so careful to conceal his intentions; but his watchful mother discovered it, and by her prudence, preserved him from committing the external sin: and Jacob from falling a prey to this second Cain.

Ver. 45. Both my sons. Esau would have forfeited his life for murder. C. 9:6. H.—Perhaps she might also fear that Jacob, in his own defence, should in the very agony of death, give the aggressor a mortal wound; or that Esau, at least, would be forced to flee his country. Indeed, she considered him already as a lost man, on account of his marriage with the two women of Chanaan, and his savage manners. C.

Ver. 46. To live. Life will be a burden to me. M.—She does not mention the principal reason of her desiring Jacob to go to Haran, for fear of grieving the tender heart of her husband; who, it seems, knew not the temper of Esau so well as she did. C.

Ver. 2. Take. Sept. “flee;” as if Isaac began at last to be apprized of Esau's designs. Wisdom (10:10) conducted the just when he fled from his brother's wrath, &c.—Thy uncle. He points out the house, but leaves the woman to his choice.

Ver. 4. Grandfather. Isaac, out of modesty, does not mention that the same promises had been made to himself. He determines the right over Chanaan to belong solely to Jacob, and to his posterity. H.

Ver. 9. To Ismael's family; for he had been dead fourteen years. Esau asks no advice. It is doubtful whether he meant to appease or irritate his parents, (M.) by this marriage with the daughter of Ismael. She lived with her brother, the head of the Nabutheans, and is called Basemath. C. 36:3. C.

Ver. 11. Head for a pillow. Behold the austerity of the heir of all that country! H.—He departs from home in haste, with his staff only, that Esau might not know. W.

Ver. 12. A ladder and angels, &c. This mysterious vision tended to comfort the patriarch, with the assurance that God would now take him under his more particular protection, when he was destitute of human aid. H.—The angels ascending, foretold that his journey would be prosperous; and descending, shewed that he would return with safety. M.—Or rather, the ladder represented the incarnation of Jesus Christ, born of so many patriarchs from Adam, who was created by God, to the blessed Virgin. He is the way by which we must ascend, by observing the truth, till we obtain life eternal. H.—Mercy and truth are like the two sides; the virtues of Christ are signified by the steps. Angels descend to announce this joyful mystery to men; they ascend to convey the prayers and ardent desires of the ancient saints, to hasten their redemption. M.—Our Saviour seems to allude to this passage. Jo. 1:51. 14:6. The Providence of God, watching over all things, appears here very conspicuous.

Ver. 13. Thy father, or grandfather. God joins the dead with the living, to shew that all live to him, and that the soul is immortal. H.

Ver. 16. Knew it not. Jacob was not ignorant that God fills all places. But he thought that he would not manifest himself thus in a land given to idolatry. He begins to suspect that the place had been formerly consecrated to the worship of the true God, (C.) as it probably had by Abraham, who dwelt near Bethel, (C. 12:8,) and built an altar on Mount Moria, 22:14. Interpreters are not agreed on which of these places Jacob spent the night. S. Aug. q. 83, supposes it was on the latter, "where God appointed the tabernacle to remain." The Chaldee paraphrases it very well in this sense, v. 17, "How terrible is this place! It is not an ordinary place, but a place beloved by God, and over against this place is the door of heaven.” H.

Ver. 18. A title. That is a pillar or monument. Ch.—Or an altar, consecrated by that rite to the service of the true God. This he did without any superstition; as the Catholic Church still pours oil or chrism upon her altars, in imitation of Jacob. Raban. Instit. i. 45. If pagans did the like, this is no reason why we should condemn the practice. They were blamable for designing thus to worship false gods. Clem. Strom. vii. Apul. Florid. i. &c. If Protestants pull down altars, under the plea of their being superstitious, we cannot but pity their ignorance or malice. W.

Ver. 19. Bethel. This name signifies the house of God. Ch.—Bethel was the name which Jacob gave to the place; and the town, which was built after his return, was called by the same name. Hence those famous animated stones or idols, received their title (Bethules, Eus. præp. i. 10.) being consecrated to Saturn, the Sun, &c. Till the days of Mahomet, the Arabs adored a rough stone, taken from the temple of Mecca, which they pretended was built by Abraham. Chardin.—Luza, so called from the number of nut or almond trees. Here the golden calf was afterwards set up, on the confines of the tribes of Benjamin and of Ephraim, (C.) the southern limits of the kingdom of Jeroboam. H.

Ver. 20. A vow; not simply that he would acknowledge one God, but that he would testify his peculiar veneration for him, by erecting an altar, at his return, and by giving voluntarily the tithes of all he had. W. C. 35:7. How he gave these tithes, we do not read. Perhaps he might hereby engage his posterity to give them under the law of Moses. C.

Ver. 1. East. Mesopotamia, where Laban dwelt. H.

Ver. 2. Stone. Not of such an immoderate size but that Jacob could remove it. In that country water was scarce, and preserved with care. C.

Ver. 3. Sheep. Instead of this, Kennicott would read shepherds; as also v. 2 and 8. In which last, the Sam. Arab. and Sept. agree with him; as the two former do likewise in this third verse. H.

Ver. 4. Brethren. Jacob understands and speaks their language, either because it was not very different from his own, or he had learnt the Chaldee language from his mother. In the days of Ezechias, the Jews did not understand it. 4 K. 18:26. Jer. 5:15. C.

Ver. 5. Of Nachor, by Bathuel, who was not so well known. M.

Ver. 6. Health. Heb. “in peace;” by which name all good things are designated. D.

Ver. 7. To feed. He shews his knowledge of pastoral affairs, and his concern for them. M.

Ver. 9. She. Heb. He, ipsa. Eva is put for Eia, the letters being similar. C. 3:15. H.—Other copies agree with the Vulg. and the Sept. C.

Ver. 10. Cousin-german, and uncle, are put for brevity’s sake by S. Jerom, instead of the Heb. “the daughter of Laban, brother of Rebecca his mother,” and “his mother’s brother.” H.

Ver. 11. Kissed her, according to the custom of the country, (C. 24:26,) having told her who he was. He was not so young, that she could suspect him guilty of an unbecoming levity, being above 77 years old. C. 27:1. H.—In that age of simplicity, beautiful maids might converse with shepherds, without suspicion or danger. M.—Wept, through tenderness, and perhaps on account of his present inability to make her a suitable present. C.

Ver. 12. Brother, or nephew. The name of brother, in Scripture, almost corresponds with the Consanguineus of the Latins, or our relation.

Ver. 14. My flesh, entitled to my utmost protection and friendship. C.

Ver. 17. Blar-eyed. Heb. racoth. Watery and tender, unable to look steadfastly at any object, but at the same time very beautiful. Onkelos, &c.—The beauty of Rachel was perfect; not confined to one part. These two sisters represented the synagogue and the Church of Christ. Lia, though married first, never gains the entire affection of her husband. C.

Ver. 20. For Rachel. It was then the custom to buy or to pay a dowry for a wife. C. 34:12. Ose. 3:2. Herodotus says, i. 196, that the Babylonians sold their beautiful women as high as possible, and gave part of the price to help off the more deformed. The Turks do the like. C.—A few, &c. So highly did he esteem Rachel, that he thought he had obtained her for just nothing, though delays naturally seem long to lovers. T.—Calmet supposes that he was married to her the second month after he arrived at Haran; and on this account, easily explains his words, as love made all labour tolerable, and even easy, in the enjoyment of the beautiful Rachel. Usher also places the birth of Ruben in the first year of Jacob's service. A. 2246. But Salien and the context decide, that he waited full seven years, and then obtained Lia, by fraud, of Laban; and seven days after, Rachel. H.—He was then 84 years old! D.

Ver. 21. Go in, &c. To consummate my marriage; (M.) as the time is expired. H.

Ver. 22. Friends. Heb. Sept. and Chal. say, “all the men of that place.” He was rich, and, though very greedy, could not well avoid conforming to the custom of making a splendid entertainment on such a joyful occasion. H.

Ver. 24. A handmaid, by way of dowry, as he did afterwards to Rachel. Both sisters considered it so small, as to say they had nothing. C. 31:14.—Lia, who committed a great sin of adultery, though she was more excusable than Laban; inasmuch as she obeyed his order. M.—Jacob might justly have refused to marry her; and then what a dishonour would have been entailed upon her for life! In consequence of this imposition, the legitimacy of Ruben's conception was rendered doubtful. We may suppose, that shame hindered Lia from opening her mouth; so that Jacob had no means of discovering the cheat till day-break, having gone into the nuptial chamber after it was dark, according to custom, and the woman being also covered with a veil. Tob. 8:1. Hence Jacob was guilty of no fault, as his mistake was involuntary. H.—He afterwards consented to marry her, (C.) probably on the second day of the feast. H.

Ver. 26. Custom. This appears to be a false pretext: for all the people saw that Rachel was adorned like the intended bride, (H.) and were invited to her wedding. M.

Ver. 28. Week. Seven days; not years, as Josephus would have it. The nuptial feast lasted a week. Jud. 14:15.

Ver. 30. Latter. Jacob is the figure of Jesus Christ; who rejected the synagogue, and treated his Church, gathered from all nations, with the utmost affection. C.—Lia means “painful or labourious;” and Rachel a sheep; denoting, that a quiet contemplative life must be united with an active one; and that the Church must suffer here, and be crowned in heaven. H. S. Greg. Mor. vi. 28.

Ver. 31. Despised, or loved less; so Christ orders us to hate father, &c. Matt. 10:17. C.

Ver. 32. Ruben. "See the son, or the son of vision;" alluding perhaps, distantly, to v. 24. He saw Lia. H.

Ver. 33. Despised, or the hated wife, Deut. 21:15.—Simeon, "hearing or obedient."

Ver. 34. Levi, "adhesion or union." My husband will now stick to me.

Ver. 35. Juda, "praise or confession." C.—Left bearing for a time. H.—In the imposition of these names, Lia testified her gratitude to God. T.

Ver. 1. Envied, or desired to have children like her. Thus we may envy the virtues of the saints. C.—Give me, &c. These words seem to indicate a degree of impatience, at which we need not be surprised, when we reflect, that Rachel had been educated among idolaters. M.—Die of grief and shame. "I shall be considered as one dead." Jun. S. Chrysostom thinks she threatened to lay violent hands on herself, and through jealousy, spoke in a foolish manner. This passion is capable of the basest actions, (H.) and is almost unavoidable where polygamy reigns. C.

Ver. 2. Angry at the rash and apparently blasphemous demand of Rachel. M.—As God, pro Deo. Am I to work a miracle in opposition to God, who has made thee barren? To him thou oughtest to address thyself. The Hebrews justly observe, that God has reserved to himself the four keys of nature: 1. Of generation; 2. Of sustenance, Ps. 144:16; 3. Of rain, Deut. 28:12. And, 4. Of the grave or resurrection, Ez. 37:12. T.

Ver. 3. Servant, like a maid of honour. Josephus says she was not a slave, no more than Zelpha.—My knees, whom I may nurse with pleasure. It was an ancient custom to place the new-born infants upon the knees of some near relation, who gave them a name, and thus in a manner adopted them. C. 50:22. Job 3:12. Ps. 21:11. Homer. C.

Ver. 4. Marriage. The Manichees condemned Jacob for having more than four wives at once. But S. Aug. replied, it was not then unusual or forbidden. He took the two last only at the pressing instigation of Rachel and Lia, and that only for the sake of children. Lia herself was forced upon him. c. Faust. xxii. 48.

Ver. 6. Dan, means judgment. From the same root as Adonis; Adoni, my lord or judge, &c. Rachel's whole solicitude was for children. H.

Ver. 8. Compared me, &c. As Lia treacherously got my husband, so I have craftily surmounted the difficulties of barrenness; I have struggled earnestly, and have got the victory. Patal, means to act with cunning. Ps. 17:27. C.—Nephtali, “a crafty wrestler.” M.

Ver. 11. Happily, fortunately.—Gad, or Bonaventure. H.—“Good-fortune,” was acknowledge by the pagans for a divinity; (Is. 65:11) perhaps for the Sun, or Oromagdes, the Gad of Aram. He was opposed to the wicked Arimenes in the Chaldee theology, by Zoroaster, (C.) the inventor of the Two Principles. Whether Lia intended to attribute this child to the influence of the planet Jupiter, the Sun, or some other tool, we cannot determine. H.—Her naming my be simply; Behold I am now a mother of a troop, or little army, Gad; and to which (C. 49:19.) Jacob evidently alludes. C.

Ver. 13. Aser: happy. My servant has now had as many sons as my sister (M.) and I have given them both names, indicating my great felicity and joy. H.

Ver. 14. Ruben, now perhaps about four years old, playing in the fields, in the latter harvest time, (Ex. 9:32) found mandrakes of an extraordinary beauty and flavour, (Cant. 7:13) whether they were flowers, lilies, jasmine, &c. as some translate; or rather, fruits of the mandrake tree, according to all the ancient versions; or of the citron, lemon, or orange tree, if we believe Calmet. Dudaim designates two breasts, or something lovely and protuberant. The ancients have spoken with admiration, and have attributed wonderful effects to the mandrakes, which, though controverted by moderns, might suffice to make Rachel greatly desire to have them; at least, if she believed they would contribute to remove her sterility, as Pliny xxv. 15. Aristotle (de Gener. ii.) and other naturalists of eminence, have maintained they did. H.—The effect which she desired so much, was not, however, to be attributed to them, since she conceived only three years after, and that by the blessing of God. T.

Ver. 15. From me. Lia was aware that Jacob's affection lay entirely towards Rachel; particularly now, as she had ceased to bear children herself. H.—This might, when it is my turn to have him. To prevent any jealousy, the husband visited his wives one after another, as was the case with Smerdis, the king of Persia. Herod. iii. 79. Exod. 21:10. C.

Ver. 18. Issachar, “the reward of the man, or husband.” C.—She might allude also to the reward she had obtained for her mandrakes. H.

Ver. 20. Zabulon, “dwelling or cohabiting.” Zobad (which resembles the sound of Zobal) means to endow, (C.) to which she seems also to refer; as if her marriage was renewed, and God had given her more children for a dowry. M.

Ver. 21. Dina, “judgment,” like Dan. God hath done me justice. The Hebrews assert that Dina was married to holy Job. She was born the same year as Joseph, the 91st of Jacob. Lia brought forth seven children in seven years.

Ver. 24. Joseph. In imposing this name, Rachel looks both to the past and to the future; thanking God for taking away (asop) her reproach, and begging that He would add (isop or Joseph) the blessing of another son, as he really did, though it occasioned her death: so little do we know what we ask for! Joseph means one “adding or increasing.” C. 49:22. H.—He was born when the 14 years of service were over; being a most glorious figure of Jesus Christ, who came to redeem us from slavery. D.

Ver. 28. Give thee. He wishes to engage him to continue in his service; being convinced, that a faithful and pious servant is a great treasure. Laban promises every thing, and performs little according to his agreement. He never thinks of making Jacob any present for his extraordinary diligence.

Ver. 31. Nothing. I am willing to depart with my family towards my father. But if I must stay, these are my terms. H.—I require no certain wages, committing myself entirely to what Providence shall send. Salien.

Ver. 32. Speckled; from those which are all of one colour. Those which should be of the former description must belong to Jacob, while all the black and the white should be Laban’s.—Brown, or of a dull mixture of white and black.—Spotted, having large patches of either colour.—Divers, little spots variegating the fleece. M.—The original is extremely obscure. Jacob asks only for the worst; the speckled sheep and goats, also the black sheep and the white goats, v. 35. Bochart. C.

Ver. 33. Of theft, if they be found in my possession. I am so well convinced that God will reward my justice, that, even contrary to what might naturally be expected, he will enable me to have plenty of spotted sheep and goats, though their mothers be all of one colour. It is not certain, that Jacob agreed to have the flocks parted till the end of the year. M.

Ver. 35. His sons. These continued to observe the conduct of Jacob, while Laban drove off all the flocks of divers colours to so great a distance, (v. 36) that there was no danger of the sheep under Jacob's care getting to them. Thus Laban first began to violate the agreement; and the angel of the Lord suggested to Jacob, the plan by which he was preserved from serving a cruel and avaricious man without wages. C. 31:12. M.

Ver. 40. All the white, &c. Notwithstanding Jacob's stratagem, some had lambs all of a colour. The force of fancy is very surprising on such occasions. Oppian, Aristotle, and others, recommend Jacob's plan as consonant to nature. H.

Ver. 42. Later-coming, in autumn, when the spring lambs were of an inferior value. These he was willing to abandon for the most part to Laban; and therefore did not use his rods. Pliny viii. 47. and Columella viii. 3. agree, that the lambs which are produced in spring do not thrive so well as those of autumn, at least in Italy, and in those countries where sheep lamb twice a year. Bis gravidæ pecudes. Virg. C. —Many who have tried the same experiment as Jacob, have not experienced the same success; whence S. Chrysostom, and most of the Greek fathers, suppose that it was miraculous. T.

Ver. 1. After that six years were expired, and calumnies and ill-will attended Jacob in Laban's family, God ordered him to retire, v. 3. H.

Ver. 7. Ten times. Very often, or perhaps this exact number of times, v. 41.

Ver. 8. All, or the far greatest part, so that I was exceedingly enriched. M.—The Sept. here agrees with the Vulg. But the Heb. and other versions, instead of white ones, read of divers colours, or ring-streaked, which takes away the intended opposition. C.

Ver. 12. Are of divers colours. Their fancy was strongly impressed with these various colours, in consequence of the pilled rods, which they beheld: and which Jacob was directed by the angel to place in the troughs.—I have seen with displeasure, the injustice of Laban; (H.) and therefore, I, the Lord of all things, authorize thee to act in this manner. By this vision, the justice of Jacob would appear; and the authority for removing, given in a second vision, would suffice to induce the two principal wives of Jacob to give their consent to leave their father's house, and to begin a long journey. During the last six years, Providence had given no increase of family, that the little children might be no impediment to the removal. H.

Ver. 15. Eaten up. Laban kept for himself the dowry paid by Jacob for his wives, though he ought to have allotted it to them, with the addition of something more, in proportion to his immense wealth. M.

Ver. 18. Gotten. Heb. expresses over again, the cattle of his getting, &c. which is omitted in one MS. as well as in the Sept. Syr. and Arab. versions, though yet used in the Samarit. copy. Kennicott.—To Isaac, who was still living, though he had apprehended death was at hand 20 years before. He continued to live other 20 years after. Salien.—Jacob spent about 10 years at Sichem and at Bethel, before he went to dwell with Isaac. M.

Ver. 19. Her father's idols. By this it appears that Laban was an idolater: and some of the fathers are of opinion, that Rachel stole away these idols, to withdraw him from idolatry, by removing the occasion of his sin. Ch.—Others think she was herself infected with this superstition, until Jacob entirely banished it from his family in Chanaan. C. 35:2. T.—The Heb. Teraphim, is translated images by the Protestants in this place, though it certainly denotes idols. But Ose. 3:4, they leave it untranslated, lest they should be forced to allow that images pertain to religious service, as well as sacrifice, &c. which are mentioned together, (W.) though they now indeed have images in the same verse of Osee for what the Vulgate renders altar. These teraphims are consequently taken in a good as well as in a bad sense. They were, perhaps, made of rich metal, and taken by Rachel and Lia to indemnify them for the want of a dowry. This, however, was wrong, and done without the participation of their husband. H.

Ver. 20. Away. Heb. “Jacob stole the heart of Laban,” concealing his flight from him. M.

Ver. 21. The river Euphrates.—Galaad, as it was called afterwards, v. 48. M.

Ver. 22. Third day. He was gone to shear his sheep, distant three days' journey.

Ver. 24. Speak not. Laban did not comply exactly, but he used no violence. H.

Ver. 32. Slain. Homer says, “the father judges his children and wives;” and thus Jacob pronounces sentence. The Rabbins pretend it and its effect soon after in the death of Rachel. C. 35:18. C.

Ver. 35. Vain. For who would imagine, that a woman should treat in this manner the objects of her father's adoration? C.—It would hence appear, that she did not herself adore them, unless fear overcame her religion. H.

Ver. 36. Angry. He was extremely quiet. But patience abused, turns to fury. M.

Ver. 39. Exact it. Laban acted in opposition both to custom and to justice, (C.) while Jacob forebore to claim what he might have done, agreeably to both. H.

Ver. 42. The fear of Isaac; or of that God, whom Isaac fears, on account of the danger to which he is exposed of losing his friendship; a thing which, Abraham being now departed in peace, has not to dread. C.

Ver. 43. Are mine, or proceed from me originally; so that if I were to injure them, I should disregard the dictates of nature. M.

Ver. 47. Testimony. Heb. makes Laban give this etymology, Jegar-sahadutha; while Galaad means the hill or the witness. The Syrian language had now begun to deviate some little from the Hebrew of Jacob.—Each, &c. This is added by the Vulgate. C.

Ver. 49. Behold. Heb. “and Mitspah,” or “Hammitspah,” the watch-tower, whence God will see us. C.

Ver. 50. Over them. A wise precaution, which the rich Turks still observe when they give their daughters in marriage. Busbeq. ep. 3.

Ver. 51. I have, &c. One Sam. copy reads very properly, “thou hast set up,” (yarithi), v. 45. Kennicott.

Ver. 53. God of Nachor. Heb. uses Elohim, which is often applied to idols, such as Nachor worshipped along with the true God. C.—Jacob swears by the one only God, whom his father revered. M.—The God of their father, is omitted in the Sept. and is deemed an interpolation by Kennicott. The Sam. reads again the God of Abraham. H.

Ver. 55. Night (de nocte) when it was just at an end, and day-light appeared.—His daughters, with Dina, &c. Thus all ended well and in peace, by the divine interposition, after the most serious alarms. H.

Ver. 1. Angels. Guardians of Chanaan and Mesopotamia. Jarchi.—The latter escorted him as far as the torrent Jaboc. That angels guard different provinces, is well attested, Dan. 12:1. Acts 16:9. C.—Michael protected Chanaan and the people of God. Diodorus of Tarsus. M.

Ver. 2. Mahanaim, “two camps.” A town was afterwards built here.

Ver. 3. Edom; comprising the countries east, west, and south of the Dead sea. C.—Providentially, Esau had now left his father’s house open to his brother; who, on this occasion, addresses him with the utmost civility, and speaks of the riches which he had obtained; in order that Esau might neither be ashamed of him, nor suspect that he would impoverish his father. M.

Ver. 6. Men. Jonathan has Polemarchoi; officers or warriors, either to punish Jacob, (Wisd. 10:12) as the latter feared, v. 11; or to do him honour, as Esau protested. C. 33:15. C.

Ver. 9. God of ... Isaac. It is not true, therefore, that God never has the title of God of any man, while living, as some assert. C. 31:42. Jacob addresses him by those very titles which he had assumed at Bethel. C. 28:13. H.

Ver. 10. Not worthy. Chal. “my merits are beneath all thy kindnesses.” S. Aug. reads, with S. Cyril, idoneus es, &c. “thou art sufficient for me.”

Ver. 11. The children; sparing neither sex nor age, but destroying all. C.—Jacob insists on the promises of God; yet fears lest he should, by some offence, have deserved to forfeit his protection; particularly, as he had been living 20 years among idolaters. He acts with all prudence. W.

Ver. 15. Camels. The milk of these animals is most exquisite, being mixed with three parts water. Pliny xi. 41, who says, “They give milk till they be with young again.” The Arabs feed chiefly on their milk and flesh. S. Jer. c. Jor. ii. The value of all these presents, may give us some idea of the prodigious wealth which God had heaped upon Jacob in the space of six years! H.

Ver. 20. He said, &c. These words were not to be related to Esau; they are the words of the sacred historian. There were probably five droves of goats, sheep, camels, kine and asses; by the successive presenting of which, Esau might be appeased.

Ver. 22. Sons, with Dina his daughter, and all his household.

Ver. 23. All things. Grotius thinks this has been lost in the Heb. copies;

as it occurs in the Sam. Sept. and Syriac.

Ver. 24. A man, &c. This was an angel in human shape, as we learn from Osee 12:4. He is called God, v. 28 and 30, because he represented the person of the Son of God. This wrestling, in which Jacob, assisted by God, was a match for an angel, was so ordered, (v. 28) that he might learn by this experiment of the divine assistance, that neither Esau, nor any other man, should have power to hurt him. It was also spiritual, as appeareth by his earnest prayer, urging, and at last obtaining the angel's blessing. Ch.—The father will not refuse a good gift to those who ask him with fervour and humility. Jacob had before set us an excellent pattern how to pray, placing his confidence in God, and distrusting himself, v. 9. &c. H.—It is not certain, whether Jacob remained alone on the northern or on the southern banks of Jaboc. C.

Ver. 25. Sinew, near the coxendix, or huckel-bone. D. This was to convince Jacob, how easily he could have gained the victory over him; and to make him remember, that it was not simply a vision, but a real wrestling. T.

Ver. 28. Israel. This name was more honourable, and that by which his posterity were afterwards known; being called Israelites, and not Jacobites. God ratifies the title. C. 35:10. It means a prince of God. S. Jer. q. Heb. (C.) or one standing upright, and contending victoriously with God, rectus Dei, yisrael. H.—Many have expounded it, a man seeing God; aiss-rae-al. Philo, &c.

Ver. 29. Why, &c. He represses Jacob's curiosity, (H.) perhaps because God did not as yet choose to reveal his name. Ex. 6:3. Some Greek and Latin copies add, which is wonderful, taken from Jud. 13:6. 18. C.

Ver. 30. Phanuel. This word signifies the face of God, or the sight, or seeing of God. Ch.—Hebrew reads here Peni-el, though it has Phanuel in the next verse. Jacob thus returns thanks to God for the preservation of his life, after having seen God or his angel in a corporeal form, and not in a dream only. C.

Ver. 31. Halted, or was lame. Alulensis thinks the angel healed him very soon. M.

Ver. 32. The sinew in beasts of any kind, corresponding with that part of Jacob's thigh. H.—Some refrain from the whole quarter, others extract the sinew. This they do, without any command, in memory of this transaction. C.

Ver. 3. Forward, before his family; like a good father, exposing himself to the greatest danger. M.—Seven times, to testify his great humility and respect for his brother. How, then, can any one find fault with Catholics, if they bow down before the cross thrice on Good Friday, to testify their great veneration for their expiring Lord?

Ver. 8. Favour. Esau had already heard from the servants. But he asks again, meaning to excuse himself from receiving them. H.—This civil and unexpected behaviour, filled the breast of Jacob with such gratitude and love, that he made use of an hyperbole, I have seen, &c. ... of God. Chal. “of a prince,” Syr. “of an angel,” Elohim. See 2 K. 19:27. Est. 15:16. C.—A little present. Heb. monee, or mincha, calculated to shew the subjection of the giver. M.

Ver. 13. Young, boves foetus, giving milk, having calved lately, Sept. Bochart. C.

Ver. 14. In Seir; not immediately, but as soon as it might be convenient. This time perhaps never arrived. S. Aug. q. 106.

Ver. 18. The town of Salem, which was the first town of Chanaan that he came near after his return. It was afterwards called Sichem, and Sichar. J. 4:5 and Naplosa. Salim, mentioned John 3:23, was probably more to the east. Some translate, “He came quite sound to the city of Sichem;” where, Demetrius says, he dwelt ten years, Eus. præp. ix. 21, having stopped at Socoth six months. C.—This seems very probable, as Dina met with her misfortune a little before he left the country; and as she was six years old when she came from Haran, she would be about 15 when she began to go a visiting, &c. C. 34:1. H.

Ver. 19. Lambs. Heb. Kossite, or Kesita, a word which occurs also, Jos. 24:32, and Job 42:11; and may signify lambs, or a species of money, marked perhaps with their figure. It may also denote pearls, coral, a vessel, or purse of good money. S. Stephen, Acts 7:19 mentions the price of money. But he probably speaks of the bargain made by Abraham with Ephron, son of Heth, for which some have substituted Hemor, the son of Sichem. Kista in the Chal. means a vessel or measure; and we learn from Herodotus iii. 130, that the Persians were accustomed to keep their money in this manner. In the Chal. Syr. and Arabic languages, there are words derived from the same root as Kesita, which mean purity, perfection; and thus what Jacob gave was good current money; (C.) or such things as we received among merchants.

Ver. 20. The most, &c. El Elohe Yisrael. By this name he dignified the altar, consecrating his field and all his possessions to God, and acknowledging that all was his gift. H.

Ver. 1. Country, when a great festival was celebrated. Josep. Ant. i. 18.) Dina was urged by curiosity to see and to be seen. Let others take example from her, and beware of associating with infidels, and of opening their hearts to pleasure at fairs and nocturnal meetings.

Ver. 2. Virgin. Heb. and Sept. "He humbled or afflicted the virgin." It is well if she made all the resistance she was able, and resented the indignity; as she seems to have done, though Sichem tried all means to comfort her. H.

Ver. 5. Heard this, perhaps, from Dina's companion. M.

Ver. 7. In Israel, or against the honour and peace of their father and all his family.—An unlawful act, which some nevertheless commit without scruple, and even dare to represent as a matter of small consequence if they marry afterwards!

Ver. 10. Command, or you are at liberty to purchase and till it as you please. H.

Ver. 12. Dowry for Dina.—Gifts for her parents and brothers. G. 24:53. C.

Ver. 13. Deceitfully. The sons of Jacob, on this occasion, were guilty of a grievous sin, as well by falsely pretending religion, as by excess of their revenge. Though, otherwise their zeal against so foul a crime was commendable. Ch.—In this light it is viewed by Judith 9:2. Simeon and Levi spoke on this occasion. Sept. as they were afterwards the chief actors, v. 25. There were commissioned by their father to speak for him; but Jacob was ignorant of their deceit. H.

Ver. 14. Abominable. To be uncircumcised, was a reproach among the Hebrews. Yet there was no law forbidding to marry such. Laban was of this description, and the Chanaanites also; whose daughters the sons of Jacob themselves espoused, at least Juda and this very Simeon, as the Scripture assures us.

Ver. 17. Our daughter, the only one of our father; who, it would hence appear, was detained by Hemor, v. 26. C.

Ver. 19. The greatest man, (inclytus) perhaps associated to his father in the government of the town. Yet he is willing to submit to this painful operation. H.

Ver. 20. Gate. Here judgment was given, the markets held, &c. They endeavoured to convince the people, that the conditions offered would be for their interest. M.

Ver. 23. Ours, by mutual commerce. The Rabbin pretend the Sichemite designed to circumvent Jacob and his family. But their conduct seems to screen them from any reproach of this kind, and Jacob throws the blame upon his own sons. C. 49:6. If Hemor said more than he was authorized by them to do, this will not palliate their injustice and sacrilegious perfidy. C. M.

Ver. 25. Greatest. On that day a fever and inflammation likewise often take place. See Hippocrates on fractures, Valesius sac. Phil. 12. M.—Brothers of Dina by Lia, and both of a fiery temper. They were assisted by some servants, (M.) and afterwards the other children helped to pillage the city. Theodot. ap. Eus. ix. 22.

Ver. 29. Captive. No doubt Jacob would force them to restore such ill-gotten goods. C.—They had acted without authority, and even contrary to the known disposition of their father. They rashly exposed him to destruction, which would inevitably have taken place, if God had not protected him. C. 35:5. H.

Ver. 31. Should they, &c. This answer, full of insolence, to a father who was as much hurt by the indignity offered to Dina as they could be, heightens their crime. Sichem was the only one among the citizens really guilty, unless perhaps some of his servants might have given him assistance; and Hemor, the king, might contract some stain by not causing a better police to be observed, and by not punishing his son with greater severity, and not sending Dina home, &c. But why are the harmless citizens to be involved in ruin? unless Quicquid delirant Reges, plectuntur Achivi. H.

Procopius says Hemor also abused Dina; but the plural is here used for the singular, and this author builds upon a false supposition. C.

Ver. 1. God dissipates Jacob's well-grounded fears, and sends him to perform his vow. C. 18:13. H.

Ver. 2. Strange gods, which his servants had reserved in the plundering of Sichem; perhaps he had also been informed of Rachel's theft. D.—Garments; put on your cleanest and best attire, to testify the purity with which you ought to approach to the service of God. M.—See Exod. 19:10. Lev. 15:13.

Ver. 4. And the ear-rings. Hebrew, hanezamim; such as had been consecrated to some idol, and adorned the ears of those false but gaudy deities. M.—Men and women used them likewise, as phylacteries or talismans, to which many superstitious virtues were attributed. S. Aug. ep. 73, ad Posid. 9. iii. in Gen. Ezech. 16:12. Prov. 25. Ex. 35. Jud. 8. C.—The turpentine tree; or “an oak tree,” as the Hebrew haela means also. Sept. adds, “and he destroyed them till this present day;” which seems intended to refute the story of their being found and adored by the Samaritans, or employed by Solomon when he built the temple. Jacob buried them privately. C. See Deut. 7:5.

Ver. 5. Terror of God. A panic fear, which the pagans thought was sent by Pan. C.—God can easily make the most powerful flee before a few. S. Aug. q. 112.

Ver. 6. Chanaan, to distinguish it from another. Jud. 1:26, (M.) or because Moses wrote this in Arabia. C.

Ver. 7. To him. Heb. lit. “He called that place the God of Bethel, because there God (or the angels) appeared to him.” Haelohim, with a verb plural, generally refers to angels; when it is applied to God, the article is omitted, and the verb is singular. C.

Ver. 8. Debora. The Rabbin say she had been sent to urge Jacob's return. M.—Perhaps she was come to see him and the daughters of Laban, for whom she would naturally have a great regard, as she lived with Laban.—Weeping. This shews the great respect they had for this good old servant. H.

Ver. 10. Israel. This name signifies one that prevaieth with God; (Ch.) and is more honourable and expressive than that of Jacob. God confirms what had been declared by his angel. C. 32:28.

Ver. 12. And to, &c. And is often put by way of explanation. Chanaan was possessed by all the twelve sons of Jacob. Those of the handmaids are not excluded, as Ismael had been. W.

Ver. 14. Set up either a fresh altar, or restored the stone which he had formerly used for sacrifice. S. Aug. q. 116.—Drink, wine.—Oil. Theophrastus, speaking of a man addicted to superstition, says, “he adores every anointed stone.” C.

Ver. 16. Spring. Heb. cibrath. Sept. leave it untranslated, Chalratha, though they render it horse-race, (v. 19) and join both together. C. 48:7. The word occurs again, 4 K. 5:19; and S. Jerom translates it the spring, or the finest time of the earth. Others suppose it signifies the high road, (v. 19) or horse-course, or a mile, &c. as if the place, where Rachel died, and not the season of the year, were designated. Calmet concludes, she died about the distance of an acre (sillon, furrow or ridge) from Ephrata. But there seems to be no reason why we should recede from the Vulgate. H.

Ver. 18. That is. These etymologies are given by S. Jerom. D.—Right hand, (jemini) as he is often styled in Scripture. Jamin has the same meaning; though it may also signify of the south, with respect to Bethel and Sichem; or of days and old age. C. 44:20. 1. C. Jacob chooses to give his son a more auspicious name; as the other would have reminded him too sensibly of his loss. H.

Ver. 20. A pillar; or sepulchral monument, about 500 paces north of Bethlehem, (H.) which was called Ephrata afterwards, from Caleb’s wife. C.

Ver. 21. Tower. Heb. Heder, about a mile to the east of Bethlehem, where the angels appeared to announce the birth of Christ. S. Helen built a temple there in honour of the angels. T.—Shepherds had such places to keep watch. C.—There was a tower of this name near Jerusalem. Mich. 4:8. S. Jerom, q. His.

Ver. 22. The concubine. She was his lawful wife; but according to the style of the Hebrews, is called concubine, because of her servile extraction. Ch.—Ignorant of; and therefore, to mark his displeasure, he deprived him of the birth-right. C. 49:4. Jacob approached no more to Bala, as David had no farther commerce with the wives whom Absalom had defiled, 2 K. 16:22. M.—The Sept. add, and it appeared evil in his sight; an omission which the Hebrew editions seem to acknowledge, by leaving a vacant space. Kennicott.

Ver. 26. Syria, all except Benjamin. C.—All frequently means the greatest part. H.

Ver. 29. Spent. He lived 42 years, after he had blessed Jacob.—His people, in the bosom of Abraham, in limbo.—Full of days, quite satisfied. Cedat uti conviva satur. Hor. Sat. i. 1. He was one of the brighest figures of Jesus Christ, on account of him miraculous birth, name, willingness to be sacrificed, marriage with a woman sought at a great distance, &c. C.—Esau, who had always shewn a great regard for his father, joins his brother in rendering to him the last rites of burial. H.—Rebecca was probably dead. M.—The death of Isaac is mentioned out of its place, that the history of Joseph may not be interrupted, as it happened when Joseph was in prison, A. 2288. C.

Ver. 1. Edom. His genealogy extends as far as v. 20, where that of Seir, the Horrite, begins. The seven first verses specify Esau's sons, the twelve next his grandsons born in Seir. From the 15th to the 20th verse, we have the most ancient form of government in that nation under the Aluphim, or heads of families. To them succeed kings, (v. 31 to 40,) and then dukes to the end. Moses omits several generations of Oolibama's grand-children, as foreign to his purpose, which was to shew the Israelites whom they were not to molest. The kings, of whom he speaks, (v. 31,) might govern different parts of the country at the same time; and that before any form of government was established among the Hebrews, as it was under Moses, who is styled a king, (Deut. 33:5,) about 200 years after Esau had driven the Horrites from their mountains. C.—Among these nations several good men might exist, as Job, &c. But the true religion was preserved more fully among the 12 tribes. S. Aug. de C. D. xv. xvi. W.

Ver. 2. Ada. These wives of Esau are called by other names, Gen. 26. But it was very common amongst the ancients for the same persons to have two names, as Esau himself was also called Edom. Ch.—Ana, the daughter of Sebeon. It is not certain that Ana was a woman. The Sam. and Sept. make him son of Sebeon, both here and v. 14, (H.) as well as some Latin copies; and he is mentioned as such, v. 24. The daughter of Sebeon may, therefore, designate his grand-daughter, which is not unusual. Sebeon is called Hevite, Hethite, and Horrite, on account of his dwelling in different countries; though some think they were different persons. C.—This, and innumerable other difficulties, may convince Protestants that the Scriptures are not easy. W.

Ver. 4. Eliphaz; perphas the Themanite, and friend of Job, (S. Jer.) or his grandfather, by Theman; as Job was the grandson of Esau, and the second king, v. 33. T.

Ver. 6. Jacob, by the divine Providence, as Chanaan was to be his inheritance. M.—He had returned from Seir about the same time as Jacob came home. S. Aug. q. 119.

Ver. 9. Of Edom, or of all the nations who inhabited Idumea, sprung from Esau's grand-children. C.

Ver. 15. Heb. Aluph, prince of a tribe, or of a thousand; a Chiliarch. Zach. 5:2. The Rabbin assert they wore not a crown, as the kings did. C.—Both obtained their authority by election. An aristocracy prevailed under the dukes. M.

Ver. 16. Duke Core, being the son of Esau, is omitted in the Sam. though found in all the versions and Heb. Ken.

Ver. 24. Hot waters. Medicinal, (M.) like the springs at Bath, &c. H.—Heb. hayemim, a word which some translate mules; others, the nation of that name; or the giants, Emeans, with whom he had perhaps some engagement, as Adad (v. 35,) had with the Madianites, the particulars of which were then well known. The Sept. and ancient versions retain the original word. It is used for a body of water. C.

Ver. 30. Seir, contemporary with the princes of Esau, in another town or region. C.

Ver. 31. A king. See v. 1. Moses might also add this with reference to the times, when he knew the Hebrews would petition for a king, for whom he gave particular laws. M.—These kings were probably foreigners, who subdued the natives. They did not obtain the kingdom by succession. C.

Ver. 33. Jobab. Most people suppose this is Job, the model of patience. M.—Bosra, or Bezer, was the capital of Idumea, in the tribe of Ruben. C.

Ver. 37. River Rohoboth; or as it is expressed, 1 Par. 1:48, of Rohoboth, which is near the river Euphrates, below where the Chaboras empties itself.

Ver. 39. Adar. Many confound him with the king, whom David overcame.—Daughter of Mezaab, or perhaps her grand-daughter, or adopted child.

Ver. 40. Callings. They left their names to various places. They were in power when the Hebrews approached their respective territories, and threw them into dismay. Ex. 15:15.—Alva. Sept. gola. C.

Ver. 43. The same Edom is Esau. Moses seems particularly attentive to assert both titles for the same person, v. 8, &c. The time of Esau's death cannot be ascertained. There is reason to hope that he died penitent; though in the early part of his life, he gave way to his ferocious temper, and became a figure of the reprobate. He lived on terms of friendship with his brother, assisted him to bury his father, &c. C.—He was a hunter, indeed; which S. Jerom looks upon as a bad sign: “nunquam venatorem in bonam partem legi,” in Mic. 5. But this was also in his younger days. H.—I have hated Esau, Matt. 1 refers to his irreligious posterity, and to his being deprived of temporal advantages, attending the birth-right. T. C.

Ver. 1. Sojourned at Hebron and the environs. H.

Ver. 2. Generations. This connects his history with C. 35. What happened to Jacob and his sons, and particularly to Joseph, forms the subject of the remaining part of Genesis. H.—Old; complete, or beginning “his 17th year,” as the Heb. Chal. and Sept. have it. “He was the son or boy of”—so many years always means the current year unfinished. Bochart 1. R. xiii. 1.—The sons. Perhaps these were not so much enraged against Joseph, till he told his father of their scandalous behaviour, in order that he might put a stop to it.—He accused. Some editions of the Sept. read, “they accused him,” &c.; but all others confirm the Vulgate and Hebrew. C.—Crime: perhaps of sodomy, or bestiality (S. Tho.); or of abusive language to Joseph himself. C.

Ver. 3. Old age, and therefore expected to have no more children; but he loved him still more, on account of his innocent and sweet behaviour (M.): in which sense the Sam. Chal. &c. have, “because he was a wise and prudent boy.”—Colours. The nations of the East delight in gaudy attire, “hanging down to the heels” as the original passim is sometimes expressed, talaris & polymita, v. 3. C.

Ver. 4. Could not, through envy, which caused them to notice every little distinction shewn to Joseph. They perceived he was the most beloved. His accusing them, and insinuating by his mysterious dreams that he would be their lord, heightened their rage. H.

Ver. 5. A dream. These dreams of Joseph were prophetical, and sent from God, as were also those which he interpreted, Gen. 40 and 41; otherwise, generally speaking, the observing of dreams is condemned in the Scripture, as superstitious and sinful. See Deut. 18:10 and Eccle. 34:2. 3.

Ver. 7. Sheaf. Joseph probably knew not what this portended, as the prophets were sometimes ignorant of the real purport of their visions. C.—But it admirably foreshewed the famine, which would bring his brethren to adore him in Egypt. M.

Ver. 9. The sun. This second dream confirmed the truth of the former. Joseph relates it with simplicity, not suspecting the ill will of his brethren: but his father easily perceives what effect the narration would have, and desires him to be more cautious. He even points out the apparent incoherence of the dream, as Rachel, who seemed intended by the moon, was already dead; unless this dream happened before that event. S. Aug. (q. 123) observes, this was never literally verified in Joseph, but it was in Jesus Christ, whom he prefigured. C.—Some think that Bala, the nurse of Joseph, was intended by the moon. T.

Ver. 10. Worship. This word is not used here to signify divine worship, but an inferior veneration, expressed by the bowing of the body, and that, according to the manner of the eastern nations, down to the ground.

Ver. 11. With himself: not doubting but it was prophetical. Thus acted the B. Virgin. C.

Ver. 13. In Sichem. About ninety miles off. The town had not probably been as yet rebuilt. Jacob had a field there, and the country was free for any one to feed their flocks. It was customary to drive them to a distance. C.

Ver. 14. Bring me. He was afraid of letting him remain with them, and retained him mostly at home for company, and to protect him from danger.

Ver. 16. My brethren. The man was acquainted with Jacob's family, as he had dwelt in those parts for a long time. H.

Ver. 17. Dothain: twelve miles to the north of Samaria. Euseb.

Ver. 19. The dreamer. Heb. Bahal hachalomoth, “the lord of dreams,” or the visionary lord (C.); or one who feigns dreams: so the Jews say of our Saviour, this seducer. H.

Ver. 20. Pit: walled around to contain water: Heb. Bur. Bar means a well that has no walls. M.—Shall appear. They resolve to tell a lie, and easily believe that Joseph had been as bad as themselves in telling one first. If they had believed the dreams were from God, they would hardly have supposed that they could prevent them from having their

Ver. 22. His father. Ruben wished to regain his father's favour. C. 35:22.

Ver. 25. To eat bread. How could they do this while their innocent brother was praying and lamenting! C. 42:21. H.—Some: a caravan of merchants. D.—Balm, or rosin; "That of Syria resembles attic honey." Plin.—Myrrh, (stacten); Heb. Lot: "drops of myrrh or laudanum, or of the Lotus tree." C.

Ver. 28. Of silver. Some have read, thirty pieces of gold or silver. S. Amb. c. 3.—The price was trifling; twenty sicles would be about £2 5s. 7½d. English. The Madianites and Ismaelites jointly purchased Joseph. H.

Ver. 29. Ruben, who, in the mean time had been absent while his brethren hearkened to the proposal of Juda only, and therefore consented to this evil. H.

Ver. 30. I go to seek for him. His brethren inform him of what they had done, and he consents to keep it a secret from his father. M.

Ver. 33. A beast. So he might reasonably conclude from the blood, and from the insinuations of the messengers sent by his ten sons, (H.) whom he would not suspect of so heinous a crime. Wild beasts infested that country. M.

Ver. 34. Sack-cloth, or hair-cloth, cilicio. These garments were made very close, like a sack, of the hair taken from the goats of Cilicia, which grew long, rough, and of a dark colour. The poorest people used them: Usum in Castrorum & miseris velamina nautis, (Virg. Geor. 3.); and the Ascetics, or monks, afterwards chose them for the sake of mortification and humility. C.—Jacob was the first, mentioned in Scripture, who put them on, and the Israelites imitated him in their mourning.—Long time; twenty-three years, till he heard of his son being still alive. M.

Ver. 35. Into hell; that is, into limbo, the place where the souls of the just were received before the death of our Redeemer. For allowing that the word hell sometimes is taken for the grave, it cannot be so taken in this place; since Jacob did not believe his son to be in the grave, (whom he supposed to be devoured by a wild beast) and therefore could not mean to go down to him thither: but certainly meant the place of rest, where he believed his soul to be. Ch.—Soal, or sheol, to crave, denotes the receptacle of the dead, (Leigh) or a lower region; the grave for the body; limbo, or hell, when speaking of the soul. See Delrio, Adag. in 2 Kings, p. 209. H.—Protestants here translate it, “the grave,” being unwilling to admit a third place in the other world for the soul. See the contrary in S. Aug. ep. 99. ad Evod. de C. D. xx. 15. W.

Ver. 36. An eunuch. This word sometimes signifies a chamberlain, courtier, or officer of the king: and so it is taken in this place. Ch.—Soldiers, cooks, or butchers. Hebrew tabachim, executioners, mactantium. He might also be chief sacrificer, governor of the prisons, &c. all these employments were anciently very honourable. Dan. 2:14. The providence of God never shines more brightly in any part of the Scripture, than in this history of Joseph, except in that of Jesus Christ, of whom Joseph was a beautiful figure. He was born when his father was grown old, as Jesus was in the last age of the world; he was a son increasing, as Jesus waxed in age and grace before God and men; both were beloved by their father, both comely, &c. C.

Ver. 1. At that time Juda, twenty years old, marries the daughter of Sue, and has three sons by her during the three following years. The first takes Tamar to wife, when he was seventeen. Onan marries her the next year; after which she remains a widow about three years, when she bears twins to Juda. Phares goes down with him into Egypt, and has children there during Jacob’s life. On this account, they are numbered among those who went down with Jacob, (C. 46:12) as the children of Benjamin seem to be likewise. Thus all these events might happen during the twenty-three years that Jacob dwelt in Chanaan, and the seventeen that he sojourned in Egypt. Some have thought the time too short, and have concluded that Juda had been married long before Joseph’s slavery. He was, however, only four years older. C.

Ver. 5. Sela. Juda gave the name of Her to his first-born, as the Heb. shews. His wife gave names to the two latter.—Ceased; Heb. casbi: “she died in bearing him,” as Aquila has it. Most commentators take the word for the name of a place mentioned, Jos. 15:44. “He (Juda) was at Casbi when she bare him.”

Ver. 7. Wicked; without shame or remorse, sinning against nature, in order, if we may believe the Jews, that the beauty of his wife might not be impaired by having children. Onan was actuated by envy. M.

Ver. 8. Wife. This was then customary among the Chanaanites, as Philo insinuates. It also continued to be practiced in Egypt, till the year of Christ 491 at least, when the marriage had not been consummated. Moses established it as a law, when no issue had sprung from the deceased brother. C. Deut. 25:5. The eldest son bore his name; the rest were called after their own father. This law is now abrogated; and the prohibition, which has been issued by the Church, can be dispensed with only by herself, (W.) as was the case in the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine, the virgin relict of his brother Arthur. H.

Ver. 10. Slew him, perhaps by the hand of evil angels, Ps. 77:49. Asmodeus, &c. who slew the libidinous husbands of Sara. Tob. 3:7. M.—If an exemplary vengeance were oftener taken of the perpetrators of such a detestable thing, this abominable and unnatural vice would sooner perhaps be eradicated. H.

Ver. 11. Till. Juda had no design to give her to Sela, as the custom of that age required. C.—She waited patiently for a time; when, perceiving that she was neglected, she devised a wicked scheme to punish Juda, even at the hazard of her own life. H.

Ver. 14. Veil; (theristrum) a long robe, covering the whole body, except the eyes. Thus she was disguised; or, as it were, masked, as Aquila translates. Harlots herein imitated modest women, chap. 24:65.—Cross way. Heb. Henayim, which the Sept. and Syr. take for a proper name. Others translate “at the gate of the eyes,” which means two roads, where a person must open his eyes to judge which is the right one—or “at the gate of the two fountains leading to Thamnas.” Jud. 14:1. Prostitutes formerly infested the high roads. Jer. 3:2. Ezech. 16:25. Chrysippus says, “at first harlots remained out of the city, and covered their faces; but afterwards growing more hardened, they laid aside the mask,” &c.

Ver. 18. Staff. These were all marks of dignity. “Kings made use of spears, or sceptres, before they wore a diadem.” Trogus. 43. C.—Juda might blame himself for exposing these valuable things, and divesting himself of all his dignity, to gratify his unjustifiable passion. If some have excused both the parties concerned, the Scripture at least sufficiently shews in what light we ought to consider their conduct. Juda himself thought her worthy of death; though in some sense, she was juster than himself, v. 24. 26. H.—She was guilty of a sort of adultery, being engaged to Sela; and also of incest, &c.; whereas the fault of Juda, through ignorance of her person, was simply fornication; which is, however, always contrary to the law of nature, as the pagans themselves confessed. Grot. in Matt. v. C.—From Christ’s choosing to be born of such progenitors, we may learn to adore his humility and tender regard for sinners. H.

Ver. 21. Harlot. Heb. Kedesha a person consecrated to good or evil. Many nations esteemed prostitution, in honour of Venus, as a laudable action. 2 K. 17:29. C.

Ver. 23. A lie. Heb. “lest we be exposed to shame,” by making any farther search. M.

Ver. 25. Execution. The Rabbin say she was to be marked with a hot iron. If she was to die, before she was delivered, God prevented the cruel sentence from taking effect. H.—Many nations have punished adultery with fire. Macrinus, the Roman emperor, ordered the culprits to be tied together and thrown into the flames. Capitulin.—Moses commanded the daughters of priests, who should be detected in this crime, to be given to the flames, (Lev. 21:9,) and others to be stoned; (Lev. 20:10,) whence the Rabbin have concluded, that Tamar was a priest’s daughter. C.

Ver. 26. Juster. For Juda had been guilty of injustice; and had thus exposed her to the danger of following a life of lewdness. H.—She remained a widow afterwards, as she was now rendered unfit to be married either to Juda or Sela. The latter married another woman. Num. 26:19. C.—While Juda was engaged in this unlawful commerce, and yielded to the temptation, Joseph was triumphing over a much greater temptation, in rejecting the solicitations of his master’s wife. H.

Ver. 29. Partition; the secundinæ. The midwife was apprehensive of danger. M.—Phares. That is, a breach or division. Ch.

Ver. 30. Zara. “Orient, or rising;” in whose hand the red ribband denoted, that the blood of Christ is the source of all our merits and happiness. These two brothers were a type of the vocation of the Gentiles, and of the reprobation of the Jews, who lost the privileges to which they thought themselves entitled. S. Iren. iv. 42. S. Chrys. &c. C.—Phares was the ancestor of Jesus Christ. S. Matt. 1:3.

Ver. 1. Ismaelites. They are called Madianites. C. 37:36. H.

Ver. 6. Bread. A proverbial expression, to shew how entirely he reposed in Joseph's fidelity and prudence. M.—He was so rich, that he knew not the extent of his wealth. So Petronius says, Nescit quid habeat, adeo Zaplutus est. It may also be understood as a commendation of Joseph's disinterestedness.

Ver. 7. Many days. About 10 years; as Joseph was 30, three years after this. C.

Ver. 9. His wife, and such things as could not be touched without sin; such as his daughter, if the woman, whom Joseph afterwards married, was the daughter of this man. C. 41:45.—My God, Elohim; which might also be understood of his lord and master. The sin against the latter would be resented by God, who is offended by every transgression. H.

Ver. 10. Both the woman was importunate, &c. Heb. does not express this so fully. D.

Ver. 12. Out. He could easily have wrested it from her. But he would not do any thing that might seem disrespectful, nor claim what her impure hands had touched. M.

Ver. 16. A proof of her fidelity, or an argument to gain credit, argumentum fidei. Ch.—Love neglected, turns to fury. She wishes to take away Joseph's life, according to the laws of Egypt against adulterers. Diodorus says Sesostris burnt some women taken in the crime; and we must attribute it to divine Providence, that the enraged husband did not inflict instant death upon his slave. Perhaps he did not altogether believe him guilty. H.

Ver. 17. Thou hast, &c. As if her husband were guilty of an indiscretion. M.

Ver. 19. Too much. The proof was of an ambiguous nature. But Putiphar perhaps thought it unbecoming to distrust his wife, or to interrogate his slave. H.

Ver. 21. Keeper. Pererius thinks this was the same Putiphar, who, recognizing the innocence of Joseph, allows him every indulgence in prison; but does not liberate him, for fear of the dishonour and resentment of his wife. C.—He had before put him in irons. Ps. 104:18. Wis. 10:13. Joseph here exercises at once the four cardinal virtues. Prudence, in keeping out of the company of his mistress, as the Hebrew express it, v. 10. "He yielded not to lie with her, or to be in her company." H.—Justice, in regard to his master. Fortitude, in bearing with all sorts of hardships, loss of character, &c. And Temperance, by refusing to gratify the most violent of all passions, at an age when it is the most insidious and ungovernable. This makes the fathers exclaim, We wonder more at the conduct of Joseph, than at the delivery of the three children from the Babylonian furnace. For, like them, Joseph continues unhurt, and more shining, in the midst of the flames. S. Chrys. T.—The stories of Hippolitus, Bellerophon, &c. seem to be copied from this. C.

Ver. 1. Two eunuchs; chief officers, and high in dignity, as the Hebrew expresses it, v. 2. H.—Offended, perhaps, by stealing, or by some treasonable conspiracy. M.

Ver. 2. And, &c. Heb. “Pharao was enraged against two of his officers; against the chief of the butlers,” &c. Mashkim. S. Jerom translates this word procurator domus, “steward of the house.” C. 15:2. No slave was entrusted with these high offices in the courts of Egypt and of Persia.

Ver. 3. Commander. Putiphar. C.—Prisoner, though his chains were struck off. M.

Ver. 5. According to, &c. foreshewing what would happen to them, as Joseph afterwards interpreted the dreams. T.

Ver. 8. Doth not interpretation belong to God? When dreams are from God, as these were, the interpretation of them is a gift of God. But the generality of dreams are not of this sort; but either proceed from the natural complexions and dispositions of persons, or the roving of their imaginations in the day on such objects as they are much affected with, or from their mind being disturbed with cares and troubles, and oppressed with bodily infirmities: or they are suggested by evil spirits, to flatter, or to terrify weak minds; in order to gain belief, and so draw them into error or superstition; or at least to trouble them in their sleep, whom they cannot move while they are awake: so that the general rule, with regard to dreams, is not to observe them, nor to give any credit to them. Ch.—Physicians indeed, sometimes from some judgment of the nature of a distemper from dreams; on which subject, Hippocrates and Galen have written. But to pretend to discover by them the future actions of free agents, would be superstitious. Deut. 18:10. T.—Justin (36:2,) says, “Joseph was the first interpreter of dreams, and often gave proofs of his knowledge,” &c.

Ver. 14. Prison, after examining into the justice of my cause.

Ver. 15. Hebrews. Chanaan, a foreign land with respect to Egypt, as was also Mesopotamia, where he was born. H.—Joseph only maintains his own innocence, without accusing any one. M.

Ver. 16. Of meal. Heb. may also mean “white, full of holes,” &c.

Ver. 19. From thee, by decapitation. This was customary, when a person’s body was to be hung on the cross or gibbet. Deut. 21:22. Jos. 10:26. Lament. 5:12. 1 K. 31:10.—Birds. So Horace says, pasces in cruce corvos.

Ver. 20. Birth-day. This was a common practice among the pagans. S. Matt. 14:6. 2 Mac. 6:7. C.

Ver. 22. That, &c. Thus was verified the prediction of Joseph. M.

Ver. 23. Forgot. A thing too common among those who enjoy prosperity! H.—God would not have his servants to trust in men. D.—The butler was a figure of the good thief, as the baker represented the impenitent one, between whom our Saviour hung on the cross. C.

Ver. 1. River; or the branch of the Nile which ran to Tanis, his capital. There were seven principal canals, and this was the most to the east, except that of Pelusium. C.

Ver. 2. Marshy. Heb. Achu; a word which the Sept. and Siracides (Eccli. 40:16,) retain. D.

Ver. 3. Very bank; to shew that the Nile had not inundated far, and that consequently a great famine would prevail, as the fertility of Egypt depends greatly on the overflowing of the Nile. “When the river rises 12 cubits, sterility pervades Egypt; when 13, famine is still felt. Fourteen cubits bring joy, 15 security, 16 delight. It has never yet been known to rise above 18 cubits.” Pliny v. 9.) This successive depression of the waters was an effect of God’s judgments, which no astrologers could foretel. T.

Ver. 5. Another dream of the same import, (v. 25,) to convince Pharaoh that the event would certainly take place, v. 32. Thus Daniel had a double vision, 7:2. 3.—One stalk. It was of the species which Pliny (xviii. 10,) calls ramosum, branchy. What would strike Pharaoh the most was, that the last ears should devour the former ones. C.

Ver. 6. Blasted with the eastern wind, blowing from the deserts of Arabia. Ose. 13:15. M.

Ver. 7. Rest. Heb. adds, “and behold a dream” sent by God, like Solomon’s, 3 K 3:15. The king’s mind was quite full of what he had seen.

Ver. 8. Interpreters: chartumim is probably an Egyptian word; denoting magicians, priests, and interpreters of their sacred books, hieroglyphics, &c. K. Ptolemy consulted them. Tacit. Hist. iv.

Ver. 9. My sin against your majesty, and my ingratitude towards Joseph. C.

Ver. 12. Servant. C. 39:4. He waited also upon the prisoners of rank. C. 40:4. H.

Ver. 14. Shaved him. The Egyptians let their hair grow, and neglected their persons, when they were in mourning or prison. But on other occasions they cut their hair in their youth. Herod. ii. 36. iii. 12. It was not lawful to appear in court in mourning attire. Est. 4:2. Gen. 50:4. C.

Ver. 16. Without, &c. The interpretation does not proceed from any natural acquirement, but from God alone. Chal. T.—The Samaritan and Aquila read, “Without me God will not give,” &c. See Matt. 10:20.

Ver. 30. The land of Egypt, and the adjacent countries.

Ver. 34. Fifth part. This was a tax laid upon all the Egyptians, (C.) unless Pharaoh paid for what corn was laid up. H.—This quantity would be sufficient, as the people would be content with a smaller allowance during the famine; and the environs of the Nile would produce something, though not worth mentioning. C. 45:6. M.

Ver. 38. God. Heb. of the gods Elohim. Pharaoh was probably an idolater.

Ver. 40. Obey. Heb. Yishak; which may signify also “kiss” you, or their hand, in testimony of respect; or “shall be fed, governed, and led forth,” &c. He made him master of his house, and ruler, &c. Ps. 104:21. Wis. 10:14.

Ver. 42. His ring, the sign of power. Thus Alexander appointed Perdicas to be his successor. Curtius x. 5. Assuerus gave his authority to Aman and to Mardocheus. Est. 3. & 8.—Silk, or fine cotton; shesh (or ssoos). See byssus. Ex. 25:4.—Chain, with which the president of the senate in Egypt, or the chief justice, was adorned. The three chief officers among the Chaldees wore chains. Dan. 5:7, 16. C.

Ver. 43. Second chariot. On public occasions the king was followed by an empty chariot, (2 Par. 35:24,) or the chariot here spoken of, was destined for the person who was next in dignity to the king. C.—That all, &c. Heb. “crying Abroc,” which Aquila explains in the same sense as the Vulgate. Others think it is an exclamation of joy, (Grot.) like huzza! (H.) or it may mean father of the king, or tender father. C. 45:8.

Ver. 44. Pharao, or the king. This is the preamble to the decree for the exaltation of Joseph, which subjected to him the armies and all the people of Egypt.

Ver. 45. The saviour of the world. Tsaphenath pahneach. Ch.—In the Coptic language, which is derived from the Egyptian, Psotemphane is said to mean the saviour of the world. S. Jerom supposed this word was not Hebrew; and therefore he added, in the Egyptian tongue, though he knew it might be interpreted in Hebrew “a revealer of secrets.” q. Heb.—Putiphare. Whether this person be the same with his old master, cannot easily be decided. Most people think he was not. See S. Chrys. 63. hom.—Priest. None were esteemed more noble in Egypt.—Heliopolis. Heb. On, “the city of the sun,” built on the banks of the Nile, about half a day’s journey to the north of Memphis.

Ver. 47. Sheaves. The straw would serve to feed the cattle, and would hinder the corn from spoiling for 50 years, if kept from the air. Varro. Plin. xviii. 30. C.

Ver. 51. Manasses. That is, oblivion, or forgetting. Ch.—Father’s house, or the injuries received from my brethren. H.

Ver. 52. Ephraim. That is, fruitful, or growing. Ch.—Being in the plural number, it means “productions.”—Poverty; where I have been poor and afflicted, though now advanced in honour. H.

Ver. 55. World. Round about Egypt; such as Chanaan, Syria, &c. M.—There was. The Syriac and some Latin copies, read not, &c.: there was a famine. We must adhere to the Vulgate and Hebrew.

Ver. 57. All provinces in the neighbourhood: for the stores laid up would not have supplied all mankind even for a few months. C.

Ver. 1. Careless. Heb. “gazing at one another,” like idle people.

Ver. 6. To him. Conformably to the prophetic dreams. C. 37:7. 9. M.—Joseph was like a prince or sultan, shallit, with sovereign authority. C.

Ver. 8. By them. Years and change of situation, had made such an alteration in him. God was pleased that Jacob should remain so long ignorant of his son’s fate, that, by sorrow, he might do penance, and purify himself from every stain; and that he might not attempt to redeem Joseph, whose slavery was to be the source of so much good to his family. M.—Joseph did not make himself known at first; in order to bring his brethren to a true sense of their duty, that they might obtain pardon for their sin. Thus pastors must sometimes treat their penitents with a degree of severity. S. Greg. hom. 22. Ezech. S. Aug. ser. 82. de Tem. W.

Ver. 9. You are spies. This he said by way of examining them, to see what they would answer. Ch.—Aquila translates “vagrants” going from place to place, as if to discover the weakest parts. Joseph was a person in authority. It was his duty to guard against invasion. He knew how his brethren had treated Sichem, and how they had behaved to himself; and though he might not suppose, that they had any evil design upon Egypt, yet he had a right to make them give an account of themselves. H.—He wished also to extort from them a true account respecting Jacob and Benjamin. M.

Ver. 15. Health. This oath implies, that he is willing that even Pharaoh, whom he so much revered, should perish, if he did not execute what he said: (H.) or, as Pharaoh is now in health, so true it is you should not all depart, till your youngest brother come. C.

Ver. 16. Or else by the health of Pharaoh you are spies. That is, if these things you say be proved false, you are to be held for spies for your lying, and shall be treated as such. Joseph dealt in this manner with his brethren, to bring them by means of affliction to a sense of their former sin, and a sincere repentance for it.

Ver. 18. God. I shall do nothing contrary to justice or good faith, as I know I have a superior in heaven, to whom I must give an account. M.

Ver. 21. We deserve. Conscience upbraids. “Punishment opens the mouth, which sin had shut.” S. Greg. M.—They had sold Joseph about 22 years before! C.

Ver. 22. His blood. Ruben supposed his brother was dead, (v. 13,) and judging that Jacob would not let Benjamin come, he thought they must all perish. H.

Ver. 23. Interpreter, to keep them at a greater distance. It does not appear that the sons of Jacob were ignorant of the language of the country. C.

Ver. 25. Simeon. If he had joined himself to Ruben and Juda, who seemed inclined to protect Joseph, they might easily have prevented the cruel act, by overawing their younger brothers. Hence he was most guilty. M.—Presence. That they might learn to condole with an afflicted brother.

Ver. 34. And you may, &c. Joseph had said, (v. 20,) and you may not die, which they thus interpret. H.

Ver. 35. Astonished. One had before made the discovery, v. 28. Now all find their purses among the corn, which renews their astonishment. C.

Ver. 36. Without. Through excess of grief, Jacob speaks with a degree of exaggeration; or he thought his children were now taken from him so fast, that he would soon have none left.

Ver. 37. Kill, &c. By this proposal, he meant to signify his utmost care and zeal to bring back young Benjamin safe to his father.

Ver. 38. Alone: the son of my beloved Rachel. H.—To hell. That is, to that place where the souls then remained, as above, chap. 37. ver. 35. (Ch.) though with respect to his grey hairs, and body, it may signify the grave. H.

Ver. 5. My face, in peace. Joseph had told them they should be considered as spies, if they did not produce their youngest brother. M.

Ver. 7. Asked us. This is perfectly consonant with what they say. C. 42:13 and C. 44:19. They mentioned their having a brother at home, without the smallest suspicion of doing wrong.

Ver. 8. The boy; now 24 years old, (C.) and the father of a family. C. 46:21. H.

Ver. 9. For ever. Always lay the blame on me, and punish me as you think fit. M.

Ver. 11. Best fruits: Heb. lit. “of the praise, or song of the earth;” or of those things for which the country is most renowned, and which are not found in Egypt. Origen.—Balm. Literally, rosin, resinæ; but here by that name is meant balm. Ch. See C. 37:25.—Honey, or all sorts of sweet fruit.—Storax: Sept. “incense,” or perfumes. It is like balm; thick, odoriferous, and medicinal.—Myrrh, (stactes); Heb. Lot. A liquor stamped from fresh myrrh pilled, with a little water. C.—Sometimes it is translated Gutta, a drop. Ps. 44:9. M.—Turpentine. S. Jer. and the Sept. seem to have read Bothmin instead of the present Heb. Batenim, which some translate, “nuts of the pistacium,” (Bochart); which hand in clusters, and are of an oblong shape. Vitellius first brought them out of Syria. Plin. xv. 22.—Almonds; Sept. nuts, of which almonds are one species. M.

Ver. 14. Desolate. Heb. and Sept. “Since I am deprived of my children, I am deprived of my children:” I must submit.

Ver. 16. Victims: the blood of which was first offered to God, as he had appointed, (C. 18:1. Lev. 17:5) and the flesh brought upon the table. If idolatry was then common in Egypt, as Calmet supposes, in opposition to Grotius, Joseph did not participate at least in that impiety.—At noon. This was the time for the chief meal in Egypt. The Hebrews generally took something at this time, and again in the evening. To eat before noon was esteemed a mark of intemperance. Eccles. 10:16. Acts 2:15. Plato thought the people of Italy, who eat two full meals in the day, would never be eminent for wisdom or for prudence. Athen. 4:10. C.

Ver. 21. We opened. C. 42:35. They seem to have discovered the whole of their money only when they were in the presence of Jacob; though they had already, perhaps, seen part of it at the inn, and left it in their sacks for the satisfaction of their father. H.

Ver. 23. Your God. To Him we must always refer what advantage we derive from men. He inspired Joseph to give such orders to his steward.—I have for good. I received it, and was satisfied that it was good: you need not be uneasy; you are not suspected of any fraud. H.—Heb. “Your money came into my hands.” M.

Ver. 28. Living. The Sam. and Sept. add, “Joseph replied, Blessed be he of God: and bowing themselves,” &c. Thus all Joseph’s brethren adore him. C. 37:7. H.

Ver. 32. Hebrews. “They had the same aversion for all who did not adopt their superstition.” Porphy. Abstin. iv. Herod. ii. 41. says, that would not use a knife which had been in the hands of a Greek, nor kiss him. This aversion arose, from their custom of abstaining from various meats which other nations eat. Chald. &c. They disliked the Hebrews, because they were also shepherds, C. 46:34 (C.); and because they knew they were accustomed to eat goats, oxen, and sheep, the objects of adoration in Egypt, (Exod. 8:26.): though they were not, probably, served upon Joseph’s table. T.—They who dwelt in the towns could not bear even the Egyptian shepherds, because they were of a more stirring and warlike temper. C. Cunnæus.

Ver. 33. They sat. This posture is more ancient than that of lying down at table. The Hebrews adopted the latter, from the Persians, during the captivity. Est. 1:6 and 7:8.—We have at least no earlier vestige of this custom in Scripture. C.—Very much: as they were placed in that order by the steward. They knew not how he could so exactly discover who was born first, as there was so short an interval between the births of many of them. H.

Ver. 34. Of him. Joseph, the master of the feast, sends a portion to each of his guests, according to the ancient custom. Plut. Sympos. ii.—Five parts: in order to distinguish Benjamin the more. So Hector reproaches Diomed for fleeing before him, though he was placed in the highest place at table among the Greeks, and had the largest portion both of meat and drink.—Merry. Inebriati sunt, sometimes means intoxicated: but it is not at all probably that Joseph’s brethren would indulge in any such excess, while they knew him not, (C.) and were under the impressions of fear and wonder. They took what was sufficient, and even decently abundant, with thankfulness for so unexpected an honour. H.—The word is often taken in this sense, as at the feast of Cana, where Jesus would never have furnished such an abundance of wine for people already drunk. Jo. 2:10. Prov. 11:24. Homer's feasts consist in every man taking what he pleased. C.

Ver. 4. Pursue; escorted by a troop of horsemen, to prevent resistance. M.

Ver. 5. To divine. This was spoken by Joseph to his steward in jest; alluding to the notion of the people, who took him to be a diviner. Ch.—S. Tho. 2, 2, q. 95, a. 7. Heb. may be translated without attending to the points, “Is not this the cup, out of which my lord drinketh; and he has augured, or discovered, by it the evil which you have committed.” Pliny (xxx. 2.) mentions a method of divining, by means of water in a basin. C.—The Egyptians probably supposed that Joseph used some means to disclose what was hidden; and he alludes, in jest, to their foolish notion. H.—He had a right to afflict his guilty brethren; and as for Benjamin, who was innocent, he made him ample recompense for this transitory terror. Some think that the steward said, in which he is wont to divine, unauthorized by his master. M.

Ver. 10. Sentence. It is but just; yet I shall only insist on the detention of the culprit. C.—Joseph wished to see whether the marks of attention, which he had shewn to Benjamin, would have excited the envy of his brethren (M.); and whether they would be concerned for him: thus he would discover their present dispositions. He might wish also to keep his younger brother out of danger, in case they were inclined to persecute him. H.

Ver. 13. The town, with heavy hearts, of which their torn garments were signs (H.): yet they say not a word in condemnation of Benjamin. They are determined either to clear him, or never to return home. M.

Ver. 14. Juda, mindful of his engagement, (C. 43:9,) and perhaps more eloquent and bolder than the rest. M.

Ver. 15. The science of divining. He speaks of himself according to what he was esteemed in that kingdom. And, indeed, he being truly a prophet, knew more without comparison than any of the Egyptian sorcerers. Ch.—Heb. Sept. and Chal. “knew ye not that a man like me would divine with certainty,” and presently discover any fraud? C.

Ver. 16. Iniquity. He begins with the greatest humility, acknowledging that they were justly punished by God for some transgression, though they were, in his opinion, innocent of any theft. H.—Perhaps he might imagine that Benjamin had been guilty, (Bonfrere) and is willing to bear a part of the blame with the rest; or his conscience still presents before him the injustice done to Joseph so long before. H.

Ver. 18. Boldly, perceiving that he had to deal with an equitable judge.—Thou art; the second man in the kingdom. Heb. “even as Pharaoh.”

Ver. 20. Is left of, (habet mater.) Rachel had been dead about twenty-four years. H.

Ver. 31. With us, is not now found in Heb. But it is in the Sam. Sept. Syr. and Chaldee. C.—His grey hairs. That is, his person, now far advanced in years.—With sorrow unto hell. The Hebrew word for hell is here Sheola, the Greek hades: it is not taken for the hell of the damned; but for that place of souls below, where the servants of God were kept before the coming of Christ. Which place, both in the Scripture and in the creed, is named hell. Ch.—In this speech, we find many particulars not mentioned before; whence it appears, that the sacred historian does not always specify every circumstance. But, in relating the same speech, uses various expressions to the same purport. C.

Ver. 33. The boy. I am older, and more fit for service. M.

Ver. 34. My father; who will drop down dead, oppressed with grief. How eloquent and pathetic was this address! Joseph could bear no more.

Ver. 2. Weeping, with a loud cry, being unable to restrain himself. The servants, who were in the adjoining apartments, heard this cry and declaration of Joseph, acknowledging one common father with these men; and they presently conveyed the intelligence to the king. H.

Ver. 4. Nearer; that no one might hear what he was going to say respecting their fault. M.—It is thus we ought to treat those who have injured us. He excuses his brethren as much as possible. H. See C. 50:20.

Ver. 5. Hard. Heb. “Be not indignant in your eyes.” Perhaps he was afraid, lest they should begin to accuse one another, as the authors of the deed, and thus disturb the harmony of this reconciliation. He perfectly understands the conduct of divine Providence, which can draw good out of evil, and cause even the malice of men to co-operate in the execution of his designs. C.—God did not sanction or will this malice, as Calvin, &c. impiously assert. T.

Ver. 6. Reaping, as in common years, thought he places near the Nile might produce some little; (M.) and hence the Egyptians ask Joseph for seed. C. 47:19. C.

Ver. 8. Counsel. Joseph's brethren had no design of elevating him to so high a dignity; but God's will directed Pharaoh to appoint him his counsellor or prime minister. His father. H.—So the Roman emperors styled the prefects of the Prætorium, and the Caliphs their chief minister. C.

Ver. 10. Gessen, to the north-east of Egypt, near me, at Tanis, in the Delta and near the promised land, being a part of Arabia. H.—Heliopolis, where many suppose Joseph resided, is situated in the same canton, and was one of the chief cities after Ramesse, the capital. C. 46:28. This country is often refreshed by showers of rain, (C.) which never falls in most parts of Egypt. It is intersected by many canals, and is very rich and proper for pasturage. H.

Ver. 11. Perish. Hebrew, be reduced to poverty. He fed them like the priests. C. 47:12. 22. C.

Ver. 12. My mouth. You now recognize my features and my speech; particularly you, my dear Benjamin. H.—I speak no longer by an interpreter. M.

Ver. 16. Family, and courtiers. They were all so enraptured with Joseph's conduct, that they rejoiced in whatever gave him pleasure. M.—They thought, perhaps, that his relations would resemble him, and be of service to Egypt. H.

Ver. 18. Marrow; which is an emphatical expression, to signify the best things of Egypt. Chal. Heb. “the fat, or the cream of the land.” C.

Ver. 20. Leave nothing. Heb. may have another meaning, which Calmet approves, “Let not your eye spare your furniture.” Be not concerned to leave what may be useless, as most of the husbandry utensils would be in Egypt, “for all,” &c.

Ver. 22. Two robes (stolas) hanging down to the feet. These properly belong to women. But they are worn by men in the East. It was customary to make presents of such robes, as it is still among the great men and kings of that country. Lucullus kept 6000 cloaks in his wardrobe. Horat. 1. sat. 2. C.—Of silver, sicles. The Sept. has “of gold,” as also C. 37:28.

Ver. 23. As much ... besides. This is omitted in Heb. or at least is left ambiguous, “He sent in like manner to his father ten,” &c. But the Syr. and Sept. explain it like the Vulgate.—She-asses. Sept. “mules.”—Bread. Hebrew adds, “meat,” or provisions. C.—These presents might convince Jacob that Joseph was still alive. H.

Ver. 24. Angry. A prudent admonition at all times, but particularly now, to Joseph’s brethren; lest reflecting on his excessive kindness, they should each wish to remove from themselves the stigma of cruelty towards him, by throwing it upon others. H.—Heb. may be rendered, “fear not.” C.

Ver. 26. He awaked, &c. His heart was overpowered between hope and distrust. He seemed to himself to be dreaming. Sept. “in an ecstasy.” Such a sudden transition has oftentimes caused death. H.

Ver. 27. Revived; like a lamp, which was just going out, for want of oil, resumes fresh vigour when a new supply is poured in. S. Chrys.

Ver. 1. The well of the oath. Bersabee.

Ver. 3. Fear not. He might be apprehensive, lest his children should be depraved, living among idolaters, or prefer Egypt before the promised land. He was also afraid to undertake this journey without consulting God. M.

Ver. 4. Thence; in thy posterity. Sept. add at last, or after a long time. Jacob’s bones were brought back and buried in Chanaan. C.—Eyes, as he is the most dear to thee. Parents closed the eyes of their children in death. The Romans opened them again when the corpse was upon the funeral pile; thinking it a mark of disrespect for the eyes to be shut to heaven; “ut neque ab homine supremum eos spectari fas sit, & cœlo non ostendi, nefas.” Plin. xi. 37.

Ver. 7. Daughters. Dina, and grand-daughter Sara, (v. 17,) and his sons’ wives, &c. C.—We may observe, that all here mentioned were not born at the time when Jacob went down into Egypt, but they were before he or Joseph died; that is, during the space of 17 or 71 years. See S. Aug. q. 151. 173. M.—The names of the Heb. and Sept. vary some little from the Vulgate, which may be attributed to the difference of pronunciation, or to the same person having many names. The number is also different in the Sept. as the authors of that version have, perhaps, inserted some names taken from other parts of Scripture, to remove any apparent contradiction. The genealogies of Juda, Joseph, and Benjamin, are carried farther than the rest, as those families were of greater consequence.

Ver. 9. Hesron and Charmi were probably born in Egypt, as Ruben had only two sons. C. 42:37. Philo.

Ver. 10. Jamuel. Num. 26:12, he is called Namuel.—Jachin is Jarid. 1 Par. 4:24. C.

Ver. 12. Were born, afterwards. M.

Ver. 15. Syria. This must be restrained to her seven children.—Thirty-three, comprising Lia, or Jacob; but without Her and Onan, who were dead. C.

Ver. 20. Ephraim. The Sept. take in here the children of both. Num. 26:29. 35.

Ver. 21. Benjamin. Ten in number; though the Sept. have only nine, and suppose that some of them were his grandchildren. He was 33 (or 24, M.) years old. C.—Grotius thinks three names have been made out of two; Echi, Ros, and mophim, out of Ahiram and Supham, as we read, Num. 26:38.

Ver. 23. Sons. The Arab. has son. Husim is Suham, (Num. 26:42,) by change and transposition of letters. Ken.

Ver. 26. Sixty-six; not including Jacob, Joseph, and his two children, who make up 70, v. 27. Deut. 10:22. The Sept. taking in Joseph's grandchildren, read 75; in which they are followed by S. Stephen. Acts. 7:14. See S. Jer. q. Heb. C.—S. Augustine cannot account for these grand-children and great grand-children of Joseph being mentioned as coming with Jacob into Egypt, since some of them were not born during his life-time. He suspects some hidden mystery. W. See v. 7.—Some think S. Stephen excludes Jacob, Joseph, and his sons; and included the 64 men, with 11 wives. D.

Ver. 34. Abomination. See C. 43:32. The source of this hatred against foreign shepherds, was probably because, about 100 years before Abraham, the shepherd-kings, Hycussos, had got possession of a great part of Egypt, and were at last expelled by the kings of Thebais. See Manetho ap. Eus. præp. x. 13. Another reason why they hated foreigners was, because they slew and eat sheep, &c. which they themselves adored. The Egyptians kept sheep for this purpose, and for the benefits to be derived from their wool, &c. C. 47:17. C.—Joseph took advantage of this disposition of the inhabitants, to keep his brethren at a distance from them, that they might not be perverted. He does not introduce them at court, that no jealousy might be excited. He shews that he is not ashamed of his extraction. M.

Ver. 2. The last. Extremos. Some interpret this word of the chiefest, and most sightly: but Joseph seems rather to have chosen out such as had the meanest appearance, that Pharaoh might not think of employing them at court, with danger of their morals and religion; (Ch). or in the army, where they might be distracted with many cares, and be too much separated from one another. H.—He took such of his brethren as came first at hand. Vatable.

Ver. 7. Blessed him, Pharaoh; saying, perhaps, God save the king; or, O king live for ever: thus wishing that he might enjoy all sorts of blessings. M.—It is generally taken in this sense, when men bless one another; but when they bless God, they mean to praise, supplicate, or thank him. C.

Ver. 9. Pilgrimage. He hardly deigns to style it life, as he was worn out with labour and sorrows, and was drawing fast to an end, so much sooner than his ancestors. Isaac had lived 180 years, and was only dead the year before Joseph was made ruler of Egypt. Some had lived above 900 years. H.

Ver. 13. Chanaan. The whole world that was inhabited, and known to the Hebrews, felt perhaps the effect of this raging famine; but the countries here mentioned were the most afflicted. H.

Ver. 14. Treasure, reserving nothing for himself. Philo.

Ver. 15. Wanted. Or “failed both in Egypt and Chanaan,” as the Hebrew insinuates. H.

Ver. 18. Second; or the next year after they had sold their cattle; the fourth of the famine, or perhaps the last, since they ask for seed, v. 19. In that year, Joseph gave back the cattle, &c. to the Egyptians, on condition that they should ever after pay the fifth part of the products of the land to the king, the sole proprietor, who had thus full authority to send them to till any part of his dominions. C.

Ver. 19. Servants. A person may part with his liberty, to preserve life. M.

Ver. 21. People, “he transplanted” from, &c. as the Heb. Arab. &c. now read, by the change of one letter. Herodotus, ii. 108, says, the same person has never a field there two years together. Diodorus 1. also attests, that individuals have no property in Egypt, the land being divided among the priests, the king, and the military. Tradesmen always follow their father’s profession, which makes them very skilful.

Ver. 22. Priests. This was done by the king’s direction, as they were probably idolaters. M.—The immunities of the sacred ministers have been respected both by Pagans, Jews, and Christians; by all who have had any sentiments of religion. Reason dictates that they should live by the altar. They have to labour for the truest interests of the people, and consequently are worthy of their hire.—Which had been given, &c. Inasmuch as their wants were supplied, and the king forebore to claim their land. Heb. “only the land of the priests he, Joseph, bought not.” H.—If infidels did so much for their priests, ought we to do less for those of God? S. Chrys. hom. 65. W.

Ver. 26. This day. When Moses wrote, and long after, as we learn from Josephus. S. Clem. Alex. Diod. &c. C.

Ver. 29. Thigh. To swear, as the steward of Abraham did. C. 24:2.—Kindness and truth. This act of real mercy; or, shew me mercy, by promising freely to comply with my request; and truth, by fulfilling this oath. M.

Ver. 30. Place. Hebron, where Sara, Abraham, and Isaac reposed. C.—Thus he manifested his belief in a future resurrection with his Saviour, who should be born in that land; and he admonished his descendants never to lose sight of it, nor forfeit the promises by their wicked conduct. C. 23:17. M.—He teaches us likewise, to be solicitous to obtain Christian burial. W.

Ver. 31. To the bed’s head. S. Paul, (Heb. 11:21,) following the Greek translation of the Septuagint, reads adored the top of his rod. Where note, that the same word in the Hebrew, according to the different pointing of it, signifies both a bed and a rod. And to verify both these sentences, we must understand that Jacob, leaning on Joseph’s rod, adored, turning towards the head of his bed: which adoration, inasmuch as it was referred to God, was an absolute, and sovereign worship: but inasmuch as it was referred to the rod of Joseph, as a figure of the sceptre, that is, of the royal dignity of Christ, was only an inferior and relative honour. Ch.—S. Aug. proposes another very probable explanation. He adored God, supporting himself on the top of his staff, or of Joseph's sceptre, q. 162. The Sept. and Syriac intimate, that Jacob bowed down respectfully towards the sceptre of his son, and thus complied with the explication which he had given to his dream. C. 37:10. Others, who understand the Hebrew Hamitta, in the sense given to it by S. Jerom, Aquila, and Symmachus, suppose that after he had given his last instructions to Joseph in a sitting posture, growing weaker, he laid his head again upon his pillow. C.—God was pleased to have this recorded in a language subject to such various interpretations; as he, perhaps, would have us to understand, that Jacob literally bowed down both to the bed-head and to the top of the sceptre. For many believe, that the Scripture has often several literal meanings. T.—If the Massoretic points had been known to the Sept. we should not have had this variation. But the learned generally agree, that they are of human, and even of very modern invention.

Ver. 1. Sick. Worse than when he was with him before. H.

Ver. 2. Strengthened: with the thought of seeing this beloved son, and also with the prophetic spirit (M.) of God, which filled him with joy, &c. Gal. 5:22. H.

Ver. 4. Possession. He makes mention of this first vision of God to him, to shew that he had a right to Chanaan, and to adopt the two children of Joseph, who were each to have as much as his own children. H.—Jacob's posterity enjoyed that land till the Messias came, with some few interruptions. But his spiritual children inherit a much better country, (of which this was a figure) an eternal kingdom in heaven. C.

Ver. 5. Mine, by adoption; and shall be heads of their respective tribes. M.

Ver. 6. Thine. They shall not claim the same prerogative: they shall live among their brethren, Ephraim and Manasses. We read not that Joseph had any other children besides these two. C.—The double portion, or the birth-right, was thus transferred from Ruben to Joseph. D.

Ver. 7. For when, &c. Heb. “as for me.” Do not wonder that I should so earnestly desire to be laid in the tomb of Mambre, whereas your mother was buried at Ephrata. I was in a manner forced to bury her there, by the heat of the weather, (M.) and the confusion to which my family was then exposed, on account of the slaughter of the Sichemites. H.—That place was, moreover, to be honoured with the birth of the Messias. S. Aug. q. 165.

Ver. 11. Deprived. Heb. “I did not expect; or, I durst not pray” to God for a thing which I thought impossible; I mean, the happiness of seeing thee; and lo, God, &c.

Ver. 12. Lap, (gremio, breast,) after Jacob had embraced them; or from between his knees, where they knelt to receive his blessing.—Bowed down, out of reverence to his father, and to beg of God that he would put words of comfort into the mouth of his father, on this solemn and important occasion. Then, in order that his children might not lean upon, or incommode Jacob, he placed them, the elder at his right-hand, the other at his left. H.

Ver. 14. Changing. Heb. “making his hands intelligent;” or giving to understand, by forming a cross with his extended hands, that he had some particular reason for so doing. H.—By the preference given to Ephraim, he forshewed his royal dignity, in giving kings to the ten tribes, (Euseb.) and that his tribe would surpass that of his brother in glory and numbers; (v. 19,) and lastly, give birth to that great leader, Josue; who, as a figure of Christ, should introduce the Israelites into the promised land. M.—The custom of imposing hands on a person, is of high antiquity, and is still practiced in the Christian church in the ordination of her ministers. Num. 8:10. Acts 6:6. See Matt. 19:13. Num. 27:23. C.—The cross of Christ is the source of all our exaltation. A preference for the younger children is generally observable in Scripture; being intended to shew that the Church, though chosen later out of all nations, should obtain the preference over the synagogue. Theodoret. T.

Ver. 16. The angel guardian, who, by God’s ordinance, has ever protected me, continue his kind attention towards these my grandchildren. It is not probably that he, who was called God before, should now be styled an angel, as some Protestants would have us believe. H.—S. Basil c. Eunom. iii. and S. Chrysostom, with many others, allege this text, to prove that an angel is given to man for the direction of his life, and to protect him against the assaults of the rebel angels, as Calvin himself dares not deny.—Let my, &c. Let them partake of the blessings (promised by name to me, to Abraham, and to Isaac) among the other tribes; or, may God bless them, in consideration of his servants. Moses obtained pardon for the Hebrews, by reminding God of these his chosen friends. Ex. 32. W.

Ver. 17. Displeased; (graviter accepit,) was grieved to see the elder son neglected; and, thinking it might possibly proceed from a mistake, as his father's eyes were so dim that he did not know them, (v. 8,) he ventured to suggest his sentiments to his father; but acquiesced in his decision. H.—The greatest prophets are not always under actual inspiration. C.

Ver. 19. A people, (in populos.) He shall be father of many peoples. The tribe of Manasses was divided, and had a large territory on either side of the Jordan, immediately north of that which fell to the lots of Ephraim and of Gad. H.—Grow. Heb. “shall be the fulness of nations;” or shall possess every thing that can make a nation great and enviable. The event justified this prediction. Ephraim was at the head of the ten tribes, most valiant and powerful. 3 K. 11:26. C.

Ver. 20. In thee, Joseph. Sept. “in you,” Ephraim and Manasses. The Israelites shall wish the same happiness to their greatest friends, as that which you have enjoyed. M.

Ver. 22. Thee. In thy posterity; and particularly in Ephraim, to whose lot it shall fall, a portion. Hebrew shecem; which the Sept. explain of the city, or field near it, which Jacob had formerly purchased; and which, being wrested from him after he had left that country, by the Amorrhites, he recovered by the sword. Masius.—The particulars of this transaction are not given in Scripture. M.—The children of Joseph buried their father in this field. Jos. 24:32. There also was Jacob's well. John 4:5. We have already observed, that Jacob restored whatever his sons had taken unjustly from the unhappy Sichemites. C. 34:30.—Sword and bow, is understood by S. Jerom and Onkelos in a spiritual sense, to denote his justice and earnest prayer, by which he merited the divine protection; (C.) or it may mean the money, which he had procured with hard labour. S. Jer. q. Heb.

Ver. 1. Last. Heb. “future days.” It was an ancient and commendable custom, for parents to assemble their children in their last moments, to give them salutary instructions. They often also foretold to them what should happen. See Deut. 31. Jos. ult. 1 K. 12. Tob. 4:3. 1 Mac.

2. Cyrus and Socrates both believed that they had then an insight into futurity. C.

Ver. 3. My strength, &c. He calls him his strength, as being born whilst his father was in his full strength and vigour; he calls him the beginning of his sorrow, because cares and sorrows usually come on with the birth of children.—Excelling in gifts, &c. because the first-born had a title to a double portion, and to have the command over his brethren, which Ruben forfeited by his sin; being poured out as water; that is, spilt and lost. Ch.—In command. He ought to have succeeded to his father in authority. But Joseph entered in upon his rejection, 1 Par. 5:1. The priesthood was given to Levi's descendants; and the regal power, partly to those of Joseph, who reigned over the ten tribes, for a long time; and partly to the posterity of Juda, who exercised dominion over all the people of Israel. Chaldee. W.

Ver. 4. Grow thou not. This was not meant by way of a curse or imprecation; but by way of a prophecy, foretelling that the tribe of Ruben should not inherit the pre-eminences usually annexed to the first birth-right, viz. the double portion, the being prince or lord over the other brethren, and the priesthood: of which the double portion was given to Joseph, the princely office to Juda, and the priesthood to Levi. Ch.—Thou hast abandoned thyself to thy brutal passion; do so no more, ne adjicias. S. Jer. q. Heb. Let Ruben live, and die not; let him be small in number. Deut. 33:6. His tribe never became very considerable. C.—Couch. See C. 35:22. Eternal infamy attends the name of Ruben. H.

Ver. 5. Brethren. Born of the same parents; similar in disposition.—Vessels; instruments. Sept. and Chal. “they have completed wickedness,” as they read calu, instead of the present Heb. cele, which is adopted by Aquila. C.

Ver. 6. Slew a man, viz. Sichem, the son of Hemor, with all his people, Gen. 34. Mystically and prophetically it alludes to Christ; whom their posterity, viz. the priests and the scribes, put to death. Ch.—A wall, Sichem, which they destroyed: or, according to the Sept. “they hamstrung” a bull, as the same Hebrew word signifies; both which may refer to the prince of the town, or to Joseph, (C.) in whose persecution these two were principally concerned. Jacob declares, he had no share in their attack upon the people of Sichem: his soul, or his glory, was not impaired by their misconduct. H.

Ver. 7. Scatter them. Levi had no division allotted to him, but only some cities among the other tribes; and Simeon had only a part of Juda's lot, which was so small, that his descendants were forced to seek for a fresh establishment; some in Gader, others in Mount Seir, 1 Par. 4:39. Jos. 19:2. Simeon alone was not blessed by Moses. Deut. 33. D.—The Levites obtained a blessing, on account of their distinguished zeal; (Num. 25) while Zambri rivets, as it were, the curse upon the family of Simeon. M.

Ver. 8. Praise. He alludes to his name, his martial prowess, and dominion over all his brethren; who should be all called Jews, and submit to his sway. Some explain all this of Jesus Christ; others refer the first part of the prophecy to Juda. H.

Ver. 9. A lion's whelp, &c. This blessing of Juda foretelleth the strength of his tribe, the fertility of his inheritance, and principally that the sceptre, and legislative power, should not be utterly taken away from his race till about the time of the coming of Christ: as in effect it never was: which is a demonstration against the modern Jews, that the Messias is long since come; for the sceptre has long since been utterly taken away from Juda. Ch.—This none can deny. Juda is compared to a lion, which was the emblem of his royal dignity, and was borne in the standards of that tribe.—To the prey. Heb. “from the prey.” He proceeds from victory to victory. He couches, ready to fall upon his prey; and, retiring to the mountains, is still eager to renew the attack. C.—Read the history of David and of Solomon, who, both in peace and war, were a terror to the surrounding nations.

Ver. 10. The sceptre. Almost every word in this verse has been explained in a different manner. But all the ancient Jews agree with Christians, that it contains a prediction of the Messias, and points out the period of his coming. Whether this was verified when Herod, a foreigner, got possession of the throne, and was acknowledged by the Jews, just about the time of our Saviour's nativity, as most of the fathers suppose; or it only took its full effect when Agrippa II. lost all his power, the temple and the city were laid in ruins, and the whole nation dispersed for ever, it is not perhaps so easy to determine. In either supposition, the Messias has long since come. Jacob foretels, either that Christ would make his appearance as soon as the Jews should fall under a foreign yoke, and in this sense he was born about the 37th year of Herod the great—or he should come just before the kingdom of Juda should have an end, which took place in the 70th year of the Christian era, or about 37 years after the public appearance and death of our Saviour. The sceptre shall not depart irrevocably from the Jews; over whom the tribe of Juda had always the greatest authority in appointing the princes, when they were not selected from the tribe itself, or from his thigh; till the Messias, who has been expected so long, shall come and gather all nations into his Church. Then the designs of Providence, in watching over the Jews, being accomplished, their republic shall be dissolved, because they have shed his blood, instead of acknowledging his celestial beauty, v. 12. The evident signs of decay in the kingdom of the Jews, were sufficient to excite the attention of all to look for the Messias; and we read, both in S. John 4:25, in Tacitus, and Suetonius, that his appearance was fully expected about that time. The sceptre is the emblem of sovereign, though not always independent, power. Juda and his posterity were always at the head of their brethren. They marched first in the wilderness; two of the judges were of this tribe. But their chief glory began with David, whose posterity the whole nation obeyed, till Jeroboam tore away the ten tribes. Still the tribe of Benjamin and the Levites adhered to Juda. During the captivity there were judges admitted to superintend over their brethren; and K. Joakim was raised to high authority. The rulers who came into power after the return of the Jews, were either of this tribe, at least by the mother's side, or were chosen and recognized by the tribe of Juda. Even Herod, in this sense, might be considered as a Jewish king, though a foreigner, as well as a Thracian might be counted a Roman emperor, without any diminution of the imperial authority of Rome. Perhaps, indeed, he was an usurper, till the nation acknowledged his authority two years after the birth of Christ. Philo de temp. ii. Josep. Ant. xvii. 3. "Herod was the first foreign king admitted by the Jews." S. Aug. de C. D. xviii. 45. If, therefore, no stranger was to be acknowledged by the nation, till He came, who was to establish a spiritual and everlasting kingdom, the moment was arrived, when the Jews submitted to Herod, and Christ had actually been born two years.—From Juda, or from that tribe; for Jacob gave peculiar blessings to each; (v. 28) and hence the fathers gather, that the Messias should spring from Juda.—Ruler from his thigh, lineally descended from him, or acknowledged at least by his posterity, as all the legal princes were till the coming of Christ.—Mechokek might also signify a teacher or scribe expounding the law of Moses, which subsisted for the same period; but this is more probably a farther explication of the sceptre, &c. C.—Till had ci, which words being joined together, are always taken in this sense. Helvicus.—Sent. Schiloach (or Ssolue) seems to have been in S. Jerom's copy, though we now read Shiloh (or Ssole) "to whom" the authority belongs; Sept. "to whom all things are reserved; or till the things arrive, which are laid up for him. C.—Expectation, or congregation of nations, as Aggeus afterwards foretold, 2:8. If we examine all the plausible explications which have been given to this verse, we shall find that they all tend to convey the same truth. "The sceptre (ssetbet, rod, crook, power or tribe) shall not depart (cease, be taken off) from Juda, (the tribe or the Jews) nor a leader (scribe, lawyer, or legislator) from his thigh, (between his feet, or from his banners) till He, who shall be sent, (shio, the pacific, his son, to whom it is, or the things are, reserved) arrive; and Him shall the nations expect, (and obey) to Him they shall look up (and be gathered). Whom will the Jews point out to whom all these characters agree, except our divine Lord, whom they also must one day adore? H.

Ver. 11. Foal. The nations, which had not been subjected to the yoke of the old law.—Vineyard; the house of Israel, the vineyard of the Lord of hosts. Isai. 5:7. Christ broke down the wall of separation, and made both one. Eph. 2:14.—His ass, or the Jews.—O my son; Juda, the Saviour king, who shall be born of thee, shall tie both Jews and Gentiles to the vine, which is himself. Jo. 15. To the Jews he shall preach in person; but the Gentiles he shall call by his apostles, chosen out of the vineyard of the Jewish church. M.—He shall wash his robe, his flesh, and his garment, or all his disciples, in his own blood; adorning them with all graces by means of his death, which must be applied to their souls, in the holy sacraments devoutly received, and in the Mass, where his blood is offered under the appearance of wine. H. See S. Amb. &c. Tertullian, (ag. Marc. iv.) shewing that Christ fulfilled the figures of the old law, interprets the stole to mean his body, and wine his blood. W.—Jacob alludes also to fertility and abundance of vines, which should enrich the portion of Juda, particularly about Engaddi. Cant. 1:13. C.

Ver. 12. Beautiful. The eyes and teeth contribute much to the beauty of a face. Our Saviour, rising from the dead, filled the hearts of the beholders with joy, as wine exhilarates the heart of man. M.—The spouse in the Canticle (v. 12,) compares the eyes of the bridegroom to the shining reddish, or fiery ones of pigeons: chaclili, beautiful, means shining red, &c. Jesus Christ seems to allude to this prophecy of Jacob, (Matt. 21:43 and Jo. 10:16,) telling the Jews, that the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and one fold should be established for all. God would then cease to distinguish the Jews by any other marks than those of his wrath. He would no longer be their king and shepherd. His sceptre, or pastoral crook, should be taken off the tribe of Juda, and it should be confounded with the rest, as it is at this day. C.

Ver. 13. Road. The territory of Zabulon was famous for good harbours, being situated between the Mediterranean and the sea of Genezareth. M.—Jacob marks out the limits to be assigned his children, 200 years before Chanaan was conquered; and Moses wrote this before they possessed a foot of land in it. The reason why Zabulon is placed before his elder brother Issachar, is not known.—Sidon; not the city, but the territory of Sidon, or Phenicia. C.

Ver. 14. Strong. Heb. “bony ass.” Many of Jacob’s children are compared to animals, which was customary in the eastern style. Homer compares Ajax with the ass, for his strength and patience. Iliad xii. Jacob thus indicates the laborious disposition of Issachar’s tribe, which did not delight in war. Their country was the most fruitful of all Galilee. C.

Ver. 16. Dan shall judge, &c. This was verified in Samson, who was of the tribe of Dan, and began to deliver Israel. Judges 13:5. But as this deliverance was but temporal and very imperfect, the holy patriarch (v. 18,) aspires after another kind of deliverer, saying: I will look for thy salvation, O Lord. Ch.—Many have supposed, that Antichrist will be one of his descendants, which makes Jacob break out into this exclamation. H.—See S. Iren. v. 30, &c. Samson exercised his ingenuity in discomfiting the Philistines. But Antichrist will be far more subtle in deluding the faithful. M.—The Danites took Lais; afterwards called Cæsarea Philippi, by stratagem. Jud. 18. T.

Ver. 19. Gad, being girded, &c. It seems to allude to the tribe of Gad; when, after they had received for their lot the land of Galaad, they marched in arms before the rest of the Israelites, to the conquest of the land of Chanaan: from whence they afterwards returned loaded with spoils. See Josue 1 and 22. Ch.—He alludes continually to the name of Gad, which signifies one “girded, or a troop.” See Osee 6:8. Num. 32:17. C.

Ver. 20. Fat, delicious. This country was very luxuriant. Deut. 33:24. M.

Ver. 21. A hart. Barach was of this tribe, and seemed rather timid, till he was encouraged by Debora; and his victory gave occasion to that beautiful hymn, Jud. 5. C.

Ver. 22. Run to and fro, &c. To behold his beauty; whilst his envious brethren turned their darts against him, &c. Ch.—Joseph continued increasing, in spite of the envy of his brethren, and the calumny of Putiphar’s wife, who was too much enamoured of his beauty. H.

Ver. 24. His bow rested upon the strong, &c. That is, upon God, who was his strength: who also loosed his bands, and brought him out of prison to be the pastor, that is, the feeder and ruler of Egypt; and the stone, that is, the rock and support of Israel.

Ver. 25. Blessings, &c. 1. Of rain; 2. of springs; 3. of milk, (uberum); and 4. (vulvæ) of children and cattle.

Ver. 26. The blessings of thy father, &c. That is, thy father’s blessings are made more prevalent and effectual in thy regard, by the additional strength they receive from his inheriting the blessings of his progenitors Abraham and Isaac.—The desire of the everlasting hills, &c. These blessings all looked forward towards Christ, called the desire of the everlasting hills, as being longed for, as it were, by the whole creation. Mystically, the patriarchs and prophets are called the everlasting hills, by reason of the eminence of their wisdom and holiness.—The Nazarite. This word signifies one separated; and agrees to Joseph, as being separated from, and more eminent than, his brethren. As the ancient Nazarites were so called from their being set aside for God, and vowed to him. Ch.—Nazir denotes also one chosen or crowned, and is a title of one of the chief courtiers or ministers of the Persian kings. Such was Joseph. C.—These blessings were perhaps forfeited by the misconduct of his posterity, when Jeroboam set up the worship of the golden calves; though probably many would subsist of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasses till the coming of the Messias. T.

Ver. 27. Wolf; alluding to the wars in the defence of the inhabitants of Gabaa, and those waged by Saul, Mardocheus, &c. M. Jud. 19 and 20. S. Paul was of this tribe; and, from a fiery zealot, became an eminent apostle. S. Aug. &c. T.

Ver. 28. Proper blessings, or predictions; for Ruben received no blessing. H.

Ver. 29. To be gathered to my people. That is, I am going to die, and so to follow my ancestors that are gone before me, and to join their company in another world. Ch.—Jacob's life was embittered with many afflictions, which he bore with admirable patience, and thus deserved to be considered as an excellent figure of Jesus Christ.—The man of sorrows. His faith in the promises of God, made him contemplate the land of Chanaan as his own, and parcel it out among his children. C.

Ver. 1. Kissing him, as it was then the custom, in testimony of an ardent affection. M.

Ver. 2. Physicians, whose business it was to embalm dead bodies, with a composition of myrrh, &c. in order to keep them from putrefaction, (M.) as the Egyptian mummies are treated. H.—The entrails are taken out, &c. by the embalmer during 30 days, and the body is left in salt and various drugs, for other 40, in all 70 days, as Herodotus informs us, (B. xi. 86,) and as Moses here insinuates, v. 3. This was an honour peculiar to the kings. Before any person was buried, his praises were rehearsed; and it was lawful on this occasion to declare, what evil even the kings themselves had done; which sometimes caused them to be deprived of funeral honours. We have several funeral canticles preserved in Scripture, 2 K. 1:18. 3:33. 2 Par. 35:25. C.—The Lamentations of Jeremias were perhaps of this nature, on the death of K. Josias. The usual time for mourning among the Jews, was 30 days for people of eminence, (Num. 20. Deut. 34:8. Procopius) and seven for the rest. Eccli. 22:13. H.

Ver. 4. Expired. Before the corpse was interred, Joseph could not lay aside his mourning attire, in which it was not lawful to appear at court. C.

Ver. 5. Digged, in the sepulchre which Abraham had purchased. This circumstance, and the exact words here used by Joseph, are not mentioned elsewhere. H.

Ver. 7. Ancients; chief officers. C.—This is a name of dignity; like our aldermen. H.

Ver. 10. Atad, which was so called, from being encompassed with thorns. C.—Beyond; with relation to Moses, (H.) or on the west side of the Jordan. C.

Ver. 11. Mourning: Heb. “Ebel Mitsraim beyond the Jordan.” On this occasion they fasted till the evening: perhaps they also cut their flesh and plucked their hair, according to the manners of the Egyptians, which customs (Lev. 19:28. Deut. 14:1.) were prohibited to the Jews. T.

Ver. 16. A message; perhaps by Benjamin. M.—They hope thus to obtain pardon for the sake of their deceased father, and for the sake of their common God.

Ver. 17. Wept, that they should entertain no doubts respecting the reconciliation, which had taken place seventeen years before. H.

Ver. 19. Resist, &c. Heb. “Am I not subject to God; or, Am I a God,” to oppose his will. Sept. “I belong to the Lord.” You see that your designs against me have turned to our mutual advantage. Can I, therefore, think of punishing you? Repent, and obtain pardon of God: I certainly forgive you. H.—Thus God drew good out of the evil, in which he had no share.—S. Aug. de C. D. xiv. 27. S. Chrys. hom. 67.

Ver. 22. And ten; consequently he had been governor of all the land eighty years; God having made him abundant recompense, even in this world, for a transient disgrace! H.—Knees. Joseph adopted the only son of Machir. See C. 30:3.; or, according to the Samaritan, “in the days of Joseph” he was born. C.

Ver. 24. Visit you with various persecutions; or will fulfil his promises. —Carry my bones. He would have them to keep his bones till the time of their departure, as an earnest that they should certainly obtain the land of Chanaan; and thus his bones were visited, and after death, they prophesied. Eccli. 49:18. Perhaps the Egyptians would have been offended, (W.) if the corpse of Joseph had been removed out of the country immediately, as that of Jacob was; and they might have taken occasion hence to envy and persecute his brethren. H.

Ver. 25. Embalmed, like the Egyptian momies, or mummies, which is a Persian word, signifying a dried corpse. Some of them are very magnificent, adorned with golden letters and hieroglyphics, various bandages, &c. They are laid in coffins. Some pretend that Joseph was afterwards adored in Egypt, under the names of Serapis and Osiris: but the grounds of this supposition are only a few uncertain etymologies and emblems, which might agree with him as well as with those modern deities: (C.) at least it does not at all appear probable, that he was adored in Egypt before the departure of the Israelites, as the king who persecuted them did not know Joseph. Ex. 1:8. His greatest glory was, to have prefigured Jesus Christ in so wonderful a manner during the course of his life, and to have been replenished with all the graces which could form the character of a great man and a saint. Some think, that the history of Joseph has been imitated in the fable of Proteus, or Cetes, king of Egypt. See the True Hist. of Fabulous Times, by Juerin du Roche, a virtuous and learned ecclesiastic, who was put to death for his faith, at Paris, Sept. 8, 1792. See also Rollin’s Abridgment. H.

EXODUS

THE BOOK OF EXODUS

INTRODUCTION

The second Book of Moses is called Exodus from the Greek word Εξοδος, which signifies going out; because it contains the history of the going out of the children of Israel out of Egypt. The Hebrews, from the words with which it begins, call it Veelle Shemoth: These are the names. Ch.—It contains the space of 143 years, till the beginning of the second year after the liberation of the Israelites. T.—Their slavery is described in the first chapters; and is supposed to have continued ninety years. D.—The laws prescribed by God to his people, the sacrifices, tabernacle, &c. were all intended to prefigure the Christian dispensation. S. Aug. de C. D. vii. 31.—Moses himself was a type of Jesus Christ, who was rejected by the synagogue, and received by the Gentiles, as the Jewish Legislator was abandoned by his mother, and educated by the Egyptian princess. She delivers him back to his mother; and thus the Jews will, at last, acknowledge our Saviour. D.—God deigns to address his people in the character of a powerful Eastern monarch, and requires the like attention. He appoints his ministers, like guards, to attend before his tabernacle, &c. The laws which he enacts, are such as suited the Jewish people: they were not to rise all at once to perfection; but these laws guide them, as it were, on the road. They are infinitely more perfect than those of the surrounding nations. C.

Ver. 3. And Benjamin. He is mentioned here because he was the son of Rachel, as the preceding were the children of Lia. The offspring of the handmaids follow. H.

Ver. 5. Seventy: Sept. “75,” including the offspring of Joseph. See Gen. 46:26.

Ver. 6. Generation, or race of mortals who had seen his wonderful works. The tyrant, who knew not Joseph, began his reign about 58 years after that patriarch’s death. C.—His name was Pharaoh Amenophis, (Perer.) or Ramesses Miamum. Usher.

Ver. 9. Numerous. Calvisius observes, that from Ephraim alone might have sprung 4,112,323,729 people. See S. Aug. q. 43, &c. H.—In the space of 215 years, 70 people may produce an immense multitude, as Bonfrere shews by an accurate calculation. God also was pleased to bless the Hebrews with fecundity, so that they sprung up (ebullierunt) like frogs or fishes, v. 7. In Egypt, the women had sometimes seven at a birth (Plin. vii. 3,) and Aristotle (Anim. vii. 4,) mentions one woman who had 20 children at four births. T.—Stronger. This might easily be true, if this king had only Thebais under his command. But if he was king of all Egypt, it seems an exaggeration. C.—Indeed, human policy often gives birth to all kinds of wickedness. The king justifies his cruelty on this pretext of self-defence. He wishes to keep the Hebrews under; yet he is not willing to let them depart, as he knew they intended, according to Joseph's prediction. H.—God permitted this disposition, in order to punish his people for their idolatry, (Ezec. 23:8,) to admonish them not to fix their abode in Egypt, and to manifest his power and glory in the destruction of the impious. M.

Ver. 11. Masters. Cruel like himself, who not only made them build without proper materials, (v. 14 and C. 5:10. H.) but oppressed them with heavy burdens of brick and tile. Hence Aristophanes calls the Hebrews in derision Plinthophoroi. This servitude is styled the iron furnace of Egypt, Deut. 4:20. Jer. 11:4.—Of tabernacles, or of storehouses. Ch.—To keep his treasures, Chal. or “fortresses,” Sept. It may also be the name of a city, Miscenoth. C. 12:37. Phithom, perhaps the same as the town of Heroum, where the Sept. say Joseph first met his father. Gen. 46:28. Ramesses was the capital, and situate in the Arabic nome. C.

Ver. 14. Service. They were forced to till the land, reap, &c. M.

Ver. 15. Midwives. Egyptian women, who assisted all of that district. Josephus xi. 5. There were others under them. Some think all these midwives were of Hebrew extraction, as their names are Hebrew, &c. C.

Ver. 16. The time, &c. Heb. “and you shall see them upon the two stones.” Abenaim. Jeremias (18:3,) uses the same expression, speaking of a potter hard at work. C.—A woman, from whom nothing could be feared, to be reserved for service and for pleasure. M.—We must not obey princes in their unjust commands. Acts 4 and 5. Matt. 10:28. W.

Ver. 19. Skilful, &c. Heb. Caioth means midwives: or they are full of vigour, or bring forth alive, like brutes. By this allusion they not only excuse themselves, but seem also to enter into the king's sentiments of hatred and scorn for the Hebrews. M.—Women in Egypt, and in the eastern regions, are easily delivered, and hardly stand in need of any assistance. Ludolf. 1 K. 4:19. Perhaps, therefore, the midwives spoke truth, with regard to the generality of the Hebrew women. But they gave way to a lie of excuse, with regard to some, (v. 17,) which S.

Augustine would not allow, even to save all the Hebrew children. c. Mend. 15. It was not so easy to discover this delusion, as women in that country seldom appear in public; and hence Jochabed was enabled to hide Moses so long. C.

Ver. 21. Because the midwives feared God, &c. The midwives were rewarded, not for their lie, which was a venial sin; but for their fear of God, and their humanity: but this reward was only temporal, in building them houses, that is, in establishing and enriching their families. Ch.—This alone the Scripture specifies, thought hey might also be filled with heavenly graces. W.—Some conclude from this verse, that the midwives embraced the true religion. The Hebrew refers built them to the Hebrews, as if they multiplied in consequence of the humanity of these women; (C.) and the Vulgate may be explained in the same sense. H.—De Muis supposes, that Pharao ordered houses to be built for the midwives, where the Hebrew women were forced to appear when they were to be delivered, in the presence of commissaries.

Ver. 22. The river Nile, where the persecuting successor of this king found his end. H.—It seems this inhuman decree was not published till after Aaron was born, and it was probably revoked soon after the birth of Moses; for if it had been rigorously put in execution, there would have been nothing but old men 80 years after, when Moses led the people out of Egypt. C.—But perhaps even the Egyptians abhorred and refused to execute this edict. M.

Ver. 1. After this. In process of time, without reference to what immediately precedes. The Heb. and Sept. omit these words. H.—The marriage of Amram, grandson of Levi, with his aunt or cousin, had taken place before the persecution. Tostat and others suppose, that people were not then forbidden to marry their aunts. But it is probable Jochabed was only the grand-daughter of Levi, and the daughter of one of Amram's brothers, as the Sept. insinuate. Otherwise their ages would have been very disproportionate. See C. 6:20. C.

Ver. 2. Goodly. Handsome, elegant. Heb. 11:23; agreeable to God. Acts 7:20. Josephus says, Amram had been assured by God that the child should be the deliverer of his people. Yet he neglects not to use every prudent precaution. W.—Months. Heb. moons; whence some erroneously infer, that the Hebrew year was not solar. C.

Ver. 3. Bulrushes, or paper plant, growing on the banks of the Nile. Such little vessels were used in Egypt in Lucan's time. Conseritur bibula Memphitis cymba papyro. M.—Sedges, to prevent it from being carried away by the stream. Cajetan thinks the Hebrews did not drown their children; but by thus exposing them, abandoned them to the king's use. Acts 7:19.

Ver. 4. His sister, Mary, who was born at the beginning of this persecution, and was therefore called bitterness. H.—She was about 12 years old. M.

Ver. 5. Daughter, and sole heiress. H.—She is called Thermut by Josephus, and Meris by Artapanus. She was going to bathe, or to purify herself, according to the custom of the country; or perhaps she was going to wash linen, as Nausicrae, the daughter of Alcinous, was doing, when she met Ulysses. C.

Ver. 6. Hebrews, against whom the persecution raged. She saw it had received circumcision. Theod. q. in Ex.

Ver. 10. Moses, or Moyses, in the Egyptian tongue, signifies one taken or saved out of the water. Ch.—Mo, signifies water in the Egyptian tongue; Mosse, “he drew out,” in Hebrew. Philo believes that the princess feigned him to be her own child. Moses denied that he was, and would not take advantage of this adoption, Heb. 11:24. He was grown up, and had been well instructed by his parents, ver. 9. He afterwards became well versed in all the sciences, (Acts 7:22,) rejecting what was idle and superstitious. Josephus assures us he became a great conqueror. C.

Ver. 12. He slew the Egyptian. This he did by a particular inspiration of God; as a prelude to his delivering the people from their oppression and bondage. He thought, says S. Stephen, (Acts 7:25,) that his brethren understood that God by his hand would save them. But such particular and extraordinary examples are not to be imitated. Ch.—He was inspired, on this occasion, to stand up in defence of the innocent. M. S. Tho. ii. 2, q. 60.—The laws of Egypt required every person to protect the oppressed; or, if unable to do it, he was to call in the aid of the magistrate. Diod. i. C.—Moses looked round to see if there was any help near. He was 40 years old when he was forced to flee.

Ver. 14. Feared. S. Paul, (Heb. 11:27,) is speaking of his leaving Egypt, at the head of the people, when he says, not fearing the fierceness of the king. Without being dismayed on this occasion, by the unexpected discovery of what he had done, (which was perhaps undesignedly made public by the Hebrew whom he had rescued,) he resolves not to tempt God. H.

Ver. 15. Madian. A city and country of Arabia, which took its name from Madian the son of Abraham, by Cetura, and was peopled by his posterity. Ch.—There were, perhaps, some of the descendants of Cham, by his son Chus, intermixed with them; (H.) and hence Aaron reproaches the wife of Moses for being a Chusite. Num. 12:1. Jethro was a Cinean, descended from the same stock.

Ver. 16. Priest. Hebrew cohen, (or cen,) means also a prince, as the Chal. has it. When put in this manner, with the name of a place, it is generally taken in this sense. But formerly kings were also priests. Jethro served the true God, like Job, in the midst of a perverse generation, and offered sacrifice to him, when he joined the camp of the Israelites. Ex. 18:11. C.

Ver. 18. Raguel. He had two names, being also called Jethro, as appears from the first verse of the following chapter. Ch.—He is also called Hobab and Ceni. Num. 10:2. Jud. 1:16. Perhaps Raguel was father of Jethro. Drusius.

Ver. 21. Swore. Heb. Goel is rendered “was willing.”—Sym. has, “He conjured Moses;” and Theod. “Moses began to dwell.” The Sept. neglect the word entirely, “But Moses took up his abode.”

Ver. 22. Gersam, or Gershon. This name signifies, a stranger there: as Eliezer signifies the help of God. Ch.—And she, &c. is wanting both in Heb. and Chal. but found in the Complut. edit. of the Sept. It occurs (C. 18:4,) and we might naturally expect to find it in this place. C.

Ver. 23. Died in the year 2494. His successor, Amenophis, treading in his footsteps, was drowned 19 years afterwards. Usher.

Ver. 25. Knew them; that is, he had respect to them, he cast a merciful eye upon them. Ch.—Heb. “he had regard for them,” and, as some Latin copies read, delivered them. C.

Ver. 1. Fed for the space of forty years. During which time, he composed the books of Genesis and Job, for the consolation of his countrymen; (M.) though others believe he wrote all the Pentateuch in the desert. Theodor. &c.—Of God, on account of its height; or on account of God’s appearing to Moses.—Horeb is so close to Mount Sinai, that the shadow of the latter reaches it when the sun rises. It is watered with three springs; and the summit is adorned with fruit trees. C.

Ver. 2. The Lord appeared. That is, an angel representing God, and speaking in his name. Ch. Acts 7:30. Gal. 3:19.—The apparitions of God to the patriarchs are generally understood in this sense. S. Aug. de Trin. iii. 11. W.—Yet many of the Fathers suppose, that this angel was no other than the Son of God, the angel of the great council. (Mal. 3:1,) and S. Aug. (q. 2, in Ex.) does not disapprove of this opinion. C.—Not burnt. Thus the Hebrews were afflicted, but not destroyed. M.—God is styled a consuming fire. Deut. 4:24. He appeared in fire again. C. 24:17. C.

Ver. 5. Shoes. Juvenal, sat. 6, takes notice of this custom. Observant ubi festa mero pede sabbata reges. D.—The Ethiopian Christians and the Turks never enter their churches, or mosques, without putting off their shoes. The priests did the like when they entered the temple of Jerusalem, and God ordered them moreover to wash their feet and hands. Ex. 30:19. C.—We observe the same ceremony, out of respect for Jesus Christ, when we go to kiss the cross. Pythagoras said, “Offer sacrifice and adoration barefoot.” Jamblic. 24. On such occasions, we ought to have our hearts disengaged from the world. H. See Lev. 2:15.

Ver. 6. Hid, out of respect, and perhaps fearing lest he should die. Gen. 16:13. C.—God takes the title of these three patriarchs, because he had promised Chanaan to each of them, and because they were eminent for virtue. God is repeated thrice, to insinuate the mystery of the blessed Trinity, and to shew that the Lord watches over each individual, as if that one alone existed. M.

Ver. 8. Spacious, compared with that of Gessen. Chanaan was not above 210 miles long, and 70 broad. Brocard. S. Jerom does not allow so much. Hecateus says that the Jews had three million acres of excellent land.—Milk and honey are still very plentiful in Palestine, (C.) though the country has lost much of its ancient beauty and luxuriance, for want of cultivation. The Sam. and Sept. number the Gergesites among the rest of the Chanaanites.

Ver. 12. A sign. Moses had modestly represented his own inability to perform so great a work, and such God generally selects. He encourages them therefore with a sign, to the splendour of which he was then a witness; and with another, which should appear in future, to convince him and all the world, that the undertaking was from God, when they should see him offering sacrifice in that place, out of the reach of Pharaoh. C. 24:3. Thus a future event is assigned to Achaz and Ezechias, as a sign of something that was to happen first. Is. 7. 4 K. 19:29. Perhaps the sign here appointed is the presence of God enabling Moses to work miracles. M.

Ver. 13. His name. Many of them had embraced idolatry, and had forgotten God. Moses very properly begs to have his extraordinary mission sanctioned by miracles, without which he might well have been rejected, as heretics are. H.

Ver. 14. I am who am. That is, I am being itself, eternal, self-existent, independent, infinite; without beginning, end, or change; and the source of all other beings. Ch.—Heb. agrees with the Vulg. though it seems to read aeje, “I shall be,” &c. A. Lapide, &c.—No name can fully explain the divine perfections. As God is alone, he stands in need of no distinctive appellation, as Lactantius, and even the pagans have confessed. Orig. c. Cels. vi. C.—All other beings are just nothing, compared with God. He alone is self-existent and infinitely perfect. W.

Ver. 15. Memorial. By this title he is still known among Christians. M.—Hitherto God had generally been called Elohim. But now he assumes the incommunicable name (T.) consisting of four vowels, Jod, He, Vau, He, Jehovah, the essence, or OΩN, a word which the Greek Scriptures leave undeclined, to denote the unchangeable nature of the Deity. The word has been pronounced Jehovah by the moderns, and by the ancients Jevo, Jao, Jave, &c. H.

Ver. 16. Ancients. Perhaps there might be 72 magistrates already among the Hebrews, as there were afterwards in the desert (Grotius); or more probably they were only the chiefs of families, and leading men among their brethren, though without any public authority derived from the king of Egypt.—Visiting. So Joseph had foretold, Gen. 50:23. God examines before he punishes, Gen. 18:21. C.

Ver. 18. Called. Sam. and Sept. “hath been invoked upon us.” Heb. “hath occurred, or appeared to us.” H.—Journey, to Sinai, which was about this distance, to go straight. But the Israelites spent 48 days in arriving at it by a circuitous road. C.—In Heb. they ask, “Let us go, we beseech thee.” They do not tell a lie, but withhold the truth. M.

Ver. 21. Egyptians, among whom the Hebrews were forced to live, not being now allowed to enjoy the fertile country of Gessen alone, according to Joseph’s disposition. The subsequent kings altered that wise regulation. H.

Ver. 22. Shall spoil, &c. That is, you shall strip, and take away the goods of the Egyptians. This was not authorizing theft or injustice: but was a just disposal made by him, who is the great Lord and Master of all things; in order to pay the children of Israel some part of what was due to them from the Egyptians for their labours. Ch.—Wisdom (10:17) rendered to the just the wages of their labours; and (v. 19,) the just took the spoils of the wicked, in a just war. It is an ancient tradition of the Jews, that the Egyptians appealed to Alexander the Great for the recovery of these spoils; but when the Jews demanded their wages, they were willing to desist from their claims. Selden, de Ture vii. 8. Tert. c. Marcion ii. 20. C.—God had a mind to punish the extravagance of the Egyptians, while he enabled his people to appear with suitable presents before him. It was on this last plea that the Hebrews borrowed precious garments, gold, &c. H. See Clem. Strom. 1. S. Aug. q. 23.

Ver. 1. They, &c. Many of the common people, not of the ancients. C. 3:18. M.—He knew that all ought to bring credentials from God, when they come in his name to institute a new order of things. This Moses, Jesus Christ, and the apostles did. Nothing less than a miracle can suffice to guard against imposters, who will never be able to stand this test throughout, in such a manner, but that God will evidently confound their delusive designs, if they should even attempt to work miracles. H.—Believe the works. S. Jo. 10:15. Mar. 16. W.

Ver. 4. A rod. This alluded to the three states in which the Hebrews had lived in Egypt: 1. As holding the sceptre; 2. as persecuted in a crafty and cruel manner; and 3. as liberated by Moses. M.—The dragon was so terrible as to make even Moses flee. Philo.

Ver. 7. Again. When Moses first appeared in defence of his brethren, Pharaoh afflicted them more grievously; but at last he was forced to let them go. M.

Ver. 9. Blood. This third sign had the same tendency as the former. It showed the cruel persecution inflicted upon the Hebrews, particularly in drowning their male infants; a cruelty which God would shortly revenge, by turning the waters of Egypt into blood, and by slaying the first-born and the army of the Egyptians. T.

Ver. 10. Of tongue, being impressed with awe, at the divine presence. He feared, therefore, that he should not be able to deliver himself intelligently at the court of Pharaoh, and might rather excite the disgust of that haughty tyrant. H.—He had been 40 years absent in the land of Madian, and might have forgotten both the Egyptian and Hebrew languages in some degree; in which sense slowness or heaviness of tongue is taken, (Ezec. 3:5) to express an unknown language. C.—God was thus pleased to shew, that all the glory arising from this enterprize belonged to himself; and he thus also gave occasion to Moses to humble himself, while he wrought miracles. M.

Ver. 13. Send. Many of the fathers think Moses here prays for the coming of the Messias, who was to be the deliverer of his people; (S. Justin, &c.) or he begs at least that one more proper than himself may be selected; in which some discover marks of pusillanimity, others of great and laudable modesty; so that the anger of God here only means an earnest expression of his will, that Moses should make no further demur. Lyran supposes that Aaron was the person pointed at by Moses; and God grants his request. C.

Ver. 16. To God. Heb. “thou shalt be to him in the place of God.” He shall hear and obey thee, explaining to the people the instructions thou shalt give him. I have established thee the god of Pharaoh, and Aaron shall be thy prophet. C. 7:1. C.—I will address myself immediately to thee. T.

Ver. 17. Rod. So the devil taught Mercury and Bacchus to mimic Moses, and to carry a wand. Tum virgam capit, hac animas ille evocat orco. Virg. iv. C.

Ver. 19. Life. “After those many days were elapsed, the king of Egypt died,” who had obliged Moses to flee, as the Sept. Jos. and Philo add at the end of v. 18. Upon which God, who had already commissioned him to go, and saw him willing, gives him this further assurance that he has nothing to fear for his own person. H.

Ver. 21. I shall harden, &c. Not by being the efficient cause of his sin; but by withdrawing from him, for his just punishment, the dew of grace, that might have softened his heart; and so suffering him to grow harder and harder. Ch.—Non impertiendo misericordiam. S. Aug. ep. 194, ad Sixt. Thus God permitted the false miracles of the magicians, and did not suffer the scourges to continue long, so that the tyrant soon relapsed and forgot his promises. Orig. Philos. xx. Theod. in Rom. ix. 16. C.

Ver. 22. First-born, heir to my promises, and the object of my complacency.

Ver. 23. Thy son. This was the tenth and last scourge, which forced the king to relent. M.

Ver. 24. The Lord met him, and would have killed him. This was an angel representing the Lord, who treated Moses in this manner, for having neglected the circumcision of his younger son: which his wife understanding, circumcised her child upon the spot, upon which the angel let Moses go. Ch.—Both his children were born about this time. But Eliezer, the younger, had not been circumcised; and therefore remained under the power of the destroying angel. Orig. c. Cels. v. Others think the angel was going to kill Moses. C.

Ver. 25. Stone, like a flint. Such stones are very common in Egypt, and are used by the embalmers to open the side of the deceased. The Galli priests make themselves eunuchs without danger, by means of sharp stones. Plin. xxxv. 12. Josue 5 circumcises with the like. But any instrument will suffice. C.—Sephora seized the first thing that came in her way, to save the life of her husband, with whom God was displeased for this neglect of complying with the law, whatever might be his pretext. It was not fit that he should be a legislator, who was not a pattern of obedience. T.—Spouse. I have redeemed thee from destruction, by shedding the blood of my son; therefore I will deem this a ratification of our marriage. Never forget our union, which costs me so much, and which has placed you in such imminent danger. The Hebrew mothers style their newly circumcised infants bloody spouses, in imitation of Sephora, who on this occasion perhaps addresses the words to Eliezer. The Sept. read, “Sephora ... fell at his feet, and said, the blood of my son’s circumcision has ceased to flow,” &c. which is not very easy to understand.

Ver. 27. Of God. Horeb, where both brothers met, after Sephora was returned to her father.

Ver. 30. The three signs, prescribed above, in proof of their mission. C.

EXODUS 5

Ver. 1. Went in alone. Aaron was substituted instead of the ancients, chap. 3:16.—Pharao Amasis, Cenchres, or Amenophis. Usher.—Sacrifice, which is the principal part of a religious festival. M.

Ver. 2. The Lord. Is there anyone above me?

Ver. 3. Upon us. They include themselves in the common danger, in case of disobedience; and they admonish the king respectfully, that there is no resisting the God of the Hebrews with impunity.

Ver. 4. Get you. He knew not that Moses had been so long absent; and if he had known, he would not probably have treated him more mildly. H.

Ver. 5. Increased, the edict against children being abrogated. M.—He insists upon their labour being so intense and toilsome, as to thin their ranks.

Ver. 6. Overseers, natives of Egypt, who had under them some Hebrews for task-masters, as the people were more willing to obey them, v. 14.

Ver. 7. Straw, beaten small and mixed with clay, to make brick and mortar. See Ezech. 13:11. 15. Chardin, Perse ii. p. 76.

Ver. 8. Idle. Thus the impious speak of those who consecrate any part of their time to the service of God: and thus Protestants often condemn the holy-days prescribed by the Catholic Church!

Ver. 9. Lying words, alluding to the proposals of Moses. H.—Let them not spend their time in idle conversation. C.

Ver. 12. Straw. While some continued at the works, (M.) others went about the fields to gather up every grain of chaff and piece of straw which they could find.

Ver. 14. And they, the officers of the children of Israel, established over their brethren, as the Heb. more clearly insinuates, were scourged, or bastinadoed on the soles of the feet, as smaller faults are commonly punished in the East; (C.) or they were beaten also with rods, v. 16. H.

Ver. 16. Withal. Heb. “the fault is in thy own people,” who require impossibilities. C.—They throw the blame upon the king’s officers, (M.) though it was his own. H.

Ver. 21. Kill us. You are the occasion of our more cruel treatment. You have made the king have a bad opinion of us. Heb. “you have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh.” So Jacob said, (Gen. 34:30,) you have made me stink or become odious. Those who attempt to do a kindness, unsuccessfully, often experience a similar ingratitude. C. 14:11. M. It does not appear from the original, whether the officers or Moses was coming from the king’s presence. They met in some appointed place. C.

Ver. 22. Wherefore. These are not words of anger, but of earnest prayer. S. Aug. q. 14. Moses does not attempt to satisfy the exasperated officers, but commits the whole to God. M.—In great undertakings, there are commonly many difficulties; which ought not to discourage us. T.

Ver. 1. Said, in answer to his prayer.—Cast out, so eager he will be to have you dismissed, after he has repeatedly felt my hand. C. 3:19. H.

Ver. 3. My name Adonai. The name which is in the Hebrew text, is that most proper name of God, which signifieth his eternal self-existent being, (Exod. 3:14,) which the Jews, out of reverence, never pronounce; but instead of it, whenever it occurs in the Bible, they read Adonai, which signifies the Lord; and therefore they put the points or vowels, which belong to the name Adonai, to the four letters of that other ineffable name, Jod, He, Vau, He. Hence some moderns have framed the name Jehovah: unknown to all the ancients, whether Jews or Christians: for the true pronounciation of the name, which is in the Hebrew text, by long disuse, is now quite lost. Ch.—This name was first clearly revealed to Moses, that he might have confidence in his special protection and love. M.—To know one by his name is to treat him with familiarity and distinction. Ex. 33:17. The pronounciation of the name of God might be known to Abraham, &c. but it was not so fully explained, nor the power and excellence of it declared in such a stupendous manner, as it was to Moses. D.—Or perhaps Moses made use of this name in the history of the patriarchs, because he wrote his account of them after this revelation. C.—The Sept. always put Kurios, “the Lord,” instead of the ineffable name; and our Saviour and his apostles, citing text where it occurs, follow their example. Mat. 4:7, 10. Rom. 15:11. W.—Philo informs us, that it was death to pronounce it out of the temple, and since that was destroyed, it has never been heard. C.—Galatinus, who wrote in 1518, is supposed to have invented the word Jehovah, (see Amama Antib. p. 319,) the year after the pretended reformation began. H.—S. Jerom (ep. 136 ad Marc.) explains the ten names of God, but never reads Jehovah. T.

Ver. 7. God, Elohim, who will pass sentence in your favour, as a just judge. M.

Ver. 8. Hand; swearing. C. 14:22. 2 Esd. 9:15.

Ver. 9. Anguish: Sept. “pusillanimity.” They would not even hope for a change. M.—The Samaritan copy records the speech which they made to Moses. Kennicott, p. 313.

Ver. 12. Uncircumcised lips. So he calls the defect he had in his words, or utterance. Ch.—The Hebrews call the heart, &c. uncircumcised, when it has any natural or moral defect. Acts 7:15. T.—“I do not speak the language in its purity.” Sym. “I express my sentiments with difficulty.” C. 4:10. Onkelos.

Ver. 14. These. From this place to v. 26, is written in a kind of parentheses: the remainder of the chapter is a recapitulation of what had been said. C.—Moses intends to give his own genealogy, and the state of affairs when he began to afflict Egypt. H.—He mentions three tribes, which Jacob had rebuked, lest any one might think they had forfeited their title to some distinctive tribes. M.

Ver. 16. Levi died the last of his brethren, and Joseph the first. W.

Ver. 20. Aunt: Heb. Doda is applied to various degrees of kindred. The Chaldee says, Jochabed was daughter of Amram's sister, the Sept. assert of his brother, and consequently his own cousin. But she might be his aunt. C. 2:1. C.

Ver. 23. Nahason, prince of the tribe of Juda. Num. 1:7. Observe the modesty of Moses, who passes over his own family almost in silence. M.

Ver. 26. Aaron is sometimes placed first, as the elder; sometimes last, as inferior in dignity, v. 27.—Companies, or bands, in order of battle. C. 13:18. C.

EXODUS 7

Ver. 1. The God of Pharaoh, viz. to be his Judge; and to exercise a divine power, as God's instrument, over him and people. Ch.—Artapanus says, Moses was afterwards adored by the Egyptians.—Prophet, or interpreter. Thou shalt reveal my orders to him. C.—Moses participated in the divine nature, as judge, priest, prophet, &c. W.

Ver. 3. I shall harden, &c.; not by being the efficient cause of his hardness of heart, but by permitting it; and by withdrawing grace from him, in punishment of his malice; which alone was the proper cause of his being hardened. Ch.—He took occasion even from the miracles to become more obdurate. H.—Yet Pharaoh was less impious than Calvin, for he takes the sin to himself. C. 9:27. T.

Ver. 10. Took, or “threw down,” as the Heb. and Sept. read.

Ver. 11. Magicians. Jannes and Mambres, or Jambres. 2 Tim. 3:8. Ch.—The pagans represented Moses as the greatest of magicians. (Plin. xxx. 1. Justin xxxvi.—They also, &c. Heb. has three terms, “wise men, diviners, and magicians;” but the two last seem to be of the same import. “The enchanters did the like by their secret practices,” either by words or by actions. Some say these operations were real; others affirm they were only apparent, and mere delusions. C.—“Whoever believes that any thing can be made, or any creature changed or transmuted into another species or appearance, except by the Creator himself, is undoubtedly an infidel, and worse than a pagan.” Coun. of Orange. See S. Aug. q. 21, de Trin. iii. 7.; S. Tho. ii. 2. q. 17. a 2.—The devil deceived the senses of the beholders; or brought real serpents, &c. thither. M.

Ver. 12. Devoured. Thus the superiority remained with Aaron. The rod was then restored to its pristine form, v. 15. H.

Ver. 17. My hand. The rod was in the hand of Moses, but he was God’s agent. M.

Ver. 18. River. The Samaritan copy repeats here the very words of God to Pharaoh, as the other speeches are also twice put at length. “Moses and Aaron went to meet Pharaoh, and said to him, ‘The Lord,’ ” &c. as v. 16, 18. See C. 11:7. C.—This is very agreeable to the style of Homer; and Kennicott believes that the repetitions have been omitted in the Hebrew for brevity’s sake, (Diss. 1 Chron. p. 383,) and that before the Greek version had been made. H.

Ver. 21. All the land, even in that of Gessen, which belonged to the Egyptians; while the Hebrews had good water. M.

Ver. 22. Like. They got a small quantity of water, either from the sea, from Gessen, (Wisd. 11:5,) or by digging wells, v. 24. C.—This plague lasted a full week, v. 25. The water which they found in the mean time in the wells was mixed with blood, Philo. S. Aug. in Ps. lxxvii. Wisdom 11:7, thou gavest human blood to the unjust.

Ver. 3. Frogs, not by a new creation; but the spawn was miraculously brought to maturity. C.—Angels, or a divine instinct, brought them to infest all places; and thus they became a more grievous plague than that of blood. M.

Ver. 4. Servants. The Abderites and Dardanians were formerly obliged to abandon their country by such a plague. Orosius iii. 23. Plin. viii. 29. C.—Here the Samaritan copy adds, that Moses delivered this message to Pharaoh. H.

Ver. 7. Frogs, few in number, and brought by the ministry of devils. M.

Ver. 8. Pray ye to the Lord, &c. By this it appears, that though the magicians, by the help of the devil, could bring frogs, yet they could not take these away: God being pleased to abridge in this the power of Satan. So we see they could not afterwards produce the lesser insects; and in this restraint of the power of the devil, were forced to acknowledge the finger of God.

Ver. 9. A time. Moses thus prevents the king from attributing their departure to natural causes. Pharaoh was perhaps inclined to suspect this would be the case, and therefore had a mind to wait till the morrow. M.

Ver. 14. Corrupted. This helped to produce the ensuing plague of flies, &c. C.—The Egyptians might then recollect the putrid carcasses of the children, whom they had drowned. H.

Ver. 15. Pharaoh hardened his own heart. By this we see that Pharaoh was himself the efficient cause of his heart being hardened, and not God. See the same repeated in ver. 32. Pharaoh hardened his heart at this time also; likewise chap. 9:7, 35, and chap. 13:15. Ch.—This is the constant doctrine of the holy fathers. S. Aug. ser. 88. de temp. q. 18. 28. 36. S. Basil, orat. “that god is not the author of evil.” S. Chrys. hom. 67. in Jo. &c. Hence Origen, periar. 3. says, “The Scripture sheweth manifestly that Pharaoh was hardened by his own will; for God said to him, thou wouldst not: if thou wilt not dismiss Israel.” Even the priests of the Philistines were so well convinced of this, that they said, (1 K. 6:6,) Why do you harden your hearts? God therefore hardened them only by not absolutely hindering their wickedness, and by punishing them with less severity, as they did not deserve to be corrected like dear children, Hebrews 12.—Perdition is from thyself. Ose. 12:9. Thus God cast Pharaoh into the sea, by permitting, not by forcing, him to enter. Ex. 15:4. How shocking must then the blasphemous doctrine of Zuinglius, (ser. de provid. 5.) Calvin, (Instit. 8. 17,) &c. appear, who attribute every wicked deed to God, though they pretend at the same time that he is not unjust, even when he commands and impels a man to commit murder or adultery! Idem facinus puta adulterium ... quantum Dei est auctoris, motoris, impulsoris opus est, crimen non est; quantum hominis est, crimen ac scelus est. Zuing. sup. The light of reason may suffice to confute such absurdity. W.

Ver. 16. Sciniphs, or Cinifs, Hebrew Cinnim, small flying insects, very troublesome both to men and beasts. Ch.—Like midges. Origen, hom. 4. Others think they were lice. Bochart. Pharaon is not forewarned of this plague.

Ver. 18. Practiced, fecerunt; the same expression as v. 7: whence some argue, that the former were delusions, not real changes. H.—God was pleased to shew here the vanity of their attempts, and the imbecility of the devil, who could not even bring a single animalcule or insect, though he had before appeared to work great wonders. T.

Ver. 19. Finger, the spirit, (Lu. 11:20 comp. Matt. 12:28,) or power of God. Is. 40:12. The magicians here confess, that Moses is something more than themselves. C.—Thus God interferes, whenever a contest of miracles, real or apparent, might lead any sincere seeker astray. He caused the priests of Baal to be confounded; (3 K. 19,) and Simon Magus, flying in the air, was hurled down at the prayer of S. Peter. Hegesip. Cyrola, the Arian patriarch, attempting to deceive the people, by giving sight to a man whom he bribed to feign himself blind; and Calvin, who wished to have the honour of raising a man to life, at Geneva, by the like imposition, were both deservedly covered with confusion; while, of those unhappy men who joined in the collusion, one lost his sight, and the other his life. Greg. of Tours ii. Hist. 3. Bolsec. On such occasions, we are admonished to be on our guard, and to adhere to the old religion. Deut. 13. Matt. 24. W.—The magicians, though fully convinced, were not still converted.

Ver. 21. Flies. Heb. earob. Sept. “dog-flies.” Some include under this plague all sorts of wild beasts. Josep. ii. 13. Wisd. 11:9, 16, 18. Insects are very troublesome, and the pagans honoured Jupiter with the title of Apomuioi, because he delivered them from flies. Beelzebub, “the god-fly,” got his name for the same reason. 4 K. 1:1. C.

Ver. 22. Gessen, where the Hebrews dwelt. The Egyptians who lived among them would not, however, escape this plague.

Ver. 23. Be. Here again the Sam. copy observes, that Moses told this to Pharaoh. H.

Ver. 24. The Lord, without the intervention of the rod, lest any inherent power might be supposed to rest in it. M.—Corrupted, ravaged; men and beasts being destroyed by their bite or sting. Ps. 77:45. Wisd. 16:9.

Ver. 26. The abominations, &c. That is, the things they worship for gods: oxen, rams, &c. It is the usual style of the Scriptures to call all idols and false gods, abominations; to signify how much the people of God ought to detest and abhor them. Ch.—The Egyptians adored the stars, and even the vilest creatures, on account of some advantage which they derived from them. Cicero, N. Deor. i. They sometimes sacrificed animals; though, at first, “they offered only prayer and incense.” Macrobian. Satur. i. 7. Gen. 43:16. Their belief in the transmigration of souls, perhaps, induced them to abstain from the immolation of beasts. C.

Ver. 32. Hardened. Heb. and Sept. “Pharao hardened his heart for this time also.” M.

EXODUS 9

Ver. 3. My hand. God inflicts the fourth, fifth, and tenth plagues without Moses.

Ver. 5. Land. Moses related all this to the king, according to the Samaritan copy.

Ver. 6. All the beasts. That is, many of all kinds. Ch.—So it is said, (Jer. 9:26,) all the nations are uncircumcised, though some few observed the rite of circumcision with the Jews. H.

Ver. 7. Hardened. He did not beg for a deliverance, as the beasts were dead. M.

Ver. 9. Blains. Pestiferous buboes or burning swellings. C.—Thus were the pride and luxury of the Egyptians punished by Moses; and they who had kept the Hebrews in an iron furnace, were themselves scorched with fiery ashes and ulcers. M.

Ver. 11. Stand before to oppose Moses. They could not screen themselves. H.

Ver. 12. Hardened, &c. See the annotations above, chap. 5:21, chap. 7:3, and chap. 8:15. Ch.—The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins, condemneth: but ignominy and reproach follow him. Prov.

Ver. 14. Plagues of fire and hail, that thy heart may relent. But as all my chastisements will not produce this effect, I will be glorified in thy fall. H.—I could now strike thee dead; (v. 15,) but I reserve thee for a more dreadful punishment, (v. 17,) in the waters of the Red Sea. C.

Ver. 15. Pestilence, or various evils which now came fast upon Pharaoh. M.

Ver. 16. Raised thee to the throne, or preserved thee hitherto from the former plagues. God disposes of things in such a manner, as to draw good out of the evil designs of men. S. Aug. de C. D. xi. 17. Rom. 9:17. C.

Ver. 19. Cattle. Some had escaped the former plague, or the Egyptians had purchased more from their neighbours, and in the land of Gessen. H.—God tempers justice with mercy. S. Aug. q. 33.—Die. This message was accordingly delivered to Pharaoh. Sam. copy. H.

Ver. 24. In all the land of. So the Heb.: but the Sam. and some Heb. MSS. have simply in Egypt. Ken.—Founded, about 627 years before. Hence it appears, that the rain falls in some parts of Egypt, (M.) particularly about Tanis, v. 18, 34. C. Wisd. 16:17.

Ver. 32. Lateward. The hail fell in February. Bonfrere Aristophanes (in Avibus) says, the Egyptians and Phenicians have their harvest when the cuckoo begins to sing. The month Nisan, which answers to part of March and April, was honoured with the first fruits. C. 13:4. M.

Ver. 35. Hard. Heb. “and he hardened his heart.” W.

Ver. 1. Servants. They took occasion, from God’s withdrawing his chastisements, to become more obdurate. S. Aug. q. 30. and 36.

Ver. 7. Scandal, or source of repeated misery; whether they meant their own resistance to God’s orders, or Moses, with the Hebrew nation. C.

Ver. 9. *Herd*s. Out of which the Lord may choose what victims he requires. M.—The people of Egypt kept solemnities of this description. Herod. ii. 58, 59.

Ver. 10. So be. A form of imprecation mixed with scorn: as, I shall not let you go, so may God abandon you. C.

Ver. 11. Desired. Moses had requested that all might go. He had not specified the men only, as the king boldly asserts. M.—A partial obedience will not rescue him from the threatened plague. H.

Ver. 13. Wind from “the south,” (Sept.) or “east,” (Kadim) or perhaps blowing from the south-east. Bonfrere. The locusts would come from Ethiopia, or from Arabia, in both which countries they abound. Ludolf, &c. They lay their eggs in autumn, and hatch in spring. Frequently they devastate one country after another. They are very large in the East, and sometimes will fasten upon the heads of serpents, and destroy them, as they did on this occasion the Egyptians. Wisd. 16:9.—In Cyrene, bordering upon Egypt, it is requisite to encounter these creatures thrice in the year. C. See Lev. 11:22.

Ver. 14. Hereafter. Joel 1:2, speaking of locusts which infested Judea, uses the same expressions to denote a very heavy judgment. Two events never perfectly agree. C.

Ver. 17. Also. Heb. “only,” and I will amend.—Death, or plague. M.

Ver. 18. Moses. The printed Heb. and Chal. do not read his name; but some MSS. have it agreeably to the Sept. and Syr. versions. Ken.

Ver. 19. West. Heb. sea, (Mediterranean) to the north and west of Egypt.—Red sea. Heb. “of suph,” or green herbs, which abound there. It has also a reddish appearance in some places, from the coral branches of a saffron colour. It probably was called red from Edom, or Erythros, the son of Isaac. C.—God drowned the locusts in this sea, by means of the wind, which often proves the destruction of those animals. Plin. xi. 29.

Ver. 21. Darkness upon the land of Egypt so thick that it may be felt. By means of the gross exhalations, which were to cause and accompany the darkness. Ch.—Thus were the Egyptians punished for keeping the Hebrews in dark prisons. M.—Philo says, even a lighted lamp or fire was extinguished. The Egyptians were affrighted with hideous spectres and evil angels. Ps. 77:49. Wisd. 17:4.

Ver. 29. More. Of my own accord. M.—Thou wilt send for me. C.

Ver. 1. To Moses, before he was gone out from Pharaoh. M.—This revelation had been made at Mount Horeb. Calmet places the three first verses within a parenthesis; and the fourth, &c. he supposes that Moses addressed to the king at the last interview. C. 10:29. Kennicott maintains, that the Samaritan copy preserves the unity of this awful transaction almost in its original perfection, by preserving the speech of God to Moses, part of which the Hebrew seems to address to Pharaoh.

Ver. 2. Ask; “not borrow,” as the Protestants translate; nor “jewels of silver,” but vessels, such as the princes offered at the dedication of the tabernacle, Num. 7. The Sam. and Sept. add “and raiment,” which they also asked for, (C. 12:35,) according to God’s command. C. 3:22. Kenn. 1. Dis. p. 391.

Ver. 3. The Lord. The Sam. makes this a continuation of God’s speech, “and I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they shall give them what they ask.—4. For, about midnight, I will go forth into the midst of the land of Egypt.—5. And every first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, &c. (as in our fifth verse.—6. And there, &c.—7. But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue against man, nor even against beast, that thou mayest know that Jehovah doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel.—8. And thou also shall be greatly honoured in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh’s servants, and in the sight of the people.—9. Then said Moses unto Pharaoh, Thus sayeth Jehovah: Israel is my son, my first-born; and I said unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me.—10. But thou hast refused to let him go; behold! therefore Jehovah slayeth thy son, thy first-born.”—5. And Moses said, (as above, v. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.) The Jews have retained the parts of the 3d and 8th verses, which were honourable to their nation, but they have given them as an historical narration. The 9th and 10th verses in the Sam. copy, record what God had before commanded Moses to declare. C. 4:22, 31. As, therefore, all had been once written in the Heb. text, the transcribers might probably think themselves dispensed from repeating the same things; and thus they might change some passages, and still repel the accusation of any wilful corruption, which seems to be the meaning of Ben Chaim’s preface to Bromberg’s Heb. Bible; where he acknowledges 13 such alterations made in the copies which were presented to King Ptolemy, and translated by the Sept. Ken. Dis. 2. p. 310.—Moses. This exaltation of Moses and the people took place only after the slaughter of the first-born. C. 12:36. Hence the Sept. observes here, the Egyptians gave or lent to them (echresan) all. H.—The greatness and dignity of Moses, impressed the king with awe, and made the people more willing to assist the Hebrews. M.

Ver. 4. I will enter, by means of a good angel, (Wisd. 18:14. S. Chrys.) or by evil angels. Ps. 77:49. S. Aug. ibid. C.—Moses spoke this on the morning of the 14th Nisan; and that same night, after the paschal lamb had been eaten, the dreadful carnage commenced. M.

Ver. 5. Mill. The vilest slaves were thus employed in a sort of prison. C. 12:21. God makes no distinction between the king and the beggar. Death levels all.

Ver. 7. Dog. They shall enjoy a profound peace, (Judith 11:5,) while Egypt is in tears. Calmet here inserts the speech from the Samaritan copy, “And the man Moses;” &c. (v. 3 and seq.) deeming it essential to the context, and very agreeable to the spirit of Moses, who has many repetitions. H.

Ver. 9. Angry, at such obstinacy. M.

Ver. 10. The Lord hardened, &c. See the annotations above, chap. 4:21 and chap. 7:3.

Ver. 1. Said, some time before. Moses mentions all the plagues together. M.

Ver. 2. Year, sacred or ecclesiastical, which is most commonly used in Scripture. The civil year commenced with Tisri, in September, and regulated the jubilee, contracts, &c. Lapidé—January was the first month to determine the age of trees, and August to decide when cattle became liable to be tithed. C. 22:29. Levit. 19:23. C.—Before the captivity, the months were not styled Nisan, &c. but abib, (C. 13:4,) the first ... Bul the 11th, (1 K. 6.), &c. Sa.

Ver. 3. Children; a word which has been dropped in the printed Heb. and in the Chaldee, which has been assimilated to it, though found still in some MSS. and in the Sam. Sept. Syr. and Arab. versions. Ken.—Day. This regarded only the present occasion. Jonathan.—The Jews no longer eat the paschal lamb, as they are banished from Chanaan. C.—Man, who has a family sufficient to eat a lamb; Heb. se, which means also a kid, (as either was lawful, v. 13,) and perhaps also a calf. Deut. 16:2.

Ver. 4. Less. Moses does not specify the number. But in never comprised fewer than ten, nor more than twenty, in which number Menoch does not think women or children are comprised. The Jews satisfied the inquiry of Cestius, concerning the multitude which might be assembled at the paschal solemnity, by allowing ten for every victim; and finding that 250,600 victims had been sacrificed in the space of two hours, they concluded 2,700,000 people were collected at Jerusalem. Josep. Bel. vii. 16.

Ver. 5. Lamb. Heb. se, which denotes the young of either sheep or goats. Kimchi. He who had not a lamb, was to sacrifice a kid. Theodoret.—A kid. The Phase might be performed, either with a lamb or with a kid; and all the same rites and ceremonies were to be used with the one as with the other. Ch.—Many have asserted, that both were to be sacrificed. But custom decides against them. All was to be perfect, Momim, as even the pagans required; (Grotius) and God (Lev. 22:22,) orders the victims in general must have no fault. The Egyptians rejected them, if they were even spotted, or twins.—A male, as all holocausts were to be. Pagans gave the preference to females. C.—One year, not older, though it would do if above eight days old. M.—The paschal lamb prefigured Jesus Christ, who has redeemed us by his death, being holy, set apart, and condescending to feed us with his sacred person, in the blessed Eucharist. Here we eat the lamb without breaking a bone, though we take the whole victim. Jo. 19:36. 1 Cor. 5:7. C.—To fulfil this figure, Christ substituted his own body, and, making his apostles priests, ordered them to continue this sacrifice for ever. He came to Jerusalem on the 10th day of Nisan, on Sunday. He gave himself to his disciples on the evening of the 14th, and died at noon on the 15th. The unleavened bread, and the cup, (Lu. 22:17,) clearly denoted the blessed Sacrament, which was ordered to be eaten in the house or church of God. S. Cyp. Unit. See S. Greg. hom. 22. in Evang. Tert. c. Marc. iv. “The bread he made his own body.” If, therefore, the truth must surpass the figure, surely the blessed Sacrament must be more than bread and wine; otherwise it would yield in excellence and signification to the paschal lamb. W.

Ver. 6. Sacrifice, not simply kill, as the Protestants would have it. W.—Evening. Heb. “between the two evenings,” or “suns,” according to the Chaldee, alluding to the sun when it declines and when it sets, including about the space of two hours. This time belonged to the evening of the 14th, at which time the lamb was to be sacrificed, though it was to be eaten in the night, which pertained to the 15th. M.—The Jews began the day at sun-set, and some began the first evening soon after mid-day. Matt. 14:15 and seq. C.

Ver. 7. Houses. Those who joined their neighbours to eat the paschal lamb, were therefore to continue with them that night, if they would escape destruction, v. 23. M.

Ver. 8. Unleavened, in testimony of innocence, 1 Cor. 5:7. The priests of Jupiter did the like. Servius.—Lettuce, or some “bitter herbs.” Heb. and Sept. The Jews allow of five sorts.

Ver. 9. Raw. Some nations delighted in raw flesh, in the feasts of Bacchus, who hence received the title of Omados. Porphy. de Abstin. 3. The Heb. term na occurs no where else, and may perhaps signify half-roasted or boiled, semicoctum. It cannot be inferred from this prohibition, that the Hebrews commonly lived on such food.—In water, as the other victims usually were, 1 K. 2:13. 2 Par. 35:13.—You shall eat, is not in the original, nor in the Sept. We may supply it, however, or “you shall roast all, head,” &c. but in eating, you shall avoid breaking any bone, as the Sept. and Syr. express it, (v. 10,) and as we read, v. 46, and Num. 9:12. These were to be burnt, that they might not be profaned. C.

Ver. 11. Haste, as all the aforesaid prescriptions intimate. M.—Many of them regarded only this occasion, and were not required afterwards.—Phase, which the Chaldee writes Pascha, signifies the passing over (C.) of the destroying angel, when he spared those houses only which were marked with blood, to insinuate the necessity of faith in Christ’s death. Some have derived the word from the Greek Pascho, “to suffer,” on account of the similarity of sound. H.

Ver. 12. First-born, often denotes the most beloved; or, when spoken of those under oppression, the most miserable. Is. 14:30. Ps. 88:27. Moses observes, (v. 30,) that every house had one dead, which would not probably be true of the first-born, taken in a literal sense; but where there was no child, there the most dear and honourable person was cut off. Hab. 3:13, 14.—Gods, idols, whose statues some assert were overthrown (S. Jer. ep. ad Fabiol. Euseb. præp. ix. ult.); or sacred animals, which were adored by the Egyptians; (Origen) or the word may imply that the princes and judges of the land would be mostly destroyed. C.—Forbes observes, that by the destruction of the first-born, all the proper sacrifices, and priests of Egypt, were destroyed.

Ver. 14. This day. The Jews assert, that as their fathers were delivered out of Egypt on the 15th of Nisan, so Israel will be redeemed on that day by the Messias; which has been literally verified in Jesus Christ.—Everlasting. This is what will be done with respect to our Christian passover, (C.) of which the Jewish was a figure, designed to subsist as long as their republic. M.

Ver. 15. Perish, either by sudden death, or by forfeiting all the prerogatives of God's people; (v. 19) or, his offense shall be deemed mortal. See Gen. 17:14. The punishment of Kerith, separation, among the Jews, bore some resemblance to our excommunication. These menaces presuppose, that the law is possible, and that the land of Chanaan be in the possession of the Jews. Thus, the people who were not circumcised during the 40 years' sojournment in the desert, were not liable to this punishment of separation, as they knew not when the cloud would move, and they would have to march.

Ver. 16. Eating. On the sabbath, meat was not even to be prepared. C. 16:23. During the five intermediate days, any work might be done.

Ver. 17. Bread. Heb. matsoth. But the Sam. and Sept. read Motsue, precept, or ordinance. C.

Ver. 18. Unleavened bread. By this it appears, that our Saviour made use of unleavened bread, in the institution of the blessed Sacrament, which was on the evening of the paschal solemnity, at which time there was no unleavened bread to be found in Israel.

Ver. 19. Stranger. Heb. ger, signifies also a proselyte. M. See v. 43.—Only those men who had been circumcised were allowed to eat the Phase. Women, belonging to the Hebrews, might partake of it. The unclean were excluded. C.

Ver. 22. Hyssop; Heb. ezob: which some translate rosemary. M.—Sprinkle, &c. This sprinkling the doors of the Israelites with the blood of the paschal lamb, in order to their being delivered from the sword of the destroying angel, was a lively figure of our redemption by the blood of Christ. Ch.—S. Jerom, in Is. lxvi. says the doors were to be sprinkled in the form of a cross.

Ver. 24. Children; twelve years old. Lu. 2:42. M.—Ever. Sam. adds, “in this month.”

Ver. 27. Victim, sacrificed upon the altar, in honour of the passage, &c. It was a true “sacrifice of propitiation,” as the Arab. translates, and of thanksgiving. C.

Ver. 30. Pharao, who it seems was not the eldest son. Where the first-born of a family had a son, both were consigned to destruction. M.

Ver. 32. Bless me, by exposing me to no further danger by your stay.

Ver. 34. Leavened; which dough afterwards made unleavened ember-cakes. Heb. “and misharoth (a word which the Vulg. does not translate) provisions” of flour, &c. v. 39. Josep. ii. 6.—This flour might be tied up in their cloaks, as they were only square pieces of cloth. Ruth 3:15. C.

Ver. 36. The Egyptians, who afterwards, pursuing them unjustly, put it out of their power to restore, if they had not been otherwise dispensed with by God. H.

Ver. 37. Ramesse. The first of the 42 stations or encampments of the Hebrews. M.—Socoth, or tents, perhaps the scenæ of Antoninus, or the Mischenot, mentioned C. 1:11.—About. Moses does not speak with such precision, as after the people had been numbered, and were found, 13 months after, to be 603,550 men, without the Levites, or those under 20 years. C.—Women and old men, and Egyptians, who joined their company, might make them amount to three millions. M.

Ver. 40. Egypt. Sam. and Sept. add, “and in the land of Chanaan, they and their fathers,” dating from the departure of Abraham from Haran in his 75th year; from which period, till Jacob’s going into Egypt, 215 years elapsed. Kennicott produces this instance, as a proof that the Hebrew text is defective: Dis. 1. p. 399. Josephus ii. 15. S. Aug. q. 47. and others, admit this addition as genuine; which, however we have observed on Genesis, is rejected by Ayrolus, Tournemine, &c. H.

Ver. 42. Observable, in which the Lord has been our sentinel and preserver. Vatab.

Ver. 48. Dwell, or become a proselyte, by circumcision, if a male; or by baptism, if a female; receiving a sort of new-birth. Jo. 3:10. The Jews would not suffer any to dwell among them, who would not observe the seven precepts given to Noe. Gen. 9. But the proselytes of justice embraced the Jewish religion. C.

Ver. 2. Sanctify unto me every first-born. Sanctification in this place means, that the first-born males of the Hebrews should be deputed to the ministry in the divine worship: and the first-born of beasts to be given for a sacrifice. Ch.—Sanctify, set apart. M.—Openeth, the first male fruit of the womb. If a female was born the first, none of the children were to be redeemed. Lu. 2:23. Jesus Christ submitted to this law; though many of the fathers have asserted that, on account of his miraculous conception and birth, he was not subjected to it; while others maintain the contrary.

Ver. 4. Corn. Heb. Abib; which was styled Nisan after the Babylonian captivity. At this time, peculiar names were not yet given to the months, by the Hebrews or Egyptians. C.—They were distinguished by their respective order, productions, or appearances. H.

Ver. 5. When. These regulations did not therefore take place in the desert. M.

Ver. 9. And it, &c. The festivals appointed by God and his Church, naturally remind us of the favours which we have received, and help us to meditate on the law. H.—The Jews, understanding the precept literally, write verses taken from this chapter, and Deut. 6 and 11 upon parchment, and bind these tephilins, or phylacteries, on their forehead. But if these scrolls were requisite, why do they not also put them in their mouth and in their heart? Jesus Christ condemns the vanity of the Pharisees, who wore these bandages extremely large. Matt. 23:5. The Mahometans teach their scholars, by writing the Coran upon a tablet, and exposing it to their view: (C.) a plan lately introduced in England with great success by Mr. Lancaster.

Ver. 13. Price. No other option is given, as the Levites were selected for the ministry. H.—The first offspring of impure animals, were to be redeemed or killed; those of the pure were to be offered in sacrifice. Num. 18:15. Philo. Dogs, cats, poultry, &c. were to be slain. Deut. 23:18. C.

Ver. 14. To-morrow. At any future period. Matt. 6:2. M.

Ver. 15. Hardened. Heb. “by himself,” or by his own malice. W.

Ver. 16. It. This ordinance shall cause thee never to forget the goodness of God. H.

Ver. 17. Lest. God maketh use of precautions, to shew the free-will of man. W.—The Philistines had before made a great slaughter of the Ephraimites, 1 Par. 7:21. The Chanaanites would also be ready to oppose the Hebrews, if they had attempted to enter by the road of Pelusium, and perhaps the Idumeans and Amalecites also would have met them in front, while the Egyptians attacked their rear. C.—This journey, Philo says, would not have taken up above three days. The battle with Amalec took place only 40 days afterwards, and God protected his people. M.

Ver. 18. Armed, in order of battle. Heb. chamushim, “by fives,” or in five battalions. Jos. 1:14. Jud. 8:11. C.—Calvin asks where the Hebrews could procure arms, as if to cavil with this translation. But surely they might get them in the same manner as the vessels of gold; and they undoubtedly were not destitute of arms when they encountered the Amalecites, v. 17. H.

Ver. 19. Joseph's. This attention to the dead is commended. Heb. 11. W.—S. Stephen assures us, that the bones of the other patriarchs were deposited at Sichen; and we may conclude, that they were transported on this occasion by their respective families. Acts 7:16.

Ver. 20. Etham. A city on the banks of the Red Sea, giving its name to one of the gulphs, which the Greeks called after the city of Heropolis. Plin. vi. 29. The Sept. translate, “They encamped at Othon, which is near the desert;” and (Num. 32:6,) the Hebrews marched three days in the desert of Buthan, before they arrived at Mara.

Ver. 22. Never. From the station of Etham; or, if we follow S. Jerom, from that of Socoth, or even from Ramesses, according to Bonfrere, till the passage of the Jordan, when the ark supplied its want. Jos. 3:11. This cloud assumed different appearances, as the exigencies of the Hebrews required. It was a figure of baptism; (1 Cor. 10:1) the fire designated Jesus Christ, and the cloud the Holy Ghost. S. Amb. de sac. 6. C.

Ver. 1. Beelsephon, means “the lord of the watch-tower.” Some think an idol was thus denominated, whose office it was to prevent people from quitting the country. How vain were his efforts against God’s people!

Ver. 3. In. Between craggy mountains and the Red Sea. H.

Ver. 4. And he will. Protestants falsely translate, “that he may,” &c. contrary to the Heb. and other versions. W.

Ver. 6. People, fit for war, who could be got ready on such short warning. Ezechiel (ap. Eus.) makes the number amount to a million.

Ver. 7. Captains. Sept. “Tristatas.” Three men rode on every chariot, which was armed with scythes, to cut down all that came within contact, the chief warrior, with his armour bearer and charioteer. S. Greg. Nys. H.—Or these three captains may very probably be the three chief officers of state, (C.) or the generals of cavalry, and of infantry, and the chief treasurer, or receiver of taxes, principes equitum peditumque erant, & tributorum. S. Jer.

Ver. 8. Hand. Without any dread. Num. 15:30. C.—All the army of Egypt could do nothing against them. Yet presently, at their approach, the Hebrews were suffered to fall into dismay, that they might learn not to confide in their multitudes, and might pray with greater earnestness for protection, v. 10.

Ver. 12. Wilderness. This is the language of dastardly souls. They had begun to be almost in love with their chains. Every difficulty gives them occasion to repine at the gracious purposes of God, and the exertions of his servant Moses. But God bears patiently with the defects of a carnal and long-oppressed nation. H. v. 13.—The wiser sort pray to God, while others thus upbraid Moses.

Ver. 13. Ever. They saw their floating carcasses the following morning. Heb. “you shall not see the Egyptians any more as you see them at present.” They were not in the same condition.

Ver. 14. Peace. You will not have to draw a sword. The Syriac subjoins, “Therefore Moses cried unto the Lord,” which connects this with the following verse. C.

Ver. 15. Criest.—“A vehement desire is a cry, which reaches the ears of the Lord.” S. Bern.

Ver. 17. To pursue. God did not restrain the perverse will of the Egyptians; but suffered them to be guided by their blind passions, and to rush presumptuously into the bed of the sea. If the retiring of its waters had been owing to any natural cause, this wise nation could not be ignorant but that, at the stated time, the ebbing would cease, and consequently that they would be overtaken by the waters. But the waters stood up like walls on both sides, and they were so infatuated as to suppose that the miracle would be continued for their protection. H.

Ver. 20. A dark cloud, and enlightening the night. It was a dark cloud to the Egyptians; but enlightened the night to the Israelites, by giving them a great light.

Ver. 21. Wind. This served to dry up the sandy channel of the Red Sea, which was mixed with mud and weeds. It blew from the east, Kodim, or from Arabia.—Divided, some say into 12 parts or divisions, Ps. 135:13. But the words of the psalmist may be verified by the sea opening a spacious passage, such as was requisite for so many millions to travel through, (H.) e.g. a distance of perhaps 18 miles, in so short a space of time. Silara Adrichomius thinks the breadth of the division would not be less than nine miles.

Ver. 24. Watch. About four o'clock. The Hebrews divided the night into three equal parts, (C.) or four, consisting each of three hours, (M.) which varied in length as the night was longer. H.—Slew many by his thunderbolts, as Artapanus relates, and the Scripture elsewhere insinuates. C. 15:6, 12. Ps. 76:16, 18. Josep. ii. 7.

Ver. 25. Lord. thus they reluctantly confess his might, and are forced to glory Him in their destruction. Their change is only the effect of fear and temporal danger, v. 18. H.

Ver. 31. Sea-shore. The Hebrews would thus again be enriched by their spoils. C.—Servant. Those who believe God, submit to the directions of his ambassadors. S. Jerom in Philem. 5. In this merited catastrophe of the Egyptians, which fixed the last seal to the mission of Moses, the fathers contemplate how God's servants are rescued by baptism, and by the merits of Jesus Christ, from Satan and from all sin. 1 Cor. 10:1, 4. Orig. hom. 5. H.

Ver. 1. Canticle. Origen reckons this to be the most ancient piece of poetry. It is truly sublime, and calculated to fill the souls of those, who say their late cruel masters, now prostrate at their feet in death, with sentiments of the greatest gratitude and piety towards their almighty benefactor. H.—God miraculously gave utterance to the dumb on this occasion, (Widsom 10:21.) and taught the whole congregation of Israel to join in harmonious concert. (De Mirab. S. S. inter. op. S. Aug.) This mode of perpetuating the memory of past benefits by canticles, is very common in Scripture. C.—Let us sing. So the Sept. The Heb. has “I will sing ... for he hath triumphed gloriously.” This canticle was composed by Moses, about 1491 years B.C. H.

Ver. 2. Praise. The printed Heb. is here irregular, but some MSS. agree with the Vulg. Chal. and Arab. Ken. i. p. 400.—To him my praise is due on all titles. H.—God. Hebrew el, “the strong one.” M.

Ver. 3. The Lord. Sept. “breaking wars in pieces,” a man of war, a conqueror. C.—Almighty. Jehova, I am. This is the most awful and incommunicable name. H.

Ver. 4. Captains. Lit. Princes. Heb. shalishim, chiefs. The three great officers. C. 14:7. We find three were entrusted with the highest power in the empire of Chaldea, (Ezec. 23:15. Dan. 5:7) as well as at the court of David. 2 K. 23:8. 1 Par. 11:10. Hadino, Eleazar, and Semma, had various other princes under them. C.

Ver. 7. Wrath. A tempest of lightning. See Isai. 63:11. Habac. 3:15.

Ver. 8. Together. “Congealed on either side,” as the Chal. and Sept. express it. C.

Ver. 9. Enemy. Miracles make but small impression upon the wicked. They pursue their schemes of destruction, which end in their own ruin!—Slay. Heb. “despoil.” Sept. “bring them into subjection.” H.

Ver. 10. Wind. Sept. “spirit,” which S. Amb. and S. Aug. understand as the Holy Ghost. C.

Ver. 11. Who ... Lord. The initials of these four Hebrew letters, which the Maccabees placed on their banners, (m c b i) probably gave that title to those stout heroes, who rose up in defence of their religion. H.

—Strong, may be applied either to men, or to the pretended gods of the Gentiles, which seems to agree best with the sequel. Sept. “among the gods ... wonderful in praises.”—Terrible and. Heb. “terrible to praise,” requiring that we should perform that duty with awe. C.

Ver. 12. Earth. When their carcasses were corrupted, such as were not eaten by fishes, mixed with the earth at the bottom, or on the shore of the sea.

Ver. 13. Hast been. This is a prophecy of what should happen to the Hebrews till they should be put in quiet possession of Chanaan, (C.) of which they had an earnest, in the protection which they had already experienced. H.—Holy, on account of the temple, and of the patriarchs, and Jesus Christ, who dwelt there. M.

Ver. 15. Stiff, with consternation. See Jos. 9:9. The nations of Chanaan found auxiliaries even among the near relations of the Hebrews, the children of Esau, (who were not governed by princes, Alphim, as Gen. 36) and of Lot. We easily forget our relations, when our interest is at stake! Heb. instead of being stiff, says, they “melted away.” Both words insinuate, that their heart was under such a violent struggle, that they could perform no duty.

Ver. 16. In the, &c. When they shall behold thy wonders, wrought in our defence.—Let them cease to make opposition. Heb. “let them be silent as a stone.” H.

Ver. 17. Mountain. Chanaan was very mountainous, and different from Egypt. C.—Sion was the peculiar mountain of God, consecrated to his worship. M.

Ver. 18. And ever. Lit. et ultra, “and beyond;” holam, which denotes a long duration, is often used to mean a time that will have an end. To add the greater emphasis to it, the latter term is sometimes used when eternity is meant. The Sept. “The Lord shall reign over this generation, or age of the Mosaic law, and over an age lasting from Christ to the end, and still.” His kingdom shall extend over all eternity. C.

Ver. 19. For, &c. He is not tired with repeating this wonderful judgment, which gave him reason to hope that God would complete his work; and at the same time, give a sanction to his mission. If the most potent of the monarchs of the earth could so little withstand his power, what had he to fear from a few jarring clans of barbarians and shepherds? H.

Ver. 20. Mary, or Mariam, as it was formerly pronounced, though the Masorets now read Miriam: may signify one “exalted, lady, star, bitterness of the sea.”—Prophets; having revelations from God, (Num. 12:1,) and singing his praises.—Of Aaron. Moses passes over himself out of modesty. She is known by this title, whence it is supposed she never married. S. Amb. C.—Timbrels, which were already used in solemn worship.—And dances. Choris may mean companies of women, singing and dancing in honour of God. The men repeated what Moses had entoned, and the women did the same after Mary; unless, perhaps, the multitude of both sexes, respectively, repeated only the first verse by way of chorus; or Mary and her band took up each verse “in answer” to the men, as the Heb. insinuates. This divine canticle will afford joy even to the elect. Apoc. 15:3.

Ver. 22. Sur, which is called Etham, “Pough,” (Num. 33:7,) on which account both sides of the Red Sea are described by the same name; hence some have groundlessly asserted that the Hebrews came out of the Red Sea by the same way they entered it. H.

Ver. 23. Mara, about halfway between Suez and M. Sinai. The waters are said to be still potable, though of a disagreeable nitrous taste. C.

Ver. 25. A tree; (lignum) or piece of wood, which had the natural property here ascribed to it. Eccli. 38:4. C.—Though we can hardly suppose, that all the collection of waters would be thus rendered sweet, unless God had given it a miraculous efficacy. H.—It foreshewed the virtue of the cross. Theodoret ix. 26.—Him, Moses, and the people of Israel, of which he was now the sole head or king. H.—God proved on this occasion the disposition of the Hebrews to enter into the alliance, of which he proposes to them the heads, v. seq. Josue 24:25, makes use of nearly the same words. God begins to take upon himself the administration of the republic, appointing the forms of judicature. Jer. 7:22. What regarded sacrifices, was given upon occasion of their idolatry. D.

Ver. 26. Healer. God delivered his people from every infirmity, which might prevent any one from joining the rest of their tribes on the night of the exit. Ps. 104:37.

Ver. 27. Elim, to the north-west of Sinai. Shaw says there are now only nine fountains. H.—Strabo mentions a place of this description, five days’ journey from Jericho, which was consecrated to the gods. B. xvi. p. 511. C.—We might here, (at the conclusion of the third age, according to those who call the deluge the first, and Abraham’s call, the second,) pause, with Dr. Worthington, to take a view of the progress of the Church, and of the true doctrine, which has at all times been believed. But the attentive reader of the sacred text, and of these notes, will find this to his hand almost every page. Meditate upon these things ... Take heed to thyself and to doctrine, be earnest in them. 1 Tim. 4:15. The holy Job probably lived about this time, so that his book may serve to corroborate those truths, which were the objects of faith to some good men living among the Gentiles, as well as to the more favoured nation of the Jews. H.

Ver. 1. Sin, after they had encamped on the Red Sea. Num. 33:10. The 33d station was also in the desert of Sin, or Cades. But that is far remote from this desert. Num. 20:1. C.—Month of May, Jiar. Their provisions lasted a whole month. On their failure, they presently have recourse to murmurs.

Ver. 3. Over, greedily feasting on the most nutritive meats. H.

Ver. 4. Prove. Show by experience. Therefore he orders the Hebrews to gather manna only for one day, except on Friday. Many suppose that this bread of angels began to fall on Sunday, (v. 22. Origen. hom. 7.) or on Friday. C.

Ver. 5. Provide. Hence, this day was called Parasceve, or the day of preparation.

Ver. 7. Morning, when manna fell, as quails were brought the former evening, v. 12 and 13. These fresh instances of protection might, convince them that they had not been imposed upon by Moses in leaving Egypt. M.

Ver. 8. Lord. All rebellion against lawful authority is resented by God. D.

Ver. 9. Before, to the place appointed for public worship. C. 32:7. C.

Ver. 12. Say. Similar promises are often repeated, to appease the seditious mob. H.

Ver. 13. Quails. All the Oriental languages express these birds by solaem, though some have asserted, that pheasants or locusts are here meant. Josephus (Ant. 3. 1) informs us, that great flocks of quails are found about the gulph of Arabia. They return to Europe from the warmer regions, about the beginning of May, at which time God directed the course of vast multitudes to the camp of Israel. Hesychius says, the chennion, a smaller species of quails, was salted and dried, as the Hebrews did theirs. Num. 11:32. See Ps. 77:26. C.—Dew, upon which lay the miraculous bread, around the camp. None fell within, as the place was not sufficiently clean. M.

Ver. 15. Manhu. S. Jerom adds the explanation, (D.) which is almost universally adopted, though some pretend that man, even in Chaldee, means who, and not what? Calmet refers them to Ps. 60:7 for a proof of the contrary. Manna is found in various parts of the world, the best in Arabia. But this was of a different nature, and wholly miraculous, falling every day, except Saturday, throughout the 40 years that the Hebrews dwelt in the desert. It melted with the heat of the sun, (v. 21,) though it would bear the fire, and might be made into cakes, which cannot be done with the Arabian manna. It filled the mouth of God's servants with the most delightful tastes, (Wisd. 16:20,) while the wicked were disgusted with it. Num. 11:6.—Our soul is dry, &c. It is called the bread of angels, being made or brought by their ministry, and of such a quality, that they would desire nothing better, if they stood in need of food. C.—Whatever a man gathered, he had only a gomor full, and this sufficed for young and old, sick and healthy; if any was kept over the night it became corrupt, except that which was reserved for Saturday, and that which was preserved in the ark for a memorial for several hundred years. W.—Yet this wonderful bread was only a figure of that which Jesus Christ promised to give, (S. John 6) and as the figure must come beneath the reality, (Col. 2) what we receive in the blessed Eucharist, must undoubtedly be something better than manna. Would Zuinglius and Calvin attempt then to persuade us, that Christ appointed their mere sacramental bread, to supersede and excel the favour of manna granted to the fathers, who are dead? Mere bread cannot stand in competition with this miraculous food. But the truth which it foreshewed, according to all the doctors of the Church, I mean the body and blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ, in the blessed sacrament, under the appearances of bread and wine, are surely more excellent than manna itself. It is miraculously brought upon our altars by the words of Jesus Christ, spoken by his priests at Mass, and dispensed to infinite multitudes, in the most distant places from each other, and even in the smallest particle. H.—It giveth grace in this life, and glory in the next, and this in proportion to each one's disposition. To the wicked it may appear contemptible, but to the servants of God it is the most delightful and supersubstantial. W.—Button allows that the Protestant version of this verse “seems to make Moses guilty of a contradiction. It is manna, for they wist not what it was. But the Sept. (he might add the Vulg. also) translate it according to the original.” H.

Ver. 18. Eat. Each one's provision was just enough to fill a gomor; (

M.) or those who had collected more, gave to those who wanted. 2 Cor. 8:15. Any one might take less.

Ver. 20. Putrified. So God was pleased to punish their diffidence in Providence. H.

Ver. 21. Morning. Wisd. 16:28, we find the reason of this ordinance, which enforces diligence, and was a constant admonition to bless God without delay. H.—It melted, that it might not be trodden under foot by the profane. M.

Ver. 22. Told Moses, wishing to know why God had given this injunction.

Ver. 29. Place. Onkelos allows a person to travel 2000 cubits on the sabbath. Some heretics understand this literally, and would not alter the posture in which they were found by the festival. Orig. Philos. 1.

Ver. 31. Manna. This miraculous food, with which the children of Israel were nourished and supported during their sojourning in the wilderness, was a figure of the bread of life, which we receive in the blessed sacrament, for the food and nourishment of our souls, during the time of our mortal pilgrimage, till we come to our eternal home, the true land of promise: where we shall keep an everlasting sabbath: and have no further need of sacraments. Ch.—Seed in size, but white; whereas the seed of coriander is black. M.—Sam. “like a grain of rice.”—Honey, or oil. Num. 11:8. C.—This was the usual taste. But if any one liked another better, the manna assumed it. Wisd. 16:20. M.

Ver. 33. A vessel, “a golden urn,” as the Sept. and S. Paul (Heb. 9:4,) express it. This was placed in the tabernacle, where the Hebrews met to pray, till the ark was made. C.

Ver. 35. Land. Manna was withdrawn as soon as usual food could be easily procured. H.—In this desert of the world, we are supported by the sacraments. As manna fell in the night, so the mysteries of faith are concealed from the curious researches of men. It melted with the sunbeams; so mysteries confound the idle attempts of those who would fathom their impenetrable depth. Those who ate manna died, but the worthy receiver of the blessed sacrament will live for ever. C.

Ver. 1. Mansions, at Daphca, (Num. 33:12,) and perhaps at Aluz. C.—

Raphidim, the 11th station mentioned by Moses, which was afterwards called Massa, “temptation,” because the people murmured in this place. M.

Ver. 2. Chode, quarrelled and murmured. H.—Tempt, requiring a miracle, v. 7.

Ver. 6. Before thee, ready to grant thy request at Horeb, a rock to the west of Sinai, and a figure of Jesus Christ, according to S. Paul; who says, (1 Cor. 10:4,) that the spiritual rock followed the Hebrews. Some say a part of the real rock was carried in a chariot. S. Chrys. Others, that the rivulet of waters accompanied them till it fell into the sea near Asiengaber. Usher.—The Rabbins say, that these waters never failed the Israelites till the death of Mary, for whose sake they were given, and that the bright cloud disappeared with Aaron, and manna at the decease of Moses.

Ver. 7. Temptation. Massa and Meriba “quarrel,” as the Heb. reads.

Ver. 8. Amalec. The descendants of Esau by his grandson, living about the Red Sea.

Ver. 9. Josue, who was before called Osee, or Ausem, was the son of Nun. From the victory obtained over the Amalecites, he was ever after called Josue, Jehosuah, or Jesus, “Saviour.” He attached himself to Moses, and is styled his servant, as Patroclus and Merione are called servants of Achilles and of Idomen, by Homer; though they were men of high birth.—Hand, to defend the cause of the Hebrews by a miracle, if it be requisite.

Ver. 10. Hur, grandfather of Beseleel, (1 Par. 2:19,) grandson of Esron by Caleb.

Ver. 11. And when Moses lifted up his hands. Here Moses was a figure of Christ on the cross, by whose power and mediation we overcome our spiritual enemies. Ch.—Hands, forming the sign of the cross, as the fathers observe, in the posture of a suppliant. S. Jerom says, the people fasted also till the evening, c. Jos. ii. C.—If heretics deride the priests of God, standing with their hands extended at the altar, let them reflect on Moses, and on Jesus Christ, who, lifting up his hands, blessed his disciples; and hence learn, that such ceremonies are not vain. W.

Ver. 14. Of Josue, and of all who shall govern after him, that they may remember to execute my decree of extermination, against these cruel Amalecites, who have first dared to oppose the progress of my dejected people. H.—Moses mentions, that they particularly attacked the feeble and stragglers, (Deut. 25:18,) though their army was very formidable. Judith 4:13. Saul received an express order to destroy this nation; and he made such havoc among them, that they never rose again to any importance, and were confounded with the Idumeans. 1 K. 15:3. C.

Ver. 15. Exaltation. He has given me the victory. He has supported my hands on high, holding the rod as a standard. H.

Ver. 16. Hand of the throne. The Lord hath lifted up his hand, and sworn on his throne, that war, &c. (Chald.) or the hand of Amalec hath attacked the throne (Israel, the inheritance) of the Lord; therefore shall he pursue them for ever. The Sept. have followed a different reading, "because with a secret hand the Lord will fight; and some suggest, that instead of ces, throne, we should read nos, signal, or standard." Since the hand has attacked the standard of the Lord, the war of the Lord is against Amalec. Le Clerc.—Or "the Lord has taken his standard into his hand to destroy the Amalecites for ever." Chateillon. C.

Ver. 1. Jethro. See C. 2:18.—Priest. Hebrew Cohen means also a prince. Both offices were performed by the heads of families, in the law of nature. W.—It is supposed that this interview took place later, and should be placed. Num. 10:10. C.

Ver. 2. Back, with her consent, when he was going to the court of Pharaoh. M.—Since he had the vision of God, S. Epiphanius says, he lived in continence with her. Hoer. 78.

Ver. 5. Mountain. Horeb, (C. 3:1,) or Sinai. M.

Ver. 6. Word. Heb. "And he said unto Moses, I, &c. 7. And Moses went out to meet," &c. which seems very strange, after he had been just talking with him. The authors of the Sept. and Syr. read behold, instead of I. "It was told Moses. Behold thy," &c. Kennicott observes, that five Samaritan copies retain ene, "behold," instead of ani, "I," and thus obviate the nonsense which disturbs the reader of the present Hebrew.

Ver. 7. Worshipped, bending to the ground, according to the custom of the country. H.—Tent of the Lord, if it were then erected, and afterwards into that of Moses. C.

Ver. 9. Rejoiced. Sept. “was in an ecstasy,” of admiration, mixed with joy. M.

Ver. 11. I know. I am now more convinced of this truth. Jethro instructed his family in these principles. The Rechabites were his descendants. 1 Par. 2:55. Jer. 35. M.—Proudly. Heb. “because in the thing in which they did proudly, he was against, or above them.” Something must be supplied. God turned the wisdom and arms of the Egyptians to their own confusion. C.

Ver. 12. Sacrifices. Peace-offerings, of which he might partake with the ancients. H.—Jethro being a stranger, and a servant of the true God, might perform this duty in person, even though we allow that the priesthood was restrained to the family of Aaron before this time with regard to the Hebrews. C.—Before God. S. Aug. who supposes that the tabernacle was not yet erected, explains this in honour of God: but others, who believe this happened at the close of the year, say that the feast was made before the tabernacle, the house of God. M.

Ver. 17. Good, or convenient, either for yourself, or for the people. H.

Ver. 18. Foolish. Sept. “intolerable.”—Labour. Heb. “thou wilt surely sink, or be wasted away.”

Ver. 20. To do. Be a mediator between God and the people: explain their wants, and bring back his decision: but let inferior officers see them executed. H.

Ver. 21. Avarice. That they may not be bribed against their better knowledge. The wise, rich, and disinterested, must be appointed magistrates; such as may not be under any undue influence. Aristotle blames the Lacedemonians for entrusting such offices to people who had nothing. See Isai. 3:7.

Ver. 23. Thou shalt. Heb. “and God shall order thee.” Jethro does not wish his advice should be followed, till God had been consulted. C.—By his plan, he thought Moses would have time to confer more with God, and promote his own welfare, and the convenient dispatch of business. M.

Ver. 25. Tens. The Samaritan copy here inserts, from Deut. 1:9 to 19, where this is related at greater length. The Sept. also add to the other officers, the Grammatoeisagogeis, or Shoterim, mentioned in the same place, as lectors or scribes, whose business it perhaps was to present written requests.

Ver. 26. To him. Whether they regarded religious or civil matters. No appeal was made from an inferior or any other tribunal, but that of the supreme magistrate. C.

Ver. 27. Depart, upon his consenting to leave his son Hobab, for a guide, (Bonfrere on Num. x. 29,) or perhaps he departed for a time, and returned again. C.—Moses shews by his example, that superiors ought not to disdain receiving prudent admonitions from any one. S. Chrys. W.

Ver. 1. This day. The same on which they departed from the Raphidim, or on the third day of the third month; though S. Aug. understands the first of the month; (C.) on which last supposition, allowing 16 days of the month Nisan, 30 of Jiar, and 4 of Sivan, the law was given 50 days after the liberation of the Jews, as the new law was promulgated on Whit-Sunday, on the day of Pentecost. S. Aug. ep. 119. 16. W.

Ver. 3. And Moses went up to God. Moses went up to Mount Sinai, where God spoke to him.

Ver. 4. Eagles. Out of the reach of danger. As eagles carry their young upon their wings, so I have protected you from all your enemies. Deut. 32:11. C.

Ver. 5. Possession, (peculium.) Heb. segula, “a chosen portion or treasure.” M.—Mine. I could have made choice of others. We cannot but admire the goodness of God, who asks for the free consent of the people. Hence they can have no pretence for breaking this solemn covenant. C. Theod. 9. 35.

Ver. 6. Priestly kingdom. “Priests and kings.” Chal. You shall rule over the Chanaanites, &c. and you shall offer sacrifice to me, at least, by slaying the paschal lamb. This kingdom shall not be merely of a civil nature; it shall be also sacred. The whole nation shall be holy, separated from the pagans, and consecrated to me. M.

Ver. 8. Related, as a mediator acting between two parties, (H.) though God knew all before. Thus his servants cease not to lay before him their own and our wants. W.

Ver. 9. Cloud, to veil his majesty, while he spoke to Moses in the hearing of all. H.—Then they began to place an entire confidence in their leader. Maimonides.

Ver. 10. Garments, with their bodies, as the Jews understand by this expression. They were also to abstain from their wives, &c. By which exterior practices, they were admonished of the interior purity which God required. All nations seem to have adopted similar observances of continence, washing themselves, and putting on their best attire, when they appeared before God. See Herod. &c. C.

Ver. 13. Him. In detestation of his impiety, which has made him unclean. H.—Go up into the precincts of the mountain, to which Moses conducted them; (v. 17, 21,) or they might ascend after the trumpet ceased, and the law was given. For some understand shall begin, in a contrary sense with the Roman Sept. “when the voices of thunder, and the trumpets, and the cloud shall be no more;” (apelthe) so also the Chal. Syr. Vatable. The sound which was heard, resembled that of a horn. (Jobel.) See Levit. 25:10. C.

Ver. 15. Wives. S. Paul recommends continence when people have to pray. 1 Cor. 7. On the pagan temple of Epidaurus, this inscription was placed, “Let those be chaste who enter here.” Clem. Strom. 5.

Ver. 18. Terrible, by the display of so many instruments of God’s power; lightning, fire, a thick cloud, and various peals of thunder, and the sound of a trumpet; besides rain, and the company of millions of angels. Ps. 67:9, 18. How different was the appearance of Sion, when Jesus proclaimed his gospel! Heb. 12:18.

Ver. 19. Answered him, “in a speech,” articulated and heard by all the people, as the Heb. Sept. Syr. &c. intimate. Many legislators have pretended that their laws came from heaven. But they had no witnesses. Moses does all openly. His laws are preceded, accompanied, and followed by prodigies.

Ver. 22. Sanctified, in an extraordinary manner, above the rest. These priests, according to S. Aug. are the children of Aaron, and the whole race of Levi, who would shortly be selected by God. But others think, they are those who, by the law of nature, were accustomed to officiate. Or, as God had declared that they were all a priestly kingdom, some of the most comely and irreproachable youths of each family, had been chosen to present victims, when the covenant with God was to be ratified. C. 24:15. C.

Ver. 23. The people. Glassius understands this with an interrogation, “Can no one?” God exempts Aaron from the common law, v. 24. H.

Ver. 24. Pass. Sept. “contend violently to pass.” The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, Matt. 11:12. M.—Moses was the mediator of this covenant, and Aaron his interpreter, to explain to the people the orders of Moses. C.—Thus we have seen the dreadful apparatus of the law of fear, with the preface to it, and the approbation of the people.

Ver. 1. The Lord now, by his angel, delivers in an intelligible manner the ten words, or commandments, which contain the sum of all the natural law, and may be reduced to two precepts of charity, Matt. 22:40. Mar. 12:31. How these commandments are to be divided into ten, the ancients are not perfectly agreed. We follow the authority of S. Augustine, (9. 71,) Clement, (strom. 6,) and others, in referring three of the precepts to God, and seven to our neighbour. Protestants adopt the Jewish method, of making four commandments of the first table, and six of the second; as they divide our first into two, and unite the 9th and 10th; though it surely must appear rational to admit a distinct precept, for an internal as well as for an external object; and the desires of committing adultery or theft require a distinct prohibition no less than the external actions. Whereas the forbidding to have strange gods, or to worship images, or creatures of any description, is exactly of the same tendency. For no one can worship an idol, without admitting a strange god. The latter part, therefore, of the first commandment, or the second of Protestants, is only a farther explanation of what had gone before, as Moses himself clearly insinuates, v. 23. You shall not make gods of silver, &c.

Ver. 2. Thy God. By this endearing title, we are all required to consecrate our whole hearts and souls to our only Maker and Redeemer; and therefore we must love God sincerely, and comply with all his commandments. This preface to the Decalogue, enforces the acts of faith, hope, charity, religion, &c. H.

Ver. 3. Before me, or in my presence. I shall not be content to be adored with idols. C.

Ver. 4. A graven thing, nor the likeness of any thing, &c. All such images or likenesses, are forbidden by this commandment, as are made to be adored and served; according to that which immediately follows, thou shalt not adore them, nor serve them. That is, all such as are designed for idols or image gods, or are worshipped with divine honour. But otherwise images, pictures, or representations, even in the house of God, and in the very sanctuary, so far from being forbidden are expressly authorized by the word of God. See Exodus 25:15, &c. chap. 38:7. Num. 21:8, 9. 1 Chron. 28:18, 19. 2 Chron. 3:10. Ch.—

Protestants insidiously translate “any graven image,” though pesel, eidolon, glupton, and sculptile, in the Heb. Gr. and Lat. denote a graven thing or idol. They will, however, hardly condemn his majesty for having his representation stamped upon the coin of the nation, nor so many of our wealthy noblemen, who adorn their rooms with the choicest efforts of painting and of sculpture. They know that the object of prohibition is the making and adoring of idols. But they probably wish to keep the ignorant under the stupid delusion of supposing, that Catholics are idolaters, because they have images, and that they themselves are not, though they have them likewise at home; and even in their churches admit the absurd figures of the lion and the unicorn, stretching their paws over the tables of the law, instead of the pious representations of Jesus expiring on the cross, &c. which were set up by their Catholic ancestors. Let them read, and adopt herein just weights and measures, proposed to them by Thorndike, one of their most discerning and moderate teachers. In the mean time, we will assure them, that we abhor all idols; both those made with hands, and those which are formed by the head of heretics, who set up their own fancies and delusions, to be adored instead of the true God. Our general councils of Nice and of Trent define what we ought to believe on this head; and the matter is so fully explained in our catechisms and books of instruction, as well as from our pulpits, that no person can well remain in ignorance. If we perform various actions of respect before pictures, which are also done in honour of God, can any man of sense infer, that we look upon both with equal respect? Do we not read of the people falling down to shew respect to the king, and supreme worship to God, by the same act of the body? H.—Altars and sacrifice we reserve solely for God, as S. Aug. (c. Faust. xx. 21) well observes. Other indifferent practices must be determined by the intention.—Latria, or supreme worship, can be given to none but the Deity. But we shew our respect and veneration for his servants in glory, by an inferior service called Dulia, giving honour to whom honour is due. How profane and impious must the words of the first reformers appear, who, after saying most falsely, that “papists make the Virgin Mary a god, (Luther. postil.) and worship images in heathenish manner,” (Melanct. Loc. com.) attribute various fictitious crimes to the blessed Virgin and other saints! Cent. Magd. Calvin, &c.) They knew that all the saints abhorred their impiety; and therefore, in revenge, they vilify the saints, and condemn all the doctors and fathers of the Church, since the death of the apostles, as guilty of superstition and idolatry. H.—“By this occasion, dead creatures, and bloodless half worm-eaten bones, began to be honoured, invoked, and worshipped with divine honour. All which the doctors of the Church not only winked at, but also set forward." Cent. Magd. C. vi.) What is then become of the promises of God, to teach all the truth by the mouths of his pastors? Matt. 28, &c. Let others judge, whether we ought to pay greater deference to Saints Jerome, Aug. Greg. &c. or to Luther, Calvin, and the Centuriators of Magdeburg. But some will even admit that images were commanded by God. C. 25:18, &c. Hence they lay great stress upon the words to thyself; as if all images were forbidden that man should make, without the express sanction of God. So Parkhurst Lexic. But those who are conversant in Hebrew, know that these words have no such import; and if things were inseparable from idolatry, they could not be sanctioned by God. H.—No creature must be represented as a deity. But sovereign worship, both internal and external, must be given to the great Author of all good, while we abstain from every superstitious act, and from all dealings with the devil and false religions. C.—Protestants, therefore, who only forbid images, diminish God's law. Were not the idols of Chanaan, Chamos, &c. which represented nothing in nature, also condemned?

Ver. 5. Adore. Protestants translate again, with the same view, as in the preceding verse, "thou shalt not bow down thyself to them," in condemnation of Catholics, who kneel before the cross. But do not they kneel, when they receive their sacramental bread, or when they ask for their parents' blessing? Did not S. John, and other saints, bow down out of respect to angels? And were these all idolaters! We are forbidden, therefore, to shew any respect to strange gods. But we must honour the true God in his saints, referring all the glory to him. H.—Hate me. Those who do not imitate their wicked ancestors, need not fear being involved in their punishment. M. S. Aug. q. 42. S. Greg. mor. 15. 22. S. Jer. in Ezec. xviii.—Sometimes, indeed, God takes away the lives of children and of subjects, to punish the sins of parents and of kings; but this may be no real detriment to the deceased. H.—Grotius thinks, that this menace is directed against idolaters. Others believe, it may be placed at the conclusion of each of the commandments. C.

Ver. 7. In vain. On trifling occasions, rashly, or falsely. "Those who swear often, diminish their credit among the wise." Philo.

Ver. 8. Sabbath day, on which rest from servile work is prescribed, that we may worship God with greater fervour. Saturday was kept holy by the Jews, in honour of God's resting. The apostles have authorized us to keep Sunday instead, to commemorate the mysteries of Christ's resurrection, &c.

Ver. 9. Six, &c. This must be understood if no festival of obligation occurred. For many were in force in the old law; such as the Passover, Encenia, Purim, &c. as there are still in the Church. H.

Ver. 10. Stranger. Of some other nation. Good policy required that all should conform to this regulation, whatever their religion might be. Grotius.—Maimonides says, without any probability, that “a Gentile observing the law, was guilty of death.” C.

Ver. 12. Honour. Love, respect, feed, if requisite; support the infirmities of parents. See Num. 24:1. 1 Tim. 5:3, 17. They are ministers of God in the production of children; and those who offer an affront to his minister, irritate God. Philo.—Land of Chanaan. The promises are of a temporal nature; but they should bring to our reflection the eternal rewards which attend the virtuous. The duties of parents are not specified, as nature would shew their extent, and as the obligations of parents and children are reciprocal. C.

Ver. 13. Kill. These precepts are to be taken in their full extent, as prohibiting not only the ultimate act, but every thing which leads to it. Magistrates are authorized to inflict capital punishment. We are allowed also to defend ourselves against an unjust aggressor. But we must never intend to kill him. C.—The laws will not condemn us, perhaps, if we do; but God sees the heart, and judges. A night thief may be slain, because we know not how far our own lives may be endangered. C. 22:2. H.

Ver. 14. Adultery. This precept is placed before the former one, in the Sept. S. Mark 10:19, and S. Luke 18:20. Adultery was punished with death, Lev. 20:10. All civilized nations have held it in abhorrence, as destructive of all peace. Job 31:11. All other impure actions are forbidden, under different penalties.

Ver. 15. Steal; by which name fraud of every description is condemned. Some have erroneously restrained this prohibition to the stealing of men for slaves. C. 21:16. C.

Ver. 16. False. Calumniators were subjected to the law of retaliation, and were forced, by the Egyptians and others, to undergo the same punishment, which they would have inflicted upon others. This law is the guardian of good faith and honesty in all our dealings. It is explained more in detail. C. 23:1. Lev. 19:11.

Ver. 17. House. Sept. places wife first, as all do. Deut. 5:21. The express prohibition of lustful and unjust desires, might suffice to have obviated the mistake of Josephus, and of the Jews, in our Saviour's time, who looked upon them as indifferent, provided they were not carried into effect. They render us guilty in the sight of God, (Matt. 5:28,) whenever we give consent to them, as even Ovid and the pagan philosophers acknowledged. Grotius.—At the conclusion of this 10th commandment, we find five verses in the Samaritan copy and version, as well as in the Arabic, and a sufficient vacant space is left in an ancient Syriac MS. translated from the Hebrew, which induce Kennicott (D. 2. p. 97,) to conclude that they are genuine; particularly as they explain what law was to be engraven on the two stones set up by Josue, which the Hebrew leaves ambiguous. They are as follows, repeated, for the most part, Deut. 27:2. “And it shall come to pass, when the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land of the Chanaanites, whither thou goest to possess it, then thou shalt set thee up great stones; and thou shalt plaster them with plaster, and shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law.—And it shall come to pass, when ye are passed over the Jordan, ye shall put these stones, which I command you this day, upon Mount Gerizim.—And thou shalt build there an altar to the Lord thy God, an altar of stones; thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them.—Thou shalt build the altar of the Lord thy God, and shalt sacrifice peace-offerings; and thou shalt eat there, and rejoice before the Lord thy God.—That mountain is on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down, in the land of the Chanaanites, which dwell in the flat country over-against Gilgal, beside the plain of Moreh, near Sichem.” This particular designation of Gerizim, makes Calmet suspect, that it is an interpolation of the Samaritans. But Kennicott hesitates not to lay the blame of omission upon the Jews; as he endeavours to shew, that they have corrupted Deut. 27:4, substituting Hebal, instead of Gerizim. “Certainly the Jews might omit, as easily as the Samaritans might insert.” p. 100. H.

Ver. 18. Saw. The Hebrews often substitute one organ of sense for another. S. Aug. 9. 72. Jer. 2:30.—The Samaritan reads, “the people heard the thunders, and the sound of the trumpet, and beheld the lightning.” Henceforward till C. 24. Moses and Aaron alone heard the voice of God; and the laws delivered. C. 25 to 31 were revealed to Moses only.

Ver. 19. Die. The Sam. copy inserts here what we read, Deut. 5:24, 5, 6, 7.

Ver. 22. Seen: no visible form; (C.) but I have spoken from the top of Sinai. H.

Ver. 23. Make. Heb. adds, “with me.” v. 3. This people was prone to idolatry, and stood in need of having the first commandment often inculcated. M.

Ver. 24. Earth, which may be destroyed with ease, to prevent any profanation.—Place. Where the tabernacle shall be fixed, you shall offer sacrifice, and I will hear you. The ark was afterwards deposited in the temple, where alone the Jews were, consequently, allowed to sacrifice. H.—Samuel offered victims at Mespha and Ramatha, by the dispensation of God. 1 K. 7:9, 17. M.

Ver. 25. Defiled; because done in opposition to God's order, who required, on this occasion, the utmost simplicity, to prevent any undue veneration. Iron was not used about the tabernacle or temple, as brass was more common. Altars raised in haste, like that, Deut. 27. Jos. 8:30, and that which was designed for the ratification of the covenant, (C. 24:4,) were required to be of this construction, unpolished and simple, as was the altar erected, 1 Mac. 4:47. But other altars were not built after this model. C.

Ver. 26. Steps. These were afterwards allowed in the temple. Ezech. 43:17. The Egyptians made use of their pyramids for altars; and some suppose, that the high places of Juda were of a similar nature, and exposed the priests, who wore long robes without breeches, to the danger of being seen. C. 28:42. The steps allowed by God were therefore very low, and enclosed with boards, after the Greek fashion. Such were used by the priest and priestess of Jupiter. Serv. in Æneid iv. 646. Linen breeches, or girdles, were afterwards required. Lev. 19:27. and Ex. 28:42. C.

Ver. 1. Judgments, or laws directing the civil conduct of the Israelites. M.

Ver. 2. Servant, or slave. A man might sell himself and his children. But if they were females, under age, God prescribes how they are to be treated, v. 7.—Six years: in case he were brought immediately after the expiration of the Sabbatic law: none could be detained for a longer period. If a person lost his liberty in the fourth year after the general release, he would recover it in the space of two or three years at latest. H. Bonfrere.

Ver. 3. Raiment. Hebrew Gaph may signify also the body. "If he come

(with his body) alone, let him so depart." Sept. C.

Ver. 6. To the gods: Elohim. That is, to the judges, or magistrates, authorized by God. Ch.—In a matter of such consequence, great deliberation was requisite.—Posts, of his own house. This ceremony tended to punish the slave for neglecting his liberty, and shewed, that he should not pass the threshold any more without his master's leave. —For ever; till the year of Jubilee, when all the Hebrews were to be set free. Lev. 25:40. M.

Ver. 7. Go out, to work in the fields, according to Grotius; or rather, to enjoy her liberty. A father who sold his daughter, always expected that she should be the wife of the purchaser, or of his son. If this did not take place, she was free after six years, or before, if her master died. Constantine sanctioned the power of the Romans to sell their children. The Phrygians and Thebans had the like custom. C.

Ver. 9. Daughters. When she is old enough to be married, he shall give her a dowry like his own daughter, or like a free woman. H.

Ver. 10. Marriage. This seems to insinuate that she was divorced: but the best commentators suppose, that the introduction of the second wife was not to infringe the rights of the first. Heb. "he shall not diminish her food, raiment, and dwelling," but treat her as his wife. The Athenians required husbands to visit their wives thrice a month. —Price, &c. A sufficient dowry, or the rights of marriage; "her company," (omilian.) Sept.

Ver. 12. With a will. The Heb. and Sept. do not express this, but the context shews it to be necessary.—Death, by the sword, as people soliciting idolatry to others were also. Eighteen crimes were punished with lapidation, ten with fire, or melting lead poured down their throats, and six with strangling. The royal tribunals always commanded the criminal's head to be struck off. C.—When the punishment is not defined, stoning must be understood; (Rabbins and Selden, Syned ii. 13.) at least when it is said, his blood be upon him. But when it is only determined that he shall die, Grotius understands he must be strangled, with towels put round the malefactor's neck, while he stands up to the knees in a dunghill; (Drusius) as he does also when he is to be killed with melted lead. Murder was punished by the ancient Greeks with exile. Plato, &c. "At that time it was deemed unlawful to inflict a capital punishment upon any, who, however criminal, were still men." Lartant 2. But as these crimes became more frequent, God enacts this law of retaliation, blood for blood. Gen. 9:6. Ten paces from the place of execution, the criminal Hebrew had to confess his sin. Maimon. C.

Ver. 13. God. When a person was slain undesignedly, the Providence of God was to be adored in silence, as nothing happens without his permission. H. See Num. 25:6.

Ver. 14. Altar, if he should flee thither for safety. No asylum was allowed to such murderers. Thus Joab was slain by Solomon. 3 K. 2:31. M.

Ver. 15. Striketh, even though death should not ensue. But some require a grievous wound, and that the son should be twice admonished. Deut. 21:18. Parricide seemed a crime so shocking and unnatural, that neither Moses nor Solon made any express law against it.

Ver. 17. Curseth, or speaking injuriously. The Athenians put such in prison.

Ver. 19. Staff, as people in health do, or even as a convalescent. In the mean time the other person was confined, and subjected to the law of retaliation, if the sick man lost either limb or life, v. 24. C.

Ver. 21. Money, which purchased the slave. Hence, as he will be punished in some degree, and it is not absolutely certain that the slave died of his wounds, his master shall not be put to death. "They are slaves, (says Seneca, ep. 47,) but they are our fellow-slaves." We have one common origin, and one master over us all. Job 31:13. H.—Many nations tolerated the murder of slaves by their masters. But this was contrary to reason and humanity, (C.) and condemned by many of the Roman laws. Christen.

Ver. 22. But live herself. So Josephus also reads, Ant. iv. 8. But Philo and the Sept. have, "of a child unformed;" and v. 23, "But if the child be formed, (exeikonismenon, animated and organized) he shall give soul for soul;" as if all were referred to the child, which the Vulg. explains of the mother. To destroy the life of either was punished with death. "She who first taught the art of expelling the tender foetus, deserved to perish by his own malice." Ovid. C.—The precise time when the soul begins to animate the body is so very uncertain, that, after conception, the person who should cause a miscarriage wilfully, would expose himself to incur the guilt of murder. Josephus, c. Ap. ii. shews how the Jews abhorred such wickedness. The Romans punished it with death. H.—Homicidii festinatio est prohibere nasci. Tert. apol. Onkelos says, that "if the mother should not die of the stroke, the offender was to satisfy the husband by paying a fine, to be awarded by the husband, or by the judges: but in case the mother died, he should render life for life:" (C.) in which decision he agrees with the Vulg. H.

—The Heb. is ambiguous, “If death ensue not.” C.

Ver. 24. Eye. “This law tended to restrain, not to encourage, fury and revenge.” S. Aug. c. Faust. xix. 25. Some explain it, as if a sum of money could only be required, equivalent to the ransom of an eye, in case a person should be under a necessity of losing or of redeeming it. Muis. Jonathan.—Retaliation was not left to the injured party’s discretion. The judge was to decide. Christ enjoins what is more perfect, ordering us to turn the left cheek, when we have received a blow on the right. The canon law inflicts the punishment of retaliation upon the calumniator. C.

Ver. 28. Stoned, that he may do no more harm, and that the owner may be punished at least by this loss. H.—Sentence was passed by the 23 judges. By the Roman law, the animal which struck a man was forfeited to him (C.); and its master had to make good all damages. Justinian iv. 9.

Ver. 32. Bond man, &c. of any of those uncircumcised nations, (Jonathan) whom it was lawful to put to death; and hence their life was esteemed of less value. H.—Sicles. Sept. “didrachmas.” This was the price of a slave, for which our Saviour was sold: that of a free-man was double. C.

Ver. 1. Five oxen; because they are of greater value than sheep. Theodor.—As these things may easily be stolen, a heavier fine is imposed than on those who steal money. The Scythians punish theft with the utmost severity. Grot.—All these punishments, till the 25th chapter, were inflicted by the judge. T.

Ver. 2. Blood. The reason is, because it could not easily be known whether the thief had not a design upon the life of the people in the house; and therefore, the law gave them authority to defend themselves. But they were not authorized to kill the thief designedly. the laws of Athens and of Rome, permitted nocturnal robbers to be slain, at least when they came armed. Plato de leg. ix. &c. To defend our goods or honour, by killing the aggressor, is contrary to justice and reason. C.

Ver. 4. Double. This is an exception from the general law, v. 1, (C.) because he can more easily make restitution, as he has not sold or destroyed the thing. D.

Ver. 8. Gods. “In the presence of the Lord.” Sept.

Ver. 9. Damage. Heb. “thing lost, which another challengeth.... and whom the judges condemn, he,” &c. If the person who had deposited a thing, pretended that the one produced was not the same, or not equally good, and failed in proving the charge, he was liable to pay double its value. C.

Ver. 12. Stealth, of the person to whom it was entrusted, or by his connivance, as the Hebrew mamu, (de cum eo) “from with him,” intimates. M.

Ver. 13. Slain. Or any part of its mangled remains, in proof of his assertion. Syr.

Ver. 14. Restitution. It is to be presumed he was guilty of some negligence. C.

Ver. 15. Especially, &c. This is a third case, in which the person who lends, suffers all the loss, in consideration of the money which he had received. Others explain, “If he be a hired servant, he shall pay out of his wages.” Syr. Grotius.

Ver. 17. Money. Fifty sicles, as it is expressed, Deut. 22:29. If the maid were of high birth, the magistrates might inflict other punishments on the seducer.

Ver. 18. Wizards. Heb. “a witch.” Women are more given to such delusions, which imply an apostacy from God to serve the devil, and disturb the republic.

Ver. 20. Death. Heb. “shall be anathema,” (erom) which denotes utter destruction both of the person and of his goods. Jonat. 1 K. 15:3.

Ver. 21. Were strangers. The Celtes punished with death the murderer of a stranger, which they only banished him who murdered a citizen. C.

Ver. 24. Fatherless. Thus God will retaliate upon the oppressors of the poor. H.

Ver. 25. Poor. Such are often most in want. Usury is not lawful, even with respect to the rich. The Heb. terms it a bite. M.—“What is usury, said Cato, but to kill a man.” The Romans required thieves to restore double, but usurers were to render four times as much as they had taken. Varro Rustic. i.—Restitution is prescribed, 2 Esd. 5:11. Some Calvinists have stood up in its defence, in opposition to the Scriptures, fathers, and Councils of the Catholic Church. Lend, hoping to gain nothing by it. Lu. 6:35. "Let him who loves money, ... lend (in the persons of the poor) to Him who says, Give, and it shall be given to you." S. Leo ser. The Jews themselves have reprobated usury in any use. C.

Ver. 28. Gods. Judges, priests, &c. Josephus and Philo say, we must not speak ill of strange gods, lest the Gentiles should take occasion to blaspheme the true God, and that we may be farther removed from the danger of taking the name of God in vain, and losing that respect which we owe to it.

Ver. 29. Tithes. Heb. "thy plentitude, (first-fruits and tithes) and thy tears;" (or liquors distilled from odoriferous trees) in a word, all that is most excellent. Censorinus (de die nat.) says, excellently well: "They who acknowledged that they had received food, a country, light, and even their very persons, from the bounty of the gods, failed not to consecrate a part of all to the gods, ... to the temples and chapels, where they worshipped them." C.

Ver. 31. Beasts. "Wild beasts." Sept.—This was to encourage humanity. Theodoret.

Ver. 1. Lie, by countenancing calumny. Judges must never do any thing which they know to be unjust, whatever the witnesses may assert. The person who speaks against his neighbour, would injure him, if he had an opportunity. Quintel.—Heb. "Thou shalt not raise a false report." H.

Ver. 3. Favour. Mercy would then be contrary to justice. Ps. 71:2. S. Aug. q. 88.

Ver. 8. Bribes, which naturally induce the receiver to shew favour, and therefore cannot be too carefully avoided. The Athenians put to death those who bribed the judges, and required the latter to restore ten-fold. C.

Ver. 9. The hearts. You have experienced what sorrow and misery they feel. M.

Ver. 11. Year. Thus God was pleased to teach them to place entire confidence in him, and to compassionate the distress of the poor. Most people suppose, that the sabbatic year commenced in autumn; as otherwise the land would have remained without any harvest two years. This law began to be observed the 7th year after Josue crossed the Jordan. Jerusalem was thrice besieged during the sabbatic years. Jer. 34:8 1 Mac. 6:51. See Josep. Ant. xii. 14. xiv. 28. God blessed the 6th year, so that it produced as much as three. Lev. 25:21 C.—On the feast of tabernacles, (in September) at the beginning of the 7th year, Deuteronomy was to be read aloud to all the people, the Hebrew slaves might obtain their liberty, and if a person could not restore what he had borrowed, it was to be remitted for ever. Deut. 15 and 31:10. T.

Ver. 13. Name. Hence it is supposed, the Jews had given abusive titles to the idols; as they call Beelzebub the god-fly, &c. No respect was to be shewn to them. C.

Ver. 14. Three. Women are not here mentioned; but they are, Deut. 31:12. Children under 13 were exempted from the obligation, according to the Caraites. Men from 20 to 60, not lawfully hindered, were bound to appear. Levit. 27:3.

Ver. 15. Empty. But shalt offer something in sacrifice, and for the support of the Levites, freely. Deut. 16:10. At the Passover, the first-fruits of barley were to be offered, as those of wheat would be ready at Pentecost. The third feast was that of tabernacles, at the conclusion of the civil year. Presents were to be made to God, in testimony of their submission to him; as they were to the kings of the east, by their subjects. Tavernier, Perse. iv. 16. See 1 K. 10:27. 1 Par. 18:2.—A sixtieth part of the fruits, at least, was carried to the temple. They consisted of wheat, barley, grapes, figs, apricots, olives, and dates. The king himself carried his basket, and when the solemn procession arrived at the temple, the Levites began to sing Ps. 29. I will extol thee, O Lord, &c. After which, the people repeated the words of Deut. 26:3.; and having given their baskets to the priests, (v. 4,) recited parts of the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th verses. C.—God. Here the Sept. add, “For when I shall have cast the Gentiles from before thy face, and extended thy limits.”

Ver. 18. Thou, &c. This has a reference to the feast of the Passover, v. 15, (Onkelos) as well as the following verse. C.

Ver. 19. Dam. The paschal victim must not be so young as to be still suckled. The Sam. subjoins, “Because that would be like immolating an animal found dead, and the God of Jacob hates it.” C.—Some imagine that this law alludes to a superstitious custom of the pagans, (Spencer Rit. ii. 8,) or it forbids eating animals while they are, as it were, all milk, not eight days old. Rivet.

Ver. 20. Angel; my only son. Philo.—S. Paul says, they tempted Jesus Christ, (1 Cor. 10:9,) who is styled, the angel of the covenant. Mal. 3:1. Some apply this to Josue, others to S. Michael, who, from the cloud, conducted the army of Israel. C.

Ver. 21. Forgive. Dimittet, as well as the Heb. and Sept., may signify, “he will not abandon.” H.—My name. Moses, Josue, and still more our Saviour, acted in the name and by the authority of God the Father.

Ver. 25. Waters, or all things necessary for your sustenance.

Ver. 26. Fruitless. Heb. may also be, “miscarrying.”—Days. An untimely death was a judgment of God on the wicked, though sometimes he chooses to draw his elect quickly out of this dangerous world. Wisd. 4:11.

Ver. 27. Destroy. Heb. “fill with consternation.”

Ver. 28. Hornets, or wasps. Wisd. 12:8. Josue (24:12,) assures us this was verified. Thus scorpions forced the Ethiopians to abandon their country, and flies and wasps drove away the Mysians and Phaselides. See Bochart iv. 13. The latter people were of Phœnician extraction, and probably fled before Josue. Most of the Chanaanites withdrew into Africa; some perhaps into America. C.

Ver. 29. Beasts. Herod the great killed many in hunting. Josep. Bel. i. 16. Two bears rushed upon the children, 4 K. 2:24. How much would they have increased in all the countries from the Euphrates to the Nile, had they been destitute of any other inhabitants but the Hebrews, (C.) many of whom perished in the desert!

Ver. 33. Scandal. If you have any society with these nations, it will turn to your ruin, which was but too literally manifested afterwards.

Ver. 1. You, Aaron, &c. The people had heard the voice of the Lord, as it were the sound of thunder, giving the foregoing commands; which Moses explains to them distinctly (v. 3,) by the mouth of Aaron; and afterwards draws up a memorial of their solemn ratification. H.

Ver. 4. Titles. That is, pillars; (Ch.) or altars, round that made of turf;

(C. 20:24); which represented God. Part of the blood was poured upon this altar, and the rest upon the Hebrews, to remind them, that if they proved rebellious, their blood should be spilt. C.

Ver. 5. Holocausts: whole burnt-offerings: in which the whole sacrifice was consumed with fire, upon the altar. Ch.—It is not said that these young men were to officiate as priests. Moses acted alone in this capacity, pouring the blood.—Calves, and he-goats also. Heb. 9:19. The book was also sprinkled with the blood (C.) mixed with water; for which purpose scarlet wool and hyssop were employed, as S. Paul learnt from tradition, or by inspiration. H.

Ver. 8. Covenant. Thus Christ confirmed the new covenant, by the effusion of his blood. T.—This is daily renewed upon our altars for ever. C.—Our Saviour alludes to this transaction in the consecration of the chalice. D.—If wine alone had been substituted instead of blood, the figure would have surpassed the reality. Isichius. W.

Ver. 11. Saw God, under the appearance of a burning fire, v. 17. They beheld some rays of his glory, but not distinct similitude, (Deut. 4:15,) though Cajetan thinks that God appeared in a human form. C.—Drink. They made a feast of thanksgiving for so great a favour, and for the preservation of their lives, after beholding such a glorious apparition. Vat.

Ver. 14. Wait ye. They returned soon to the camp; and the people not perceiving Moses with them, and supposing he was dead, made the golden calf.

Ver. 16. Called him, to come up still higher, while Josue remained there.

Ver. 18. Forty, including the six mentioned before, v. 16. The Rabbins pretend that Moses received the written law during the days, and their traditions during the nights. R. Bechai ap. Buxt. syn. 1. C.

Ver. 2. First-fruits: offerings, of some of the best and choicest of their goods. Ch.—This was the first time such a voluntary offering was made by the Hebrews. M.—It is a lesson for Christians to be liberal for God's service. W.

Ver. 4. Scarlet twice dyed. Aq. and Sym. have transparent. This colour is often confounded with purple, as our Saviour's robe is styled scarlet by S. Matt. 27:28; and purple by S. John 19:2. It was dyed with a worm called shani in Heb. S. Jer. ep. ad Fabiol.—Fine linen, byssus. Heb. shesh, "or six folds," or it may mean cotton, which was highly esteemed by the ancients; (Arab. version. Herod.) and it is not probable that Moses would have passed over it unnoticed. C.

Ver. 5. Setim-wood. The wood of a tree that grows in the wilderness, which is said to be incorruptible, (Ch.) as the Sept. intimate. It is perhaps the Acacia, which is very black and hard. S. Jer. in Joel iii. 18, says it resembles our white thorn.

Ver. 7. Onyx, emeralds. C.—The ephod and the rational. The ephod was the high priests upper vestment; and the rational his breast-plate, in which were twelve gems, &c. Ch.—Ephod means a kind of girdle or stole, peculiar to priests, or used by others only of the highest distinction, (C.) and in religious solemnities. S. Jer. ad Marcel. Josephus (Ant. ii. 8) describes it as different from what it was in the days of Moses. Many other alterations had then taken place; the Urim and Thummim were disused, &c. The Pallium is in imitation of the high priest's ephod. The rational is so called, because by it the high priest was enabled to give his oracles. C. 28:15. C.—The precise import of the Heb. cheshen, which Protestants render breast plate, is not known. It was certainly fastened on the ephod over the breast, and consisted of 12 stones, on which the names of the 12 patriarchs were engraven. H.

Ver. 8. Sanctuary, or tabernacle, to serve as a portable temple. Such alone were probably used at that time. The high priest entered into this holy place once a year. C.

Ver. 10. Ark, to contain the tables of the law, as a constant memorial of the alliance made between God and his people, ver. 16. In, or on the side of it, were also placed the rod of Aaron, (Num. 17:10) and the golden urn, containing manna. Heb. 9:3. Hence the pagans perhaps took occasion to keep their secret mysteries in an ark, cista secretorum. Apul. Met. 2. C.—The ark was three feet nine inches long, two feet three inches high, and as much in breadth. H.

Ver. 11. Gold (deaurabis). Our method of gilding was not yet discovered.—Crown, or border, resembling "waves," (kumatia) Sept.

Ver. 14. Carried on them, when exposed in solemn processions. These were covered along with the ark: and other bars were used to remove the ark during the journeys in the desert. Num. 4:6. C.

Ver. 16. Testimony, the law which testifies the will of God to us. M.—An authentic record. Jeremias (32:11,) uses præceptum in the same sense. C.

Ver. 17. A propitiatory: a covering for the ark; called a propitiatory, or mercy-seat, because the Lord, who was supposed to sit there upon the wings of the cherubims, with the ark for his footstool, from thence shewed mercy. It is also called the oracle, ver. 18 and 20, because from thence, God gave his orders and his answers. Ch.—It was the lid or covering of the ark, from kapha, “to cover, efface,” &c. C.—Here the hanan, or cloud representing God, rested, (Lev. 16:2) and the divine oracles were audibly given: for which reason, God is said to sit upon the cherubims, the mercy-seat being his footstool. Ps. 79:2.

Ver. 18. Cherubims, symbolic figures, which Moses does not perfectly describe, and therefore we cannot pretend to know their exact form. Some represent them as young men, with their wings joined over the propitiatory, in a contrary direction to those of birds, in order to form a throne for God, and bending towards Him, with profound respect. Others only admit their heads, with six wings: while many suppose that they resembled those compounded figures mentioned, Ezech. 1:5. 10:20. They denote some extraordinary figure not found in nature, 3 K. 7:29. An order of angels is known by this name. Yet the four animals, or cherubims, represent the saints. Apoc. 5:8, 10. The different forms under which they appear, set before us their various perfections. Their wings denote agility, &c. The Egyptians adored Anubis, under the form of a man, with a dog’s head. Isis had the head of a cow, Apis that of a bull. They placed a sphinx at the entrance of their temples, to shew that their theology was enigmatical. God condescended perhaps to satisfy the inclinations of his people, by representing the mysteries of religion under similar forms. Wisd. 18:24. C.—Would he have allowed such things, if they were so dangerous, as to be inseparable from idolatry! H.

Ver. 23. A table: on which were to be placed the twelve loaves of proposition; or, as they are called in the Hebrew, the face bread; because they were always to stand before the face of the Lord in his temple: as a figure of the eucharistic sacrifice and sacrament, in the church of Christ; (Ch.) which shews that Christ must be present in the eucharist. W.—By this bread, renewed at the public expense every sabbath-day, the Israelites made profession that they were indebted for their food to God’s providence; and in gratitude, offered him this sacrifice, with incense and wine, v. 29. The priests alone were to eat these loaves (1 K. 21) at the expiration of the week. T.

Ver. 25. Polished, (interrasilem, sculptured and plain, at equal distances). Heb. "Thou shalt make all round at the top, a ledge (border) of a hand's breadth," &c. The tabernacle was the tent of God, the king of Israel: and food and lights were on that account placed before him, (C.) though he stood not in need of them. The idolatrous priests set all sorts of meats before Bel. Dan. 14. H.

Ver. 29. Dishes. (acetabulum.) Properly, a vessel to hold vinegar, but used for various purposes.—Bowls, or vials full of wine. Tostat.—Censers, to contain incense, &c. C. 37:16. The first term, karuth, might also mean vessels to contain the flour and oil of which these loaves were made. Num. 7:13. The Levites made the bread themselves, (1 Par. 22:19,) and even sowed the corn, and did every thing about it. S. Jer. in Mal. i. 7. The second term, coputh, may denote vessels to keep incense; the third, monkiuth, instruments to clean either the floor or the table, &c. All these vessels seem mended to accompany the table of shew-bread.—Cups, used for libations (C. 37:16. Num. 4:7,) of wine, on the sabbath. Kossuth signifies a porringer or dish, like the ancient patera. Whether wine was placed on this table, we cannot determine. But we read of salt, (C.) which was to accompany all God's sacrifices. Lev. 2:13.

Ver. 30. Loaves. There were 12, containing each six pints of flour, made up in a square form, without leaven. They were placed in two rows, one above the other, and were kept separate by plates of gold. C. See Levit. 24:5.

Ver. 31. A candlestick. This candlestick, with its seven lamps, which was always to give light in the house of God, was a figure of the light of the Holy Ghost, and his seven-fold grace, in the sanctuary of the church of Christ. Ch.—It contained a talent of gold, or above 113 lb.; worth £5475 sterling, including the snuffers, &c. (v. 39,) and had seven branches, adorned alternately with cups, bowls, or knobs, and lilies; (H.) or with cups, pomegranates, and lilies. All was of massive gold, moksse.—Bowls, sphærules, globes, apples, &c. C.—Thou shalt make. The Heb. thiasse, has evidently the letter i redundant, and rejected by the best MSS. Ken. Dis. i. Houbigant.

Ver. 33. Cups. Heb. "cups which produce almonds or nuts;" that is three buds of flowers, out of which comes the stalk, as fruit does from the flower. The Heb. Gr. and Lat. languages use the word chalice, or cup, for a flower full-blown. The height of this candlestick is undetermined; but it would not exceed five feet.

Ver. 37. Against. The table of proposition on the north, and that of perfumes in the middle, before the veil. T.—The lamps might be detached from the rest, (C.) and were trimmed every evening to burn all night; but in the day four were extinguished. Bonfrere.

Ver. 38. Put out, with the oil, &c. Nothing was to be treated with disrespect that had been dedicated to God's service. H.—Alexander adorned the temple of Apollo with a grand candlestick, resembling a tree laden with fruit; (Plin. xxxiv. 8,) and Dionysius the younger made a present of one to the prytaneum of Athens, which had 365 lamps upon it. They stood on the ground, and burnt oil, being the more necessary, as the ancient temples had generally no windows. The Egyptians, according to S. Clem. (strom. 1,) were the first who introduced them into their temples. C.—Solomon set up ten candlesticks, five on the north, and five on the south of the holy place. 3 K. 7:49.

Ver. 1. Twisted, for greater strength, with double threads. D.—Diversified, &c. Heb. “cherubim wrought by a skilful workman.” A cherubic work is one extremely diversified, and wonderful; representing birds, flowers, monsters; either in gold, wood, painting, or tapestry. When it is done with a needle, it is styled rokom, “feathers,” (plumarium opus.) But when the variety of colours is done with the loom, being more ingenious, the Heb. call it essob “of an inventor.” Such were these curtains.

Ver. 3. Five curtains, which would cover half the tabernacle, or 20 cubits. C.—Being joined together, they remind us of fraternal charity and union; which ought to adorn the members of the church. W.

Ver. 6. Rings. Hooks or taches, v. 11.

Ver. 13. A cubit. As these curtains were two cubits longer, and four broader, than those more precious ones below, they hung down to the ground. Josep. iii. 5.

Ver. 14. Skins. These two were probably as large as the last, to keep out rain; (M.) though the text only specifies the roof.

Ver. 17. Mortises, (incastraturæ). Heb. “tenons,” which corresponded with the former. C.

Ver. 19. Corners. Hebrew tenons, lit. “hands,” which has the same meaning as the Vulg. Some think, the sockets or bases rested on the ground, and had a point which entered into the boards, to keep them in their places. Lyran.—The ornaments on the north and south were the same.

Ver. 22. Six, at the western end, with two other strong boards, or pillars, to connect the whole, as they were placed at the two corners, and were half a cubit each. M.

Ver. 26. Bars, 30 cubits long, on two sides, and ten on the western end, to fasten the boards.

Ver. 31. A veil, to hang before the entrance of the tabernacle, at the east side, which had no boards. Within was the ark, v. 33. H.

Ver. 32. Heads. Chaptrels of setim-wood, overlaid with gold,—(Vovim), not little hooks for curtains. C.

Ver. 33. The sanctuary, &c. That part of the tabernacle, which was without the veil, into which the priests daily entered, is here called the sanctuary, or holy place; that part which was within the veil, into which no one but the high priest ever went in, and he but once a year, is called the holy of holies, (literally, the sanctuaries of the sanctuary,) as being the most holy of all holy places. Ch.—It occupied only one-third of the tabernacle. M.

Ver. 36. Hanging, or veil, suspended on five pillars, before the sanctuary. H.—It was the other veil, which was rent at the death of Christ. Baronius observes, that Christian temples were formerly built in imitation of the Jewish tabernacle. It was a figure of the Catholic church. 1 Tim. 3:15.

Ver. 1. Altar, of holocausts, in the open air, before the tabernacle. T. —Four square, or five cubits in length and breadth, and three in height, which the Rabbins measure from the grate, (v. 5,) or middle of the altar's height. So high the altar was sunk in the earth, (C.) or was built of unhewn stone, on which the wood of the altar rested, being secured by plates of brass above, from the heat of the fire. It was hollow within, and had neither top nor bottom fixed to it. M.

Ver. 2. It. The altar, wood. The horns were for ornament, and were made of brass. Upon them also they might hang the grate, and instruments for sacrifice. C.—Some of the pagan altars consisted of the horns of animals, (Ovid) and were designed to shew what a number of victims had been offered in their temples. Their gods had frequently horns on their heads. Spencer Rit. iii. 4.

Ver. 3. Pans, &c. The Sept. have, “a crown or border, for the altar, and its covering, and its cups, and flesh-hooks, and fire-place, or pan.” Heb. also has five terms; which Calmet renders: 1. a small kettle to receive the ashes under the grate; 2. fire-shovels; 3. bowls to receive blood (mozrokoth, which term the Vulg. does not perhaps notice); 4. flesh-hooks; 5. chafing-dishes. The Protestant version has also the basins or broad cups, phialas, of the Sept. H.

Ver. 5. Midst. Hanging down half way. On this, the wood designed to consume the victim, was placed. The Sept. and Vulg. refer which to the rings, and the present Heb. refers to the grate, or net. But it seems to be inaccurate. The rings were fixed about the middle of the altar’s height, to the same holes, through which the bars intended for its removal were put. The altar stood upon feet, which took up half the height, and let in air below the grate, to fan the fire, and to prevent the brass from melting. All the altars described in the table of Isis, are of this nature. C.—The Sept. do not distinguish the grate from the hearth, or little altar, (arula) as they use the word hearth, escharaboth, (v. 4 and 5,) and place it about the middle of the altar, or where the feet supported the box or frame of the altar, which was almost a yard high. The hearth may therefore denote the bottom of the frame, where the grate was suspended by four rings.

Ver. 9. Court. This inclosed the tabernacle, and the altar of holocausts, being 50 yards long and 25 broad. At the bottom, or western end, there were ten pillars, and on the north and south 20, ornamented in the same manner, and supporting curtains of cotton. But on the eastern side, 10 yards were left, with four pillars in the middle, for an entrance, supporting a richer veil, and on either side three pillars of brass, adorned with circles of silver, as all the rest were. H.

Ver. 10. Engraving. Heb. and Chal. “circles,” adorning the chaptrels, (M. v. 17,) or rather the body of the pillars. The chaptrels were covered with plates of silver.

Ver. 19. Tabernacle, with respect to this court; for surely the utensils prescribed in the former chapter, were to be of gold. The Sept. do not mention the tabernacle. C.

Ver. 20. Pestle. That it may be as free from dregs as possible; quasi luxurians defluxerit. Colum. xii. 20. The Heb. and Sept. are silent about the pestle. The olives must, however, be a little bruised, before they will yield their oil. H.—Always: four of the seven lamps were extinguished every morning. Josep. iii. 9. 1 K. 3:3. Hecateus (ap. Eus. præp. ix. 4,) assures us, that a light was kept always burning in the tabernacle. The temple of Hercules, at the Straits, its priests and ceremonies, bore some resemblance with the tabernacle and usages prescribed by Moses. It was probably erected by the Phenicians. C.—“The wood seemed to be incorruptible. Women and swine are kept at a distance. White linen covers the priests at the altar; that which adorns their head is most beautiful, and brought from Pelusium. Et Pelusiaco præfulget stamine vertex. They offer incense in long ungirded robes, but the vestment in which they sacrifice, is distinguished with a Latus clavus, or with broad studs of purple, (like the Roman senators.) They go barefoot, their heads shaved, and they observe continence, castumque cubile. They keep a perpetual fire burning on the altars. But no images or statues of the gods have filled the place with majesty and sacred fear.”

Sed nulla effigies, simulacraque nota Deorum, Majestate locum & sacro implevere timore. Sil. Italic. iii.

Ver. 21. Aaron. Here God declares that the sons of Aaron are chosen by him to perform this office. They were not anointed priests till C. 29. H.—Light. Thus God admonishes us to let our good works always shine before men. Bede Taber. iii. 1.

Ver. 1. Take, &c. Priests must be called by God, as Aaron was. Heb. 5. W.

Ver. 2. And beauty, that all may be filled with awe, and adore the majesty of God. C.—Our priestly vestments, which are objects of derision to the ignorant, are made so rich and beautiful for the same purpose. They have the sanction of God, by a parity of reason; and the authority of his church. H.

Ver. 3. Heart. The Hebrews generally attributed to the heart, what we give to the head.—Wisdom. All good, both in the order of grace and of nature, proceeds from God.—Consecrated, as if they imparted a sort of virtue. C.

Ver. 4. Rational and ephod. See C. 25:7.—Tunic, long robe or cloak of blue wool.—Garment, next the body, and woven very close and thick.

—Mitre, like a tiara or turban of linen, or rather of byssus, or fine cotton. This was never laid aside in the temple; as, to appear uncovered was then esteemed a mark of insolence. Eneas introduced the Phrygian custom into Italy, of sacrificing with a cap on the head. —Girdle, for his under-garment, besides that which formed a part of the ephod. C.—By these vestments, we are admonished to exercise the virtues of discretion, &c. S. Jer. ep. ad Fab.

Ver. 6. Ephod, (superhumerales.) That of the other priests was made of linen; and such were worn by Samuel, and by David, when he danced before the ark. M.

Ver. 7. Together, by the hooks, under the two precious stones. Josep. iii. 8.

Ver. 8. Work. Heb. “all the work, and the girdle, shall be of the same” materials, and net sewed on afterwards. C.

Ver. 9. Onyx. Sept. emeralds. C.—Heb. shoham, which the Protestants render onyx-stone. H.

Ver. 10. Birth. On the right shoulder were engraven Ruben, Simeon, Juda, Dan, Nephtali, and Gad. On the left, Aser, Issachar, Zabulon, Ephraim, Manasses, and Benjamin. The high priest himself represented the tribe of Levi. M.

Ver. 12. Remembrance, for both, v. 29. The sins or burdens of the people, were thus to be borne by the high priest, and he was to make intercession for them. T.

Ver. 13. Hooks. Sept. aspidiscas, “imitating the form or biting of an asp.” C.—Gold, on the ephod, by which the rational was suspended from the shoulders. H.

Ver. 14. Linked, &c. The present Heb. has “at the ends,” migbaloth. But the Vulg. seems to have read more properly k instead of g, as in C. 26:4. C.

Ver. 15. The rational of judgment. This part of the high priest's attire, which he wore at his breast, was called the rational of judgment; partly because it admonished both priest and people of their duty to God; by carrying the names of all their tribes in his presence; and by the Urim and Thummim, that is, doctrine and truth, which were written upon it: and partly because it gave divine answers and oracles, as if it were rational and endowed with judgment.

Ver. 16. Span, or half a cubit, (Ezec. 43:13, 17,) formed like a purse, in which the Rabbins say the Urim and Thummim, were placed. C.

Ver. 17. Stones. It is difficult to ascertain the true names of these stones, interpreters are so much at variance; as they are also respecting the name of the 12 patriarchs, which were engraven upon each. They probably stood according to the order of their birth, v. 10, 21. Thus Ruben, Simeon, and Levi, would occupy the first places, upon the sardius, topaz, and emerald. See on these stones, Plin. xxvii. 5. xxxviii. 8.

Ver. 18. The carbuncle, (ruby) sapphire, and jasper, (or diamond) had on them Juda, Dan, and Nephtali.

Ver. 19. Ligurius, agate, and amethyst, (or eumeces; Plin. xxxvii. 7,) had Gad, Aser, and Issachar.

Ver. 20. Chrysolite, (beryl and opale,) onyx, (Sept. beryl; Chal. or emerald, C.) beryl, (Heb. jasper; Sept. &c. onyx) were inscribed with the names of Zabulon, Joseph, and Benjamin. In Ezech. 28:13, the jasper stone comes in the sixth place, as it does in the Vulg. here. C.—The mystical interpretation of these stones, may be seen in A. Lapide. S. Epiphanius has written a learned work on the 12 precious stones. H.

Ver. 28. Another. Hence the ephod, rational, urim, &c. are used to denote the same thing. See 1 K. 30:7. C.

Ver. 30. Doctrine and truth. Heb. Urim and Thummim: illuminations and perfections. These words, written on the rational, seem to signify the light of doctrine, and the integrity of life, with which the priests of God ought to approach to him. Ch.—Aurim means things brilliant, “declarations,” Sept. and thomim, “perfections,” or “truths.” Some imagine, that God required the stones of the rational to be of the utmost brilliancy and perfection; Oleaster and Josephus (Ant. iii. 8,) say, it was by the appearance of those stones that the high priest was enlightened, when he consulted God. If God approved of what was in agitation, they assumed a surprising brightness, as well as those on the high priest’s shoulders. But this had not happened for 200 years before he began his history. The Urim and Thummim were not in the second temple, 1 Esd. 2:63. Some think these words were engraven on the stones in the rational. Whether God explained his will by articulate sounds, as (Matt. 3:17,) this is my beloved son, or internally instructed the high priest, when he was consulted, cannot be determined. C.—S. Chrysostom is of the former opinion. “If any thing was to be known, a voice came from between the cherubim, from the propitiatory, to declare what would happen.” As the Jews lost the propitiatory, when they were led captives to Babylon, it seems they never afterwards obtained this privilege of having an oracle. God sometimes instructed them by his prophets. But, for a long time, none had appeared; and all might attend more earnestly to the voice of the Messiah. T.—Judgment. He shall be the supreme judge in religious matters, and must strive to pass sentence according to the dictates of my law, with truth. H.—The chief judge in Egypt wore a golden chain, hanging from the neck on the breast, to which was attached the image of Truth, on a sapphire stone. Olian (Var. Hist. xxxiv. 14,) also observes, that this office was always held by a venerable and honest priest.

Ver. 33. Bells, to denote the harmony of the universe, (Philo) and that all the actions of a priest ought to give edification. S. Jerom.

Ver. 35. Die, for coming in disrespectfully, without giving notice. See Judith 14:8.

Ver. 36. Plate; reaching from ear to ear, two fingers' breadth, tied behind like a diadem. Wisd. 18:24.—Holy, or "sanctity, belongeth to the Lord," and all who approach to Him, ought to be holy. C.—Josephus represents the ornaments of the high priest's head, like the triple crown of the pope. Ant. iii. 8.

Ver. 38. Iniquities. This means, perhaps, that he shall wear these grand vestments and crown only on the solemn day of expiation, when he makes atonement for all the sins of the people, as a figure of Jesus Christ. Josephus tells us, that on other occasions, he wore a less costly attire. De Bel. v. 6. or 15. C.—By bearing on his forehead kodesh la Yehovah, "Holiness to the Lord," he confessed that all mankind were sinners, and stood in need of pardon. H.

Ver. 40. Linen. In Ezechiel (44:17,) woollen garments are forbidden to be worn by priests. Many of the pagans required their priests to be clothed in white linen. All these prescriptions of God, which seem to us so minute, had a more sublime and mysterious meaning. For in the priestly robe ... was the whole world, by the colours denoting the air, light, earth, and water: the two stones on his shoulders, signified the sun and moon, as the 12 did the signs of the zodiac, or the glory of the fathers; and thy majesty was written upon the diadem of his head. Wisd. 18:24. Thus the priest was a mediator between God and his people, and was to be solicitous for the welfare of all. S. Tho. 1. 2. q. 102. a. 5. S. Aug. S. Jer. &c.

Ver. 41. Consecrate. Heb. and Sept. "thou shalt anoint and fill their hands" with oil, and the instruments of their office.

Ver. 42. Linen breeches, descending as far as the knees. S. Jer. In the C.

39:29, they seem to have been made of byssus, or cotton. But as linen is prescribed in all other places, perhaps a word has crept in there, by mistake of the transcribers. They were intended to remind the priests of superior modesty, as they were not commonly worn. Homer never mentions them. Virgil only specifies the cloak and tunic of Evander. Augustus wore breeches and stockings in winter. Sueton.—But the ancient breeches were not like ours, but resembled rather an apron or girdle, enveloping both thighs, and hanging from the waist. C.

Ver. 2. Wafers, (lagana.) They knead them with water, and afterwards fry or bake them with oil. S. Isid. Such wafers are very common in Italy. C.

Ver. 4. Washed. The pagans never approached their mysteries, without divers purifications and washing. S. Clem. Strom. 5. Exterior cleanliness was designed to signify the purity of the heart, with which we must appear before God. C.—It is for this reason we take holy-water, when we go into our chapels, and we wash our fingers before and during Mass. H.

Ver. 5. Vestments. No mention is made of breeches, because they had them on, while they were washing. V. Bede.—Belt. Sept. have read esson, instead of chesheb. “Thou shalt tie the rational to the ephod.” C.

Ver. 7. Pour, in the form of a cross or T, according to many of the Rabbin, &c. The inferior priests were anointed only on the hands. The Levites were sprinkled with oil, mixed with the blood of the victims. The custom of anointing prophets, priests, and kings, was peculiar to the Jews; as if to foreshow Christ, the great anointed of the Lord. S. Aug. Ps. 44. Dan. 9:24.

Ver. 10. Head. Confessing that they are sinners, and deserve to die. Thus they shall substitute the victim instead of themselves, and obtain pardon. In the holocaust, (v. 15,) and the peace-offering, (v. 19,) they impose their hands, having first washed them) and pronounce some prayer. C.

Ver. 11. Beside. Al, is now wanting in the printed Heb. and Sam. though expressed by the Protestant translators, (who often help their text) and by all the ancient versions. Kennicott mentions one MS. which retains it very properly. H.—The victim was offered on the altar of holocausts, before the tabernacle, the seat of God's majesty. C.—Moses was the priest on this occasion. M. Ps. 98:6.

Ver. 12. Horns. This was done in all the sacrifices of expiation. After Aaron was ordained, he carried the blood into the sanctuary, for the sins of all. C.

Ver. 13. Burnt-offering, (incensum.) To evaporate like incense. M.—God requires what is most fat and delicious. C.—The Persians never reserved any of the victims for their idols, except the caul. Strabo xv.

Ver. 14. Sin of the high priest and people. In the other sin-offerings, this was not done. M.

Ver. 16. About, upon the altar, and at the foot of it. So the pagans did. Euseb. præp. iv. 9.

Ver. 18. Victim. Heb. ishe, means a whole burnt-offering.

Ver. 20. Tip, or “softer part” Sept. This ceremony insinuated, that the priests ought to be all attentive, and perform their office with diligence. Philo. Vit. Mos. 3.

Ver. 22. Rump, or tail, for which the sheep of Arabia were famed; some having tails three yards long, others a yard thick. Herodot. iii. 113. They weighed from 12 to 30 pounds, and were almost all fat. C.

Ver. 23. Roll. (torta) Heb. kikkar, “a loaf.” Sept. “a loaf or cake of oil.” H.

Ver. 24. Elevating, and then letting them descend towards the earth. After which, Moses lifted the victims towards the east and west, and from north to south, to shew that God is the Sovereign of the world. R. Solomon.—Cato (Rustic. 34,) mentions a similar custom, of agitating or waving bread, in honour of Janus and of Jupiter. C.

Ver. 28. Israel. As these parts have been offered by Aaron to the Lord, so the Israelites shall present them to him and his sons, when they offer sacrifice. M.—All the different kinds of victims were immolated on this occasion, because the priests were consecrated to offer them all. D.

Ver. 29. Vesture. A new one was not made for every high priest. C.—One of the other priests had to perform the ceremony of consecration. M.

Ver. 30. Days. During which he could not leave the sanctuary. Levit. 8:33. On each day, the aforesaid ceremonies were to be repeated, v.

Ver. 31. Holy place. The court of the tabernacle, where a constant fire was kept, to prepare the food of the priests, and sometimes of others, who wished to eat their share of the victims in the presence of the Lord.

Ver. 33. Stranger. The Levites themselves could not partake of these things.

Ver. 37. Seven. This number is frequently prescribed in Scripture. Balaam required seven altars, (Num. 23) and the Egyptians never spent less than seven days in their expiations. Porphy. Abstin. 4. C.—Shall be holy, consecrated according to this rite, (M.) or defiled; for sacred things purify those who approach in a proper manner, while they defile or increase the guilt of the unworthy. C.—By the unleavened bread, (v. 23,) we are reminded of the blessed eucharist; and by oil, of the grace of the spirit. D.

Ver. 39. Morning. About sun-rise.—Evening, or between the two vespers. Ex. 12:6. The lambs were provided by the people; flour, wine, and oil, by the priests. Philo.—The wine was poured at the foot of the altar, the flour and oil were burnt upon it, and not placed on the head of the victim, as was customary among the pagans, frontique invergit vina sacerdos. Virg. vi. Maimon. By these sacrifices, God was to be adored as the author both of day and night; (M.) and we are admonished of our duty of praying to him, particularly at those times. H.—All the sacrifices prefigured that of Christ, (S. Aug. c. advers. i. 18,) but none more than these of lambs. Orig. in Jo. W.

Ver. 40. Part of an epha, half of which was used in each sacrifice.

Ver. 43. Glory, or presence, or by the flame which shall come down from heaven to consume the victim. Lev. 9:24.

EXODUS 30

Ver. 1. An altar to burn incense. This burning of incense was an emblem of prayer, ascending to God from an inflamed heart. See Ps. 140:2. Apoc. 5:8 and 8:4. Ch.—Nothing but incense was daily offered by the high priest upon this altar. On the day of expiation he touched the four corners with blood. It stood over-against the bread of proposition.

Ver. 2. Height. Ezechiel (41:22,) describes his altar of incense, a cubit higher.

Ver. 3. Grate, or covering. Some think the fire and incense were placed on this grate, and the ashes fell under the altar. But fire was taken hence, and put in the thuribles; (Num. 16:17. C.) or a brazen thurible was placed on the fire. Lev. 10:1. M.—Walls, or sides, of setim-wood.—Crown, cornice or moulding. See C. 25:25.

Ver. 6. Where, &c. Hence some infer, that its situation was in the most holy place. But God spoke also to Moses at the door of the sanctuary (C. 29:42. H.); and most people suppose, that it was placed out of the holy of holies, beside the veil. The golden censer, which S. Paul (Heb. 9:4,) tells us was within, might be that of Aaron, which was placed there after the sedition of Core, (Num. 16) or one that might be left smoking before the ark, on the day of expiation. C.—S. Augustine, &c. believe, however, that it was in the holy of holies. q. 133. Orig. hom. 19. S. Greg. 1 K. 14. &c.

Ver. 7. Aaron, or some other priest. They did it by turns, and were bound to observe continence during the time of their ministry. Lev. 15:16. Luc. 1:9. C.

Ver. 9. Composition, than what is prescribed, v. 34. M.

Ver. 10. It. This altar, or this rite; all deserve a singular respect.

Ver. 12. Sum. David perhaps neglected this injunction. 2 K. 24. Josep. Ant. vii. 10. Yet we do not read that Moses took the half sicle when he numbered the people. Num. 1. Whence others gather, that this sum was to be paid every year, as it was done in our Saviour's time, for the support of the temple. Matt. 17:23. Vespasian ordered the Jews to pay the same money for the capitol. Josep. Bel. vii. 13.) After the captivity, the third part of a sicle was demanded. 2 Esd. 10:32. C.

Ver. 13. Half a sicle. A sicle or shekel of silver, (which was also called a stater) according to the standard or weight of the sanctuary, which was the most just and exact, was half an ounce of silver; that is, about half a crown of English money. The obol, or gerah, was about three halfpence. Ch.—A priest kept the weights and measures. 1 Par. 23:29. The Egyptians and Romans took the like precaution to prevent any fraud; and Justinian required that such things should be kept in churches. Some have supposed, that the royal or common sicle was less than that of the sanctuary. But Moses admits of no distinction. Lev. 27:25. Ezech. 14:12. Perhaps the weights of the Egyptians, &c. might differ from this, which Moses therefore particularizes so well. C.

—Arbutnot makes the weight of the sicle equal to 9 dwt. 2,57 gr. English Troy weight; and he values that of silver at 2s. 3,375d. sterling. H.

Ver. 15. Rich. The life of every man is equal in the sight of God, and He will not give the rich occasion to despise his poor neighbour. Thus also the number of people would be ascertained. M.

Ver. 18. Its foot also of brass, made of mirrors which the women gave. C. 38:8. It was double; one vessel being shallower, to wash the feet &c. and the other containing a quantity of water, which was let out by pipes. The pagans had lavers also; and our holy-water vessels should remind us of that purity and holiness which became the house of God. H.

Ver. 19. Feet. The priests went barefoot in the tabernacle. In the Misna we find the same law binds laymen. None were allowed to enter the temple of Diana, in Crete, with shoes on; and the Roman ladies followed the same custom, when they came down to the temple of Vesta. Huc pede matronam nudo descendere vidi. Ovid. Fast. 6. C.—The priest is ordered to put off his shoes on Good Friday, out of respect for Jesus Christ, who suffered on the cross. H.

Ver. 23. Spices. Perfumes were probably first invented in Arabia and Egypt. Ovid makes Bacchus the author of bloody sacrifices, and of incense offered to Jupiter. Fast. 3.—Myrrh. Heb. “the head of the myrrh of liberty,” or such as flowed freely and was most excellent, free from any mixture. Sudant sponte ... stacten dictam. Plin. xii. 15. C.—Stacte takes its name from distilling. M.—Sicles; this is not expressed in the Heb., as this measure is commonly meant.—Cinnamon, a plant extremely rare. Matthcole assures us, that it is not now to be found in Arabia, no more than balm in Judea.—Calamus. Heb. adds the epithet sweet-smelling both to cinnamon and calamus, or cane, the latter of which grows in the Indies. Dioscor. i. 17. That which druggists sell, under this name, is not a proper ingredient for ointments.

Ver. 24. Cassia, not the common sort, which would spoil the perfumes, but the essence of iris, (Hebrew, kode) mentioned in the Sept. Ezec. 28:19. Joseph. &c. C.

Ver. 29. Sanctified. But if he ought not to touch it, he shall be defiled the more: (Deut. 22:9,) a double effect, which we perceive in the Christian sacraments. C.

Ver. 31. Holy unto me, or set apart for the persons and things employed in my service. H.

Ver. 32. Of man. Some except the king of Juda, till the reign of Josias. Rabbins.—But they were anointed with common oil. M.

Ver. 33. Cut off. Excommunicated, and deprived of all the privileges of the Israelites; (C.) or even put to death for his presumption. M.

Ver. 34. Onycha. An aromatic root, shining like “the nail,” or perhaps the bdellium of Arabia, which is clearer than that of the Indies. Dioscor. Gallen Medic. It distills from a tree. Others affirm, that it is the shell of a fish which feeds on spikenard (spica nardi) in the watery places of India.—Galbanum, an unctuous gum, of a strong but not very agreeable smell when alone.—Frankincense, is a juice proceeding by incision from the trees of Saba.—Weight. The Rabbins say 70 or 74 pounds of each.

Ver. 35. Together. Heb. lit. “salted,” (Chald.) as salt was to accompany all the sacrifices. Lev. 2:13. But it was not, perhaps, to be mixed with this perfume, no more than with the wine of libations. The word may signify “a thing used in embalming, pure and holy.”

Ver. 36. Place. On the table of perfumes, to be burnt morning and evening. C.

EXODUS 31

Ver. 2. By name. I have fixed upon and taken into my service, as Is. 43:1.

Ver. 3. Spirit. “God, our master, causeth our genius to shew itself.” Senec. Ben. iv. 4.

Ver. 4. Brass. Sept. add, “and violet, and purple, and scarlet spun, and byssus twisted.”

Ver. 5. Marble and (or) precious stones. Marble was not used in the tabernacle. C.

Ver. 6. Wisdom. Good artists deserve this title, provided they make things of real use. Orig. hom. 22. Num.

Ver. 7. Vessels. Tables, curtains, &c. C.

Ver. 8. Table and (all) the. The Sam. copy retains the word col, “all,” as well as the Sam. Sept. Syr. and Arab. versions, and one Heb. MS. though the printed editions have rejected it. In a Chaldaic MS. it is also found. The omission, probably was occasioned by the custom of the Jews, who always fill up their lines with the initial letters of the next line; and as coliu followed, the transcriber supposed that col was in that predicament. Ken. dis. 2.—Most pure gold, always giving light, or kept clean. C. 39:37.

Ver. 13. Sabbath. Let not the workmen do any thing for the tabernacle on that day. M.—God reiterates and insists particularly on this commandment, which begins with the word remember; because men are so apt to forget, or to transgress a precept, which seems to interfere with those worldly concerns and profits, which they love more than God and their own souls. H.

Ver. 18. Testimony, to inform men of their duty.—Written, not by Moses, or by any man, but by God himself, or by an angel. C. 34:1. Gal. 3:19. C.

Ver. 1. Delayed. They waited perhaps about a month, with some patience; and then, becoming seditious, assembled against Aaron, and extorted from him a compliance with their impious request. He was thus guilty of a grievous crime, though the violence might extenuate it in some degree. Salien.—He was not yet ordained high priest. C. 40:12. H.—Gods. Aaron gratified their request by the golden calf. They had the pillar to conduct them, but they wanted something new. They speak with contempt of Moses. M.

Ver. 2. And your sons. The Sept. omit this. But in the East, it was fashionable for men also to wear ear-rings. Plin. xi. 37. Judg. 8:24. Ezech. 7:20. Aaron hoped the people would relent at this proposal. S. Aug. q. 141.

Ver. 4. Received them, “in a purse, (as Gideon did afterwards, Judg. 8:25,) he made a molten calf.” Jonath.—Perhaps he engraved on it the peculiar marks of the Egyptian idol, Apis; a square white spot on the forehead, and a crescent upon the side. For it is generally believed, that this calf was designed to imitate that object of worship, to which the Hebrews had been too much accustomed. Acts 7:39, 41. S. Jer. in Ose. iv. The Egyptians adored not only the living ox, but also its image, which they kept in their temple. Porphy. Abst. ii. Mela. i. 8. Some of the fathers think, that the head of a calf only appeared. S. Amb. Lactant. &c. The rest of the figure was perhaps human, as Osiris was represented with the head of an ox, as well as Astarte and Serapis. Monceau pretends that Aaron represented the true God, under the form of a cherub, in which he falsely asserts he had appeared on Mount Sinai, and that his fault consisted only in giving occasion of superstition to the people. But his opinion (though adopted by many Protestants, who excuse all from the guilt of idolatry, but papists. H.) has been condemned at Rome, and refuted by Visorius, &c.—Thy gods, &c. Thus spoke the infatuated ringleaders. C.—And they changed their glory, the true God, into the likeness of a calf that eateth grass. Ps. 105:19.—They forgot God, who saved them, ib. (v. 21,) and forsook Him, (Deut. 32:18,) to adore the calf. W.

Ver. 5. The Lord. The most sacred name of God is prostituted, (Judg. 17 and 18. Wisd. 14:21,) and an altar is erected to this idol; though some pretend, that Aaron meant God to be adored under this similitude. His weakness was unaccountable, and God would have slain him, had not Moses interceded. Deut. 9:20. Those who undertake to justify him, enter not into the sentiments of God; and the offender himself pleads no excuse, but the violence of the people, v. 23. Salien.—To-morrow, when the 40 days expired, and Moses returned arrayed in terrors. H.

Ver. 6. They offered, by the hands of Aaron, to whom the Sept. refer all this. “He offered,” &c. appearing at the head of the idolaters. A Lapidé insinuates, that he wished to supplant his brother in the supreme command; and after a faint resistance, became the promoter of idolatry, to ingratiate himself with the people. The Scripture lays not this, however, to his charge. C.—To eat of the victims.—To play, dancing and singing in honour of their idol, probably with many indecent gestures, as was customary on such occasions among the nations of Chanaan. H.—Tertullian (de jejuniis) understands impure play. The word means also to dance, and to play on instruments of music. Ludere quæ vellem calamo permisit agresti. Virg. Ec. i. C.—Sulpitius says, the people abandoned themselves to drunkenness and gluttony, or debauchery, vinoque se & ventri dedisset. H.—They might get wine from Madian. Salien.—Foolish mirth is the daughter of gluttony, and the mother of idolatry. S. Greg. Mor. xxxi. 31. W.

Ver. 7. Thy people. They are not worthy to be styled my people; and thou didst ratify the covenant with me, in their name, and as their interpreter. They have sinned, giving way to idolatry in thought, word, and deed.

Ver. 9. And again. The Sept. omit this verse. Moses, at the first intimation of the people’s sin, fell prostrate before the Lord, to sue for pardon, and pleaded the natural weakness of an ungovernable multitude, in order to extenuate their fault. This God admits.—I see, &c. But while he seems bent on punishing them, to try his servant, he encourages him inwardly to pray with fervour. Salien.

Ver. 10. Alone. One fully determined on revenge will bear with no expostulation; whence S. Greg. (Mor. ix. 11,) and Theodoret (q. 67,) look upon this as an incitement to pray more earnestly, seeing God's servants have such influence over Him. The mercy of God struggled with his justice, and stopped its effects.—Nation, as I promised to Abraham; or I will make thee ruler over a nation greater than this, as Moses explains it, (Deut. 9:14,) and as the like offer is made, Num. 14:12. The Sam. subjoins here, "And God was likewise much irritated against Aaron, and would have destroyed him; but Moses prayed for him:" which we are assured was the case. Deut. 9:20. C.

Ver. 11. Why, &c. Calvin here accuses Moses of arrogance, in prescribing laws to God's justice. But S. Jerom (ep. ad Gaud.) commends his charity and "prayer, which hindered God's power." W.

Ver. 12. Craftily. Heb. "with a malicious design." Moses insinuates, that the glory of God is interested not to punish the Hebrews, lest the Gentiles should blaspheme, particularly as the land of Chanaan seemed to be promised unconditionally to the posterity of Abraham, who were now, all but one, to be exterminated. H.

Ver. 13. Thy servants. Thus God honours his friends, and rewards their merits, which are the effects of his grace. W.

Ver. 14. Appeased. Yet of this Moses was not fully assured, and in effect only those who were less guilty, were reprieved to be punished afterwards, v. 30, 35. H.

Ver. 15. Both sides. The ten commandments were written twice over, or on both sides, that all who stood round Moses, might be able to read them. M.—On one side, appeared the laws regarding God; on the other, those which relate to man. H.—They were like two originals. The common way of writing was only on one side. C.

Ver. 17. Josue, who was waiting for Moses lower down on the mountain. C. 24:13.

Ver. 18. Cry, &c. Heb. "the cry answering strength ... or ... weakness," which the Vulgate elucidates.—Singers. Sept. "I hear the cry of those who contend for pre-eminence in wine," or over their cups. H.

Ver. 19. Mount. “Finding the people abandoned to luxury and sacrilege, he broke the tables, deeming it a nation unworthy to be entrusted with the law of God.” Sulpit. i. 33. By this action, Moses foreshewed the dissolution of the covenant with the Jews, that the new covenant might take place. S. Aug. q. 144. The Jews kept the 17th of the fourth month as a fast, in memory of this event. S. Jer. in Zac. viii.

Ver. 20. Calf. Having manifested his disapprobation of the people’s conduct, in the most signal manner, by breaking the two tables; Moses proceeds to convince them of their stupidity, in adoring what he, in a few minutes, reduces to powder. H.—He breaks the calf in pieces, after burning it, and then grinds it to dust in a mill, with files; as the Heb. Chal. and Sept. intimate. He throws it, with contempt, into the torrent, which supplied the camp with water, and thus caused the idolaters to swallow their god. T.—Sa assures us, that he saw an alchymist pulverize gold, which Abenezra says is done by means of some herbs, which turn the gold quite black, when it is melted. C.—Some use aquafortis for this purpose. T.—But from the account of Moses, (Deut. 9:21,) it seems fire, and the mille, or file, reduced the gold into the smallest particles, so as to be even potable. Josephus (viii. 2,) mentions the gold dust used by the courtiers of Solomon. C.

Ver. 22. Evil. Aaron answers his younger brother with humility, being now touched with repentance; on which account, God still grants him the high priesthood. H.

Ver. 24. Came out. The Rabbins pretend alive, and able to walk. Hence they say Aaron was filled with astonishment, and induced to erect the altar in its honour. R. Salomo and Burgens. But these are Jewish fables, injurious to God, and invented to hide, in some degree, the shame of their ancestors. For the same reason, Josephus passes over the whole in silence, and Philo throws the blame on a few Egyptian converts. They might very probably be the ringleaders, as Num. 11:4. But the Hebrews in general readily gave in to the delusion. 1 Cor. 10:7. H.

Ver. 25. Naked. Having lost not only their gold, and their honour, but what was worst of all, being stripped also of the grace of God, and having lost him.—The shame of the filth. That is, of the idol, which they had taken for their god. It is the usual phrase of the Scripture to call idols filth, and abominations. Ch.—Of the filth, is not in Heb. But it serves to explain how the Hebrews came to be so unprotected and disconcerted. See 2 Par. 28:19.

Ver. 26. All the sons; that is, the great majority of them; for some were probably slain, v. 29.

Ver. 28. About, &c. The Heb. letter c means about, and stands also for twenty. All the versions, and some copies of the Vulg. retain the first signification; but our edition gives also the second. Sixtus V. and the Louvain Bible have about 33,000. H.—S. Paul (1 Cor. 10:7, 8,) mentions, that three and twenty thousand perished, in punishment of their fornication (with the Moabites), which some explain of the adoration of the calf, and say that Moses only specifies those slain by the Levites; while S. Paul gives the number of all those who perished by the hand of God on this occasion, v. 35. C.—S. Cyril, Alex. glap. 2, Sulpit. and many other fathers, agree with the Vulgate. The fornication with the Moabites, was followed by the death of 24,000. Num. 25:9. So that S. Paul cannot refer to it, unless he only mention those who perished in one day; and Moses expresses the total amount of the slain during the whole affair. H.

Ver. 29. To you. Thus they merited the priesthood, and a blessing; (Deut. 33:9. M.) having been the ministers of God's just indignation, without sparing any of the most guilty. With these they could not be unacquainted. No external signs on their bodies were requisite to make the delinquents known. They had appeared to publicly. H.—The Levites acted with due authority and order, which their father, Levi, had neglected. Gen. 34. W.

Ver. 30. You. Many who had not been slain, had followed the bad example, and Aaron, in particular, had brought upon them a most heinous sin. v. 21. Yet on account of their repentance, they were not subjected to immediate punishment; but they were visited afterwards, v. 34. Though God was appeased, (v. 14,) so as not to destroy the whole multitude, Moses thought it a very arduous task to obtain a full reconciliation, notwithstanding the exemplary vengeance he had taken of the ringleaders. Hence he addresses himself to God with the greatest humility, and with such earnestness as scarcely seems justifiable, if we understand that he put his own eternal salvation at stake. But he makes an impossible supposition, or proposal, which he knew God would not admit, to extort as it were the requested favour. As he is willing to die for his people, God pardons them for his sake. S. Aug. q. 147, &c. H.

Ver. 32. The book of predestinate. S. Paul uses a similar expression, Rom. 9:3. Neither could he really desire or consent to be accursed, even for a time. Hence their words can be understood only as an hyperbole, to denote the excess of their love for their brethren, as if a child should say to his father, pardon my brother, or kill me. T.—

Some explain this book, of the law or covenant, by which Moses was appointed the prince of the Hebrews, which title he is willing to forego, with pleasure, to obtain their pardon. C.—Others understand the book, or register of the living. He is willing to die for his people. See Num. 11:15. S. Greg. Mor. x. 7. S. Jer. ad Algas.—This sense is very good, and sufficiently expresses the fervour of Moses. Greater live than this no man hath. Jo. 15:13.

Ver. 33. Book: him will I slay; and, if he die impenitent, I will punish him for ever. H.

Ver. 35. Struck, with some judgment, not specified; (Lyr.) or perhaps, the various punishments which were inflicted on the Hebrews in the wilderness, were all partly designed to chastise this first act of idolatry. Calmet explains this of the devastation caused by the Levites, as he supposes the narration of Moses does not deserve the order of time. He thinks Moses expostulated with the people, and was then sent by God to punish them; and while they were unarmed, (C. 33:5,) the Levites fell upon them. Then Moses removed the tabernacle out of the camp, and obtained of God that he would go before them, and not an angel only, v. 34. C. 33:17. Moses continued full forty days, standing or lying prostrate on the mount, before the Lord, to obtain the pardon of his people. Deut. 9:25, 10:10. At the expiration of which term he returned, with an order to prepare two other tables of stone, on which, after a supplication of the same length of time, he obtained the law to be again engraven. C. 34:28. The favour cost him therefore 120 days' earnest prayer; and yet how little are we touched with God's mercy, in giving us his law! H.

Ver. 1. This place. Mount Sinai, (M.) or the tabernacle, v. 7. C.

Ver. 3. I will not go: “in majesty” (Chal.) and “brightness,” Arab. The angel shall go in his own name, and shall not perform such great miracles. My tabernacle shall be removed to a respectful distance, lest, not being able to endure the barefaced impiety of the people, I slay you in my fury. God addresses Moses, as the representative of the nation, (M.) and adopts the language of men, appearing as a king, who cannot bear to be insulted to his face. H.

Ver. 4. Ornaments. Chal. and Syr. “arms.” They had brought jewels, &c. out of Egypt. M.

Ver. 5. Once, &c. "In a moment." Pagnin.—Shall destroy, if you prove rebellious any more, as I foresee you will.—Lay aside, as you have done.—To thee, according to the measure of your repentance or negligence. M.

Ver. 6. By Horeb, or at the foot of the mount. Some think they put them on no more in the wilderness; (C.) or at least till they had obtained the tables of the law again, in testimony of God's reconciliation with them. Salien.

Ver. 7. Tabernacle: not that which God had described, which was set up later, (C. 40) but one destined for public and private prayer. M.—Afar, a thousand yards. Thalmud and Villet.—Covenant; or alliance, which God had entered into with the people. T.—The Heb. may signify, "of the assembly or congregation," because there the people met to hear the divine doctrine explained, and to offer up their prayers.—Camp. Thus were the people reminded of their excommunication, or separation, from the God whom they had so wantonly abandoned, and whose protection and presence were their only support and comfort. H.—The record of the covenant was also probably torn, as Moses was ordered to write it again. C. 34:27. T.

Ver. 8. Rose up, out of respect to their prince, who was not their mediator also. H.

Ver. 9. He spoke. The angel, conducting the pillar, spoke in God's name. M.

Ver. 10. And worshipped. This the Samaritan copy omits. The people bowed towards Moses and the angel. C.

Ver. 11. Face to face. That is, in a most familiar manner. Though, as we learn from this very chapter, Moses could not see the face of the Lord. Ch.—The angel assumed a human form, (M.) which Moses knew could not fully display the majesty of God; and hence he begs to see his face, or his glory, (v. 13, 18,) which God declares is impossible for any mortal to do, v. 20. H.—He addresses him, however, with unusual condescension, and speaks to him without any ambiguity, "without any medium," as the Arab. expresses it. Other prophets were instructed by visions, and were filled with terror. Dan. 10:8.—Young man, though 50 years old, and the general who defeated the Amalecites. C. 17:13. Puer means a servant also, in which capacity Josue waited on Moses, and was alone allowed to be present with him in the tabernacle. He did not sleep there, (C.) but guarded it from all profanation. Some say he was still called young, because he was unmarried; in which sense the Chal. styles him hullema, which corresponds with the Heb. halma, a virgin. Serarius. T.

Ver. 12. To the Lord. This conversation probably took place on Mount Horeb, (v. 22,) after God had threatened that he would not go up with the people. C. 32:34. And here (v. 3,) Moses, considering that God would thus withdraw his special providence from his people, begins to expostulate with him; and first, having mentioned with gratitude, the repeated kindnesses of God towards himself, he begs to be informed what angel shall accompany him, and then proceeds to beg that God would still shew his wonted favour to the penitent Hebrews, and conduct them himself, as he had done before the transgression. We do not read before, that God said to Moses, I know thee by name; (S. Aug. q. 193,) but he had used that expression in some conversation with him, as he did afterwards, v. 17. H.

Ver. 13. Face. Heb. “way.” Be thou our guide.—Thy people. Acknowledge them again. Moses begs not for any special favour for himself, but only for the Hebrews. Salien.

Ver. 14. Face. Arab. “light.” Syr. “walk in my presence,” and fear not. The Messiah is called the angel of his face. Isai. 63:9.—Rest. I will grant thy request. C.

Ver. 15. Thyself. Moses desires a farther explanation, or a positive assurance that God would conduct them.—By all, ab omnibus, distinguished in glory from all others. Chal.

Ver. 18. Glory, or face, v. 13, 20. The angel was robed in darkness, which Moses begs may be removed. Tertullian supposes, he wished to behold the Messiah. Many think he desired to contemplate the divine essence. S. Aug. q. 161. Philo, &c. But, could he be ignorant that such a request could not be granted? C.—God promised to shew him all good, or the beatific vision after death. H.

Ver. 19. All good, that could reasonably be desired. “I will pass before thee in all my glory,” (Sept.) and principally in my beneficence. C. 34:6, 7. C.—I will shew thee what great favours I have in reserve for Israel. Divines dispute whether Moses saw the divine essence. S. Tho. 1, p. q. 12, a. 11. M.—If he requested to do so now, it seems to be denied, v. 20. Jo. 1:17. T.—Proclaim, &c. When I pass, I will repeat some of my glorious titles, and particularly that I am merciful. M.—Yet I will shew mercy with discretion, and will punish some of you. C.

Ver. 20. My face, even in my assumed form. M.—The effulgence would cause death, as was commonly believed. Gen. 13:16. To behold the divine essence, we must be divested of our mortal body. 1 Cor.

2:9. S. Greg. Naz. or. 49. H.—Moses, therefore, did not see it on earth, though he had greater favours shewn to him than the other prophets. Num. 12:6. Theod. q. 68. S. Chrys. &c. W.

Ver. 23. See my back parts. The Lord, by his angel, usually spoke to Moses in the pillar of the cloud, so that he could not see the glory of Him that spoke familiarly with him. In the vision here mentioned, he was allowed to see something of Him, in an assumed corporeal form: not in the face, the rays of which were too bright for mortal eye to bear, but to view Him as it were behind, when his face was turned from him. Ch.—Thus our curiosity is repressed. D.—Servius observes, on Virgil, that the “gods mostly declare themselves by suddenly disappearing. They will shew their faces.” Iliad. N. Grotius.—The rock was Christ, (D.) in whose sacred humanity we discern, at a distance, the majesty of God. S. Aug. q. 154. Moses saw the hinder parts of God, or what should happen to Jesus Christ in the latter days of the synagogue. Orig. hom. 12. By this wonderful vision, God was pleased to declare that he was appeased. H.

Ver. 1. Former. Deut. 10:1, adds, and come up to me into the mount, and I, &c. Here.

Ver. 2. Go up. From these expressions we might infer, that God gave the order first on Mount Sinai, and repeated it to Moses in the tabernacle, the night before he commenced his third fast and supplication of 40 days. H.—After the first tables were broken, others were given; so after baptism we may obtain remission of sin by penance. S. Jer. ad Dem. W.

Ver. 3. Let no, &c. This was to impress all with sentiments of reverence.

Ver. 6. He said. Some refer this to Moses; others, more probably, to God, who had promised, by this signal of the name of the Lord, to testify his presence. C.—The angel addresses God in this manner, while Moses lies concealed in the rock, covered with the hand or cloud of God’s representative. H.—Of the eleven attributes here claimed by God, three regard his essence, six his mercy, and the last two his justice. C.

Ver. 7. Keepest. So the Targum of Jerusalem reads. Heb. and Sept.

have, “keepeth.”—No man, &c. All have sinned. Rom. 3:23. Heb. “who will not clear the guilty,” which is followed by the Chal. and Sept. God is a just judge, who will assuredly punish the impenitent. Yet even in justice, he will remember mercy, and will stop at the third and fourth generation, (C.) when the influence of the progenitors’ example can have but small influence upon their descendants. If, however, they prove guilty, they must expect chastisement. Ex. 20:5.

Ver. 9. (For it, &c.) If thou do not support me, I shall not be able to govern. H.—Possess us. Take us for thy peculiar inheritance. M.

Ver. 10. Covenant. The first had been made void by idolatry. C.—Notwithstanding the former threats, (C. 33:3,) God here promises new benefits. W.

Ver. 11. Observe, O my people, (M.) you who shall serve under Josue, when these promises shall be fulfilled. H.—The Sept. add the Gergesite to the list of people who should be expelled. But Lyran. thinks they are omitted in Hebrew, because they had already retired before the approach of the Hebrews. C.

Ver. 13. Statues. Sept. have “pillars,” and subjoin after groves, (unless it be another translation, as Grabe insinuates) “you shall burn with fire the graven things of their gods.”

Ver. 14. Jealous. Like a husband, He will watch all your motions.

Ver. 15. Covenant. The same word occurs here, as (v. 12,) in Heb. and Sept. H.—It relates chiefly to contracts of marriage, which God forbids the faithful to enter into with the Chanaanites, and with other idolatrous nations, lest they should follow their example. Solomon is reprehended for transgressing this law, (3 K. 11:1,) and such marriages are called abominations. 1 Esd. 9:1 10:2, 10. Joseph. But if any of those people became converts, the reason of the prohibition ceased. Hence a captive woman might be married, (Deut. 21:11,) and Salmon took Rahab to wife. If Samson and Esther married with heathens, it might be done by God’s dispensation, for weighty reasons. T.—Fornication. On account of the dissolute behaviour of those idolater, their worship is often condemned under this name, Jer. 2 and 3. Ezec. 16. C.—Sacrificed, and thus thou be drawn into a participation in his guilt. The other laws are here repeated from C. 23. M.

Ver. 16. Son. The Chal. and Sept. add, “nor give any of thy daughters to their sons;” or, joining this verse with the 15th, the Sept. say, “make no covenant ... lest they commit fornication after their gods ... and call thee and thou eat ... and thou take of their daughters wives for thy sons, and thou wilt give some of thy daughters to their sons, and thy daughters shall go fornicating after their gods.” The most imminent dangers attend those women, who have infidel husbands. H.—The intention of Moses, and the custom of the Hebrews, justly reprobated such marriages. C.

Ver. 18. New corn. Heb. Abib; the name of the month Nisan, which corresponds with our March and April.

Ver. 21. Reap; when the most urgent necessity might seem to authorize labour. H.

Ver. 22. Harvest. Pentecost.—Laid in, at the feast of tabernacles, in September. M.—The Sept. have “the feast of gathering, in the middle of the (sacred) year.” The greatest solemnity of the Passover is mentioned, v. 18. H.

Ver. 24. In wait. Heb. and Sept. “shall desire.” C.—God engages to protect their land. M.

Ver. 25. Sacrifice of the paschal lamb, to which the Chaldee properly restrains this verse. C.

Ver. 26. Dam. Chal. “thou shalt not eat flesh with milk.” See C. 23:19.

Ver. 28. Wrote. God wrote on the tables, as he had promised, v. 1. C.—Moses recorded all in this book, as he was ordered, v. 27. S. Cyprian (de Sp. S.) and S. Augustine (q. 186,) infer, however, from this text, that the second tables had not the same honour as the first. The contrary appears from Deut. 10:4, He (God) wrote ... as before. Estius, Calmet, and Menoch. think the forty days here mentioned, were those which Moses spent with God to obtain the people’s pardon, and the law, at the same time. See C. 32:35. He continued all that time without meat or sleep, by the power of God, who supports Enoch and Elias in the vigour of health without corporal sustenance. Salien. A. 2544, in which year of the world he fixes the death of Job, the great prophet of the Gentiles.

Ver. 29. Horned. That is, shining, and sending forth rays of light like horns. Ch.—Sept. “encircled with glory.” S. Paul (2 Cor. 3:7,) says, the Hebrews could not look steadfastly at the face of Moses, on account of the glory of his countenance. Hence, he was forced to have a veil, which, the apostle observes, was not taken off from the old law till Christ appeared. The Jews and heretics still read the law and the gospel with a veil over their eyes and heart, without understanding them, as they are hidden to those who perish, 2 Cor. 4:3. The Jews are much enraged at some Christians, who have represented Moses with horns, as if, they say, he were a devil, or his wife an adulteress. Stacchus and Drusius.—Heb. “his skin was radiant” all over his face. These rays commanded respect and awe from the people, who had before said contemptuously, Moses—the man, (C. 32:1,) as they shewed that God was with him. They had not appeared before, though he had often conversed with the Lord: but now, having seen the glorious vision, they adhered to him during the remainder of his life, particularly when he enforced the obligations of the law to the people. H.—The Arabs make their hair stand up like little horns, when they are about 40 years old. Patric. ii. 4. Navig. Homer mentions the like custom, and Diomed laughs at Paris calling him the pretty-horned. Iliad xi. Many of the ancient heroes and gods are represented with horns, particularly Bacchus, whose history reminds us of many particulars, which belong to Moses. He was born or educated in the confines of Egypt, was exposed on the waters, in a box; had two mothers, and very beautiful. While his army enjoyed the light, the Indians were in darkness. He was preceded by a pillar, had women in his train, dried up rivers with his thyrsus or wand, which had crawled, like a serpent, &c. Huet. &c. S. Epiphanius (her. 55,) says the Idumeans adored Moses. Their idol is called Choze by Josephus, (Ant. xviii. 11,) which may be derived from Chus, the ancestor of Sephora, as Bacchus and Iacchus may denote “the son Bar, or the god Chus,” Jah-Chus, who was adored in Arabia; so that Moses, Choze, and Bacchus, probably mean the same person. Chus peopled that part of Arabia where the Hebrews sojourned. Num. 12:1. C.

Ver. 33. And having, &c. At first, he spoke uncovered. M.—The Protestants insert the word till in Italics, to insinuate that Moses spoke with a veil on, as S. Paul mentions; (H.) and Calmet would translate, “for Moses had ceased to address the people, and had put a veil upon his face,” as soon as he perceived that they could not bear the blaze of his countenance. This he did out of modesty, that they might not be afraid of coming to speak freely to him, (Jansenius) though it was also mysterious, as S. Paul remarks. For even until this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart, (2 Cor. 3:15,) as it is upon that of heretics, who cannot see the church. S. Aug. in Ps. 30. W.

Ver. 2. Sabbath. The frequent repetition of this precept, cannot escape the notice of the attentive reader. The sabbath was a distinctive mark of the Jews, and was generally observed by them with the utmost care, and even with scrupulosity. H.—They were not allowed to do on it any thing that had the appearance of servility, if it could be avoided without serious inconveniences. But in any urgent necessity of the sick, &c. they might provide meat, and do other work, that could not be done before. They might also repel an enemy, water cattle, &c. Though a mere rest be positively ordered, the design of it shewed that the day was to be spent in religious duties, reading the Bible, &c. Josephus assures us, many were so diligent herein, as to know almost the whole law by heart. T.

Ver. 3. No fire, to dress meat. The Rabbins say it is lawful to light a fire, to warm oneself, or for light. But they generally employ some other to do it for them. The Samaritans and Caraites look upon this as an evasion. C.—It was customary to light candles and dress meat before sun-set on Friday. On other festivals, even the greatest, this was not required, as they were not instituted chiefly in memory of God's rest, as the sabbath was. C. 12:16. H.

Ver. 19. Vestments, in which the vessels of the tabernacle were folded up. Vatable.

Ver. 22. And women, by the hands of their husbands, as the Heb. and Sept. intimate.—Tablets, (dextralia) ornaments worn on the right hand or arm.

Ver. 25. Spun. The wool, it seems, was dyed first, unless it were naturally of these colours. See Ex. 25:5. C.

EXODUS 36

Ver. 3. Vows, or voluntary oblations to Moses, according to the Heb. C.—These donations are called first-fruits, because they were the best of all things, and the first offerings that were made by the people, in the desert. T.—They shew great alacrity in performing this action, as it was to make some atonement for their liberality in honour of the golden calf. H.—But as matter alone will not suffice, unless it be properly managed, so neither will the letter of the Scripture instruct us, unless God teaches us, by his pastors. Ephes. 4:11. W.—From this place to the end, the Roman edition of the Sept. is very confused. That of Alcala agrees better with the Vulgate than the Alexandrian or Aldine. See Grabe. Almost all the three following chapters might be comprised of these words. The workmen did all according to God's prescription. Moses perhaps gave them plans of what each was to execute; and hence Calmet accounts for these repetitions. H.

Ver. 33. Bar, not mentioned, (C. 26:28,) but specified by Josephus (iii. 5,) at the west end of the tabernacle, going across the breadth of the planks. Tostat.

Ver. 38. Which heads, according to the Heb. and Sept. On some parts of the pillars the wood appeared.

EXODUS 37

Ver. 1. Half, duos semis cubitos, v. 6, and C. 25:10. T.

Ver. 9. Covering ... This indicated that the Scriptures were to be studied with diligence, as they have a literal and a mystical sense. S. Greg. Nys.

Ver. 14. Over-against, or under. C. 25:27. T.

Ver. 16. Censers. Heb. Kapoth, means broad deep dishes or bowls. C.—Wherein, meaning the golden vessels aforesaid. H.

EXODUS 38

Ver. 8. Mirrors. Formerly all sorts of metal, silver, copper, tin, &c. were used for mirrors, till the Europeans began to make them of glass. The best were made of a mixture of copper and tin. Plin. xxxiii. 9.—Watched. Hebrew, served like soldiers: fasting and praying, according to the Sept. and Chal. These devout women came thither with great alacrity, to shew their affection towards God, and to consecrate to his service what had hitherto served to nourish vanity. Such were the virgins, mentioned 2 Machabees 3:19, and those who were abused by the sons of Heli. 1 K. 2:22. Ann, the prophetess, and our blessed Lady, were thus also employed in the temple. Luke 2:37. Women kept watch, singing and dancing before the palace of the Persian kings. C.—When the tabernacle was fixed at Silo, small apartments were probably built for the convenience of these pious women. T.

Ver. 10. Brass. The Heb. does not say the pillars were of brass, but only the bases. The body was of wood, encircled with silver, v. 12. See C. 27:10. C.

Ver. 17. The, &c. Some render the Heb. “The bases of the pillars were of brass, the hooks of the pillars and circles were of silver, their chaptrels were covered with silver.” Bonfrere supposes that the pillars were of the Ionic order, and that the chaptrels here designate the summit or abacus; while the hooks (vuim) mean the voluta, (M.) or bolster, representing the head-dress of virgins in their long hair. Vitruvius. H.

Ver. 21. Ithamar, some time after this, (Num. 1:50,) was appointed to deliver the necessary vessels to the Levites; part of whose duty it was to take down the tabernacle and set it up again, and to keep an account of all things. M.

Ver. 24. Gifts, voluntarily. The following verse mentions what arose from the tax of half a sicle per head. C. 30:13.

Ver. 25. And it, &c. Heb. is rather more express, “And the silver given by those who were numbered, was a hundred talents, 1775 sicles of the weight of the sanctuary, v. 26. They gave each half a sicle, paid by all those who were 20 years old and upwards, amounting to 603,550 men.” Hence the talent would weigh exactly 3000 sicles, (C.) or 12,000 drachmas. Some say that the common talent weighed 100 pounds, and that of the sanctuary 120, each pound containing 25 sicles. D.

Ver. 29. Seventy. Heb. confines the number of talents to 70, and allows “two thousand and four hundred sicles.” The Greek interpreters vary.

Ver. 1. Vestments. Heb. distinguishes “the clothes of service” destined to fold up the tabernacle and vessels, from “the holy garments of Aaron.”

Ver. 3. Threads. Heb. “wires to work it in the blue ... with cunning work.” The ancients had the art of beating gold into thin plates, with which they adorned the horns of their victims, &c. Æneid iv. See Num. 16:48. C.

Ver. 19. Fastened to the girdle. This is not specified in the Heb. The Vulgate has abridged some verses, in these chapters, to avoid repetitions.

Ver. 24. Pomegranate, alternately. C. 28. Clement of Alexandria observes, that the 366 bells denote the leap year, in which Christ began to preach. T.

Ver. 27. Of fine linen, or cotton, and of common linen, as Pollux describes it. The Samaritan copy adds, “Breeches of linen, of byssus, of violet, of scarlet, of purple, of embroidery work, according to the command of the Lord.”

Ver. 29. Veneration, of which it was deserving. Heb. “the crown of holiness.” It reminded the high priest of his consecration to the Lord, and of the sanctity with which he ought to appear before him.

Ver. 43. Finished, exactly according to God’s prescriptions.—Blessed them, the people, who had contributed so liberally; and the workmen, who had performed their task so much to his satisfaction. C.—He also blessed the sacred vessels, as they were destined for the worship of God. H.

Ver. 2. Month of the second year, v. 15. The first day of every month was kept with some degree of solemnity, though it was not a day of rest. Num. 33:11. 1 K. 20:5. &c. C.

Ver. 13. Priesthood. Heb. "And thou shalt put upon Aaron the holy garments, and anoint him, and sanctify him, that he may serve me in the priest's office: (14) and thou shalt bring his sons, and put on them their tunics; (15) and thou shalt anoint them, as thou didst anoint their father, that they may perform the office of priests to me for ever, in their generations." As the priesthood was hereditary in Aaron's family, this first unction might suffice for all. Yet, the new high priests were always anointed till the days of our Saviour. C. 29:7.

Ver. 17. Cover of purple, goat skins, &c.

Ver. 18. Testimony, or tables of the law. The pagans enclosed various symbolical figures, cakes, &c. in their mystic arks. Clem. Alex. But how different were they from the sacred records of religion! C.

Ver. 24. Roof, covering both the holy of holies and the sanctuary. M.

Ver. 28. Laver. This is a repetition of v. 7, (C.) shewing that the command was fulfilled. H.

Ver. 32. Glory. The cloud which had rested over the tent, appointed for prayer, came now to the grand tabernacle, in the midst of the camp. C.—By its superior lustre, it signified that the glory of God was there. S. Aug. q. 173.

Ver. 33. Moses, out of respect, abstained from entering that day. C.—The cloud of legal observances, though designed to prefigure Christ and the gospel, seems however to hinder the Jews from recognizing them. S. Aug. T.

Ver. 36. A fire. The same cloud overshadowed the camp by day, and enlightened it by night. Chal. C. 13:22.

LEVITICUS

INTRODUCTION

The Book is called Leviticus: because it treats of the offices, ministries, rites and ceremonies of the Priests and Levites. The Hebrews call it Vayyicra, from the word with which it begins; (Ch.) “and (the Lord) called.” The a at the end of this word is printed in a smaller size, to insinuate that little children should begin to read this Book first, if we may give any credit to those who attempt to account for all the irregularities sanctioned by the great Massora! But such irregular letters are the faults of some transcribers, and are of no authority. Kennicott Dis. 1.—This Book is styled also, “The Priests’ Law.” H.—The seven first chapters explain the sacrifices; the sixteen next, the offices and ordination of the Priests and Levites. From the 23d chapter to the end, the feasts are designated, and some regulations respecting vows are interspersed. All these rites and sacrifices foreshewed the eucharistic sacrifice of Jesus Christ, (S. Leo. ser. 8. de pas. Trid. sef. 22. c. 1.) and tended to keep the Hebrews employed, and at a greater distance from idolatry. S. Jer. on Isai. i. &c.—These prescriptions were given during the month of Nisan, in the second year after the exit, while the Hebrews remained at the foot of Mount Sinai. God spoke from the New Tabernacle. T.—In the Book of Deuteronomy we find but few regulations respecting sacrifices, as Moses had sufficiently explained them in this book. D.—If we confine ourselves to the letter, we may say these precepts are not good, and carnal; (Ezec. 20:25. Heb. 7:16) but if we consider the spirit, we shall confess that they are excellent, and spiritual. Rom. 7:14. 2 Cor. 3:6. Orig. c. Cels. vii. C.

LEVITICUS 1

Ver. 2. Offer, voluntarily, without any command. Some sacrifices were of precept. Ex. 22:29. M.—These first chapters are addressed to the people; the 6th from v. 9, to the priests. Oxen, goats, and sheep, pigeons, and turtles, were to be offered in sacrifice, and small birds also, in the purification of lepers, (C. 14:4,) as they might easily be procured. C.—By sacrifice, we testify the dominion of God over all. They were offered by the patriarchs, and by all nations. God requireth that the victim should be without blemish, and slain with certain ceremonies wisely ordained. Ps. 103:24. W.—A sacrifice. Hebrew korban, a present of any sort. Mark 7.—Sheep and goats, v. 10. The same term, tson, signifies both. M.

Ver. 3. A holocaust. That is, a whole burnt-offering; (olocauston) so called, because the whole victim was consumed with fire; and given in such manner to God as wholly to evaporate, as it were, for his honour and glory; without having any part of it reserved for the use of man. The other sacrifices of the Old Testament were either offerings for sin, or peace-offerings: and these latter again were either offered in thanksgiving for blessing received, or by way of prayer for new favours or graces. So that sacrifices were then offered to God for four different ends or intentions, answerable to the different obligations which man has to God: 1. By way of adoration, homage, praise, and glory, due to his divine Majesty. 2. By way of thanksgiving for all benefits received from him. 3. By way of confessing and craving pardon for sins. 4. By way of prayer and petition for grace and relief in all necessities. In the New Law we have but one sacrifice, viz. that of the body and blood of Christ: but this one sacrifice of the New Testament perfectly answers all these four ends; and both priests and people, as often as it is celebrated, ought to join in offering it up for these four ends. Ch. S. Aug. de C. D. viii. 17. S. Chrys. in Ps. 95.—We have an altar, (Heb. 13:10,) on which the unbloody sacrifice is offered, (Matt. 26:25,) as the blood of Christ was on the cross. Heb. 9:25. W.

Ver. 4. Victim. To transfer all the curses due to him upon it, (Eus. Demon. i. 10,) and to testify that he gives it up entirely for the honour of God. Lyran.—The Egyptians cut off the head of the victim, and vented upon it imprecations, begging that the gods would discharge upon it all the evils which they had deserved. Then they sold it to some foreigner, or threw it into the Nile. Herod. ii. 39. All nations seem to have acknowledged, that life would be given for life. Hanc animam vobis pro veliore damus: (Ovid Fast. i.) and they had holocausts, in imitation of the Hebrews. Bochart.—Expiation. Heb. “it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him,” provided he be in proper dispositions. M.—The primary intention of the holocaust was to honour God: but this insured his favour also, and pardon. D.

Ver. 5. He, by the hands of the priests, (C. 10:1,) as the Sept. express it, “they shall immolate;” (M.) though we might infer from this text, that the person who offered the victim, had to slay it; (C.) while the priests alone could pour the blood upon and around the altar. Without the effusion of blood remission is not made. Heb. 9:22. H.

Ver. 6. They. Regularly the Levites performed this office. The skin belonged to the priest. C. 7:8. C.

Ver. 7. Fire. Heb. and Sept. place the fire first, then the wood. It was the sacred fire which was never extinguished, but removed from the altar in marches, (C. 4:13,) perhaps in a censer or pan. H.

Ver. 8. All things, &c. Heb. pador, may signify the fat, or the trunk of the animal. C.

Ver. 9. Sweet. Not that the Deity can take delight in sweet odours; but he is pleased with the devotion of men. For their advancement in piety, he required these sacrifices; 1. to keep the people from idolatry; 2. to teach them to consecrate their body and effects to him, as well as their souls, to serve justice unto sanctification; (Rom. 6:19. Jo. 4:24,) as without the help of exterior observances, the mind will hardly rise to the contemplation of truth; 3. to prefigure the greater mysteries of the Christian religion, of which the law was only a shadow, incapable of conferring justifying grace. Jo. 1:17. Gal. 3:11. W.—The law was our pedagogue, in Christ, that we might be justified by faith, v. 24.

Ver. 10. Male. Lyranus seems to have read “a year old,” in the Vulg. But it is not found in the Heb. or in any version. It may have been taken from Exod. 12:5, where the paschal lamb must be a male of one year.—Blemish. The Sept. add, “and he shall put his hand upon its head.” H.

Ver. 14. Pigeons. Heb. and Sept. say nothing about the age; though the Rabbins assure us, that old turtles and young pigeons were to be immolated, as being more excellent. God requires only what each person may easily procure. This third species of holocaust was chiefly intended for the poor. C. 12:8. But if they could not afford even this, they might offer flour. C. 2.

Ver. 15. The neck. Some say, without pulling the head off (Grotius); which the Rabbins deny. C.

Ver. 16. Throat. Heb. mierath, is rendered “the crop and its contents,” by the Chal. Syr. and Sam.

Ver. 17. Pinions, as if it were to be roasted. Eusebius remarks, that the pagans plunged their birds into the sea, then poured the blood round the altar, and afterwards burnt them. Abram did not divide the birds. Gen. 15:10. C.—Oblation. Heb. “made by fire;” or which must be all consumed, except the crop and feathers. H.

Ver. 1. One, (anima). The soul is put to denote the whole person.—Of sacrifice. Heb. mincha, which is applied to inanimate things, particularly to flour, “a present of wheat.” Vatable.—As the other sacrifices have peculiar names, this is barely called sacrifice by the Vulg. It was instituted, 1. for the poor; 2. to support the ministers of religion; 3. to shew that God was to be honoured with the fruits of the earth; 4. sacrifice being intended as a sort of feast, bread, salt, wine, and oil accompany it; and also incense, which was almost solely reserved for God. M.—The person who offered the sacrifice, had to furnish all things belonging to it. The Sam. and Sept. add at the end of this verse, “Behold what is the offering of the Lord.” Similar words occur, (v. 6 and 16,) in Heb. Sacrifices of flour were the most ancient of all. Ovid (Fast. ii.) says, Farra tamen veteres jaciebant, farra metebant, &c. “Numa taught the people to worship the gods with fruits and flour, and to make supplication with a salted cake.” (Plin. xviii. 2.) Frugē deos colere, & molâ salsâ supplicare. C.

Ver. 2. Memorial. “To worship and celebrate the name of God.” Louis de Dieu.

Ver. 3. Holy of holies. That is, most holy; as being dedicated to God, and set aside by his ordinance for the use of his priests. Ch.—All was to be eaten or consumed in the tabernacle. The high priest offered a gomor full of flour and oil, rather baked, every day. C. 6:20. C.

Ver. 9. Out of. The handful, which shall be burnt, shall cause God to remember and grant the request of the offerer, equally as if the whole were consumed. M.

Ver. 11. Without leaven or honey. No leaven or honey was to be used in the sacrifice offered to God: to signify that we are to exclude from the pure worship of the gospel, all double-dealing and affection to carnal pleasures. Ch.—The prohibition of leaven regarded these sacrifices. It was offered with the first-fruits, (C. 23:17,) and perhaps also in peace-offerings. C. 7:13. Honey is here rejected, as incompatible with the other ingredients, to admonish us to lead a penitential life, and to keep at a greater distance from the customs of the pagans, who generally accompanied their oblations with honey. Ezech. 16:18. Herodotus (B. ii.) says, the Egyptians used honey in sacrifice. C.—By unleavened bread, the Hebrews were reminded of their flight out of Egypt; and by refraining from honey, they were taught to act like men. M.

Ver. 12. First-fruits, &c. to be voluntarily given to the priest, in honour of God. The honey arising from the dates might also be offered.—It was little inferior to that of bees. Josep. Bel. v. 3. See Num. 15:19.

Ver. 13. Salt. In every sacrifice salt was to be used, which is an emblem of wisdom and discretion, without which none of our performances are agreeable to God. Ch.—Salt is not prescribed in the sacrifices of animals. But it was to be used in them, as we learn from the Jews, and from S. Mark 9:48. Every victim shall be salted. The ancient poets never specify salt in their descriptions of sacrifices. But Pliny assures us, that in his time it was of the greatest authority, and always used in sacrifice, with cakes. Maxime in sacris intelligebatur salis auctoritas, quando nulla conficiuntur sine molâ salsâ. B. xxxi. 7.—Covenant. It is so called, because it was a symbol of the durable condition of the alliance with God, which was renewed in every sacrifice; (C.) or it may signify “the salt prescribed” by God: for the law and covenant are often used synonymously. M.—Let your speech be always in grace, seasoned with salt. Col. 4:6. See Num. 18:19.

Ver. 14. And break, &c. Heb. has simply, “corn beaten out (or ready to be beaten out) of full ears.” H.—These were to be offered at the Passover. D.

Ver. 1. Peace-offerings. Peace, in the Scripture language, signifies happiness, welfare, or prosperity; in a word, all kinds of blessings. Such sacrifices, therefore, as were offered either on occasion of blessings received, or to obtain new favours, were called pacific or peace-offerings. In these some part of the victim was consumed with fire on the altar of God: other parts were eaten by the priests, and the persons for whom the sacrifice was offered. Ch.—Female beasts might here be sacrificed, but not birds. The victims were either offered to praise God for past favours, or to comply with some vow, or were perfectly free. C. 7:12. Three sorts of victims, the ox, the sheep, and the goat, denoted all those who served God in innocence, or in the state of penance. D. Of these sacrifices “of the perfect,” none of the unclean could taste. C. 7:20. When only flour or bread was given, the donor received no part again.

Ver. 2. Which shall. Heb. “which he gives, he shall slay it ... the priests shall pour,” &c. Yet some assert, that laymen were not allowed to approach the altar.

Ver. 3. Fat. All the fat was carefully presented to the Lord. The Persians offered this alone. Omentum in flamma pingue liquefaciens. Catul. Epig. de Magis.

Ver. 4. Flanks. S. Jerom sometimes translates the Heb. loins, as the Sept. and Sym. do; (Ps. 37:7) and this Bochart believes is the most proper signification. C.—Two is not specified in the Latin, nor little in the Hebrew.

Ver. 5. For a. Some translate, “upon the,” others “after the burnt-sacrifice;” as if that were always to be offered first, every day. C.—But it seems that the peace-offering was an imitation of the holocaust, with respect to the fat, caul, and kidneys, which were to be entirely consumed. H.

Ver. 8. It. Heb. and Sept. “he shall slay,” v. 2, 13. C.

Ver. 9. Whole rump. Sept. “the loin without blemish.” The tail of the Arabian sheep is extremely large and fat, weighing eight or ten pounds; so that it is necessary to support it on a vehicle. Busbecq. ep. 3. The tail was not sacrificed in any other species. M.

Ver. 10. With, &c. Heb. “and the two kidneys with their fat by the flanks, and the great lobe of the liver, above the kidneys, shall they take.” H.—All our affections must be consecrated to God, and our passions kept under. D.

Ver. 11. Food, destined for the honour of God, and to be consumed by fire. In other places, God calls these sacrifices his food, and the altar his table. C. 21:21. Mal. 1:7. 12.

Ver. 17. Fat. It is meant of the fat, which by the prescription of the law was to be offered on God’s altar: not of the fat of meat, such as we commonly eat. Ch.—This distinction is sufficiently insinuated; (C. 7:25,) whence it also appears that the fat, here forbidden, is only that, which, in all sacrifices, appertains to the Lord, v. 9, 10. The fat which was intermingled with the flesh might be eaten, and even the rest if the animal was not sacrificed. God repeatedly forbade the use of blood. C. 17:13. Yet the Jews abstain from the fat also of all oxen, sheep, and goats; (Josep. iii. 10,) and some, adhering to the words of this text, forbid the use of fat indiscriminately. C.—A Lapidé condemns it, if the animal might be offered in sacrifice, though it were slain at home.

Ver. 2. Ignorance. To be ignorant of what we are bound to know is sinful: and for such culpable ignorance, these sacrifices, prescribed in this and the following chapter, were appointed. Ch.—Not to be done. Hence the Rabbins admit sins of ignorance, only against the negative precepts. But when God forbids one thing, he commands the contrary;

and we may sin by ignorance against any of his ordinances. If the ignorance be voluntary, it enhances the crime; and Aristotle well observes that drunkards, who do an injury, are to be doubly punished, because their fault is voluntary in its cause, (ad Nicom. iii. 7). But if the ignorance were perfectly involuntary, and inculpable, no sacrifice was required; so that God here speaks only of that sort of ignorance which involved some degree of negligence. This fault could not be forgiven without interior good dispositions. The sacrifice only reached to the cleansing of the flesh, (Heb. 9:13,) or to screen the culprit from the severity of the law and of the magistrates; (C.) though they might help the inward dispositions of the heart, and thus contribute to obtain God's pardon. Orig. S. Aug. q. 20. The difference between peccatum and delictum, is not perfectly ascertained. Some think the former word denotes sins of malice, and the latter those of ignorance. Tirinus maintains the contrary, as a more costly sacrifice, he says, is required for the latter. H.

Ver. 3. Anointed. That is, "the high priest." Sept. Inferior priests were not anointed, except the sons of Aaron, at the beginning. C.—Ignorance in such a one is greatly to be avoided, as it tends to scandalize the people. H.—The same ceremonies are prescribed, as on the day of expiation; only the priest did not enter the most holy place. —Offend, in some smaller matter. If he engaged his brethren in the crime of idolatry, he should die. Deut. 13:15. C.—Before the solemn unction, he might be expiated, like one of the princes. M.

Ver. 3. Calf. Heb. par, does not specify the age. C.

Ver. 5. The blood. As the figure of the blood of Christ shed for the remission of our sins; and carried by him into the sanctuary of heaven.

Ver. 6. Seven. A number consecrated in Scripture, (C.) and not superstitious. W.—Apuleius (Met. xi.) mentions it. Septies submerso fluctibus capite. C.—Sanctuary, or most holy place. M.

Ver. 12. Ashes of the victims. They were first laid beside the altar of holocausts. By this ceremony, the priest begged that his sins might be removed from the sight of God, (M.) by virtue of Christ's sacrifice, who suffered out of the gate of Jerusalem. Heb. 13:13. The high priest was obliged to offer this sacrifice himself, to expiate his own sin, as well as that of the people. Heb. 9:7.

Ver. 13. Multitude assembled. Sept. add, "be involuntarily ignorant, and no one of the congregation perceive the truth, (or word,) and shall transgress, by commission or omission, one of all the precepts of the Lord." Such was the offence of Saul and the people. 1 K. 14:33. On these occasions, the elders were to put their hands on the victim, to acknowledge the general offence, if it were not of too heinous a nature to be expiated by sacrifice. See Deut. 13:12.

Ver. 22. A prince. King, magistrate, general, chief of a tribe, or great family; in a word, one elevated above the rest (Nasi); as appears, Num. 1:4. 7:2.

Ver. 24. He. Sam. and Sept. read, “they shall have,” referring it to the priests.

Ver. 26. Him. Moses does not here specify what was to be done with the flesh. But (C. 6:26,) he commands it to be given to the priests. C.—In the sacrifices for the sins of the multitude, or of the priest, all was consumed; to express a greater detestation of such offences, (T.) and that the priests might derive no benefit from them. Theod. q. 3. S. Tho. i. 2. q. 102. a. 3. W.—Those who offered these victims received no part of them again, nor were oil or incense used; as all delicacies must be rejected by penitents. T.

Ver. 27. The land. A rustic or plebeian. M.—The offences of such might be expiated by the sacrifice of a goat, ewe, lamb, ram, two pigeons, or flour. C. 5:7. 11:15. C.

Ver. 29. Of, &c. One Heb. MS. the Sept. and Syriac read, “in the place in which he shall slay the holocaust.” The Sam. has they slay, both here and v. 24 and 33, which seems the truer reading. Kennicott.

Ver. 35. For a. Heb. may be “according to, like (H.) upon, besides, after the holocausts.” C. See C. 3:5.

Ver. 1. Swearing. We are accountable for the sins of others, to which we are accessory, as appears from this and part of the following chapter. No distinction of persons is here noticed. If any one, therefore, be witness to another’s promise, confirmed by oath, and, being cited to the bar, refuse to speak, he shall be guilty of sin, and offer the sacrifice proscribed (v. 6,) for all the preceding cases. Restitution must also be made to the injured person. M.—But others suppose that no sacrifice was allowed for such an obstinate wretch as when not answered when the judge swore or adjured him. He was liable to be put to death. The associate of the thief fell under the like punishment as the thief himself, when he would not reveal the theft to the judge. Prov. 29:24. Others again understand this swearing to mean blaspheming God. If the hearer do not reprehend him, he shall suffer as his accomplice. Orig. Philo.—Junius thinks that the neglect of fraternal correction, was to be expiated by the sacrifice prescribed for the sins of ignorance, concerning which Moses is treating. But it seems that the person here mentioned was to die, as the words he shall bear his iniquity, commonly denote. C. 19:8. &c. C.—When perjury prejudiceth another's cause, we are bound to reveal what we know to the judge, if it can be done so as to avoid scandal. W.—Not. Hebrew editions read loa, instead of la, both here and in 34 other places; an irregularity unknown in some MSS. and to the Samaritan copy. Perhaps it may have been occasioned by lu, “to him,” being of the same sound with la. Kennic.

Ver. 2. Beast. All wild beasts were deemed unclean; but domestic clean cattle, though slain, did not defile; (C.) while some of the unclean did, even alive. C. 11:26. 31. H.—Fishes are comprised under the name reptiles; yet some were not unclean. C. 11:9. The Sept. neglect reptiles, and put “the carcasses of impure abominations;” by which they probably mean dogs, and such things as the Egyptians adored. This verse does not regard those who had only touched something unclean, as such were to be purified at night, by washing their garments; but it refers to those who, having neglected that ordinance, had still ventured to touch something sacred, and were therefore required to offer the sacrifice, assom, (C.) as for an irreligious behaviour towards God. T.

Ver. 3. Of man, who may be in a state of legal uncleanness. If he neglect or forget to purify himself, he must offer a sacrifice, either such as he may choose, (S. Aug. q. 2.) or such as the priest may require. Lyran. C.

Ver. 4. Lips. This is necessary before he can be punished by men; but every secret promise binds before God. Tostat.—Evil or good: any thing whatsoever, whether favour or punishment, whether the completion of it be difficult or easy. C.—Thus parents sometimes foolishly swear that they will chastise their children unmercifully; libertines that they will live in luxuries as long as they have any money; ill-natured people that they will never speak to such a one, that they will murder, &c. To execute such promises, even confirmed by an oath, would be a double crime. Let them ask pardon of God for their rash oath. Philo.—Herod made his oath a pretext for killing the Baptist, deluding himself, perhaps, with a false interpretation of this law. H.—As such hasty oaths are easily forgotten, when the guilty person recollected himself, he was bound to confess his fault to the priest in the following manner, according to the Rabbins: Placing his hands between the horns of his victim, he shall say, "I beseech you, Lord, I have sinned; I have committed iniquity and prevarication; I have committed such a fault. I repent, I am filled with sorrow and confusion for having done so; I will relapse no more." These doctors teach, that without confession and sorrow no sacrifice will remit sin. C.—To preserve the secret of confession, the priests were ordered to eat the victims alone. Philo. &c. T.

Ver. 5. Let, &c. Heb. "and surely when he is guilty in one of these things, he shall confess that he hath sinned therein; (6) and he shall bring his sin-offering unto the Lord, for his transgression," &c. Confession to the priest was requisite, before all the other sacrifices for sin. See Josep. iii. 10. H.

Ver. 9. Sin. The flesh belonged to the priest. C. 6:26.

Ver. 11. Ephi, or a gomor, which is the tenth part of three pecks and three pints, English. Arbuthnot.—For sin, and therefore to shew how odious sin is to God, he will not allow any frankincense to be offered. M.

Ver. 12. Memorial. See C. 2:2. At the end, the Heb. and Sept. add, "It is a sin-offering;" peccatum. C.—Hence the priests are said to eat the sins of the people, Osee 4:8.

Ver. 15. The ceremonies: omitted in Heb. and Sept.—Sanctified, neglecting to pay the first-fruits; or, by mistake, eating any of the victims reserved for God, or for the priests.—Two sicles. S. Jerom seems to have read in the dual number, whereas the Hebrew pointed copies have sicles indefinitely; and the Rabbins understand two, when the word is plural and undetermined. Theodoret reads fifty, which some maintain is the ancient translation of the Sept. though it is not found in any of our copies. Hebrew may be rendered "a ram (or) according to thy estimation, sicles of silver." The particle or is sometimes understood. It is probable that when the fault was considerable, a ram was to be sacrificed, and restitution made of what was due with the fifth part besides; but if the fault was small, the priest determined how many sicles were to be presented for sacred purposes.—Sanctuary. See Ex. 30:13.

Ver. 17. Through ignorance. These words are not found in the Heb. or Sept.; but the context shews, that they must be understood. Some pretend that the ignorance here spoken of, is that by which a person doubts whether the thing which he touched was unclean or not. But we may explain these last verses as a recapitulation of what had been already ordered. C.

Ver. 18. Sin. If it were grievous, the priest required a more valuable victim, 5:15.

Ver. 19. Lord. Heb. "It is a victim for the sin which he has committed against the Lord." From this chapter, as well as from Num. 5:7, it is obvious that a special confession was necessary, not only for those who had fallen into the disorder of leprosy, which was a figure of sin, and often inflicted by God in punishment of it; but also, when they had given way to the smallest transgression against the commands and ceremonies of the Lord. H.—This custom is still observed by the Jews. Galatinus x. 3.

Ver. 2. Despising: interpretatively; not formally, as Num. 15. Estius.—The Lord, who knows the truth, and is an avenger of all injustice, even the most secret. H.—The law inflicts indeed a smaller punishment, as these offences are supposed to be secret, and the offender is thus invited to repent, and to repair the injury done. When the crime is public, the law is more severe. C.—Heb. "if a soul transgress and sin against the Lord." Sept. "If any one wilfully despise the commands," &c. H.—Trust. Heb. and Sept. "or a sum given for traffic for their common benefit."—Oppression, by any means whatsoever, detaining the wages of the labourer, &c.

Ver. 3. Lost. We acquire no title to the thing by finding it. The Roman law, as well as divines, condemn those who appropriate the thing found to their own use, as guilty of theft, whether they knew to whom it belonged or not; and Plato greatly commends the law of Solon, "Take not what thou didst not put down," a rule which the Dyrbeans and the people of Biblos rigorously observed. We may, however, take up what is lost, (C.) and endeavour to find the owner, who must indemnify us for our trouble; and, if we never find him, we are directed to give the price to the poor, for the owner's welfare. H.

Ver. 4. Convicted, by his own conscience, and by the judgment of the priest to whom he has confessed his sin. The Heb. expresses the different sorts of sins specified above, which the Vulgate denotes by the word offence.

Ver. 5. Wronged. Heb. and Chaldee add, "in the day of his sin-offering;" and the Sept. "in which he has convicted." No unnecessary delay in making restitution can be allowed to the sincere penitent, who wishes to make his peace with God.

Ver. 6. The. Heb. "thy estimation for a sin-offering." H.—Wilful sins require a more noble victim than those of ignorance, which were expiated by the sacrifice of a goat. M.

Ver. 9. Holocaust. The regulations respecting it, as they regard the priests, are here given, as C. 1 directions were given to those who represent the victims.—Morning. All the parts of the victim were not laid on at the same time. The like was observed during the day also, when no other sacrifices were to be offered on this altar.—Of the same, not strange, unhallowed fire, but such as was kept continually burning on the altar of holocausts, as the Heb. intimates; "the fire of the altar shall be burning in it." During the marches in the desert, it is not written how this fire was preserved. The Persians believed that their eternal fire came down from heaven, and the vestal virgins kept their sacred fire at Rome, with superstitious care. Theophrastus (ap. Euseb. præp. i. 9,) mentions the keeping of fire in the temples, as one of the most ancient rites of religion.

Ver. 11. Others; such as were worn on common occasions, out of the tabernacle.—And shall, &c. Heb. has only, "unto a clean place," as the other versions and some Latin copies read. The meaning of the addition is, that all the bones, &c. must be perfectly reduced to dust, before they be carried out of the camp. C.

Ver. 12. Fat, along with the whole burnt-offering. M.

Ver. 13. The perpetual fire. This fire came from heaven, (infra chap. 9:24,) and was always kept burning on the altar: as a figure of the heavenly fire of divine love, which ought to be always burning in the heart of a Christian. Ch.—It must be fed by assiduous meditation on the Scripture and holy things. D.

Ver. 14. Sacrifice of flour, monee. C. 2:1.—And libations. These words are added, to shew that oil and wine accompanied this sacrifice.

Ver. 16. He. Only the priests, who were actually officiating, could partake of it. C.

Ver. 18. Lord. As long as this law shall be enforced. M.—Sanctified. Theodoret (q. 5,) seems to assert, that all such were obliged to serve the altar in some function or other. If any unclean person touched the victims wilfully, he was slain; if, by mistake, the blood sprinkled a garment, it was to be washed, v. 27.

Ver. 20. Evening. And this shall continue as long as they are high priests, from the day of their consecration, (Josep. iii. 20.; Cajetan,) a perpetual sacrifice. C.

Ver. 22. Rightfully. According to the law, which decides that, if the first-born be deformed, the next shall succeed. C. 21:18. Heb. “the priest, of his sons, who is anointed in his stead, shall offer it.” No mention is made of its being hot, either here or in the Sept. H.

Ver. 23. Sacrifice of flour, not of animals. Ex. 29:28.

Ver. 25. Sin of individuals. The victims offered by the priest, or by the whole people, were to be burnt. C. 4:7.

Ver. 26. Tabernacle. No part shall be given to those who are not of the sacerdotal race. C.

Ver. 27. Place, in the court, that so it may be worn again. M.

Ver. 28. Sodden, or boiled. Such vessels, of private people, as had been used to boil part of the victim, (1 K 2:13,) were either to be abandoned to the service of the altar, or broken, &c. C.—Earthen vessels might imbibe some part of the consecrated juice. M.

Ver. 30. Fire. As they are the victims for the sins of the priest and of the people. C. 4:6. 18. M.

LEVITICUS 7

Ver. 1. Trespass. Trespasses, for which these offerings were to be made, were less offences, than those for which the sin-offerings were appointed. Ch.—Delictum, trespass, answers to the Heb. asham, and the Gr. plemmeleia; (H.) being of a more extensive signification than the Hebrew chete, sin, as it comprises even sins against knowledge. Parkhurst. See C. 4:2.—No particular ceremonies are enjoined, (v. 7,) only a he-goat or a ram was to be offered; if the former, the rump, &c. were to be given (v. 3); if the latter, the fat of the intestines and the reins were to be offered, and the blood poured out at the foot of the altar.—Victim. Sept. “ram.”—Holy. To be eaten by priests, and in the court of the tabernacle, v. 6. C.—Sins of commission, peccata, and of omission, delicta, are equally offensive to God. S. Aug. q. 20. W.

Ver. 8. Skin. Of these skins a great profit was made. Philo de præm. sacerd.

Ver. 9. Priest's; to be divided among his brethren, v. 10. They officiated a week by turns. C.—Each, therefore, claimed the parts allotted by God to the priest on duty. But it is not certain what part they could retain for their own use. Some think that the unbaked flour alone was to be distributed equally, v. 10. Bonfrere.

Ver. 11. This. Here the Roman, Sept., Junius, &c. commence the 7th chapter.

Ver. 12. Oil. Any of these sorts of bread would suffice. Jacob and Jethro had formerly offered sacrifices of praise, and the Greeks had some which they termed Soteria. C.

Ver. 13. Bread, for the use of the priests. C. 2:11.

Ver. 14. Of which leavened bread, one, representing all the rest, shall be offered for first-fruits. Heb. “a heave-offering,” not as a sacrifice. M.—Others maintain that a loaf, without leaven, was laid upon the altar; and all the rest given to the priest. C.

Ver. 15. Morning. Thus were they admonished to let the poor share of the bounty which God had bestowed upon them. Theod. and Philo.

Ver. 16. It. The victim of thanksgiving was more worthy, as it proceeded from a more disinterested motive. M.—Such victims as were perfectly voluntary might be received, though they had some defect C. 22:23.

Ver. 17. Fire. No part must be reserved so long, as to become offensive and putrid. C.

Ver. 18. Yea rather. Heb. “it is an abomination to be thrown away,” and the soul, &c. Thus by neglecting to comply exactly with God's commands, we lose the fruits of our former piety. H.—The flesh of these victims might be eaten in any clean place, by all those who were not defiled. C. 10:14. Joseph. T.

Ver. 19. Shall eat of it. That is, of the flesh of the thanks-offering. Ch.—People might eat the flesh of animals which had been touched by something unclean. Deut. 12:15. 22. But victims, defiled by any accident, were to be burnt. The others were to be eaten only by such as were clean. M.

Ver. 20. People excommunicated, or even slain, either by God, or by the judge. C.

Ver. 21. Uncleanness of man, means a person defiled, or his excrements. A Lapide.

Ver. 23. Eat, when they have been once immolated. See C. 3:17.

Ver. 24. Uses. Heb. “for any other use: but you shall not eat it.” Origen (hom. 5,) seems to reject this fat entirely.

Ver. 26. Beasts. Hence the Rabbins except the blood of fishes, as it is not specified. C.

Ver. 29. Sacrifice ... Libations, flour, wine, and oil. Lyran.

Ver. 30. Hands, upon a silver dish. The priest shall direct his hands to form a triple cross. Cajet. T.

Ver. 31. The breast, and other parts mentioned, Deut. 18:3.

Ver. 34. Separated from the breast for the Lord, and waved before Him, as the Heb. intimates.

Ver. 35. Anointing. Le Clerc translates the food. On this Aaron shall be maintained. This shall be his salary or portion, in quality of God’s anointed.

Ver. 36. Israel. Heb. adds, “in the day of his anointing,” or consecration. C.

Ver. 37. Law. Six sorts of sacrifices are here specified, holocausts, flour-offerings, sin and trespass-offerings, those for the consecration of priests, and the peace-offerings.

Ver. 38. In, or at the foot of Mount Sinai. H.

Ver. 2. Bread. This basket stood near the altar of holocausts, in the court. Most part of this chapter has been already explained. Exod. 29.

Ver. 7. Garment, subucula, which is styled a strait tunic. Ex. 28. This was girded close, while the upper garment (máil) was fastened by the ephod, contrary to what Josephus and others have asserted. C.—Truth. When the ephod and rational were joined together, God gave his oracles, 1 K. 23:9. No woman could wear the ornaments, which were made by divine wisdom. S. Cyril in Lev. xiii. 6. W.

Ver. 9. Sanctification. Having these words engraven on it, Holiness to the Lord.

Ver. 12. Head. To shew that he was the fountain of the priesthood, and that power was derived from him.

Ver. 13. Linen. Aquila translates “inward.” It was next to the skin.—Mitres, caps. Ex. 28:4. These were the garments of priests. Those of the Levites are not particularized. About six years before the destruction of the temple by Titus, the Levites obtained of Agrippa leave to wear the linen tunic, which was deemed a great innovation, seldom left unpunished. Joseph. Ant. xx. 8.

Ver. 14. Calf. This ceremony was repeated for seven days, v. 33. C.—At the same time, Moses consecrated the altars and all the furniture of the tabernacle, v. 10.

Ver. 23. Foot. The whole person was thus sensibly consecrated to God’s service. H.—The pagan high priest, among the Romans, was adorned in silk and ribbands, with a crown of gold. Being conducted under ground, the blood of an ox, which had been sacrificed, came upon his head, ears, and other parts of his body, through little holes, made in a board; and thus besmeared, he was recognized by the people. Prudent. hym. S. Romani, Saumaise. &c.

Ver. 27. Who having. Moses supported and directed the hands of the priest.

Ver. 30. Vestments. It is a maxim among the Rabbins, that a priest without his vestments, is not considered as such; and he is put to death, if he should dare to approach the altar in that condition. When the priests lay aside their sacred robes, they are looked upon as laymen. C.—The high priest was consecrated by the unction on the head; (v. 12,) those of an inferior condition, were sprinkled with ointment mixed with blood, &c. M.

Ver. 33. Finished. During this time, some say they were allowed to go out for a short time, to satisfy the calls of nature; while others say they were to continue always in the tabernacle, or in the court. Afterwards the priests on duty continued all the time in the temple, adorned with their sacred robes. The high priest could not wear his on other occasions, except some very urgent affair require it, as was the case when Jaddus went to meet Alexander. C.

Ver. 34. Done ... so. The Heb. adds, “the Lord hath commanded to do, to make atonement for you.” H.

Ver. 35. Watches. They might be permitted to take a little sleep during part of this week. T.—In: Heb. “at the door of the tabernacle of the assembly, attentive to the ordinances of the Lord.” H.—Die, as Nadab did afterwards. Moses officiated as the consecrating priest. One of the most venerable of the order, consecrated the successors of Aaron. Some assert, that they only invested him with the pontifical robes. Num. 20:25. 1 Mac. 10:21. C.—The power of Moses was extraordinary; that of Aaron was ordinary, designed to continue in after ages. S. Aug. q. 23. None must presume to take this office of priest, but such as are called by God. Heb. 5. Those of the old law, were initiated by sacred rites or sacraments, which signified the grace of God, requisite to perform their duties well. They were chosen from among men, to be more holy; of which their washing was a sign, as their splendid robes were to remind them of their sublime dignity and authority over the people. The high priest had seven special ornaments: 1. white linen, to denote purity; 2. a curious girdle, intimating that he must use discretion in all things; 3. the long tunic of various colours, with bells, &c. signifying heavenly conversation upon earth, union and harmony in faith and morals; 4. an ephod, with two precious stones on the shoulders, teaching him to support the failings of the multitude; 5. the rational, with its ornaments, shew that the pontiff should be solicitous to teach sound and profitable doctrine; 6. the mitre indicates, that all his actions should be referred to God above; and lastly, the plate of gold denotes that he should have God always in view, and never forget that consummate holiness which He requireth. See S. Jerom ep. ad Fabiol.—The three ornaments of the priests, put them in mind of purity, discretion, and a right intention, to be observed in all their conduct. On this occasion, a change was introduced in the priesthood, as the law was new; the first-born being obliged to give place to Aaron's family. Thus, when these were deprived of the exclusive privilege, and people from any family were chosen by Christ, the law of Moses ceased to exist. Heb. 7. The ordination of the former was a figure of that sacrament, by which Christian priests still receive grace and power. 2 Tim. 1. Theod. q. 48. Num. S. Aug. de bono conj. 24. W.

LEVITICUS 9

Ver. 1. Come. From the consecration of the tabernacle, (M.) and of Aaron.—Israel. The princes of the tribes. C.—They were to offer sacrifice by the hands of their new priests.

Ver. 2. Calf. As they had formerly adored a calf, so now they sacrifice one to God. S. Jer. in Jer. vii.

Ver. 3. Children. Sam. and Sept. “the ancients,” or princes of the people, for whom a he-goat is sacrificed.—Old. Not above, though they might be younger.

Ver. 4. Offering, &c. Heb. simply, “and a flour-offering tempered with oil; for,” &c. H.—All these sacrifices were accompanied with an offering of this nature, as they were in imitation of a dinner presented to God. M.—You. By the cloud, resting upon the tabernacle, or by fire proceeding thence. God will manifest his presence by miracles, v. 24.

Ver. 7. Thy sin. Christ needed not daily (as the other priests) to offer sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the people’s. Heb. 7:27.

Ver. 9. The altar of holocausts; as he is yet considered only as a private person; afterwards he touches the altar of perfumes. C.

Ver. 10. Burnt, or placed in order to be burnt by the fire sent by God, v. 24. M.

Ver. 11. Camp. According to the prescriptions given. C. 4:12.

Ver. 14. Water. Heb. adds, “he burnt them upon the holocaust, upon the altar.”

Ver. 15. And expiating the altar. Heb. “he offered it (the goat) for sin, as the first,” for himself, placing the parts of the victim upon his own holocaust. H.—The Chaldee says, “he expiated the altar with the blood of the he-goat, as he did before.”

Ver. 17. Holocaust. Which were religiously observed every day. The law respecting the libations was given already, though it be related, Num. 15:4. M.

Ver. 21. Elevating them. After which they were used by the priest, C. 7:31. C.—As. Samar. and some Heb. MSS. read, “as the Lord had commanded Moses.” Kennic.

Ver. 22. Hands. Thus representing the form of a cross, on which Christ redeemed us; in memory of which we still make the same sign. W.—Them. The blessing is recorded, Num. 6:24. And the Lord bless thee, &c. M.—In blessing an individual, the priest laid his hands upon him; but he stretched them out towards the multitude, as a mark of superiority.

Ver. 23. Testimony. To offer incense, which always preceded the morning holocaust.—Glory; or fire, probably issuing from the tabernacle, and consuming the victims in a moment. Thus God was pleased to shew his approbation of the priests and victims, (C.) and at the same time, to impress a religious awe upon the minds of the spectators. H.—This fire was carefully preserved and nourished by the priests with wood; though the Rabbins say, this was done only to conceal the miracle of its perpetual continuance. A fire of the same nature, came down upon the victims, when Solomon dedicated his temple, (2 Par. 7:1,) and was kept burning till the captivity, when it was hidden in a cistern. Being found afterwards, like a muddy water, God rekindled it again, (2 Macc. 1:18. 2:10,) and it was not lost till the persecution of Epiphanes.

Ver. 24. The Lord: 2 Mac. 2:10, explains this text. Fire came down from heaven, appearing like a flash of lightning, in the midst of the victims. Jos. Ant. iii. 9. C.

LEVITICUS 10

Ver. 1. The eldest sons, as they are mentioned first. Ex. 6:23.—Censers. On the same evening of their consecration.—Fire. Not taken from the altar of holocausts. C. 6:9. Whether they neglected to do so out of respect for the miraculous fire, or out of thoughtlessness and inattention, their fault was severely punished, however venial in itself; (T.) that all might learn to comply exactly with God's commands, and not dare to explain them away. Thus we must carefully avoid the mixing of falsehood with the word of God. Theod. q. 9. W.—Those in power, like priests, if they be negligent, shall suffer great torments. Wisd. 6:7. They must expect to be treated with rigour. S. Aug. q. 21. Estius infers, from the command to abstain from wine being given, (v. 8,) that these priests had been rather intoxicated. Josephus says, they had not offered proper victims; and the Rabbins assert, that they were not clothed with the sacred garments: but the Scripture only condemns them for taking strange fire. Some imagine, that no formal precept had yet been given. But had not God commanded (C. 6:9. 12,) that the victims should be burnt with the perpetual fire on the altar, and were not these young priest guilty of rashness in doing any thing of their own head, without positive instructions? Hence some infer that their offence was mortal, and that their punishment a prelude of eternal torments; while others piously hope that their sin was only venial, and that it was expiated by their repentance and violent death, in which sense Philo explains they died before the Lord. Hence they were buried honourably.

Ver. 2. Lord. Near the altar of incense, being stricken, as it were with lightning, so that their garments were not injured. C.

Ver. 3. Spoken, by this exemplary judgment. H.—We do not find the exact words recorded before: but there are some equivalent, shewing that God requires a particular sanctity in his ministers. C. 8:35. Ex. 19:22. The altar shall be sanctified by my glory; (Ex. 29:43,) may be considered as a prediction of what happened on this melancholy occasion.—Peace. Excessive grief requires silence; curæ graviores silent. “He was filled with grief.” Sept. adoring the judgments of God. The fortitude of Mino and Xenophon, who, upon hearing of the death of their sons, did not desist from sacrificing, is greatly admired. C.

Ver. 4. Brethren; cousins. These were ordered to bury the priests, as Aaron and his family were employed about the altar, (H.) and could not perform the office without contracting a legal uncleanness. Josephus. T.

Ver. 6. Uncover not. Take not off your mitres; (Sept.) let not your hair grow long, (Chal) as the Egyptians do in mourning, nor, yet shave your heads, like the priests of Isis. This God forbids. C. 21:5. And Ezechiel, (44:20,) probably with reference to this law, says, Neither shall they shave their heads, nor wear long hair ... and no priest shall drink wine when, &c.—Garments, sacred vestments, which were worn only in the tabernacle or temple. C.—The high priests are forbidden to tear their garments at funerals, (C. 21:10,) as this would betray a want of fortitude.—Perhaps. This does not imply any doubt. M. See Gen. 3:3.—Indignation of God, punishing the people, while there is none to entreat for them.—Burning of the two priests.

Ver. 7. On you. So that you cannot now join in the funeral, as there are so few anointed. H.—On other occasions, priests are allowed to mourn. C. 21.

Ver. 9. Drunk. Hebrew shekar; which the Sept. and Vulg. commonly translate by sicera, any strong liquor, (S. Jerom) particularly palm-wine. S. Chrys. in Isai. v. 11.) Jonathan says old wine. Hecateus assures us, that the Jews drink no wine at all in the temple. But the Rabbins admit of some exceptions. This abstinence was prescribed by any other nations to their priests and magistrates in office. C.—The intent of the law, is to prevent any mistake arising from the fumes of wine, (v. 10,) as likewise all drowsiness or foolish mirth. As mourning and excessive grief are prohibited on the one hand; so are intoxicating liquors, on the other. H.

Ver. 12. Sacrifice, of flour or bread. A tent was undoubtedly erected, where the priests might take the necessary refreshments of meat and sleep, during the days of their service.

Ver. 14. Place, at home. The Sept. translate, “in the holy place;” understanding that these sacrifices for sin were to be eaten in the court of the tabernacle. Malvenda allows, that the children of the priests, and their wives, might come thither to eat the parts of the peace-offerings allotted to them. But of this there is no proof.

Ver. 15. Sons. Sam. and Sept. add, “and thy daughters.” The male children were allowed to partake of the sin-offerings: those of peace, were given also to females.

Ver. 16. While, &c. Heb. “and Moses sought diligently for,” &c. This goat had been offered the same day, for the sins of the priest and of the people. C. 9:15. Aaron had not taken the parts allotted to his family, being too much grieved, and perhaps thinking that they could not eat all. C.—Therefore, he judged it conformable to God’s command to consume the whole. C. 7:17. Moses fearing lest the thing had been done through negligence, finds fault with this two sons; but on hearing the remonstrance of Aaron, is satisfied. H.

Ver. 17. People. Offering the sacrifices of expiation, as mediators between them and God.

Ver. 18. Places. This is not a victim, the blood of which is to be poured out in the holy place, and the flesh consumed with fire. C.—You ought, or might lawfully have eaten it. C. 6:25.

Ver. 19. How, &c. My children are slain. Heb. “and if I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, would it have been agreeable to the Lord?” H.

Ver. 1. Aaron. God shews him this honour after his consecration, though not always. See C. 12 and 17. &c. W.

Ver. 2. Animals which you are to eat, &c. The prohibition of so many kinds of beasts, birds, and fishes, in the law, was ordered, 1. to exercise the people in obedience and temperance; 2. to restrain them from the vices of which these animals were symbols; 3. because the things here forbidden were for the most part unwholesome, and not proper to be eaten; 4. that the people of God, by being obliged to abstain from things corporally unclean, might be trained up to seek a spiritual cleanness. Ch.—These animals had no natural uncleanness: for all things are clean to the clean. Tit. 1:15. But they were looked upon as such by the prejudice of the people, and many of them possessed noxious qualities. If they had been the most excellent, the will of God is a sufficient reason to enforce the duty of abstinence; (C.) as it was in the case of Adam and Eve. As some animals were adored, and others were deemed unclean by the Gentiles, the Hebrews were commanded to sacrifice some of the former description, and to abhor also the latter, that they might never be so foolish, as to imitate the perversity of the nations, in looking upon any animal as a god. Theod. q. 11. S. Thomas (i. 2. q. 102. a. 6,) explains at large, out of the holy fathers, the different vices, which the unclean animals represent. W.—By the distinction of these creatures, God would have his people known., C. 20:24. 26. Those who chose to die rather than transgress in this point, are justly honoured by the Church as martyrs, 2 Macc. 6 and 7. S. Greg. or. 20. H.

Ver. 3. Hoof divided, and cheweth the cud. The dividing the hoof, and chewing the cud, signify discretion between good and evil, and meditating on the law of God: and where either of these is wanting, a man is unclean. In like manner, fishes were reputed unclean that had not fins and scales: that is, souls that did not raise themselves up by prayer, and cover themselves with the scales of virtues, (Ch.) particularly of mortification and penance. W.

Ver. 4. Camel, which hath a hard skin connecting its hoof below. The Arabs and Persians eat its flesh. God will have his people keep at a distance from imitating them; and that is one of the reasons for this and similar precepts. C.

Ver. 5. The cherogrillus. Some suppose it to be the rabbit, others the hedge-hog: S. Jerom intimates that it is another kind of animal common in Palestine, which lives in the holes of rocks, or in the earth. We choose here, as also in the names of several other creatures that follow, (which are little known in this part of the world) to keep the Greek or Latin names. Ch. Bochart (Hiero zoicon) may be consulted on this subject. He supposes, that the Hebrew shaphan, denotes the Arabian rat called aliarbuho. But the Jews themselves are ignorant of many of these animals. C.—Both choiros and grullos, signify swine. The porcupine, or the bear-mouse of Palestine, may be meant. M.

Ver. 6. Cheweth. Some copies of the Sept. add not, which agrees with the nature of the hare; though the people to whom Moses addresses himself were of a different persuasion. Its hoof is not divided into two parts only, and therefore it is accounted unclean.

Ver. 7. Swine. This animal was abhorred by many other nations. If an Egyptian happened to touch one, he plunged into the Nile. Herod. ii. 47. Few are to be seen in the East. Yet the people of Crete and of Samos held swine in veneration; and they were offered in sacrifice to Venus, by the Cyprians. They seem designed for slaughter, as they are good for nothing alive. They are very subject to leprosy. C.—The Jews would hardly name them, but called them “the beast.” Old Eleazer was strongly instigated to pretend at least to eat swine’s flesh, but preferred a painful death before the transgression of God’s law, 2 Mac. 6:18. H.

Ver. 8. Carcasses. They might be touched while alive, v. 24.

Ver. 9. Eat. The Egyptians, and the priests of the Syrian goddess, abstained from fish.—Pools. Heb. and Sept. torrents. C.—Eels are prohibited, &c. M.

Ver. 10. Scales. Numa forbade fish without scales to be used in the sacred feasts. Plin. xxxii. 2.

Ver. 13. The griffon. Not the monster which the painters represent, which hath no being upon earth; but a bird of the eagle kind, larger than the common. Ch.—Osprey. The sea or black eagle, which is very clear-sighted, and expert at catching fish. Pliny relates, (B. x. 3,) that it tries its young by making them look at the sun, and hurls them down if they refuse. But this seems fabulous.

Ver. 16. Ostrich; which was served up at the tables of the Persian kings. Heb. “the daughter of the hiena;” (both êiâne) or the swan. Isai. 13:21.—Owl, or perhaps the male ostrich, which cruelly abandons its young.—Larus, the water-hen. C.—Some have the cuckow. H.

Ver. 17. Owl, or the onocrotalus, which makes a hideous noise like an assibis, a bird adored in Egypt. Bochart takes the Hebrew to mean an owl, as well as the following term, swan, (C.) which is not probable.

Ver. 18. Bittern, onocrotalum. See v. 17. Protestant version has “pelican and the gier-eagle,” for porphyron. H.—Its beak and long legs are red. Plin. x. 46. Bochart understands the vulture, and the Samaritan version the pelican; both of which are remarkable for the care they take of their young. Reme may be derived from rem, “mercy.”

Ver. 19. Heron, or “stork,” noted for the same quality: chasida, means “piety.”—Charadriion, a kind of heron, (C.) mentioned by Aristot. 8:3. It is found in deep holes and rocks. M.—Some translate parrot, peacock, kite, &c. Anapha, may denote a bird easily vexed. C.—Houp, or lapwing. H.—Bat. Strabo (xvii) speaks of some very large, which were salted and eaten at Borsippe.

Ver. 20. Feet. Such as bees, (C.) and other insects of which he speaks. M.

Ver. 21. Walketh. Heb. adds lo, “not.” But the Massorets read lu, “to it,” agreeably to the Vulg. C.—Prot. version, “Yet these may ye eat, of every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth.”

Ver. 22. Locust. The three former are species of the same kind. The bruchus is a young locust, without wings, (S. Aug. in Ps. civ.,) and the attachus the least of all. Plin. xxix. 5. The ophiomachus is large, “encounters serpents,” and is destitute of wings. The nations called Acridophagi, received their name from their feeding upon locusts, which are the food of the common people in Syria and Africa. See Plin. xi. 29, &c. Clenard, in 1541, wrote from Fez, that he had seen the sky darkened with clouds of locusts, which the people endeavoured presently to destroy, and filled wagons with their bodies, for food. Kirsten says, they are very delicious. Arnulph assures us, that they are a finger’s breadth, and are fried in oil by the poor. Raban. in Matt. iii. 4. See Joel 2. C.—There is no need, therefore, of having recourse to crab fish and wild pears, for the Baptist’s food, as Beza has done. T.

Ver. 24. Evening. If he were guilty of sin in so doing, contrition would be necessary to regain God’s favour. W.—But the legal uncleanness would not be removed till the evening; as the one might subsist while the other was remitted. H.

Ver. 25. Necessary. To prevent the obstruction of the road, or the infection of the air. M.—When any person touched these carcasses, he was obliged to wash his clothes immediately, and still to refrain from touching any thing sacred till sun-set. Estius.—If a dog chanced to die in the house of an Egyptian, all the family shaved their hair and began to mourn. The food and wine in the house could no longer be used. Euseb. præp. ii. 1. They adored the dog. But other nations, which did not adore animals, esteemed those unworthy of sacred things who had touched a carcass, though they invoked their gods by slaying beasts, as Porphyrius remarks, ib. v. 10. They put off their shoes when they enter certain temples, for the same reason. Scorteæ non ulli fas est inferre sacello—ne violenti puros exanimata Deos.

Ver. 26. It. When dead. It was lawful to ride on a camel, but not to eat its flesh.

Ver. 27. Hands. Like a monkey, frog, &c. the fore-feet of which rather resemble hands.

Ver. 29. Weasel. Bochart understands the mole, in opposition to all the versions: choled, means indeed “to root up the earth.” C.

Ver. 30. Chameleon, feeds upon air, and assumes various colours. Plin. viii. 33. It resembles a lizard, as does the stellio, ib. xxix. 4.—Lizard. Prot. “snail.” H.

Ver. 33. Broken. See C. 6:28, where a similar injunction is given. M.—And (v. 35,) ovens and pots, made of earthenware, according to Pollux are to be destroyed. T.

Ver. 34. Water, unclean, or in a polluted vessel.

Ver. 36. Clean. They would be so difficult to purify, and water is so necessary.

Ver. 38. Defiled, and given to the beasts. M.

Ver. 39. Beast die a natural death, or be suffocated, or be slain by a wild beast. C.

Ver. 40. Clothes, and his whole body, either together or separate, as the Rabbins explain the law. Selden syn. i. 3. If any one eat or touch these things, on purpose, he was liable to a more severe punishment, (M.) and his soul was defiled by disobedience, v. 43. C.

Ver. 42. Abominable. Serpents, worms, and reptiles are proscribed. M.

Ver. 44. Holy, and detest the uncleanness of the Gentiles, in their sacrifices and feasts. S. Aug. de C. D. vi. 7.

Ver. 45. Your God. By these laws, the Jews were to be distinguished from other nations. H.—They were also to be reminded, that God was very jealous of their interior sanctity, since he required so great a legal purity. Without the former, they might easily conclude that the latter would not please him. C.

Ver. 2. Child. By this manner of expressing himself, Moses excludes the blessed Virgin, as the ancient fathers and the moderns generally remark. She conceived without concupiscence, and was subject to none of the usual inconveniences of child-birth. Suarez.—So that whether this law was instituted to expiate the former, or to purify the latter, she was not included. All other mothers were separated, at least seven days, and longer if their state required it; (C.) during which time, they were treated like those mentioned, C. 15:19. After that period they were allowed to manage their affairs, as usual, but not to touch any thing sacred, nor suffer their husbands to approach them, till the expiration of 33 days more, v. 4. M.—Euripides blames Diana for keeping such women at a distance from her altar, while she delighted in human sacrifices. Iphigen. v. 380. Censorinus says, “Prægnan ante diem quadragesimum non prodit in Fanum; & post partum pleræque graviores sunt, nec sanguinem interdum continent.” Grotius.

Ver. 3. Eighth. Nothing but the child's health could retard the day, (C.) unless the parents were under the necessity of taking a journey, as they were in the desert, &c. H.

Ver. 4. Sanctuary, or court of the tabernacle, where the women had probably a place apart. C.

Ver. 5. Days. In all 80, double the time required for a male child, as they infirmities of women continue so much longer when they bear a female. Vales. sac. Philos. c. xviii. Hippocrates allows forty-two days for the one, and thirty for the other.—Purification. Some copies of the Sept. read, in her pure, others, in her impure blood; which Origen attempts to reconcile by observing, that she is deemed less impure during the last thirty-three or sixty-six days, than in the preceding ones. C.—During these, she was treated almost like those who were under the greatest legal uncleanness, C. 15. Numbers 5. Those who were under the less, might enter the court of the Gentiles, and did not infect others by their touch. Josep. c. Apion 2. T.

Ver. 6. Lamb, to thank God for her happy delivery.—Sin, or uncleanness, which was esteemed a legal offence. Perhaps this sacrifice was also designed to expiate the sins she might have fallen into, (M.) since she was last able to offer one; and likewise the original sin of her female offspring. That of males was effaced by circumcision. H.

Ver. 7. Blood, which has caused her legal uncleanness.

Ver. 8. Lamb. This was the case of the blessed Virgin: (Luc. 2:24,); so poor was she! M.—It seems difficult to conceive, how all the women of Palestine could present themselves before the tabernacle, 40 or 80 days after the childbirth. Perhaps the law regarded those only who lived in the neighbourhood. The priests explained to the rest what they had to do, whether they might defer bringing their offering till the next great festival, or they might send it by another hand. We read that Anna came to the temple after she had weaned Samuel, 1 K. 1:21. C.

Ver. 2. Colour, &c. Heb. “a tumour, abscess, or white spot,” which are the three marks of leprosy. C.—Leprosy. The leprosy was a figure of sin: and the observances prescribed in this and the following chapter, intimate what ought spiritually to be done, in order to be delivered from so great an evil, or preserved from it. Ch.—The authority of the priests in the new law to bind or loose sins, was hereby prefigured. S. Chrys. de Sacerd. 3. W.

Ver. 3. Flesh. These two signs indicated the species of leprosy called volatile, or impetigo, (M.) resembling a scab, which did not penetrate the flesh or bones, as our leprosy or elephantiasis does. Vales. C. 19.—Separated from society. Heb. he shall contaminate him. See v. 11. H.—Some assert, that the physician was first to be consulted. But none but the priests could declare them unclean, or set them at liberty. After they had pronounced sentence, the lepers might apply for medicines to others.

Ver. 6. Obscure. Some translate the Heb. “retired,” with the Syr. and Arab. versions.—Scab, “an ebullition,” or pustule. Theod. S. Jer. in Nah. ii.—Clothes, and himself. See C. 11:40.

Ver. 8. Uncleanness, or permanent leprosy.

Ver. 10. Living flesh. The leprosy is caused by immense numbers of worms, which crawl between the skin and the flesh, and sometimes infect the latter, and they very bones, garments, &c. Hence the flesh seems all in motion, and living. H.—The different spots in the skin represent heretical opinions obscuring the true faith, of which priests are the judges. Deut. 17. S. Aug. q. Evang. ii. 40. W.

Ver. 11. Inveterate. Celsus says, this sort of leprosy is hardly ever cured.—Up. But, as the Rom. Sept. reads, “shall separate him,” from the people.

Ver. 13. Clean. The white leprosy causeth no itching. Gorrheus. Cels. v. 28. Theodoret (q. 16,) says, it is incurable; and therefore, the person infected is not shut up, out of pity. So S. Paul (1 Cor. 5:11,) forbids us to eat with a dissolute Christian, while he allows us to have commerce with infidels, though they be wholly corrupt. But others assert, it is not so difficult to cure as that which is partial, v. 14. The hand of Moses was stricken with this white leprosy. Ex. 4:6. C.—This species is not so contagious. M.

Ver. 14. Live flesh, raw, the skin being consumed in various parts.

Ver. 16. Whiteness, after the red flesh is covered with skin as usual.

Ver. 20. Ulcer, as before, v. 3.

Ver. 23. Place, which is contrary to the nature of leprosy.

Ver. 24. Scar. If it had proceeded from burning it would have been black. M.

Ver. 26. Obscure. Heb. may be, “stopped,” as it is opposed to v. 22, if it spread. See v. 55–6.

Ver. 27. Unclean. Heb. adds, “it is the stroke of leprosy,” and the Sept. “it has spread in the ulcer.”

Ver. 30. Leprosy, or scurf. C.—This species causes the hair to be yellow, and not white. M.

Ver. 31. Black. The Heb. Sam. &c. prefix “not,” which ought probably to be away, as the natural colour of the hair, in that country, is black; while yellow, or white hair, give reason to suspect leprosy; and (v. 32,) the Heb. says, “if there be no yellow hair in it,” which insinuates that it was black before. The Sept. have explained both verses in the same sense, as they found the negation also. If we admit it, we may distinguish black hair from that which approaches to brown, or light-coloured hair. When therefore a person, who had before black hair, has experienced some change, he must be shut up seven days; after which, if his hair be not become yellow or reddish, he must be shaved, &c. C.

Ver. 39. Blemish, or scab, of which Celsus speaks, B. 5.

Ver. 42. Colour, indicating some bad humours, which had caused the hair to fall off.

Ver. 45. Loose, both for the benefit of the leper, and that others may beware of him. M.—Bare, letting the hair grow, (C. 21:5. 10,) in testimony of mourning. The leper behaved like one in mourning, tearing his garments, neglecting his hair and beard, or cutting them, and, through shame, covering his face. Ezech. 24:22. The Persians would not allow any lepers to enter their cities. Herod. ii. 138. C.

Ver. 46. Camp, or city, unless some great man, like king Ozias, might be permitted to dwell there in a house, secluded from all society. 4 K. 15:5.—2 Par. 26:21.

Ver. 47. Garment that shall have the leprosy. These prescriptions, with relation to garments and houses infected with the leprosy, are to teach us to fly all such company and places as are apt to be the occasion of sin.

Ver. 49. White. Heb. and Sept. “greenish.”

Ver. 51. Grown. Heb. adds here, (and v. 53–6–7–9,) “in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in a skin, or in any work that is made of a skin.”

Ver. 55. Returned, which it had before it was infected, and, consequently, as the Heb. reads, “behold the plague has not changed its colour.” H.

Ver. 56. Dark, or “at a stand.” See v. 6. Heb. keha, means to sink, like the eyes of an old man, &c.

Ver. 57. Flying, as that in man, v. 12. Heb. it is a leprosy, which returns and is rooted. Chal. “it spreads.” C. See Calmet’s Diss. on the Leprosy.—This dreadful disorder is very common in Arabia and Palestine. During the holy wars many of the Europeans were infected with it. The Jews believe, that the leprosy of garments and of houses was restrained to Judea, and attacked them only when the people rebelled against God. Oleaster.—The providence of God often visited those, who would not obey his ministers, with this disorder. Deut. 24:8. Num. 12. Theod. q. 18. T.

Ver. 59. Pronounced. This word should refer to both; mundari vel contaminari, how it ought to be pronounced clean or unclean; as the law regards the declaration of the priests, and not the medicines to be used for the leprosy. H.

Ver. 3. Camp. The leper was not left to his own judgment to mix with society, as soon as he perceived himself cleansed. He had to send for a priest; and one of the most discerning among those who made it their employment to study in the court of the tabernacle, was commissioned to examine him. Grotius.—The sacrifice was offered without the camp, (C.) if it may be called a sacrifice. M.—That of Christ's body was not yet instituted, which supplies all the rest. S. Aug. c. adv. i. 19. W.

Ver. 4. Sparrows. Heb. tsipporim. Sept. "little birds," which the law only determines must be clean; such probably as might be procured most easily. The leper was to present them, and kill one. But the priest sprinkled with its blood the other bird, which was tied with a scarlet ribband to the cedar-wood and hyssop, in such a manner that its head and wings were not much wet, as it as to fly away. C.—The cedar prevents putrefaction, the hyssop is very odoriferous, the scarlet and the bird denote beauty and life, which qualities the leper must acquire. So the penitent regains the virtues he had lost, with interest. T.

Ver. 5. Living waters. That is, waters taken from a spring, brook, or river: (Ch.) not stagnant or rain water.

Ver. 7. Rightly. According to law. H.—The number seven is used to denote perfection, v. 15, &c. M.—Field. An emblem of the liberty which the leper would soon enjoy. H.—The pagans cast over their head the things which had been used for their purification. Virg. Ec. viii. 102. Fer cineres, Amarilli, foras, rivoque fluenti—Transque caput jace, ne respexeris.—There were afraid to trample upon them. Gell. x. 15. Metam. xiii. 954. There were also accustomed to set birds at liberty in honour of their gods. Demosthenes accuses Conon of having eaten those which had been used in his purification. Bonfrere believes that Moses does not here prescribe any sacrifice. Why then is a priest employed to make these aspersions? C.

Ver. 8. Body, even to the feet. Isai. 7:20. H.—Probably with a pair of scissors. C.—The Egyptians priests did so every third day, that nothing impure might be concealed. Herod. ii. 37. The greatest caution was requisite to prevent the return of the leprosy; and therefore, after the first purification, (v. 4,) the leper is not allowed to go home, till a sufficient time has elapsed to ascertain whether he be radically healed, and then he must offer a sacrifice, v. 10. H.—But why so many prescriptions for a disease so involuntary, (C.) which must have caused the unhappy sufferer so much pain? H.—The Rabbins assert, that the leprosy was sent to punish some secret transgression, particularly some pride or detraction; as they maintain, that every illness is in punishment of some offence. Abarbanel. Grotius.—If was often the effect of intemperance or negligence; and the sacrifices were exacted, to make some reparation to God for remaining in the camp and near the tabernacle, at the commencement of the disorder. C.—This foul cutaneous disease was also very infectious, and the law was designed to impress people with a horror of it, and to teach them to prevent its ravages as much as possible. H.—A sparrow is slain, and the hair shaved, to indicate that all sinful affections must be cut off by the true penitent, while the sparrow, which is sent away into the desert, reminds him that he must live a stranger to pleasure, and perfectly mortified. D.—Days; without having any communication with his wife. Lyran.

Ver. 10. A sextary; Heb. log: a measure of liquids, which was the twelfth part of a hin; and held about as much as six eggs. Ch.—For each of the victims a sacrifice of flour and oil was required. H.

Ver. 12. Offered. Heb. “elevated, or waved,” as Ex. 29:24.

Ver. 13. Place; on the left hand of the altar of holocausts. C. 1:11. This sacrifice is different from that for sin, v. 19. C.

Ver. 14. Taking of the blood, &c. These ceremonies, used in the cleansing of a leper, were mysterious and very significative. The sprinkling seven times with the blood of the little bird, the washing himself and his clothes, the shaving his hair and his beard, signify the means which are to be used in the reconciliation of a sinner, and the steps by which he is to return to God, viz. by the repeated application of the blood of Christ; the washing his conscience with the waters of compunction; and retrenching all vanities and superfluities, by employing all that is over and above what is necessary in alms deeds. The sin-offering, and the holocaust or burnt-offering, which he was to offer at his cleansing, signify the sacrifice of a contrite and humble heart, and that of adoration in spirit and truth, with gratitude and thankfulness, for the forgiveness of sins, with which we are ever to appear before the Almighty. The touching the right ear, the thumb of the right hand, and the great toe of the right foot, first with the blood of the victim, and then with the remainder of the oil, which had been sprinkled seven times before the Lord, signify the application of the blood of Christ, and the unction of the sevenfold grace of the Holy Ghost to the sinner’s right ear, that he may duly hearken to and obey the law of God; and to his right hand and foot, that the works of his hands, and all the steps or affections of his soul, signified by the feet, may be rightly directed to God. Ch. See C. 8:23.—These ceremonies might serve to call to the leper’s recollection the benefit which he had received, and to distinguish him from others. C.

Ver. 17. Blood. Sept. and Syr. “upon the place of the blood,” on the person’s ear, thumb, and toe.

Ver. 21. Offering. Heb. “a trespass-offering to be waved,” v. 12. 24.—

Oil. The same quantity of oil is required as v. 10. The rest is diminished two-thirds; only instead of the ewe and one lamb, two turtles or pigeons are substituted. H.

Ver. 31. Trespass. Heb. “sin,” v. 19. The Chal. and Sept. agree with the original text. M.

Ver. 34. If there. Heb. “and I send the plague;” whence some infer, that this leprosy was an effect of God’s special indignation against the owners of the house. Muis, &c.

Ver. 36. Become. If any thing was left in the house, it was deemed unclean, as soon as the priest had declared that the house was infected; and therefore, all was to be removed before he came, (C.) and might be used without scruple, unless some marks of leprosy appeared afterwards on the garments. C. 13:47.

Ver. 37. Paleness. Heb. “greenish.” H.—Such spots are often observable in damp churches and cloisters, and cause the plaster to fall off. It is probable that little worms produce this effect. To prevent these vermin from spreading, Moses orders the whole house to be demolished and carried away, if it cannot be otherwise purified. C.—Thus the plague is communicated not only by persons, but also by all the things which they have touched. The same signs of leprosy are found both in men and in houses. M.

Ver. 41. Scraped. Heb. “he shall scrape.” But the Sam. copy has, more properly, “they shall scrape.” Houbig.

Ver. 53. For the house, that it may be no more infected; and for the people, to whom it belongs, that they may carefully avoid offending God, the avenger of all sin. Heb. “you shall make an atonement for the house,” or for the sins of its inhabitants. H.

Ver. 54. Stroke. Heb. “scurf,” ulcers, wounds, &c. C.—“The leprosy of the head or beard.” Chal. Montan. T.

Ver. 57. Be known when. Heb. “to teach in what day, &c.... This is the law of leprosy.” H.

LEVITICUS 15

Ver. 2. Issue of seed, shall be unclean. These legal uncleannesses were instituted in order to give the people a horror of carnal impurities. Ch.

—If the gonorrhœa, and the lawful act of marriage, (v. 16,) and nocturnal delusions, (Deut. 23:10,) induce a kind of uncleanness—surely to imitate Onan is most detestable, Gen. 28:9. T.—The Jews rank the latter crime with murder, and so does Tertullian. See Ex. 21:22.

Ver. 3. At every moment, is not in Heb., but something like it occurs in the Sam. and Sept. According to the Heb. the uncleanness subsists for some time after the issue has ceased. Grotius pretends that these disorders were contagious; but the reason why God requires such purity in his people, is given v. 31. He dwelt among them, and would not allow of any disrespectful behaviour. There were to live like priests in his temple. The pagans in Egypt, Greece, and Italy, required the like attention to cleanliness in their priests. Herod. ii.—Noctem flumine purgas. Persius ii. C.

Ver. 11. Such a one; the person under the disorder, unless he have washed his hands.

Ver. 12. Broken, after he is perfectly healed. C.

Ver. 15. Offer, (faciet) “shall sacrifice.” D.—For sin. Legal, or any other that he may have incurred.

Ver. 16. Evening, whether the action were lawful or not. M.—Some explain this verse, of nocturnal inconveniences; and v. 18, of the act of marriage. The latter rendered unclean only in as much as it hindered a person from partaking of any thing sacred, though he might perform the duties of life. C.—This law was to lay some restraint on the too frequent use of marriage. Theodoret. D.

Ver. 19. At ... month. The Heb. and other versions omit this. C.—But “her issue in her flesh,” implies as much. H.—Naturalists anciently deemed this very contagious. Solin c. i. Plin. ix. 15. C.—Days, not out of the camp, but from the company of men.

Ver. 20. One, except infants, &c.

Ver. 24. Days, supposing the case was not brought before the judge, and the man did it through ignorance: otherwise it was death. C. 20:18.

Ver. 25. Blood, hæmorrhoids. M.—Flowers. Heb. “all the days of the issue of her uncleanness shall be as the days of her separation. She shall be unclean.”

Ver. 28. Run. Then she might act as usual, without defiling what she touched. It seems from v. 13, that this law regarded only the time while the tabernacle was in the camp. It would have been very difficult to observe it, when the people were dispersed throughout the land of Chanaan. C.

Ver. 31. Teach. So the Sept. also read. Heb. "Thus you shall remove ... from their filth." Houbig.—Filth. God threatens to kill them, if they approach unclean. M.—S. Jerom (in Gal. v.) understands this of those abominable sins, which ought not to be mentioned. W.

Ver. 1. Fire. It was upon this occasion that the feast of expiation (kippurim) was instituted, to enforce the reverence due to holy things, and particularly to the tabernacle. Heb. adds, "before the Lord," (H.) and does not specify strange fire; but the Chaldee and the Syriac do. C.

Ver. 2. Enter not. No one but the high priest, and he but once a year, could enter into the sanctuary: to signify that no one could enter into the sanctuary of heaven till Christ our high priest opened it by his passion, Heb. 10:8. Ch.—When the tabernacle was to be removed, and when he had to consult the Lord, he might also enter, arrayed in his pontifical attire. If the high priest was prevented by any legal uncleanness, the next priest was substituted to perform his office. Josep. xvii. 8. Adjutor vicarius propter cognationem ei datus est.

Ver. 4. Washed. On this day the high priest appeared in linen clothes, like one of the inferior priests, without the jewels; thought Josephus (de Bel. v. 15,) asserts the contrary. C.—This was a feast of sorrow and of penance. T.—Perhaps he put on his more costly attire before he entered the holy of holies, v. 23, 4. H.

Ver. 6. Calf, or young bull, which Aaron offered for himself and all the family of Levi, to expiate the sins which they might have committed during the year. If their sins were voluntary, they were obliged also to have perfect charity and contrition. The ram was offered for the sins of the people. Moses speaks of the red heifer, (Num. 19) which was also offered, out of the camp, for the people. This solemn day was to be kept by all as a rigid "fast from meat, drink, washing, anointing, wearing shoes, or using marriage." This is the idea which the Oriental nations generally have of a fast. They commence at midnight, and end with the following sun-set; after which they eat what they think proper. C.—On the day of expiation, the Jews made a tenfold confession of their sins. Morin. poenit. ii. 22.

Ver. 8. The emissary-goat: caper emissarius; in Greek, apompaios; in Hebrew, Hazazel. The goat to go off, or as some translate it, the scape-goat. This goat, on whose head the high priest was ordered to pour forth prayers, and to make a general confession of the sins of the people, laying them all, as it were, on his head; and after that to send him away into the wilderness, to be devoured by wild beasts, was a figure of our Saviour, charged with all our sins, in his passion.

Ver. 11. After ... celebrated. These words are not in the Hebrew.

Ver. 12. Censer, which resembled one of our chalices; without any chains, &c. Apoc. 5:8. C.

Ver. 13, 14. The cloud.—The blood, &c. This is to teach us, that if we would go into the sanctuary of God, we must take with us the incense of prayer, and the blood, that is, the passion of Christ. Where also note, that the high priest, before he went into the holy of holies, was to wash his whole body; and then to put on white linen garments; to signify the purity and chastity with which we are to approach to God. Ch.—The Sept. call this goat apompaiou, “the averter of evils, or the one sent away.” Hazazel is taken by Spencer Julian, the apostate, (ap. S. Cyr. 9. and ep. 39,) to mean the devil; as if the goat was sent or sacrificed to him, which is very foolish. C.—East. That is, the forepart of the mercy-seat, which was not to be touched with the blood, (M.) no more than the veil. Rabbins.

Ver. 15. Oracle. He probably took this blood at the same time with that of the calf. Heb. 9:7. M.—Though some Rabbins assert, the high priest entered the holy of holies four times on that day. Drusius. Pausanias tells us, that the temples of Dindymenes and Orcus were opened only once a year. C.

Ver. 16. Filth. God deigned to have his tabernacle in the midst of the camp, where so many sins, and marks of disrespect, as well as legal uncleannesses, were found. H.—Sin so defileth the soul, that the most holy place is contaminated thereby. Theod. q. 22.

Ver. 17. Out. Even the other priests were excluded from the tabernacle. The high priest placed incense on the censer as soon as he entered within the veil, and prayed for all blessings, in few words, that the people might not be uneasy, fearing lest something had befallen him. This was the form: “Be pleased to grant, O Lord our God, that this year may be warm and rainy, that the sovereign power may abide in the house of Juda, that thy people may not be deprived of any of the necessities of life; and hear not the petitions of travellers," (which are commonly vain and selfish) of "of sinners," as others translate. C.—Those who were forbidden to be present this occasion, might have made the same objections as Protestants do against the law of the Church which prescribes a language not commonly understood by all, in the administration of her sacraments. Have either any reason to be offended? H.

Ver. 18. Let him pray for himself. Heb. "he shall expiate or purify it," the altar of incense. Josephus says he also sprinkled with blood the great altar of holocausts, v. 20. Ant. iii. 10.

Ver. 22. Desert, to be devoured by wild beasts, (M.) or hurled down a precipice.

Ver. 24. Flesh, which was, in some sort, defiled by touching the goat. —Garments, belonging to his office.—Come out of the holy of holies. C. —The remainder of the day was spent in joy. The priest washed himself, as a sign that he had obtained pardon. M.

Ver. 26. Camp. This was always required of those who had burnt the bodies of the victims out of the camp, as v. 28, and Num. 19:7. Outram.—In some of the sacrifices for sin, the priests might eat part of the flesh. But here all was consumed, as the victim was offered for the sins of all.

Ver. 29. Tenth. Beginning on the evening of the ninth Tisri, which corresponds with part of our September and October, and is the first month of the civil year. C. 23:32. Afflict, by a rigid abstinence from all that might give delight to the body. Children of seven years old begin to join in this mortification. Boys of 13, and girls of 11 years old complete, were obliged to fast. See v. 6. The Samaritans pray all the day, and give no food even to infants during the 24 hours. C.—Moses was the first who shewed them the example; and this was the only day which he prescribed to be kept as a fast. The Jews afterwards appointed many more. H.—Maimonides says, this festival was instituted in memory of the descent of Moses from Mount Sinai the third time, when he came to announce to the people that God had pardoned their idolatry. Usher thinks it was in memory of Adam's fall. The Jews still observe it in some degree. As they are not allowed to sacrifice, they kill a white cock, and the women a hen, on the 9th at evening. Those with child kill both. They confess their sins, receive 93 lashes, ask pardon of those whom they have offended, and generally spend the fore part of this month in acts of piety and of penance. Buxtorf. Syn. 20.—Stranger; a proselyte of justice, such as were bound to observe the law.

Ver. 31. Of rest. Heb. “of sabbaths;” that is, a day of most perfect rest; so that even meat is not allowed to be dressed on it, as it is on other festivals. C. 23:27. C.—Religion. Fasting is therefore an act of religion. D.

Ver. 3. If he kill, &c. That is, in order to sacrifice. The law of God forbids sacrifices to be offered in any other place but at the tabernacle or temple of the Lord: to signify that no sacrifice would be acceptable to God, out of his true temple, the one, holy, Catholic Apostolic Church. Ch.—On other occasions, many believe that the blood of oxen, sheep, and goats, was to be poured out in honour of God by the priest, who received a part of each. Deut. 18:3. 12:15, 22. Theod. q. 23. Perhaps this law regards the time when the Hebrews sojourned in the desert; and that of Deuteronomy has a reference to those times when they should obtain possession of Chanaan. C.—We read of some private people like Manue and Elias, who offered sacrifice at a distance from the tabernacle. But this was done by a particular inspiration of God, who dispensed with his own law. S. Aug. q. 56. 3 K. 18:23. Judg. 13:19. M. See Jos. 8:31.

Ver. 5. They. The Egyptians and other nations, kill in the field, as the Hebrews had also done, till it was now prohibited. Some were, perhaps, still much inclined to adore, (C.) and to offer sacrifices privately to devils; (v. 7,) and therefore God forbids any sacrifice, but such as was performed by his priests at the tabernacle. H.

Ver. 7. Devils. Heb. schirim: which some translate goats, (the hairy ones,) satyrs, &c. The Egyptians adored the goat, (which they represented like the god Pan) particularly in the territory of Mendes, near which the Hebrews had dwelt. Its worship was very abominable and obscene. Strabo xvii. C.—Ezekiel (16:22) intimates that the Hebrews were given to idolatry in Egypt. They had also recently adored the calf. H.

Ver. 10. Eat blood. To eat blood, was forbidden in the law; partly because God reserved it to himself to be offered in sacrifices on the altar, as to the Lord of life and death; and as a figure of the blood of Christ; and partly to give men a horror of shedding blood. Gen. 9:4, 5, 6. Ch.—Some barbarians feast on human blood. The Massagetes drunk the blood of horses, and the Gelonians of Pontus mixed it with milk. Georg. iii. 463. If the Hebrews did any such thing, and it became public, they were put to death. But if it remained private, God threatens to take vengeance himself of their cruelty and disobedience. The face often denotes anger.

Ver. 11. Life, (anima). The sensitive soul depends on the blood. The soul and the blood are often used in the same sense. Deut. 12:23. Ps 29:10. Sanguine quærendi reditus animaque litandum—Argolica. Æneid ii. C.—If any one think that blood is the soul of cattle, we need not examine this question very nicely. S. Aug. q. 57. D.

Ver. 13. Hunting, with nets, or with bow and arrow. If a dog had killed the prey, it would have rendered it unclean. Tostat. But perhaps dogs were not employed in hunting by the Hebrews. The Persians use lions, &c. Chardin. C.—Earth, to prevent any abusive custom, such as that of the magicians, who pretended to raise spirits by blood. Tiresias would not disclose the truth to Ulysses, till he had drunk some blood. Odys. xxii. The Jews abhorred things strangled, and the apostles forbade the primitive Christians to use them. Acts 15. Phocilides, the pagan, says, “abandon such remains to dogs; beasts eat the leavings of beasts.” Euseb. C.

Ver. 15. Stranger. Perhaps the proselyte of justice, not simply of the gate, for the latter were allowed to eat and purchase what had died of itself. Deut. 14:21.—Clean, having offered the sacrifice. C. 4:27. But if he eat such things knowingly, or neglected these regulations, he was more severely punished. H.

Ver. 2. God, to whom the right of giving laws belongs. D.

Ver. 3. Ordinances respecting marriages, divine worship, &c. H.

Ver. 5. Live in them, a long and happy life, (Chal.) attended with grace and glory. Lyran.—Jesus Christ and S. Paul explain it of eternal life. Matt. 19:17. Rom. 10:5. C.

Ver. 6. Approach to marry, much less to gratify his sensual appetite. H.—To him. Heb. “None shall approach to any of their descendants;” ad omnes reliquias carnis suæ; to any of those who spring from the same stock. The Jews assert, that all are bound by the law of nature to abstain from their own mother and sister, from another’s wife, and from unnatural conjunctions. Seld. Jur. v. 11. C.—Nakedness, or turpitude, which title the body deserves, when it is used in a manner contrary to the law of God.

Ver. 7. Father, with whom the daughters must not have any connexion, as Myrrha had with Cymoras. Metam. x. H.—All relations in a right line are excluded for ever, according to the emperor Justinian. The reason of these various impediments is, 1. That God's people may not resemble infidels, who permitted such things, v. 3. The Persians married their own mothers, daughters and sisters. S. Clem. strom. 3. Semiramis married her son Justin. Cleopatra was both mother and wife of the two Ptolemies, Philometor and Euergetes, or Physcon. T.—The Egyptians took their sisters to wife for a long time, by the authority of their laws, and in imitation of Isis. Diod. 1. Clem. recogn. 9. Solon permitted people to marry their step-sisters by the same father, and Lycurgus only those by the same mother. Philo ad 6. præc. 2. By this law, the bands of society are strengthened, and families become connected. S. Aug. C. D. xv. 16. 3. Disorders which would easily take place under the same roof, on the prospect of a future marriage, are prevented. 4. The contrary practice would often prove contrary to order and decency, as the son would be raised above his mother. These regulations seem to have been made from the beginning, or at least from the time of the deluge; since the nations not subject to the law of Moses, are condemned for the transgression of them, v. 24. See Gen. 19:33. C.

Ver. 8. Father. He hath known her; and to him she belongs, as being one flesh. H.—If he were even dead, it would shew a want of respect to marry his widow, though she were not your own mother. C.—This law, Ruben and the incestuous Corinthian transgressed. T.

Ver. 9. Abroad; being born of your mother, while she was married to another. The marriages of brothers and sisters at the beginning, were authorized by necessity; but now they are the more to be condemned, as religion forbids them. S. Aug. de C. xv. 16. Some Rabbins assert, that such connexions were lawful till the time of Moses. But S. Epiphanius (hær. 39,) maintains, they had been condemned long before. Seneca (S. Aug. de C. D. vi. 10,) acknowledges that such marriages of the pagan gods were not right; ne pie quidem: and Plato says, they are hateful to God. The Romans punished them with death. Many barbarians do not, however, make any scruple to contract marriage with their children, or with their mothers. S. Jerom c. Jov. ii. 2. Eurip. Hermione. C.

Ver. 11. Sister, by thy step-mother.

Ver. 12. Father. Nearly related, and springing from the same source. M.

Ver. 14. Who ... affinity. Heb. “she is thy aunt.” Some say that, in the old law, a person might marry his niece, but not his aunt; as the order of nature would be inverted if the aunt were subject to her nephew. But others assert that the law was reciprocal, and excluded the marriage of both. The emperor Claudius married his niece Agrippina, and authorized others to do the like. But only one imitated him at Rome; (Sueton.) though Tacitus (An. xii.) says, other nations did it with solemnity, as they had no law to the contrary. Aliis gentibus solemnia, &c. C.

Ver. 16. Brother; though she may be even divorced from him. S. Aug. q. 61. If the brother were dead without offspring, the next relation was bound to marry her; (Deut. 25:5) and the kinsman of Booz was accounted infamous for neglecting this duty. Ruth 4:6.

Ver. 17. Daughter, together, or successively; even if she were the child of another husband.—Incest. Heb. “a crime.” Aquila, “an abomination.” Sept. “an impiety.”

Ver. 18. Rival her, (in pellicatum). Heb. Chal. “to trouble her.” After the death of one sister, it seems, another might be taken. Jacob had two at once. Some think that polygamy is here forbidden. But the law seems to have tolerated it; and only condemns many, or too great a number, with respect to the king. Deut. 17:17. The impediments specified in this chapter may be comprised in these four verses:

*Nata, soror, neptis, matertera, fratris et uxor,
Et patruī conjux, mater, privigna, noverca,
Uxorisque soror, privigni nata, nurusque,
Atque soror patris, conjungi lege vetantur.* C.

Ver. 19. Thus, &c. The refractory were to be slain. C. 20:18. It was thought that the infant would be in danger; and hence the Jews punished with death the man whose child was born lame. S. Augustine (q. 64,) believes that this law is still in force; and some accuse the person who neglects it, as guilty of a venial sin. Bonfrere.

Ver. 20. Wife. This crime is to be punished like the rest, v. 29.

Ver. 21. Consecrated. Heb. “to pass through the fire to Moloch.” Sept. “to serve the ruler.” Syr. “to marry strange women;” as also C. 20:2. One of the sons of Achaz was offered to this idol of the Ammonites; and yet, perhaps, succeeded his father; (4 K. 16:3. 18:1,) which shews that the children were not always burnt to death, but only lustrated, or made to pass over or between two fires. Yet many assert that the children were frequently consumed in the flames, and God condemns the cruel parents to be punished with death. C. 20:2. The brazen idol was heated red hot, and the unhappy victim was placed in its arms, or the priests dragged the child over or between the fires. The surrounding nations delighted in human victims. The Carthaginians offered them till the time of Iphicrates. Adrian abolished several such cruel customs among the Greeks. See Porphy. de Abst. ii. Jerem. 7:31. —God; by causing any to suppose that he is cruel, like the idols. We must mention his name with the utmost respect. “The mouth, which utters the sacred name of God, ought never to pronounce a shameful word.” Philo de 10. præc. Some think, that the idolaters honoured their god by committing an abominable action in his presence. See Malvenda. But most people understand that human sacrifices are here forbidden. C.—The nations of Carolina very lately observed the same custom as the ancient idolaters, in sacrificing their children to the devil, by burying them to death in a brazen statue. Vives in Civ. Dic. vii. 19. Moloch was represented as a king, in all his ornaments, with the head of a calf. He was, perhaps, the idol adored by other nations, under the name of Saturn, who devoured his own children. Bonfrere. T.

Ver. 22. Abomination, punished so severely in the Sodomites. Gen. 19. Yet, even the philosophers of Greece were not at all ashamed of it. Bardesanes assures us, that the eastern nations punished it with death, and would not allow the guilty the honours of burial. Those beyond the Euphrates were so shocked at it, that they would kill themselves if they were only accused of such a crime. Ap. Eus. præp. vi. 10.

Ver. 23. Crime. Heb. “confusion.” The Egyptians did so with goats, as part of their religion. See C. 20:16 and An. Univ. Hist. We need not, however, infer from this law, that the crime was common among the Jews, as Voltaire would insinuate. H.—Nothing but monsters can proceed from such wickedness. M.

Ver. 28. Vomited. Moses speaks of what would shortly happen, as if it had already come to pass, which is familiar with the prophets. C.—He represents the earth as sick and disgusted with the crimes of its inhabitants, in the same manner as the Book of Wisdom (v. 23,) says, the water of the sea shall rage (or foam, excandescet) against them. The strong expression used by Moses, shews to what a length the Chanaanites had carried their abominations; so that God, justly irritated, orders them all to be exterminated.

Ver. 29. People. Heb. hammam. The same temporal punishment is inflicted upon all the aforesaid crimes, though they were not all equally grievous. The smallest of them deserved to be treated with such severity, to prevent the spreading of such contagious vices. H.—The regulations respecting marriage, were not immutable, or all determined by the law of nature, which admits of no dispensation. Only those relations in a right line, and the first in the collateral line, can be esteemed of this description. D.—If Protestants maintain, that all these regulations of Moses are part of the natural law, and bind Christians, they must also allow that a person must marry the widow of his deceased brother, if he has left no children. Deut. 25. God would never have established this general rule for his people, if it were in opposition to the natural law; which is clear and obvious to all people by the light of reason, according to Aristotle. Polit. 2. Neither would so many holy men have violated this law without reproof, if it had prohibited the marriages of two sisters, of aunts, &c. See Gen. 29. Exod. 6:20. God never dispensed in the right line; (1 Cor. 5:1) and such relations, or even people in the first collateral degree of consanguinity, marrying, are punished with death. C. 20. Whereas those in the second degree, or in the first of affinity, undergo a smaller punishment; which shews that the transgression, in both cases, is not against the law of nature. No man ever undertook to dispense with the marriage of brothers and sisters; though Beza lays this to the charge of Pope Martin V. But the person alluded to, only obtained leave to retain the sister of her whom he had privately dishonoured, when his marriage could not be dissolved without great scandal. S. Antonin. 3. p. tit. i. 11. As, therefore, some of these impediments were introduced by the positive ceremonial law of the Jews, which was abrogated by Jesus Christ, they have no other force at present than what they derive from the authority of Christian republics, which have adopted some and changed others, appointing, in some countries, death for the punishment of theft, and not of adultery, though the old law enjoined the reverse. See C. 20:10, and Gen. 38:24. Ex. 22:1. The Church may, therefore, surely dispense with those laws which she has enacted. W. Trid. Ses. xxiv. 3.—She has indeed restricted marriage between relations to the fourth degree included, both of consanguinity and of affinity. See the C. of Lateran, under Inn. III. But she will not allow people to marry their aunts, brothers' widows, or sisters of their deceased wife, as the Jews do. T.

LEVITICUS 19

Ver. 3. Sabbaths. Both those which occur every week, and extraordinary ones, v. 30.

Ver. 4. Idols. Heb. “vain things.” C.—Molten, or any other sort of workmanship. M.

Ver. 7. Profane. Heb. “it shall be defiled.” Sept. “improper for sacrifice.” Aquila, “It shall be rejected.” C.—So that the person who had offered it, shall become more guilty. M.

Ver. 9. Ground. Heb. and Sept. “the extremity of thy field.” The Rabbins say, a sixtieth part of all the products of the earth, was to be left for the poor. Seld. Jur. vi. 6. Thus God teaches his people to exercise themselves in the acts of mercy. D.

Ver. 10. Strangers. Sept. and Syr. “proselytes,” who might dwell in the country. As the soil did not belong to them, great compassion was requisite: otherwise they must have perished, or become slaves.—Lord; the sole proprietor. C.

Ver. 11. Lie. “When no injury is done to another, it is a great question whether a lie can ever be justified. The case would perhaps be easily decided, if we considered the commandments alone, and not the examples,” of those holy men who seem to have sometimes thought it lawful. S. Aug. q. 68. But is it not better to allow that these were under an inculpable mistake, than to defend one fault, because it is not attended with the guilt of another, by hurting others? Even lies of jest and of excuse, are contrary to the gravity and open-dealing of a Christian; and God never speaks of lying without marks of disapprobation. H.—Heb. “you shall not deny, or refuse” to restore, what has been entrusted to you; (Grotius) “nor deal falsely, or extenuate yourselves,” pretending that you cannot give alms. Oleaster.

Ver. 12. Profane. No greater indignity can be offered to God, than to solicit Him, as it were, to assist us in doing evil, by attesting falsehood. Philo.

Ver. 13. Morning. Pay what is due to the labourer, immediately, if he desire it. H.—It was customary among the Jews to pay their workmen in the evening. Matt. 20:8.

Ver. 14. Deaf. The word Kophos, used by the Sept. means also the dumb, as these defects are generally found in the same person. Nothing can be more base, than to attack those who are unable to defend themselves. Solon forbids anyone “to speak ill of the dead,” though he may receive an injury from his children. Those who undermine and ruin the reputation of the absent, are no less to be condemned.

Ver. 16. Detracter, whisperer. Heb. rakil, stands for both these terms.

Some translate a parasite, a merchant, vilifying the goods of others to enhance the price of his own; or a spy, seeking to discover and laugh at others' faults.—Neighbour; accusing him wrongfully, to the danger of his life; or lying in wait for him like an assassin. But strive rather to rescue those who are attacked. Those who neglect this duty, are responsible for the consequences, according to the Jews, (Seld. Jur. iv. 3,) and the laws of the Egyptians. Diodor. 1.

Ver. 17. Openly, is not in the Heb. or other versions. Instead of bearing malice at the heart, we are authorized to demand our right in a legal manner, or to correct in a fraternal matter, the person who may have injured us, lest we incur sin for our neglect, and the offender continue impenitent. Jesus Christ instructs us to do this with as little disturbance as possible. Matt. 18:15. Yet public sins must undergo a public correction. 1 Tim. 5:20. S. Aug. ser. 82. Love should regulate our complaints. Id. q. 70.

Ver. 18. Revenge, by private authority, or out of passion, which the pagans themselves acknowledged was more becoming a brute than a man, feræ est. Muson. Sen. de ira ii. 32.—Citizens. Heb. "observe or lie not in wait." Sept. "act not with fury against the son of thy people." C.—Heb. notor, means to upbraid when doing a kindness.—Thy friend. Heb. rehaka, may denote thy neighbour, or any one with whom we have any thing to do. Thus God orders us to love strangers as ourselves, (v. 34,) and to help our enemy. Ex. 23:4. The false insinuations of the Jews are fully exploded by Jesus Christ. Matt. 22:39. We must love the offender, but detest the offence. S. Aug. c. Faust. xix. 24. If God required his people to exterminate the Chanaanites, he did not authorized them to entertain any personal animosity against their persons, but they were to act as ministers of his justice. "O Lord, (said Philo very justly) we do not rejoice at the misfortune of our enemy, (Flaccus) having learnt from thy holy laws to compassionate the distress of others. But we thank thee for ... delivering us from our afflictions." C.

Ver. 19. Kind. Mules were therefore either brought from other countries, (3 K. 10:28,) or they were produced by some of the same species, as, good authors assert, is frequently the case in Syria, Cappadocia, &c. Plin. viii. 44. Pineda. T.—Spencer (Leg. ii. 20,) says, without any proof, that this law had a reference to the impure conjunctions of animals, in honour of Venus and of Priapus.—Different seeds, &c. This law tends to recommend simplicity and plain-dealing in all things; and to teach the people not to join any false worship or heresy with the worship of the true God. Ch.—Draw not the yoke with infidels. 2 Cor. 6. Theod. q. 27. These different colours were not in themselves evil, since they were used in the priests' vestments. They insinuate, that we must avoid schisms. W.—The sowing of different seeds tends to impoverish the soil. Plin. xviii. 10. The Egyptians sowed various seeds on a board, covered with fine mould; and, observing which sort was destroyed by the heat of the sun in the dog-days, superstitiously refrained, that year, from sowing any of it, lest it should produce no crop. Palladius.—Sorts. The Rabbins say of linen and wool, as Deut. 22:11. They allow other sorts. Josephus (iv. 8,) supposes, that garments of the former description were thus reserved for the priests alone. The Flamen, among the Romans, could not wear a woollen garment sewed with thread, without committing a sin; piaculum erat, says Servius. These precepts were to be literally observed, though they concealed a moral instruction of the greatest consequence, importing that all unnatural intercourse was to be avoided. Pythagoras conveyed his instructions under similar enigmatical expressions, saying, “we must not stir up the fire with a sword,” as Solomon does likewise. Prov. 30:15. Eccles. 12:3. 6. C.

Ver. 20. Marriageable. Heb. “promised, or given in marriage.” Sept. “reserved for another ... she shall,” &c. Onkelos and the Arabic version suppose also, that the woman alone was to be scourged with leather thongs; a punishment to which the Samaritan copy condemns only the man. The Rabbins agree with the Sept. Others translate, “there shall be an enquiry made, or they shall be set free, and shall not die.”

Ver. 22. Pray. Heb. and Sept. “shall atone for him with the ram of the sin-offering, before the Lord, for his sin.”

Ver. 23. The first-fruits. Præputia, literally their fore-skins: it alludes to circumcision, and signifies that for the first three years the trees were to be as uncircumcised, and their fruit unclean; till the fourth year their increase was sanctified and given to the Lord, that is, to the priests. Ch.—In some countries, people take off the buds to strengthen the tree. C.—The fruit, during the three first years, is not esteemed so good or wholesome; and therefore, it could not with propriety be presented to God. Philo de Creatione.—Unclean. Heb. “three years shall it be as uncircumcised unto you; it shall not be eaten.” H.

Ver. 24. Lord. It was to be brought to the holy city, and offered with the other tithes, out of which a feast was made for the poor, &c. Joseph. iv. 8. Besides the first-fruits for the priests, and the tithes for the Levites, out of which they again paid tithes to the priests, there was an annual tithe prescribed, (Deut. 12:12,) to supply a feast for the indigent, &c. at Jerusalem, along with this fruit; and another, every third year, designed for the poor alone (Deut. 14:28,) at the place of each one's abode. T.

Ver. 26. Blood. The flesh of any animal. The blood must belong to God. The members of the Sanhedrim eat nothing on the day that a criminal is executed, supposing that this is the meaning of the precept. The Sept. read erim, "on the mountains;" and another version has, "on the roof," as if the worship of idols on high places were forbidden. H.—Divine. Perhaps by means of "serpents," or "plates of brass," as the Heb. ness, may insinuate. These methods were known to the ancients. Horace, Ode iii. 37. Plin. xxx. 2. C.—Dreams. Heb. times. See Gal. 4:10. H.

Ver. 27. Cut your hair, &c. This, and other such like things, of themselves indifferent, were forbidden by God, that they might not imitate the Egyptians or other infidels, who practised these things out of superstition, in honour of their false deities. Ch.—The pagans consecrated locks of hair, and their beard, when it was first cut, to Apollo, the river gods, the hours, Esculapius, &c. Some, at Rome, hung the hair on a tree. T.—The Arabians and Macæ left only a tuft of hair at the top of their head, in imitation of Bacchus. Herod. iii. 8. iv. 175. This tuft is called sisoe by the Sept. who seem to have alluded to the Heb. term tsitsith. See Ezech. 8:3. The ancient scholiast says, this was left in honour of Saturn. It resembles a crown. The same custom was observed by the Syrians, (Lucian) Idumeans, &c. Jer. 9:25.—Beard. Heb. "the angle, or extremity of your beard." These regulations would seem beneath the attention of a lawgiver. But they were made in opposition to some profane customs of the surrounding nations. The Jews still observe this direction, and leave the beard from the ear to the chin, (where they let it grow pretty long) and also two mustaches, or whiskers, on the top lip. The Egyptian mummies have only the beard on the chin. The eyebrows and other hair of the gods and inhabitants of Egypt, were entirely cut off. In mourning the chin was also shaved. God forbids his people to imitate them. C.—But heretics need not hence infer, that the tonsure of priests and monks is reprehensible. Randulph.—Superstition and affected delicacy in curling, &c. are to be avoided. T.

Ver. 28. Dead. Adonis or Osiris; as if you were mourning for them, in which sense the former verse may be explained. At funerals it was customary to cut off the hair. Achilles and his soldiers did so at the death of Patroclus. Homer.—The Persians also cut the manes of their horses, to shew their grief for the loss of Masistius, (Herod. ix. 24,) as Alexander did when Hephæstion died. Plutarch.—The Egyptians, Assyrians, &c. cut their hair on the like occasions, and the Hebrews did so too; whether they neglected this law, or it was rather designed only to hinder them from joining in a superstitious lamentation for some idol. They also cut their bodies, Gen. 50. Jer. 41:5. The pagans did so, intending thereby to appease the anger of the infernal deities: ut sanguine ... inferis satisfaciant, (Varro, Servius): or to please the deceased. Plutarch, de consol. Thus Virgil represents Anna, Æn. iv.: Unguibus ora soror fœdans & pectora pugnīs. The Roman and Athenian laws restrained this cruelty of women towards themselves. But in Persia, the children and servants of great men still make an incision upon their arms, when their father or master dies. The women in Greece also observe a solemn mourning, with loud lamentations, tearing their cheeks and hair, and reciting the memorable actions of the deceased. The Christians and Jews of Syria inflict still more serious wounds upon themselves. The latter have always esteemed it lawful to adopt the customs of the nations with whom they lived, provided they were not attended with superstition; which makes us conclude, that what Moses here forbids was done in honour of some idol.—Marks, made with a hot iron, representing false gods, as if to declare that they would serve them forever. Philo.—The Assyrians had generally such characters upon their bodies. Philopator ordered the converts from the Jewish religion to be marked with ivy, in honour of Bacchus. 3 Macc. Theodoret (q. 18) mentions, that the pagans were accustomed to cut their cheeks, and to prick themselves with needles, infusing some black matter, out of respect for the dead, and for demons. Allusion is made to these customs, Apoc. 13:16, and Isai. 49:15. Christians have sometimes marked their arms with the cross, or name of Jesus. Procop. in Isai. xliv. 5. C.—As S. Jane Frances de Chantal did her breast. Brev. Aug. 21. Nomen pectori insculpsit. S. Paul says, I bear the marks of the Lord Jesus in my body. Gal. 6:17. The Church historians relate, that S. Francis and S. Catharine received miraculously the prints of his wounds. H.

Ver. 29. Strumpet, which was done formerly in the honour of idols. “They gave to Venus the prostitution of their daughters.” S. Aug. de C. xviii. 5. “In Cyprus they lead the unmarried women to the sea-shore, in order to acquire a dowry by these means on certain stated days, as a libation to Venus.” Justin.—Such things were common in the East. See Lucian de dea Syr. Strabo xvi.—Joel (3:3,) reproaches the Jews with prostituting their sons and daughters for bread; for there were also effeminate men among them. 3 K. 14:24. 4 K. 23:7. See Bar. ult. 42. Ose. 4:14. C.

Ver. 31. Wizards. Heb. oboth, denotes familiar spirits, (1 K. 8:7,) which gave answers from the belly or breast, as from a bottle; whence such wizards are called by the Greeks, engastrimuthoi; and by Sophocles, sternomanteis. C.—Soothsayers, are properly those who will judge what will happen by inspecting victims. M.—Heb. yiddehonim, means connoisseurs, intelligent people, gnostics, or those who pretend that they can penetrate the secrets naturally impenetrable to the mind of man. Sept. epaoidoi, “enchanters,” who undertake to keep off all misfortunes. “Surely, (says Pliny, xxx. 1,) to learn this art, (of magic) Pythagoras ... and Plato undertook long voyages by sea, or rather went into banishment. This they extolled at their return; this they kept as a secret. Hanc in arcanis habuere.”

Ver. 32. Aged man. Such are supposed to be possessed of wisdom and experience. The Egyptians and Lacedemonians rose up out of respect to an old man. Herod. ii. 80. The Rabbins pretend that a person ought to rise up when the old man is four cubits distant, provided he be, as he ought, a man of wisdom; for otherwise he is entitled to no honour. But this would be making inferior judges of their merit. The Chaldee, Philo, &c. comprise those “learned in the law,” under the name of old men.

Ver. 35. Rule; Heb. “taking dimensions” with a yard, tape, &c.

Ver. 36. Weights. Heb. “stones of justice,” for stone weights were formerly used. Prov. 16:11.—Bushel, &c. Heb. “a just epha, and a just hin.” C.

Ver. 2. Moloch. See C. 18:21.

Ver. 3. I will thus execute vengeance upon him by the hands of his people; and, in case they neglect it, or the crime be secret, I will surely punish the guilty person, and all who may have consented to his wickedness, v. 5. H.—Face: Chal. “wrath,” which manifests itself on the countenance. D.

Ver. 4. My commandment: Heb. “If the people hide their face not to see.” (C.) or Sept. “look over on purpose, and neglect the man who has given of his seed to the ruler.”

Ver. 6. Them. To have recourse to them, is to deal with the devil and commit idolatry. See C. 19:31.

Ver. 8. Sanctify you, and order you to keep at a distance from the impure worship of other nations. H.

Ver. 9. Die. The Rabbins say, by being strangled, when nothing farther is added: but if the following addition be made, stoning is understood. But their authority is not of much weight, and is contradicted, v. 2. Stoning was the most usual method of putting to death in the days of Moses, and is commonly meant; or perhaps the judges might determine the mode of execution.—Upon him. He deserves to die. He can blame no other. See Matt. 17:25. C.—For greater infamy, the person to be stoned or hung, was stripped of his clothes. T.—The punishment of lapidation (v. 2) seems to be designed for the following times, as it was for adultery. Deut. 22:24. M. John. 8:5.

Ver. 10. Adulteress. Philo (de Joseph.) says, whoever discovered a man in the very act, might kill him; and the Roman law allowed the same liberty, impune necato. But God requires a juridical process, and witnesses, as we see in the case of Susanna, (Dan. 13) and in that of the woman who was brought to our Saviour. One witness might authorize a person to put his wife away, and if he then retained her, he was esteemed a fool. Prov. 18:23. But more witnesses were requisite before she could be put to death. They put their hands on the heads of the guilty, thus taking their blood upon themselves, if they accused them wrongfully. Solon allowed the husband to kill the adulterer. The woman was not permitted to wear any ornaments, or to enter any temple afterwards. If she did, any one might tear her clothes, and beat, but not kill her.

Ver. 11. Father. See C. 18:8. It is supposed that the father was dead, otherwise the punishment would probably be greater than for adultery. The Sam. “with the wife of his father’s brother.” C.

Ver. 12. Crime. Heb. tebel, “confusion,” the same term which is used in speaking of bestiality, (C. 18:23,) though the latter crime be more enormous. H.

Ver. 14. Alive, is not in the original; but must be understood. The Rabbins say melted lead was to be poured down the throats of the guilty. The words of Moses seem rather to refer to external fire. C.—With them, if they both gave their consent to the crime. M.

Ver. 15. The beast also ye shall kill. The killing of the beast was for the greater horror of the crime, and to prevent the remembrance of such abomination. Ch.—The beast was to be killed with clubs; the man was stoned to death. Jonathan.

Ver. 16. Them. This monstrous abomination, teras, as Herodotus, an eye-witness calls it, was not unknown to the Egyptians. Gunaiki tragos emisgeto; (B. ii. 46,) nor to other nations. Apul. Met. 10.

Ver. 17. A crime. Heb. chesed, commonly signifies an act of piety or goodness, as if Moses intended to insinuate that such marriages were at first lawful. Thalmud. Seld. Jur. v. 8.) But a softer term is used to denote a great impiety, as the Hebrews say to bless, when they mean to curse, or to blaspheme; (C.) and the Greeks call the furies Eumenides, or “the good-natured.”—One another’s. Heb. “He hath uncovered his sister’s,” &c. Whether they saw what was indecent or not, if they admitted of any unlawful commerce, they were to be stoned to death. H.

Ver. 18. People, if the action become public; otherwise the man may be purified. C. 15:24. This intemperance was by a positive law declared a mortal offence in the Jews, though in itself it might be venial. Sanchez ix. 21. The text shews that the woman here gives her consent.—And she open. Hence she deserves to die, for exposing herself and her children to great danger. H.

Ver. 19. Flesh, or relation. M.

Ver. 20. Children. The Sadducees read, “they shall die naked.” The present Heb. has simply, “they shall be without children;” their offspring shall be illegitimate. S. Aug. q. 76. God will not bless their marriage. “Such we know can have no children.” S. Greg. q. 6. S. Aug.

Apost. Anglorum. The guilty shall be slain without delay. Grot. C.

Ver. 24. Honey. Most fertile and delicious. M.

Ver. 26. Mine. This is the reason of these different prescriptions, that they may know the dignity to which they have been raised, and may avoid the manners of the profane. C.

Ver. 27. Spirit. Heb. ob, means also a bottle. See C. 19:31. If those who consult such people be guilty, the authors of the delusion deserve death still more. H.—The spirit of python is no other than the spirit of the devil, or of Apollo, who was called Pythius, on account of his having slain the serpent python. His oracles were in great request, as he was supposed to know the secrets of futurity. C.

Ver. 1. An uncleanness; viz. such as was contracted in laying out the dead body, or touching it; or in going into the house, or assisting at the funeral, &c. Ch.—At the death. Heb. “for a soul;” by which name the carcass is here denoted, because it had once been ruled by the soul. S. Aug. q. 81. This law related only to the family of Aaron, when no absolute necessity or near relation required their attendance. When such offices of charity should be deemed defiling, it is not easy to say. But the ancients generally looked upon them in this light. C. 10:6. Porphyrius enquired of Anebo, why the holy inspector touched not the dead, since in all sacred transactions, the death of animals generally intervenes. We know not the answer of this pretended prophet Egypt; and Jamblicus confesses, that he cannot resolve the difficulty. The Romans placed a branch of cypress before the door where a corpse was lying, lest any priest might see it unthinkingly, and be defiled. Servius. “At their return from a funeral they sprinkled themselves with water, and passed over fire.” Festus. The Rabbins say, that no one could be buried in Jerusalem, nor in the towns of the Levites, on account of the sanctity of those places, and for fear lest the priests might thus contract some uncleanness. C.—To account for all these regulations, we only need to observe that such was the will of God; and here it may surely be said, stat pro ratione voluntas. He might thus intend to exercise their obedience; to keep their minds from being too much depressed by the sight of the dead, and to remind us all that we ought carefully to avoid sin, which kills the soul, and renders us really unclean before God. H.

Ver. 3. Sister, of the same parents. Vatable.—Husband; for if she have, he ought to bury his wife, and to mourn for her. To be deprived of these advantages, was then esteemed a great misfortune.

Ver. 4. Prince. Heb. “Let not the prince (of the priests, Acts 23:5,) render himself unclean,” by attending the funerals of any of the people; or “let not the husband,” &c. He may be allowed to attend his wife to the grave: or, as others more probably assert, even this is not permitted. She is not one of the persons privileged, v. 2, and Ezechiel 44:25. Ezechiel (24:16,) receives a command not to bewail the death of his wife. The Romans thought their priests would be defiled, by attending the funerals even of their own wives; and Sylla, going to dedicate a temple to Hercules, sent Metella a bill of divorce, and ordered her to be removed from his house, when she was just expiring. Plutarch.

Ver. 5. Flesh. This would indicate an important grief, and want of patience. H.—They were not allowed to put on the usual signs of mourning, as the common people were, provided they did it not in honour of an idol. C. 19:27.

Ver. 7. Vile, (v. 14,) defiled, (sordidam). Heb. chalala, “a profane woman,” (Pagnin) or one of ill-fame; as captives, inn-keepers, are generally esteemed. Zone, means a common prostitute. Joseph. iii. 3. None of these fit matches for the priests.

Ver. 8. And offer. Heb. addresses this to Moses. “Thou shalt sanctify him, therefore, because he offereth the bread of thy God.”

Ver. 9. Fire. Provided she be betrothed, and still in her father’s house; so that the infamy fall upon him. Jonathan.—For if she be with her husband, she must undergo the usual punishment of stoning. Other young women received no corporal punishment for simple fornication: the man was bound to marry them, if the father consented; and, at any rate, he was forced to give them a dowry. Ex. 22:16. C.—But if the woman pretended falsely that they were virgins, they were stoned. Deut. 22:20.

Ver. 10. Head. Sept. “by taking off his cidaris, or tiara.” He shall not shave his head. C. 10:6.—Garments, at funerals, nor the sacred vestments at all. C.

Ver. 12. Places. This is to be understood in the same sense. He must not leave his sacred functions to attend any corpse whatever. Having the honour of representing God, and being his first minister on earth, the utmost purity is required of him. Inferior priests may mourn on some occasions; and the Levites are not distinguished, in this respect, from the people; to shew that God requires a sanctity in his officers, proportionate to their exaltation.—Oil. Heb. “He is the Nozor; or the crown of the anointing oil of,” &c. Joseph has the title of Nazir, (Gen. 49:26,) which is borne by the prime ministers of the Eastern kings. Such is the high priest in the temple. Let Christian priests hence learn what sanctity will be required of them. But why is the pontiff forbidden to bury his father, since he obtains that dignity after his decease. S. Augustine (q. 83,) answers, that he was to be consecrated immediately after, that he might offer incense. Another might, however, perform that office. On some occasions, the high priest was deposed, or the dignity transferred to another family. Infirmities might also hinder him from performing the duty. C.—Priests must be detached, as much as possible, from all things which might divert them from their sacred offices. The greatest holiness is required of those who receive the body of Jesus Christ. D.

Ver. 13. Wife. Josephus says he could not divorce her. The Rabbins allow him only one wife at a time. It is said that Joiada had two. But that might be successively; and it is not certain that he was the high priest; (2 Par. 24:3. C.) though he has that title in the Vulg. C. 22:11, ibid. H.—His wife must be an Isrealite. The Sept. intimates, “of his own race.” But this is denied by others. He could not marry his brother’s widow, (Selden) nor a girl under twelve and a half. “The Egyptian priests marry only one, while others have as many wives as they please.” Diod. i. C.

Ver. 14. Widow. Other priests might marry the widows of their fellow priests. Ezec. 44:22.

Ver. 15. Nation. The wife of the high priest must be of noble birth, that he may speak to kings and princes with more authority. M.—Heb. “he shall not defile his race,” &c. by marrying one of another nation, or contrary to law. If he do, the children shall have no share in the priesthood.

Ver. 17. A blemish. These corporal defects or deformities, which disqualified the priests from officiating in the old law, were figures of the vices which priests are to beware of in the new law. S. Gregory, Cura pastorum. Ch.—The Rabbins reckon 140 blemishes on which the Sanhedrim had to pass sentence. They also require in the high priest superior beauty, strength, riches, and wisdom.

Ver. 18. Nose. Heb. “a flat nose, or any thing superfluous.” Sept. “the nose, (hand) or ears slit.” This verse rejects those whose members are too large, as the next does those who have them too small.

Ver. 20. Eyed. Heb. dak, may denote “a dwarf.” Syriac, or something very thin. Ex. 16:14.—Pearl, (albuginem) whiteness.—Rupture, (herniosus). One perhaps troubled with the stone, (M.) whose testicles have been bruised, (Onkelos) or who has only one. Sept. and Syriac.

Ver. 23. Veil, which separates the sanctuary from the court. The Athenians chose the most handsome man to be the king of ceremonies; and the people of Eli appointed such only to carry the sacred vessels, &c. Atheneus xiii. 2. C.

Ver. 2. Offer. He does not speak of such things as fell to the share of the priests; (M.) but orders them to behave with great reverence when they perform their sacred offices, lest others should take occasion to treat the name of God and holy things with disrespect. Heb. and Sept. “let them not profane my holy name, which they are bound to sanctify; or in what they consecrate to me.” Such things must not be used for ordinary purposes. S. Bas. ser. de bapt. ii. 2. and 3.

Ver. 3. Approacheth, &c. This is to give us to understand, with what purity of soul we are to approach to the blessed sacrament, of which these meats that had been offered in sacrifice were a figure. Ch.—Such as were unclean either fasted till the evening, or ate unconsecrated meats till they were purified.—Perish. The Rabbins say, by the hands of the other priests. The judges could only condemn him to be whipped. If his crime were secret, the punishment was left to God. Seld. syn. ii. 1.

Ver. 4. And he, &c. Hence it is plain, even the Jewish priests were bound to observe continence during the time of their ministry. C.—For the same reason, the priests of the new law, who may be called at any time to perform their more sacred functions, engage voluntarily in the state of perpetual celibacy. H.

Ver. 5. Or any. Heb. “or a man who may contaminate,” as lepers, &c. M.

Ver. 8. That. See C. 17:15.

Ver. 9. In the sanctuary, is not found in Heb. which is difficult to explain. “They shall observe my precepts, (or “watches,” entering upon the ministry at 17. Josep. M.) and not bear sin for it, and die in it, because they have profaned it;” which it, may be understood either of the consecrated food, (v. 7,) or of the sanctuary. C.

Ver. 10. Sojourner. “Guest,” or friend. Syriac. None but priests could taste this meat, except they were going to remain in the family for ever. Hence servants and slaves of the Jewish nation, who would one day regain their liberty, are excluded.

Ver. 13. Children. If she had any, she remained with them. Philo. Monar. 2.

Ver. 14. He. A layman, who, through mistake, eat of any of the tithes, &c. was obliged to give the capital, and a fifth part besides, with a sacrifice, mentioned C. 5:15.—Sanctuary. Heb. and Sept. “He shall give to the priest the holy thing.” But if he ate it on purpose, he was to be slain. Num. 15:30.

Ver. 15. They; the common people shall not profane, by touching them afterwards, or by retaining any part. C.—The priests shall answer for the profanation, if it be committed through their neglect. H.

Ver. 18. Strangers: proselytes of justice, or converts of the Jewish religion. See v. 25.

Ver. 19. Without blemish. To teach us to aim at perfection in all our offerings and performances.

Ver. 22. Scar. Sept. “If its tongue be cut out, or slit.” which was a blemish among the heathens. Servius in Æn. vi.; lectas de more bidentes. They also required the victims to be perfect. The Egyptians had officers called Sealers, who were directed by many books how to choose the proper victims. The Hebrew priests had to examine such as were offered to them, with the utmost nicety. See the Misna of Babylon. The idea of God’s perfection, has taught all nations to present to Him nothing but what is perfect, particularly when they offer victims.

Ver. 23. Ear ... cut. Heb. saruang, which is translated a crooked nose. C. 21:18. The Sept. and Syriac agree here with the Vulg.: but the moderns generally adopt the interpretation of the Rabbins, who say the word is applied to those animals whose double members, feet, ears, &c. are disproportionately long; as kolut, means too short. Bochart. C.—Voluntarily, for the use of the priests, but not for any sacrifice, v. 21. D.

Ver. 24. Bruised. Heb. does not specify what part, no more than the Syr. or Arab. versions; but the Sept., Chal., Rabbins, and most commentators agree with us.—Do any, &c. (faciatis.) You shall not sacrifice (Syriac) any thing that is rendered unfit to propagate its kind: neither shall you reduce either man or beast to that condition. Josephus c. Apion ii. Rabbins.

Ver. 25. Bread, which always accompanies the sacrifices for sin. Holocausts might be offered by the Gentiles, 2 Mac. 3:3. 1 Esd. 6:9. Josep. Ant. xviii. 7. Seld. Jur. 4. 7.—Them. To reconcile this with v. 18, we must understand because in the sense of in as much as; they are all corrupted, when contrary to these regulations. The strangers shall not be allowed to offer any blemished victim. Heb. “Neither from the hand of a stranger shall you offer the bread (or victims) of your God of any of these; because ... blemishes are in them: they shall not be accepted (by God) for you (or them).” The Chal. and other versions explain it in the same sense. Presents of gold, &c. were accepted, and kept in the temple. The family of Augustus shewed their generosity in this respect. Philo Legat. C.—Strangers, or pagans, could not offer victims, but they might give money to purchase them. T.

Ver. 27. Lord. In this and the following verses, we are taught a lesson of humanity. Tert.—The Romans did not offer sheep or goats till they were eight days old: though the Jews were at liberty to sacrifice them after that term, they generally waited till they were thirty days old. C.

Ver. 2. Holy. The Heb. Chal. and Sept. add, “and meet together; or, these are my feasts of assembly.” On these days the people were called together to hear the word of God, &c. M.

Ver. 3. Sabbath. Heb. “the rest of rest;” a day in which no unnecessary servile work must be done, no more than on the great holidays, v. 6. 8. H.—Called holy, because it shall be really so: in which sense the word is often used. Isai. 9:6. &c.—Day; you must not even dress meat, which was also forbidden on the day of expiation.—Lord, on which he ceased from work, and which you must keep in his honour.—Habitations. In the temple, the priests were intent upon sacrificing, which was indeed a material, but not a formal, violation of the sabbath. Matt. 12:5.

Ver. 6. Bread. The obligation of eating none but this sort of bread began at the second evening of the 14th, which was the beginning of the 15th of Nisan. Ex. 12:6. 12. M.

Ver. 8. In fire. Sept. “holocausts,” extraordinary ones, besides the daily burnt-offerings. Num. 28:19.—More holy than the five intermediate days, on which servile work was allowed. In this and the former verse, more and most are not specified in the Heb. and Sept. C.

Ver. 10. Land of Chanaan, at which time these feasts began to be observed. M. See Lev. 2:14.—Before the harvest commenced, first-fruits were offered to the Lord. A gomer containing about three pints of barley was given to the priests, by the nation at large, as each individual was not bound to make a particular solemn offering. The judges deputed three men to gather this barley on the evening of the 15th Nisan, where the neighbourhood assembled near Jerusalem. It was gathered by them in three different fields, after having been thrice assured that the sun was set, and that they had leave to reap, in answer to their triple demands on each head. Then they placed the ears in three boxes, which they brought to the court of the sanctuary, and having ground the barley, and poured a log of oil and an handful of incense upon it, presented it to the priest, who heaving it in the form of a cross, threw as much as he could hold in his hand upon the altar, and kept the rest for himself. Joseph. iii. 10. &c. Private people offered also in kind or in money their first-fruits, or between the 40th and the 60th part of what their land produced. This custom is almost as ancient as the world, (Gen. 4:3,) and we may say that it forms a part of natural religion, which all nations have observed. Porphyrius esteems it an impiety to neglect it. He says that the Thoes, living on the borders of Thrace, were in a moment destroyed, because they offered neither sacrifices nor first-fruits. De Abstin. ii. 7. The ancient Romans and Greeks were very punctual in this respect. Plin. xviii. 20. Those officers who collected this first-fruits among the latter were styled Parasites. Many of the festivals among the heathens, occurred at the end of harvest. Aristot. ad Nicom. viii. The Jews might reap their wheat, but they could not taste it, before they had offered the first-fruits, at Pentecost. C. 23:17. Ex. 23:16.—Of ears. Hebrew homor, or gomer, “a sheaf,” denotes also a measure, which was called an assaron, containing almost three pints.

Ver. 11. Sabbath. Onkelos has “the good day,” from which the fifty days of Pentecost were counted. C.

Ver. 14. Corn (polentam). Some translate bruised corn, or a sort of cake. See C. 2:4.—Dwellings, even out of the holy land, which was peculiar to this law. Grotius.

Ver. 15. Sabbath. Not the ninth day of the week, but the first day of the Passover; from the morrow of which seven weeks or 49 days were reckoned; and the next day was Pentecost. M.—They began, therefore, to count on the 16th of Nisan, and end on the 6th of the third month Sivan. All the intermediate days took their denomination from this second day of the Passover; so that the next Saturday was called the first sabbath after the second day; in Greek Deuteroproton, the second-first; (Lu. 6:1,) a term which had puzzled all the interpreters until Jos. Scaliger made this discovery. Emend. 6. The Samaritans count from the day after that sabbath which follows the Passover; so that if the festival fall on Monday, they celebrate Pentecost later than the Jews. See their Letter to Huntington. C.

Ver. 16. Sacrifice. Heb. mincha, which relates to the offerings of corn and liquors. Two loaves of wheaten flour leavened, were presented probably by the nation. This festival was instituted in memory of the law being given from Mount Sinai, which was a figure of the law of grace promulgated by the Holy Ghost and by the apostles, on the day of Pentecost. C.

Ver. 17. Loaves. The Protestants supply wave loaves, (H.) though their Heb. text has nothing. The Sam. is more correct. Houbigant.

Ver. 18. Lambs. More were prescribed. Num. 28:27. Josephus joins all together. (B. iii. 10.)

Ver. 20. Use. None of the peace-offerings were burnt upon the altar, as the bread was leavened. C.

Ver. 21. Most holy. Heb. “a holy convocation.” H.—It is generally supposed that it had an octave, though the Scripture says nothing of it.

Ver. 24. Memorial, or a memorable sabbath. This third great festival sanctified the commencement of the civil year in Tisri, the sabbatical month, according to the ecclesiastical calculation. T. See Num. 29:3.—The sound of trumpets, which ushered in the year with great solemnity, reminded the Jews of the approaching fast, v. 27, (Maimon.) and of those terrible sounds which had been heard at Sinai. Theodoret, q. 32. The Rabbins say that a ram’s horn was used, because Abraham had sacrificed a ram instead of his son. Gen. 22:11. Zac. 9:14. The Jews on this day sound the horn 30 times, feast, and wish one another a happy year. Boxtorf. syn. xix. We know not on what account this festival was instituted. But it was probably ordained in order that the people might learn to thank God for the favours received during the past year, and might beg his blessing on that, upon which they were now entering. C.

Ver. 28. Servile is not in the original, or in the other versions, nor in the Vulg. v. 30; whence it is inferred, that this day of atonement was to be kept like the sabbath: so that even meat could not be made ready on it lawfully. C. 16:29. C.

Ver. 29. Every. It was difficult for any grown-up person to be entirely guiltless, amid such a variety of precepts, (M.) which S. Peter says neither they nor their fathers could bear, Acts 15:19: and S. James (3) observes, in many things we all offend. If any proved so happy as to keep without blame, (Lu. 1:6. H.) they were bound, at least, to grieve for the injury done to God by their fellow members. See Dan. 9:5. M.

Ver. 32. Sabbaths. The Church adopts this custom in her divine office. The Jewish day began and ended with sun-set. Ex. 12:6. C.—No part of the ninth of Tisri belonged to this feast, (v. 27,) which only began at the expiration of it. H.

Ver. 34. Seven days, during which the people were bound to rejoice, but not to abstain from servile work; except on the first and eighth day. T.—Tabernacles: Gr. Scenopegia; because, during the octave, the Jews lived in tents, or booths, made of branches, &c. v. 42.

Ver. 36. Most holy. Heb. “an holy assembly.” The great day of the festivity, Jo. 7:37.—Congregation. Heb. hatsereth, “retention.” All were bound to wait till this day was over. In other festivals, it was sufficient if they were present one day. This was the concluding day of the feast of tabernacles. Sept. exodion. Plutarch (Sym. iv. 5.) observes, that this festival greatly resembles that of Bacchus. Ovid (Fast. iii.) speaking of the feast of Anna Perenna, describes it thus:

Sub Jove pars durat, pauci tentoria ponunt,
Sub quibus e ramis frondea facta casa est.

Casaubon (on Athen. iv. 9. and v. 5.) mentions other feasts, on which the pagans dwelt under tents. The devil has caused his slaves to imitate most of the holy ceremonies of the true religion. C.

Ver. 39. Eighth. On the feast of the Passover, the 7th day after the 15th was kept holy, because the 14th, or the Phase, made also a part of the solemnity, v. 5. 8. H.

Ver. 40. Fairest tree, branches of the orange or citron tree, laden with blossoms and fruit. T.—Josephus (iii. 10) says, they took branches of myrtle, willows, and palm trees, on which they fixed oranges. This is the fruit which the Hebrews generally understand to be hereby designated. In the same sense the Arab. and Syriac translate “golden apples.”—Thick trees, of any species; though Josephus, &c. restrain it to the myrtle, which was certainly used on this occasion. 2 Esd. 8:12. —Willows. Sept. adds also, “branches of agnus from the torrent.” Perhaps Moses only meant that these branches should be used in forming the tents; but the Jews hold them in their hands, while they go in solemn procession round the pulpit in their synagogues, during every day of the octave, before breakfast, crying out Ana hosiah na, &c. “Save us, we beseech thee, O Lord; we beseech thee, grant us good success.” They gave the title of hosannah to those branches; in allusion to which, the children sung in honour of Jesus Christ, Hosanna to the Son of David.—Rejoice; dancing and singing before the altar of holocausts, 2 K. 6:14. The wisdom of God shines forth, in thus attaching to his worship a carnal people, by intermingling with the most solemn ceremonies some relaxation and pleasure. By calling them together so often in the year, they became also better acquainted with one another, and more in love with their religion and country. The ancient lawgivers entertained the like sentiments. Seneca, Strabo x. But the pagans generally carried these diversions to excess. C.—In this chapter we find six festivals specified: 1. sabbath; 2. Passover; 3. Pentecost; 4. trumpets; 5. expiation; 6. tabernacles, lasting till the octave day of assembly and collection. These three last were celebrated in the 7th month, the 1st of the civil year. There was also a feast on all the new moons. Num. 28:11. H.

Ver. 42. Days. Tostatus affirms they might pass the nights in their houses; but most people suppose, the Jews spent the whole octave in bowers.

Ver. 44. Feasts. In the institution of these feasts, as in the other regulations of Moses, there was something ceremonial, which might be altered, and something moral, which regards even those times when the Jewish religion was to cease. S. Aug. q. 43.—Hence we must conclude, that the obligation of keeping certain days holy must always remain. But those appointed for the Jews, as they foretold the future Messias, must be changed, lest otherwise we might seem to confess that he is still to come. Rom. 14. Gal. 4. Colos. 2. We are not therefore allowed to Judaize abstaining from work on the Jewish sabbath, (C. of Laodicea,) as Antichrist will require. S. Greg. ep. xi. 3.—But we must keep Sunday instead, (as even Protestants maintain, though there be no Scripture for it,) by authority of tradition, in memory of Christ’s resurrection, &c. S. Jerom, ep. ad Hed. ib. S. Aug. de C. xxii. 30. So also we observe the Christian festivals, in honour of our Lord and his saints, instead of those which God appointed for the Jews, either by himself or by his ministers: for we find that some were instituted after the time of Moses, (Est. 9 and 1 Macc. 4) and these were sanctioned by the observance of Christ himself, It was the feast of the dedication, and Jesus walked in the temple, &c. Jo. 10:22–3. W.

Ver. 2. Command. It is probable that this order was given while Beseleel was working at the tabernacle. C.—The people were to furnish the necessary sacrifices, &c. by the half sicle, Ex. 30:3, and by voluntary contributions on the three great festivals, on which no one was to appear empty-handed, Ex. 23:15. Some chose to put their contributions towards the temple in the treasury, Lu. 21:1.—Oil: Heb. “pure oil of the olive beaten, for light to,” &c.

Ver. 5. Bake. The family of Caath had to perform this office, 1 Par 9:32. 23:29. M.—Incense. Sept. add, “salt.” Villalpend also places wine on the table. B. iv. 57.—Memorial for the Lord to bless his people, and for them to make their oblations to him as to the living God, from whom all blessings are derived. H.—The incense was burnt instead of the bread, when fresh loaves were placed there. C.

Ver. 8. Of the, &c. The Israelites gave a sufficient maintenance to the ministers of religion, out of which these provided the loaves; as S. Jerom testifies, Mal. 1.

Ver. 10. Egyptian. Many of these came out along with the Hebrews. Exod. 12:38.

Ver. 11. The Name. Some Latin copies add, “of God;” but the best omit it, with the Heb. &c. This is, however, the meaning. C.—The son of Salumith being in a rage, cursed that sacred name; (v. 15) and, as he perhaps had attempted to vent his fury upon whatever came in his way, God here reiterates the laws against murder, &c. v. 17. The Jews are so much afraid of taking the name of God (Yehovah) in vain, that they have for a long time abstained from pronouncing it at all; (H.) and here they have probably omitted it on purpose. Houbigant. But this seems to border upon superstition, is contrary to the design of God, who revealed that august name, and inserted it very frequently in the holy Bible, and in the very prayer, which the senators have to recite; (Deut. 21:8,) and, can any one suppose, that he would not have them pronounce it, even in their solemn devotions? Many of the Rabbins suppose, that blasphemy is not to be punished with death, if any other name of God be used: but others are more reasonable. Our Saviour was not accused by the Jews of transgressing, in this respect, when they condemned him as guilty of blasphemy. Matt. 26:64. The name of God, is often used in the same sense as we use the words majesty, lordship, &c. as being more emphatical, and dignified. C.

Ver. 14. Head. To testify, that if they witness falsehood, they are willing to suffer the like punishment; and to beg that God would accept this victim, and not afflict all his people. T.

Ver. 15. His God. Heb. Elohaiv. Philo explains this of idols, as if it were unlawful to speak ill of them, lest we should proceed to do so with respect to the true God. But the prophets, and the most holy personages, had no scruple in speaking contemptuously of the pagan divinities.—His sin, and the punishment of it. C.

Ver. 19. Blemish. Heb. mum, denotes any thing by which the body is disfigured or hurt. M.

Ver. 20. Breach, or fracture: if he break a bone, the like detriment shall he receive.

Ver. 21. Striketh, so as to kill or render useless, percusserit, (H.) v. 18.—Punished. Sept. “slain.” They omit the first part of this verse.

Ver. 22. Stranger. The Jews improperly restrain this law to those nations only which have embraced their religion. God requires that the judges shall not shew more favour to their countrymen, than to others who may dwell among them. C.

Ver. 2. The rest (sabbathises sabbatum). The land was to enjoy the benefit of rest every seventh year, to remind God’s people that he had created the world, and that he still retained dominion over it, (S. Aug. q. 91. 92,) requiring the spontaneous fruits of that year as a tribute, part of which he gave to the poor. In the mean time, all creatures rested from their labours, and the people were taught to have an entire confidence in Providence. C.—This law was given in the desert of Sinai, in the month of Nisan, the second year after the exit: but it did not begin to be in force till the Hebrews entered into the land of Chanaan. H.

Ver. 5. Reap entirely, but only take a part, v. 6.—First-fruits. None shall be this year presented to the Lord. Heb. has the word Nezireka, “Nazareat,” alluding to the custom of those who, out of devotion, let their hair grow; as here only the spontaneous fruits of the unpruned vine were to be eaten; they were separated, as the word also means, or “sanctified,” (Sept.) being abandoned indifferently for the use of any one that pleased to eat of them, and no longer fenced in by the proprietor, (C.) though he might take the first, or choicest fruits for his own use, (M.) or at least he might take his share like the rest. T.

Ver. 6. They. Heb. and Sept. “The sabbath of the earth shall be meat for you” in common.

Ver. 7. Cattle. This last term in Heb. Sept. &c. means “wild beasts,” which must also live. At this period of the seventh year debts were to be remitted, the law read, &c. Ex. 21:2. Deut. 15:2 and 31:10. But in the jubilee year, even those Hebrew slaves whose ears had been pierced, and those who had sold their land, regained their liberty and possessions. C.—Their children and wives, according to Josephus, went out with them, v. 41. Houses and suburbs for gardens, &c. might be sold for ever, if they were not redeemed the first year, excepting those of the Levites, v. 34. T.

Ver. 8. Years. It is dubious whether the 49th or the 50th year was appointed for the jubilee. The former year is fixed upon by many able chronologers, who remark, that if two years of rest had occurred together, it would have been a serious inconvenience; and Moses might have said the 50th year for a round number, or comprise therein the year of the former jubilee, as we give five years to the olympiad, and eight days to the week, though the former consists only of four years, and the latter of seven days. (Rader; Scaliger; &c.) But others decide for the fiftieth year, v. 10. Philo, Joseph. iii. 10. S. Aug. q. 92. Salien, &c. C.—On the feast of expiation of the 49th year, they promulgated the following to be the year of jubilee. M.—Usher places the first A.M. 2609, 49 years after the partition of the land by Josue in 2560: Salien dates 50 years from the entrance (v. 2,) of the Hebrews into Chanaan, A.M. 2583, six years sooner; and places the first jubilee 2633, immediately after the sabbatic year, which fell in the 32nd year of Othoniel. He supposes that both were proclaimed at the same time, on the 1st of Tisri, Ros Hassana, “the head of the year;” though the heralds went about the country only on the 10th. The writers both of the Synagogue and of the Church generally adopt the 50th for the year of jubilee; and the pretended inconvenience of two years’ rest is nugatory, since God promised a three years’ crop, v. 21. H.

Ver. 10. Remission; that is, a general release and discharge from debts and bondage, and a reinstating of every man in his former possessions. Ch.—Jubilee: Heb. jubol means “liberty” (Joseph.); “re-establishment” (Philo); (C.)—“deliverance” (Abenezra). The Rabbins falsely assert, that a ram's horn was used on this occasion: but Bucharth shews that it is solid and unfit for the purpose. B. ii. 42. They also maintain, that from the 1st of this sacred month, as it is called by Philo, till the 10th, the slaves spent their time in continual rejoicings in their master's house, and on the latter day they were set free. Cunæus (Rep. i. 6,) observes, that the jubilee was discontinued after the captivity, though the sabbatic year was still kept. C.—Indeed the Jews were often very negligent in these respects, and God complained and punished them for it. C. 27:32. &c. The avarice of the great ones chiefly caused these wise regulations to be despised, though, from time to time, God enforced their observance, that it might be clearly known from what family the Messiah spring. After his birth they were abrogated, as no longer necessary. H.—Something similar was instituted by Solon, and styled “the shaking off burdens,” for the redemption both of men and good. Laertius. M.—The Locrians could not alienate their patrimony. Aristotle polit. ii. 7. and vi. 4. The Rabbins deviate from the spirit of their lawgiver, when they assert, that persons might sell their inheritance for a greater number of years than 50, if they specified how many, &c. Seld. Succes. iii. 24. In the Christian dispensation, the jubilee denotes a time of indulgence, in consequence of the power left by Jesus Christ. Matt. 16:19. 2 Cor. 2:10. The first was given by Boniface VIII. in 1300; and others were granted every century, till Clement VI. reduced the space to 50 years, 1542. Gregory XI. would have them dispensed to the faithful every 33 years, and Paul XI. every 25th, that more might partake of so great a benefit. This has been done since his time, and the Popes often grant them when the Church is in great danger, and also in the year when they are consecrated. C.—They are designed to promote the fervour of piety, and the remission of punishment due to sin. H.—Family. Slaves shall obtain their liberty. This law set a restraint upon the rich, that they might not get possession of too much land, or oppress the poor. Lycurgus, with the same view, established an equality of lands among the Spartans, and Solon acknowledged the propriety of the regulation, which he probably saw practised in Egypt. Diod. i. C.—The Agrarian laws at Rome, were often proposed; but they caused nothing but confusion and riot. H.

Ver. 12. Eat them. No wine was to be made of the grapes, nor the corn heaped up, to the detriment of the poor. All is claimed by God, as his own property.

Ver. 14. Grieve. Heb. “deceive not.” S. Chrysostom observes, that to engage another to sell us any thing for what we know is beneath its value, is theft. Grot. Jur. ii. 12. The Rabbins also decide that, if an Israelite be defrauded a sixth part, restitution must be made, v. 17.

Ver. 21. Three years. After the harvest of the sixth year was gotten in, the land rested from September to September, the beginning of the 8th year, when it was tilled again. Nothing would be ripe till about March; yet the harvest of the 6th year would suffice to furnish food till that time, or even for a year longer, as it would be requisite, when the year of jubilee succeeded that of rest, v. 8. H.

Ver. 23. For ever. Sam. version, “absolutely.” The only exception to this law is, when a person makes a vow to give some land to the Lord, and will not redeem it. C. 27:20. In that case, God re-enters upon his property, and it belongs to his priests. C.

Ver. 27. Fruits. An estimation shall be made of what the buyer would probably have gotten for the fruits of the land, till the year of jubilee, and that sum shall be given to him; (C.) or what benefit he has already derived from the land shall be computed; so that, if he purchased it for 100 sicles, and had received the value of 80, he should be content with the addition of 20 more, v. 53. H.

Ver. 29. City. These houses are of greater consequence, and therefore God dissuades his people from selling them; though if they think proper to do so, he holds out an encouragement to those who buy, that they may afford a better price, on the prospect of keeping possession for ever. M.

Ver. 33. Owners. The Levites had no other possessions, but these cities and 2000 cubits of land around them. The priests might buy of one another. Jer. 31:7.

Ver. 35. And thou. Heb. “thou shalt receive him: and of the stranger ... (36) take no usury.” There are two precepts; to relieve those in distress, and not to injury any one. C.

Ver. 40. Hireling, who has engaged to work for a term of years, either of six, or at most 49. After the year of the jubilee, he might enter into fresh engagements with his late master. H.—The Hebrews have always hated slavery. We have never been slaves to any. Jo. 8:33. They were not allowed to part with their liberty, except from absolute distress; (Maimonides) and then they do not submit to what they call intrinsic slavery.—Children. His wife and children were not made slaves of him. But if his master gave him a second wife, her children belonged to their common master. Seld. Jur. vi. 1.

Ver. 43. Might. Heb. “rigour or haughtiness.” Sept. “Do not make him strain himself with work.”

Ver. 45. Servants, or slaves, whom you may treat with greater severity than the Hebrews, and keep for ever, even though they may have embraced the true faith. But still you must remember that they are your brethren.

Ver. 47. Stranger, or Gentile, who engages at least to keep the precepts given to Noe. H.

Ver. 49. Himself. He might have saved up something by greater industry. The Athenians allowed their slaves the same privilege. C.

Ver. 53. Wages. Heb. “as a yearly hired servant shall he be with him.” What was customarily given to a hired servant for a certain number of years, might be a rule to judge how much was to be paid for redemption. H.—Thus if a man had engaged to serve 20 years for 100 sicles, and at the expiration of 10 years wished to redeem himself, he might do it for half that sum. Some think, that those Hebrews who had sold themselves to a Gentile, sojourning among them, could not take the benefit of the sabbatic year, (Ex. 21:6,) because Moses is silent on this head. But this argument is not satisfactory. C.

Ver. 1. To adore it. This explains the prohibition of making graven things, &c. The Protestants translate as usual, “Ye shall make you no idols, nor graven image, neither rear ye up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land to bow down unto it.” They seem terribly afraid of images, as if they were all idols. See Ex. 20:4. H.—Pillars. Heb. mattseba, “statue, or monument.” Such were erected by Jacob, Josue, and even by Moses himself, without any offence or danger of idolatry. Gen. 28:18. Jos. 4:4. Ex. 24:4. Apuleius (Flor.) makes mention, among other species of superstition, “of a stone anointed, and of an altar crowned with flowers.”—The stone, which is here condemned, is one set up “for adoration.” Onkelos.—Heb. “a stone of sight,” placed on some eminence, or on the high roads. Strabo, (xvii.) speaking of those which he had seen in Egypt along the roads, says, “they are lofty, polished, and almost like a sphere, some 12 feet in diameter. There are sometimes three, of different dimensions, one upon another. Some were to be seen upon Mount Libanus. They were objects of adoration.” The Greeks raised heaps of stones on the high roads, in honour of Mercury. Prov. 26:7. C.—We are not forbidden to place land-marks, &c.: but we must not adore them. D.

Ver. 2. Reverence. The Rabbins inform us, with what respect their ancestors appeared in the temple. They left their sticks and shoes behind them, and washed their feet; entering solely to perform some act of religion, and not to go a shorter road to another street. When they had ended their devotions, they retired slowly without turning their back to the sanctuary. Outram, Sacrif. lib. 3. n. 7.

Ver. 3. Due seasons. Before harvest, in spring; and after that in autumn, when they sow their wheat and barley in Palestine. C.

Ver. 5. Time. So great shall be the abundance, that you will scarcely have time to get all the work done before you will be called off to something else. H.—These promises would be so much the more agreeable to them, as in Egypt they had been forced to keep in their houses two or three months together, on account of the overflowing of the Nile. In that country, as well as in Greece and Palestine, people sow both wheat and barley about October; while in other countries the latter is sown in spring. The harvest is ready in about six months, and that of wheat in seven. Plin. xiii. 19. Hesiod, ep. 2. C.

Ver. 8. Five. Thus Gedeon's 300 men put to flight the great army of the Madianites; (Jud. 7:22,) and the Machabees destroyed vast numbers with a small force.

Ver. 10. Old; Being unable to consume all. M.—Heb. “ye shall eat old store, and bring forth the old because of the new.” Sept. “you shall eat the old of old, and you shall bring out the old from the face of the new.” Like a householder, who bringeth forth out of his treasury new things and old. Matt. 13:52. H.

Ver. 13. Upright; and be no longer bowed down with a heavy yoke, like oxen. “I have broken the locks of your prison, and have set you at liberty.” Arab. C.—A Greek proverb says, “Never was a slave's head right, but always crooked, like his neck.” M.

Ver. 16. Heat. Heb. kaddachath, is rendered “scab and jaundice,” by the Sept.: and by others “a dangerous wind,” like that which causes so many diseases in Egypt. The precise meaning of some terms in this verse is not well known.

Ver. 18. More, (septuplum.) “Very often, or very much;” in which sense it is used in this chapter. C.

Ver. 19. As brass (æneam). “Brazen,” without moisture, and barren. Onkelos.

Ver. 22. Desolate, none being left to frequent them; or the few who remain, shall keep within doors, lest the wild beasts should meet and devour them. Isai. 33:8.

Ver. 26. Bread; or that which supports you. You shall be deprived of the necessities of life.—One oven shall be used by 10 families, so little bread shall be baked, and even that little shall be delivered out by weight. I will also deprive it of its nutritive qualities, so that it shall not satisfy your craving appetite. C. See Ps. 104:16. Isai. 3:1.

Ver. 28. Fury. You will gain nothing by opposing me, but your own destruction. I will treat you, as you would deal with me. H.

Ver. 29. Daughters. To such extremities were the Jews reduced, at the sieges of Samaria and Jerusalem. 4 K. 6:28 Lament. 4:10. Josep. Bel. vii. 8.

Ver. 30. Places. The temple of Solomon was built on Mount Moria or Sion. The Persians sacrificed upon the mountains, and the Romans and Athenians built their most magnificent temples on the highest parts of their respective cities.—Idols. Heb. chammanim, denotes the chariots dedicated to the sun; (4 K. 23:11,) or the pyreia, or enclosures for the sacred fire, in honour of the god Homanus, (Strabo xv.) whose name is probably derived from this Hebrew word, (C.) as well as Hammon, a title of Jupiter. M.—Ruins. Heb. “and cast your carcasses upon the carcasses of your gods of dirt, and my soul shall vomit you out.” The Egyptians embalmed the carcasses of their sacred animals. God threatens that, if his people be so stupid as to adore them, they shall die, and be deprived of sepulture.

Ver. 31. Odours. Even the sanctuary of the Lord shall be destroyed, as you will be unworthy to have it among you, or to offer sacrifices to me. H.

Ver. 34. Desolation. It shall be uncultivated; and though you would not comply with my injunctions to let it rest one year out of seven, it shall now remain desolate for many years together. H.—Theodoret (q. 37,) says for 70 years; the number of sabbatic years, from the reign of Saul till the captivity of Babylon, during the space of 490 years. This verse seems evidently to allude to those days of distress. C. 2 Par. 36:21.—But we can hardly suppose that none of the sabbatic years should have been duly observed during the reigns of David, Solomon, &c. H.—Instead of enjoy, Heb. may be “shall expiate her sabbaths,” or the neglect of them. The same term, tirtse, is used, (v. 41. 43,) and the Vulg. generally renders it agreeable, speaking of sacrifices. C. 1:4. 22:20. C.

Ver. 35. Your sabbaths, holidays and years of rest, and of jubilee. The earth is represented as entering into the views of God, and rejoicing at his judgments. H.

Ver. 36. Fear. Sept. "timidity, or slavishness." Heb. morec, "softness and inactivity." C.—Their haughty temper shall be broken; and though they have dared to rebel against their God, the fall of a leaf shall now terrify them. H.

Ver. 37. Brethren, in their flight; while each one is endeavouring to save himself. The Rabbins say they shall be punished for the sins of their brethren, if they have not endeavoured to prevent them.

Ver. 38. Consume you. The Hebrew spies said that the land of Chanaan devoured its inhabitants. Such shall be in reality the enemies' country in your regard. You shall not be able to establish yourselves or be happy there.

Ver. 39. Own. The sins of their fathers, which they have imitated, shall fall upon them; so that they shall pine away with remorse and misery.

Ver. 41. Mind. Heb. "heart," wicked, rebellious, and unclean. M.—Pray for. Heb. and Syr. "please themselves in," &c. They shall see what advantage they have derived from their sins. C.—Then they shall enter into themselves, like the prodigal son. H.

Ver. 42. Jacob is placed first because he was the father of no other nation; as Abraham and Isaac were. W.

Ver. 44. I did not. He speaks of a future event, which he sees will certainly come to pass, as if it had already happened. As God had preserved his people, in Egypt, conformably to his covenant with the patriarchs, so he will be reconciled to them, after they shall have done penance, and acknowledged all their excesses, in the captivity of Babylon. H.—The church never ceases all together. W.

Ver. 45. Moses. What has been hitherto recorded, was mostly prescribed by God at Mount Sinai, as some of the following laws were also. C.—It would seem as if this were the conclusion of Leviticus. We must remember, however, that these divisions were not introduced by Moses, as he wrote his five books without any interruption, like one verse. So S. John seems to conclude his Gospel, (C. 20:31) though he afterwards adds another chapter. H.

Ver. 2. Estimation. Heb. is obscure. "Whoever has separated, or made a singular vow; the souls to the Lord according to thy estimation." C. —Sept. "shall vow as it were the price of a soul to the Lord." H.—The person or the beast shall belong to the Lord; but if it be redeemed, the priests shall fix a price, according to the following regulations. Whatever was vowed must be subject to these rules, or it shall remain for the service of the altar. The priests may sell it, if it be an impure animal. Those which are fit for sacrifice, were to be immolated, v. 9, &c. No change of them was allowed, lest a worse should ever be substituted for a better; (C.) and because God is better pleased with things that are offered to him by vow. W.

Ver. 5. Fifth. The parents might make a vow of their children. M.

Ver. 8. The estimation. Heb. is pointed improperly, "thy estimation;" for the price was fixed already. The priest had leave to reduce it only in favour of the poor. Houbigant. See v. 2, and seq.

Ver. 13. That offereth it. This addition of the Vulgate shews, that if any other purchased the animal, he would not have to give a fifth part more than the value. That only concerned the person who had made the vow, to punish him for his inconstancy, and that he might not have a desire to get possession again of what he had once consecrated to the Lord. If the beast was valued at 40 sicles, he would therefore have to pay 50. C.

Ver. 15. House. The Rabbins say this fifth part went towards repairing the temple. We may suppose it was laid on to indemnify the priests, for the loss which they sustained by selling a house, or a field, (v. 16,) to the former owner; since if any other had purchased them, the priests would have been able to sell them again at the return of every jubilee. At that period, even the former proprietor would not obtain a title to possess them for ever; (v. 21,) and therefore he would not need to pay any more than the stated value. Tostat. C.

Ver. 16. Possession, or inheritance. If he had only purchased the field, he could not, by his vow, transfer the property of it to the priests beyond the year of jubilee, v. 22.—Seed, not of the produce, which is uncertain. The goodness of the soil must also be considered.—Silver: which rent must be paid every year, except on those of rest, when the earth was not cultivated. C.

Ver. 21. Consecrated. Heb. "a field of anathema," devoted and separated from common uses for ever to the Lord. H.—Priests. They were bound to sell it from one jubilee to another to some of the same tribe, to which the person, who vowed it, had belonged. M.—In the new law, religious people often consecrate themselves and their effects to the service of God; and it would be a sacrilege to alienate them from such pious uses to any thing profane. They are anathema, a deposit of offering to the Lord; while those who violate them, are anathema, accursed. H. T.

Ver. 25. Obols. Heb. “gerah.” which were worth 1d.-2687; so that a sicle amounts to 2s. 3d.-375. Arbuthnot.

Ver. 26. First-born. Sept. add “a beasts.” Men, though belonging to the Lord on that title already, (Ex. 13:2,) might still be more particularly consecrated to him by vow, as Samuel was. C.—A vow must be concerning some greater good to which we are not otherwise bound. Such vows are agreeable to God, and can never be broken without sin. See Gen. 31:13. 1 Tim. 5:12. W.

Ver. 27. Unclean, either on account of some blemish, or because it is of those species which cannot be sacrificed; such as the horse, camel, &c. which might nevertheless be vowed to the Lord, and sold for the benefit of his priests.—By thee. Moses and the succeeding priests. Many MSS. read, with the Sept. and Chal. “by him,” leaving the matter to the person’s conscience; but the printed Hebrew and Vulgate agree. C.

Ver. 28. Devoted. Heb. “anathema,” different from the other vows. In this case all that had life was slain, (or consecrated to God, H.) houses were demolished, the land belonged to the priests for ever, so that they could only let it out to laymen for a certain rent. Moses thus devoted the Amalecites to destruction; (Ex. 17:14,) and Saul had orders to put in execution what he had denounced, 1 K. 15. It is doubtful whether people could thus devote their children and slaves. Most authors suppose, that it was necessary that God or the nation at large should pronounce such a sentence, as was done with respect to Achan. Jos. 8. See Num. 21:2. Judg. 11:31. C.

Ver. 29. Die. Grotius says, only public enemies and deserters could be thus devoted. Other men and women were only consecrated for ever to the divine service. D.

Ver. 30. Tithes. Abraham and Jacob paid tithes, out of devotion. Gen. 14 and 28:22. Moses first made a law on this subject, which began to be in force when the Hebrews had obtained quiet possession of Chanaan. The people paid them more exactly when they were determined to keep God's law, and had pious princes at their head. 2 Par. 31:5. At other times they were very negligent. Mal. 3:10. This forced Esdras to appoint inspectors, Nannim, to collect them. The Pharisees affected a decree of exactitude in this respect, (Lu. 11:42. Matt. 23:23,) paying what some Jews do not suppose to be necessary, though our Saviour says it was. Since the destruction of the temple the Jews pay none. The first-fruits and tithes of wheat, barley, figs, raisins, olives, pomegranates, and dates, were required, though it be not certain what quantity of the first-fruits was given; some say between the 40th and the 60th part of the produce. Wine and wool were also to be offered. The tithes were taken after the first-fruits and the heaved oblations (thorume) were paid. They belonged to the Levites, and these gave a tithe to the priests. Num. 18:28. See C. 19:24. The Eastern kings required a tithe of their subjects, for the support of their families. 1 K. 8:15. God does the like. Mal. 3:10. The Persians, Carthaginians, Greeks, Romans, and even the Arabs and Scythians, religiously paid their tithes in honour of their false gods. See Cyrop. iv. and Q. Curtius iv. 2. Herod. ii. 135. Plin. xii. 14. Mela. ii. 5, &c. The Romans often consecrate the tithes of their spoils to Hercules, as the Carthaginians did also. The Scythians sent them to Apollo. Solin 27, &c. C.—Scaliger and Amama dispose the tithes, and the oblations of the Hebrews, in the following order. Supposing a person's annual produce amount to 6000 bushels, an oblation (thorume) of at least 100 was to be made to the priests: out of the remaining 5900, a first tithe of 590 belonged to the Levites, out of which they paid 59 to the priests. The residue, of 5310 bushels, paid a second tithe of 531, to be consumed in feasts in the temple, (a custom which the ancient Christians imitated in their love-feasts, called agape. C.) The original produce was thus reduced to 4779 bushels; and both the tithes amounted to 1121 and the oblation to 100. The thorume consisted of flour dressed, and of oil, wine (Amama) and wool, (C.) to be given to the priests on the feast of Pentecost. C. 23:15. It could not be less than the 60th part of the produce, (Ezec. 45:13) and it was necessary to pay it before any could be used in the family. Hence these oblations are often called first-fruits, and have been confounded with those sheaves which were to be offered at the beginning of harvest. Amama.

Ver. 31. Of them. When the distance from Jerusalem was great, so that a person judged it more convenient to sell his tithes, and with the money purchase more for a feast in Jerusalem, (which the Rabbins call Zudui, Charisterion, grace or thanksgiving) he had to pay something additional, 12, for example, instead of 10. Scaliger.

Ver. 32. Rod; on which was some red colouring, to mark the tenth animal as it passed through a narrow gate. If it was proper for sacrifice, its blood was poured out around the altar, and its flesh was returned to the giver. If it could not be offered in sacrifice, it was slain. The priest received none of the victim, no more than the paschal lamb. Outram, sac. i. 11. But a feast was made of flesh for the person's friends, and he gave a portion to the poor and to the Levites.—The Lord, as a sacrifice of thanksgiving, in which the greatest part of the victim is consumed by the person who offers it. The priests have but a small share. C. 3. C.

Ver. 34. Sinai. The laws specified in the ten first chapters of the following book, were given here also. H.

INTRODUCTION

This fourth Book of Moses is called Numbers, because it begins with the numbering of the people. The Hebrews, from its first words, call it Vaydedabber. It contains the transactions of the Israelites, from the second month of the second year after their going out of Egypt, until the beginning of the eleventh month of the 40th year; that is, a history almost of thirty-nine years. Ch.—In the nine first chapters various orders of people are described, and several laws are given or repeated. From the 10th to the 33d, the marches and history of God's people are related; (H.) from the 20th of the second month, in the second year after their departure out of Egypt, till the eleventh month of the 40th year, and the last of Moses: so that this Book contains the transactions of almost thirty-nine years; (T.) whereas, the Book of Leviticus specified only some of the laws and occurrences of one month. Here we behold what opposition Moses experienced from Aaron and his sister, from Core, and from all the people; and yet God protected him, in the midst of all dangers, and confounded, not only their attempts, but those also of Balaam, and of all his external foes. H.—Moses conquers the Madianites, and divides the conquered country between the tribes of Ruben, Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasses. In the three last chapters, he describes the land of Chanaan, orders all the inhabitants to be exterminated, assigns cities for the Levites, and for refuge; and forbids such marriages, as might cause any confusion in the distribution of the lands belonging to each tribe. Moses composed this part of the Pentateuch, as well as that of Deuteronomy, a little while before his death, out of the memoirs which he had carefully preserved. C.—According to Usher, the people were numbered this second time, A.M. 2514, C. 1.; after which they leave the desert of Sinai, (C. 10:11) go to Cades-barne, and return thither again 2552. Soon after this, Mary and Aaron die; Moses lifts up the brazen serpent; and the Hebrews take possession of part of the promised land (2553) on the eastern banks of the Jordan. That on the western side, flowing with milk and honey, was conquered by Josue in the following years. H.

Ver. 1. First day of the second month, called after the captivity, Jiar, which party corresponds with our April. These injunctions were given from the tabernacle, (C.) in the desert, the 12th station, (H.) at the foot of Mount Sinai.

Ver. 2. Houses. The families consisted of the immediate descendants of the 12 patriarchs; the houses were from the subdivisions of these. The same plan of numbering the people was adopted on other occasions. Jos. 8:16. 1 K. 10:20.—Sex, between 20 and 60 years of age. All the subjects of the Eastern kings may be called upon, if they be able to bear arms; and hence we find such immense armies in the Scripture, and in profane history. Moses numbered the people once before, (Ex. 30:2,) and found exactly the same number of warriors, the dead being replaced by others, during the space of seven months. Perhaps the odd numbers might not be specified, as all the totals consist of so many exact hundreds, except that of the tribe of Gad, v. 25. On the former occasion, the people were not perhaps ranged according to their tribes, which was now deemed necessary, as they army was going to begin its march under its respective leaders. C.

Ver. 3. Arms, (fortium). “Strong or brave.” The psalmist (104:37,) says, there was not one feeble. M.—Troops. Heb. “army.” Sept. “force.” Their officers shall be at their head, and shall assist you in the work. Some might command 1000, others 100, and some only 50. See Ex. 13:18. 18:21.—Princes; the first-born, or most ancient, (Lyan.) the lineal descendants of the patriarchs; (Jansen) or, in fine, such as were chosen for their merit, as all were equally noble; and hence Nahasson, prince of Juda, is mentioned, though he was not a descendant of the eldest son of Juda, but of Phares; and those who were at the head of those who were numbered a little before the death of Moses, were not the descendants of these. C. 26:64. In effect, we find that Moses chose for his council, able men out of all Israel. Ex. 18:25. Bonfrere. C.

Ver. 14. Duel. Hebrew Dehuel. But (C. 2:14,) we find the word begins R, as the Septuagint have read, Ragouel. H.

Ver. 16. Army. Heb. “of a thousand.” The Vulg. commonly styles them tribunes. They were “people of name in the assembly,” as the Heb. indicates. C.

Ver. 26. Juda. This tribe was the most numerous. But it is not here placed first, because the order of birth in Lia’s children is observed. Then come those of Rachel; and last of all, the children of the two handmaids, Bala and Zelpha. H.

Ver. 47. Levites. As they attended the tabernacle, like God’s peculiar servants, and were not obliged to go forth to battle, it was not necessary to number them with the rest. C.—They might, however, fight if they thought proper, as the Machabees did. See Josep. Ant. iii. 11. iv. 4. T.

Ver. 51. Stranger, even of any other tribe. S. Aug. q. 3. W.

Ver. 52. Army. Heb. “they shall have their respective camp, and follow their own standards, with their army.” They were drawn up in four large bodies, C. 2:2, &c. C.—The first contained 151,450, the second 186,400, the third 108,100, and the fourth 157,600, under Reuben, Juda, Ephraim, and Dan.

Ver. 53. Watch. Lest any thing should offer any indecency to the tabernacle, and thus provoke God’s indignation. H.

Ver. 2. By, &c. Heb. “by his own standard, in the ensigns of their father’s house, far off, about,” &c. Perhaps a general standard, belonging to the chief tribe, was set up for each of the four great bodies; while the two inferior tribes had their peculiar ensign, as well as the different companies. It is supposed, that these standards were distinguished either by their colour, or by the representation of some animals. Jonathan says, each of the great standards, made of silk, were of three colours, similar to those precious stones, on which the names of the patriarchs were engraven on the rational; and also exhibited the figure or emblem of the principal tribe, with some text of Scripture, and the names of the three tribes. Thus the tribe of Juda, with those of Issachar and Zabulon, occupying the space of 4000 paces, had a lion's whelp on their standard, with this inscription, Let God arise, and his enemies be put to fight; Juda, Issachar, Zabulon. The tribes of Ruben, Simeon, and Gad, bore the figure of a stag, Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one God. The standard of Ephraim, Manasses, and Benjamin, had a child embroidered, The cloud also of the Lord was over them by day, when they marched. Some give to the tribes of Dan, Aser, and Nephtali, the figure of a basilisk; others, that of an eagle; with these words, Return, O Lord, and dwell with thy glory in the midst of the host of Israel. See C. 10:34–5–6. Deut. 6:4. Some imagine that the standard of Juda was green, with a lion's whelp embroidered upon it; Ruben's red, with the head of a man. That of Ephraim, yellowish, the colour of the chrysolite, and represented an ox, or a calf's head. The standard of Dan had a mixture of white and red, like the jasper, with an eagle grasping a serpent in its talons; all in allusion to various passages of Scripture, and to the cherubim of Ezechiel. We cannot, however, vouch for the accuracy of these Rabinnical accounts. The custom of bearing the figures of animals on armour and standards, is very ancient. Anubis and Macedo had a dog and a wolf engraven on their arms, when they accompanied their father Osiris. Diod. ii. 2. The heroes at Troy had similar emblems on their bucklers. Plin. xxxv. 3. Others adorned their helmets with them. Hence some derive the custom of armour-bearing.—Covenant, at the distance of 2000 cubits, as at the passage of the Jordan. Jos. 3:4. The tabernacle in the middle formed the camp of the Lord, the Levites were round it; the third camp was for the army, (C.) occupying a large square. The nearest soldiers were a mile distant from the centre.

Ver. 9. First. The gate of the tabernacle looked towards the east. H.—Juda marched therefore in the first ranks. Then followed Ruben, the Levites, with the camp of the Lord. C.—(Yet see C. 10:17. H.)—Afterwards came Ephraim; and last of all, Gad, v. 16. 17. 24. 31. But in the camp, Juda, Issachar and Zabulon, Moses and Aaron, dwelt on the eastern side of the tabernacle; Ruben, Simeon and Gad, with the Caathites, to the west; and Dan, Aser and Nephtali, with the Merarites, on the north. C.

Ver. 17. And. Heb. “when the tabernacle of the assembly, shall depart, the camp of the Levites in the midst of the camp, they shall depart in the same order as they encamp, each in his rank, and his ensigns.” The Levites shall always be in the middle. C.—So the Romans made their camps, of a square form, and placed the sacred things in the centre. Grotius.—Down. The same officers who took it down, shall set it up again. M.

Ver. 23. Five, is omitted in the Samaritan copy.

Ver. 24. Eight. Onkelos has 180,000 C.—But both these are incorrect. C. 1:37. 52. H.

Ver. 1. Generations; descendants of Aaron, whose names are specified; and of Moses, whose children are left unnoticed among the rest of the Levites, v. 27. This enhances the merit of the Jewish legislator, and shews his modesty and disinterestedness. H.

Ver. 4. Presence; or as it is expressed, (1 Par. 24:9,) under the hand of Aaron, by his direction, and in quality of his assistant, (C.) while he lived. Eleazar succeeded him in the high priesthood; (Jos. 24:33,) and his children possessed that dignity, till the posterity of Ithamar came in under Heli. C. 25:3. H.

Ver. 6. To him, and to the other priests, who had to perform the higher offices. The Levites did not approach near the altar, except when they had to carry it and the tabernacle. C.

Ver. 7. And. Heb. “They shall watch over him, and over all the congregation,” to assist the priests in their sacred office, and to take care that the people behave respectfully. H.—All were bound to prevent any sacrilegious abuse. M.

Ver. 10. To whom. Sam. and Sept. “to me.” They must serve God in the persons of his priests. They are called a gift, people bestowed, as the Nothnim, to serve in the meanest functions; and hence the Nathineans take their name. The Gabaonites were employed by Josue in this quality. Jos. 9:23.—Over. Heb. “they shall retain,” &c. They shall permit no stranger to interfere. Cuneus (Rep ii. 11,) observes, that if a Levite undertook to do the office allotted to another, he was to be slain, after sentence had been passed by the judge. C.

Ver. 12. Mine. God claimed the first-born, on account of having spared them. Ex. 12:23. He requires that all males shall be redeemed, except those of the tribe of Levi, whom he claims as his peculiar portion, as the price of the redemption of those who were living in Egypt, when the destroying angel passed by. This honour was wholly gratuitous, though the Levites deserved to obtain a confirmation of it by their zeal. Ex. 32:29. Deut. 33:9. God seems to have revealed to Moses the destination of Aaron's family, long before they were appointed to exercise the functions of the priesthood. Ex. 19:22. 24. 24:1. C.

Ver. 15. Month; at which time the first-born were to be redeemed. C. 18:16. M.—If only those of 20 years of age had been counted, they could not have amounted to nearly an equal number with the first-born of all the other tribes. C.

Ver. 17. Names. These had been long ago dead. M.

Ver. 22. Five hundred, expressed by the letter c, has, according to Kennicott been put for 200, which the Hebrews denote by a similar letter, r. See 2 K. 23:8 and 1 Par. 11:11, for other mistakes. H.

Ver. 26. Thereof. The Gersonites had the care of the veils around the court, and of the cords and gates. The priests guarded the tabernacle, v. 32. The sons of Caath carried the altars, (v. 31,) and the Merarites took care of the cords, which were attached to the pillars of the court, v. 37. Hebrew may be translated “(among the vessels of) the tabernacle, the covering thereof, and the hanging for the door of the sanctuary, (or tabernacle of the congregation) and the hangings of the court, and the curtain for the door of the court, which is beside the tabernacle, and by the altar round about, and the cords belonging to the service of the tabernacle.” C.—Whatsoever, in the Vulg. must only be referred to the curtains.

Ver. 28. Sanctuary, with respect to the things mentioned, v. 31. M.—The Samaritan copy observes, that they also carried the brazen laver, as we find they did, C. 4:14. All these things were folded up in the violet curtains of the sanctuary, while the ark was covered with the veil which hung before it. C. 4:5. Some pretend that the number here specified ought to be 830, to obviate a difficulty, v. 39. But this amendment has no solid foundation. C.

Ver. 32. Eleazar had authority over the Levites, as his father had over the priests also. Thus we find princes of the priests, different from the sovereign pontiff. Matt. 2:4. 16:21. Lu. 3:2. Eleazar had also a particular charge of the Caathites, (C. 4:16,) and was to take care that they handled the sacred vessels with due respect. C.

Ver. 38. Sons, the children of Aaron. Those of Moses were among the Levites. 1 Par. 23:13. They did not remain with their father.—In the, &c. Heb. “to guard the,” &c. in order to supply for the rest of the Israelites, v. 9. S. Aug. q. 4.

Ver. 39. And Aaron; a word omitted in the Sam. and Syriac, and in the oldest Heb. MS. and marked in the printed copies as dubious.

Kennicott.—Thousand. If we collect the different sums, we shall find other 300; so that the Levites would be 27 more than the first-born of the other tribes, though Moses says (ver. 43–6,) that they were fewer by 273. Some say that the 28th verse has been corrupted, (C.) or the 22nd, where we read 500 instead of 200. H.—Others observe, that in the 22,000, the first-born of the Levites and the priests of Aaron’s family are not included, and these might amount to 300 men. Lyran.—But Bonfrere rightly observes that this number is too small, as only one is allowed for 74 people. He thinks that the first-born, who were heads of families, are omitted, and those also who were born before the angel destroyed the Egyptians. On this supposition, however, 22,000 will appear too great a number to be produced by the Levites in the space of a year, when some were too young, and others too old, to have children, and others had children already before that event. We may, therefore, either admit the solution of Lyranus, or confess that some fault has crept into the number, though this must be very difficult, since Moses argues in the sequel on the supposition of its certainty. C.—S. Jerom hence infers, that these numbers are full of mystery; Origen (hom. 4,) says, that the exact number, 22,000, may signify the perfection which God requires from those whom he takes into his service, as there are just 22 Hebrew letters, and 22 patriarchs, from Adam to Jacob, the father of the Israelites. W.—The 22,000 might be accepted by God, instead of so many Israelites; and the 300 other Levites might be due to him on their own account, being the first-born since the Hebrews left Egypt. T. D.

Ver. 41. Cattle. These were kept by the Levites, and were not intended for sacrifice. M.

Ver. 46. Levites, omitting the 300, as v. 39. For each of these 273, five sicles were to be paid, the price of the redemption of a child who had been vowed. Lev. 27:6. The money was to be paid either by those who were counted last, or by a tax laid upon all the people, or it was determined by lot who should pay it. The Scripture is silent on this head. C.

Ver. 3. Thirty. Moses speaks of those who had to carry the sacred vessels. Those of 25 years old might perform some offices; (C. 8:24,) and even at 20, they began to serve the tabernacle, in the reign of David, (1 Par. 23:24,) the fatigue being then diminished, and the splendour of religion increasing. The Sept. read 25 instead of 30, in this and all other places, and some think that the Hebrew should be so too. The time for the admission of priests to their more august functions is not specified, but was determined by themselves to be at least 20 years of age. Outram, Sacrif. i. 7.—To stand. This was the ordinary posture of the priests in the temple. The king alone was allowed to sit. Maimonides.—Heb. “all that enter into the host, or army, to do the work in the tabernacle of the assembly,” shall be of a competent age and strength. H.

Ver. 5. Sons. Necessity excused them on this occasion. Out of respect for the ark, the Levites were not allowed to behold or touch it uncovered. C.—That hangeth before the door. Heb. “the covering veil, and shall,” &c. H.

Ver. 6. Put in the bars. Heb. “place the bars,” upon the shoulders of the Levites; for they were never taken out of the sides of the ark. Ex. 25:15. Other bars, like hand-barrows, were used to carry the ark and the other different vessels, after they were folded up. Two Levites bore them on their shoulders. C.—Perhaps the bars of the ark, after it was enveloped with the three curtains, might project, so that the bearers might take hold of them. M.

Ver. 7. Loaves. Some imagine this precept was not observed in the desert, as the people fed on manna. But might not they procure some flour of the neighbouring nations? and do not the princes offer flour. C. 7? See Deut. 12:7. C.

Ver. 10. The bars, which were not attached to it. Ex. 25:37. Heb. and Sept. “They shall place it upon the bars.” Mot, signifies a stick, upon which two people may carry burdens. C. 13:24. It might be put through the foldings, v. 12.

Ver. 13. Ashes, which might be upon the grate of the altar, where the sacred fire had been burning. This shews that the precept was already observed. The Sept. do not mention the ashes. But some copies, with Origen, (hom. iv.) and the Samar. Pentateuch, insert some words at the end of v. 14, which Grotius believes have been omitted by the Massorets, in the present Hebrew Bibles. “They shall take a purple veil, and fold up the laver and its foot, and put them in a covering of violet skins, and place them upon the bars.” C.—The children of Caath were the most honoured among the Levites, as Moses and Aaron sprung from the same family, Eleazar, the future pontiff, presided over them in a particular manner, while his younger brother Ithamar, directed the rest. H.

Ver. 15. Vessels of, &c. Some say, not even their coverings. God threatens to punish all idle curiosity or negligence, particularly with respect to the ark, which the Caathites had to carry, till the priests became sufficiently numerous to perform that office, as they generally did. Deut. 31:9. C.

Ver. 16. Over them. The sons of Caath, to whose care the more sacred things were entrusted; or Heb. “over the oil,” &c.—Sacrifice of flour, wine, &c. These always accompanied the morning and evening holocaust. It hence appears that this law was already in force, and probably all such precepts were observed as were not incompatible with the wandering state of the Hebrews. C.

Ver. 20. Curiosity. Sept. “suddenly.” Let them not rush in before all the vessels be properly covered. The priests folded them up with all haste, that they might see them as little as possible themselves. C.

Ver. 23. Thirty. Sept. “25,” as v. 3. C.—They began to be taught how to act, at 25; but did not officiate till 30. D.

Ver. 26. All things. Heb. “veils round the altar” of holocausts in the court. C.

Ver. 27. Assigned. Heb. “you shall count over to them what they have to carry.” Sept. “you shall call (the Levites) by name, and all that shall be intrusted to them,” v. 32. C.—From the different offices of the priests and Levites in the old law, Innocent III. takes occasion to shew the distinction of the orders in the Christian Church. De S. Altar. 2. ad 7.

NUMBERS 5

Ver. 2. Camp; in the midst of which God had fixed his tabernacle. See Lev. 16:16. Some pretend that these unclean persons were only excluded from the camp of the Lord, and from that of the Levites, which occupied 2000 cubits round the tabernacle. But God will not permit any of the camp to be defiled by such people. They were to absent themselves for seven days, and then wash themselves, &c. C. 19:11. If lepers be excluded from the camp, how much more do heretics deserve to be cast out of the Church! Theod. q. 8. W.

Ver. 3. It. Heb. “their camps, in the midst of which I dwell.” C.

Ver. 6. To commit, against one another, v. 7. S. Aug. q. 9. When the thing is secret, so that the judges cannot take cognizance of it, the offender must nevertheless abide by the decision of the priest. Moses condemns him who had stolen an ox to restore it with another, or even to give five oxen, if he have not the one stolen in his possession. Ex. 22:1. 4. H.—Here to reward the sincerity of the man, who confesses his private fault, he only requires the thing itself to be restored, with a fifth part besides. C.—Negligence, not with contempt; (M.) though he knows that he is transgressing the divine and natural law. T.

Ver. 7. Shall confess. This confession and satisfaction, ordained in the old law, was a figure of the sacrament of penance. Ch.—A special confession of their sin, with satisfaction, and a sacrifice, are required. So Christ orders us to lay open our consciences to his priests. S. John. 20, &c. W.

Ver. 8. But if. Moses does not mention this case. Lev. 6:2, 5. Here he determines that the heirs, if known, must be entitled to the restitution. A Hebrew could not die without an heir; but a proselyte might, and then restitution was to be made to God. The Rabbins say, that when the person injured was already dead, the offender took 10 persons with him to the grave of the deceased, and said, “I have sinned against the Lord and against N.; I have injured him thus.” After which he gave what was due to his heirs; or, if none could be found, to the house of judgment or the judges, who might restore it, if any claimant appeared afterwards.

Ver. 9. First-fruits; (teruman,) a term which comprises also voluntary oblations of all sorts, and the parts of the victims which belong to the priests; unless the person offering expressed a different intention. C.

Ver. 14. The spirit of jealousy, &c. This ordinance was designed to clear the innocent, and to prevent jealous husbands from doing mischief to their wives: as likewise to give all a horror of adultery, by punishing it in so remarkable a manner. Ch.—The spirit of jealousy, of fear, &c. denotes those passions of the soul. This very remarkable law of Moses suited the genius of his people, (C.) and tended greatly to restrain the infidelity of the married couple, and the fury of suspicious husbands. Theod. q. 10. God was pleased, by a continual miracle, to manifest the truth, on this occasion, provided the husband were not also guilty: for in that case, the Rabbins assert, the waters had no effect. They relate many particularities, which seem contrary to Philo and Josephus, who inform us that the trial was still made in their time, though the former writers pretend that it was disused, on account of the many adulteries which were committed, in the age preceding the destruction of the temple by Titus. They say that the person who had committed the crime with the woman, died at the same time that the bitter waters put an end to her existence. When the suspected person was brought before the Sanhedrim, they tried, by all means, to extort a confession from her. But if she persisted in maintaining her innocence, they made her stand in black, before the eastern gate of the court, denouncing to her what she had to expect. If she answered Amen, the priest wrote the imprecations (ver. 19–22,) on vellum, with ink, which had no mixture of vitriol in it; and taking water from the laver, and dust from the court, with something bitter, like wormwood, effaced the writing in a new earthen vessel; while another priest tore her garments as far as the breast, and tied them up with an Egyptian cord, to remind her of the miracles wrought by God. If she confessed the crime before the writing was effaced, she was to be repudiated, without any dowry; or, if she kept company with a suspected person, contrary to her husband's admonition, after she had come off victorious from drinking the bitter waters, she was subjected to the same punishment, and could not demand to be admitted any more to make the miraculous experiment. See Selden, Uxor. iii. 13.

Ver. 15. Measure, (sati). Heb. and Sept. “epha,” of which the measure was only one-third. C.—Oil, &c. These were rejected in sacrifices for sin. Lev. 5:11. Jealous husbands have no sentiments of commiseration, or of sweetness; (H.) nor can any experience the emotions of joy, while they are in such a situation. T.

Ver. 17–18. Holy water, destined for sacred uses, which is called most bitter, v. 18, (M.) and cursed, (v. 22,) on account of the imprecations used to detect the guilty. W.—Earth, to shew the woman, that if she had been unfaithful, she deserved to be trodden upon as dung. Ecclus. 9:10.—Head, that she may remember all is naked before the Lord. M.—Heb. may signify, “he shall cut the hair of her head,” (see Lev. 10:6. C.) or take off her veil. Joseph. iii. 10. H.—Remembrance, by which God was requested to manifest the truth, either by punishing or by rewarding the woman, v. 15, 28. M.—Bitter, either on account of the wormwood, or because of their effects on the guilty. C.

Ver. 19. Adjure. The woman was put to her oath. Josephus. H.

Ver. 21. Curse. Heb. “an object of execration, and an oath,” &c. so that people can wish no greater misfortune to befall any one, than what thou shalt endure. H.

Ver. 22. Amen. Our Saviour often uses this form, to confirm what he says, verily, truly. The woman gives her assent to what had been proposed, “so be it.” C.

Ver. 23. Book. Heb. sepher, may also denote a board covered with wax, which was used as one of the most ancient modes of writing. C.—Josephus says, the priest wrote the name of God on parchment, and washed it out in the bitter waters.

Ver. 24. Up. Heb. “and the water, which causeth the malediction, shall enter into her, bitter.” According to Josephus, the jealous husband threw first a handful of the gomer of barley flour, upon the altar, and gave the rest to the priest; and after the other ceremonies were finished, the woman drunk the water, and either had a son within ten months, or died with the marks of infamy. B. iii. 11. Edit. Bern. Some Rabbins say she became livid and rotten, though she might linger on part of the year. Sotæ iii. But if she proved innocent, she acquired fresh beauty and health, and was delivered with ease of a son. Maimon. H.

Ver. 27. Through her. Heb. “into her,” exerting all their efficacy.

Ver. 28. Children, that her husband may love her the more, and she may receive some compensation, for the stain thrown upon her character. M.—We do not read in Scripture that any was ever subjected to this trial. The method of giving a bill of divorce was more easy. C.

Ver. 31. Blameless. To act in conformity with God’s injunctions could not be reprehensible. But it would have been certainly criminal to tempt God in this manner, in order to discover a secret offence, if he had not authorized it expressly. If the husband wished to avoid the displeasure of God, he was bound to banish from his heart all malice, rash judgments, &c. The permission here granted, was owing to the hardness of heart of this stiff-necked people, as well as the laws regarding divorces and retaliation. Women, being of a more fickle and suspicious temper, are not indulged with the privilege of divorcing their husbands, or of making them drink the waters of jealousy. But if a man were taken in the act of adultery, he was put to death, Leviticus 20:10. The crime is equal in both parties. “The husband, says Lactantius, (de V. Cultu. xxiii.) ought, by the regularity of his conduct, to shew his wife what she owes him. For it is very unjust to exact from another, what you do not practise yourself. This injustice is the cause of the disorders, into which married women sometimes fall. They are vexed at being obliged to continue faithful to those, who will not be so to them.” The Romans would not allow wives to bring an action against their husbands. “You would kill, with impunity, your wife taken in adultery, without any trial, said Cato, and she would not dare to touch you with her finger, if you fell into the same crime." Gell. x. 23. The authority which was given to husbands over their wives, was deemed a sufficient restraint; and men being obliged to be often from home, and in company, would have been exposed to continual alarms, from the suspicious temper of their wives, if they had been subjected to the like trials. C.—In latter ages, however, the Jewish ladies began to assume the right of divorcing their husbands, in imitation of Salome, sister of Herod the great, and of Herodias, his grand-daughter. Matt. 14:3. Josep. Ant. xv. 11. xviii. 7. Grotius supposes that the Samaritan woman had divorced her five husbands. Jo. 4:18. But this being contrary to the law, her first marriage alone subsisted. H.—Her iniquity, in giving her husband any grounds of suspicion. The Rabbins observe, that he was bound first to admonish her, before witnesses, not to keep company with people of bad character; and if he could bring witnesses that she had been found afterwards with them for ever so short a time, he might have the remedy of the law. The pagans maintained, that several of their fountains and rivers had the power of disclosing and punishing perjury. Polemon mentions a fountain of this nature in Sicily; and Solinus (C. xi.) says, that one in Sardinia caused the perjured to go blind. The waters of the Styx were greatly feared on this account. Hesiod, Theog. 783. Tatitus (vii. 20,) mentions some other fountains, which had the same effects as the bitter waters. C.—The various ordeal trials which were formerly in use, were probably established in imitation of this law of Moses; but not having the same authority or sanction, they were in danger of being looked upon as superstitious. H.

Ver. 2. Sanctified, and separated from the common sort of people, and obliged to observe abstinence like the Nazarites, as the Heb. intimates in one word, nazir. All this was done to acquire greater sanctity and perfection. Sept. "whoever has made a great vow to be very pure to the Lord," and intends thus to signalize his zeal for God's glory. The original term means also to distinguish oneself by a wonderful thing. There were Nazarites for life, like Samson and S. John the Baptist; and others for a limited time, like S. Paul. Their abstinence from wine, &c. lasted generally for a month, and was to be performed at Jerusalem. Those of the female sex could not bind themselves by vow till they were ten years and a day old, nor boys before they were full 13. C.—The custom of cutting the hair, in honour of some god, was very common among the pagans; and S. Cyril (de ador. 16,) seems to think that the Hebrews had seen it practised in Egypt, and that Moses judged it expedient to let them do so for the sake of the true God, in order to divert their minds from giving way to superstition. C.—The Hebrews made vows to abstain from wine for 30 days, and then to offer sacrifices, and to cut their hair, when they were attacked by any dangerous illness. Josep. Bel. ii. 15. S. Paul perhaps made a vow of this nature, in the perils of the sea. Acts 18:11. Spencer, Rit. iii. 6. Juvenal alludes to this custom, when he observes, that sailors with their heads shaved, delight in safety to recount the dangers to which they have been exposed:

*Gaudent ubi vertice raso,
Garrula securi narrare pericula Nautæ.* (Sat. ii.)

Ver. 3. Drunk. Heb. shecar, may signify old or palm wine. Lev. 10:9.—Drink. Heb. “of shecar,” which was a clear wine, with perhaps a mixture of sugar.—Vinegar was a common beverage among the ancients. Plin. xiv. 16. Ruth 2:14. The soldiers gave our Saviour some of theirs to drink. The Turks, who are not allowed to drink wine of the grape, make use of various other sorts of made wine.—Grape, or the liquor procured from grapes, with a mixture of water, after they have served already to make wine. This liquor is called secondary wine by the Greeks, (M.) being designed for labourers in winter. Varro 54, and Columella xii. 40. Grapes of every description are forbidden to the Nazarites, as they either tend to inebriate, or at least are too luxurious. H.—God deigns to give those a rule who voluntarily consecrate themselves to his service. “What do the Nazarites designate, but the life of those who abstain, and are continent.” S. Greg. Mor. xxxii. 23. W.

Ver. 4. Kernel, or stone. Neither the inside nor the outside must be eaten.

Ver. 5. Grow. At the commencement, and at the end of the Nazariteship, the hair was cut; though perhaps a sort of crown was left at the top of the head, as the 7th verse may be rendered, “the crown of his God,” &c. C.—The Nazarite is under the same regulations with the high priest, with respect to any corpse, v. 6. Maimon. More, p. 3. Lev. 21:11. Both were consecrated to God in the most perfect manner. M.—When the hair of Samson was cut off, he immediately lost his supernatural strength. Jud. 16.

Ver. 6. Dead. To teach us that those who are consecrated to God, ought to abstain from the works of death. H.

Ver. 9. Day. That none might escape; (Theod. q. 11) though the Heb. may imply that the hair was only shaved on the ninth day, when he was to be purified. C. 19:12. Then the Nazarite had to begin again, as if he had done nothing, (C.) if his vow were only for a time. Those who had taken a vow for life never shaved.

Ver. 11. Sinned. Contracting a legal uncleanness.—That day, and commence his vow. M.

Ver. 13. He. The priest.

Ver. 18. Fire, on the altar, where the ram has been sacrificed. Abulensis. Lyranus thinks it was burnt on the fire, with which the meat was boiled. M. Chaldee. T.—The Sept., Philo. &c. understand it in the former sense; and Theodoret says the consecrated hair was placed upon the victim on the fire. C.

Ver. 20. Priest, contrary to what was required in other sacrifices. Josep. iv. 4. Both the priest and the Nazarite waved the sacrifice towards the four quarters of the world.

Ver. 21. Mind. If he have vowed any thing more, he must perform it. H.

Ver. 23. Sons. The three forms of benediction for the high priests, have all the same meaning, and they might choose which they pleased. Grotius observes, that they pronounced them aloud standing, with their hands lifted up. The books of Moses are the ritual of the priests.

Ver. 25. Show. Heb. “make his face shine,” joyful and serene, (C.) like a light to direct thy steps. Ps. 66:2.

Ver. 26. Turn. With loving mercy, may he comfort and protect thee. M.

Ver. 27. Invoke. Heb. “they shall name my name (Yehovah, in pronouncing blessings) upon the sons of Israel,” which I will ratify. H. —“They shall place the blessing of my name,” &c. Chal. They shall praise my name. C.—God authorizes us to use a determinate form of blessing, and grants the effect, when his minister pronounces it, (W.) if no obstacle be put by the party. H.

NUMBERS 7

Ver. 1. The day. The second of the second month, the year after the Hebrews left Egypt. We might read this chapter immediately after the 10th of Leviticus.

Ver. 3. Covered. Destined to carry some parts of the tabernacle. C.—The Sept. use a term which, according to Hesychius, denotes the chariots in which people of quality travelled, Lampenes. M.

Ver. 8. Four. The sons of Merari were not very numerous, (C. 4:44,) and they had the heaviest parts of the tabernacle to carry. The metal alone would weigh 274,875 Roman pounds, of 12 ounces each; not to mention the pillars, &c. If 100 waggons carried each 3000 pounds, and every man 50, they would not carry one half; so that the people must have furnished them with many more waggons besides these four of the princes. Jansen. C.—Abulensis thinks the Merarites carried all that was not laid on the four waggons. M.

Ver. 9. Serve in removing the most sacred vessels of the sanctuary. C. 4:4.—Shoulders, out of respect. Yet the ark itself was placed on a cart, (2 K. 6:3. H.) improperly. D.

Ver. 10. That day. About that time; the ceremony lasted at least twelve days, v. 84. T.

Ver. 11. Altar of holocausts, the dedication of which continued seven days. Ex. 29:36. M.

Ver. 13. Dish, (acetabulum.) Heb. kaharath. See Ex. 25:29. This present of the prince of Juda weighed five Roman pounds. It was of silver, and consequently could not be used in the sanctuary, but in the court, (C.) at the altar of holocausts. T.

Ver. 14. Mortar. Heb. caph, which the Vulgate commonly renders phiala, “a cup,” (M.) may signify a spoon for incense, as it generally accompanies the censer. 3 K. 7:20. It means literally “the palm of the hand.” The high priest took his hands full of incense on the day of expiation. Lev. 16:12. But on other occasions, a spoon was probably used to throw incense on the altar, or on the coals which were burning in the censers. C.

Ver. 23. Buck-goats, (hircos). The same as the he-goats given by Nahasson. The presents of all the 12 princes are equal; and Moses mentions them in detail with equal honour. They give them according to the order in which they encamped. Juda, with his two tribes, first; then Ruben, &c.

Ver. 89. Oracle of God, whose majesty appeared, in the form of a bright cloud, upon the propitiatory, or mercy-seat. H.—Moses is allowed to enter in quality of God's messenger, to announce his will to the people; or perhaps he heard the mandates of God, standing without the veil. D.

Ver. 2. Looketh. This candlestick stood on the south side, with one branch extending towards the altar of incense, on the east; and the other to the west, so as to give light to the loaves of proposition, on the north. Ex. 25:31. C.—It was intended to illumine the holy of holies, where a sort of feast was prepared for God, and where no windows were found. M.—Heb. simply, "When thou lightest the lamps, the seven lamps shall give light over against," upon, or near to "the candlestick." H.—The lamps might be separated from the branches and stem of the candlestick. D.

Ver. 7. Let them be sprinkled with the water of purification. This was the holy water, mixed with the ashes of the red cow, (Num. 19) appointed for purifying all that were unclean. It was a figure of the blood of Christ, applied to our souls by his holy sacraments. Ch.—Purification, (lustrationis) or "expiation." The water, mixed with ashes, was taken and sprinkled round about the houses, and upon those persons who wished either to be cleansed from some defilement, or to advance in virtue and purity. We use salt instead of ashes. Theocritus (Idyl. xxiv. 100,) puts these words in the mouth of Tiresias, "then mixt with salt, according to the law, with a green branch sprinkle the honoured and pure water, and sacrifice to the supreme Jupiter a hog, if you wish to gain the victory over your adversaries."—Flesh, to remind them that they must cut off all superfluous thoughts, the roots of which they will however never be able to destroy entirely, as S. Greg. (Mor. v. 23,) says, "The flesh always produces superfluities, which the spirit must always cut away with the sword of solicitude." See Lev. 14:8. 21:5. 10. H.—The priests serving in the temple were obliged to cut their hair every month; and the Levites probably observed the same regulation, to acknowledge, that they who approach God must be pure and detached from earthly cares, (C.) and particularly from the works of sin; to remind them of which, they were to be sprinkled with water, their garments washed, and they were to offer two oxen by the hands of Aaron, and to be lifted up or offered to God, to serve in his court. T.

Ver. 10. Upon them. Some of the princes performed this ceremony, to testify that they gave up the Levites to serve God, (v. 15,) and would not be answerable, if they were guilty of any irreverence or neglect. C.—They offered them as a sort of sacrifice for the people, (M.) and gave their approbation to them, setting them at liberty. D. v. 14. 20.

Ver. 11. A gift. Heb. “he shall heave them as a heave-offering before the Lord.” Some assert, that Aaron lifted each of them towards the four quarters of the world; (v. 21,) or he made them go up towards the altar, and on each side. This ceremony was performed whenever a Levite was taken into the ministry. 2 Par. 29:34.

Ver. 12. Thou, Moses, though the Heb. here seems to refer it to Aaron, “he shall.” But the Sept. and Arab. agree with the Vulg. and the context shews that Moses is the person (C.) who had chiefly to officiate. Aaron also performed his part, v. 11. H.

Ver. 14. Mine. Free from the burdens of the state, and employed in singing and keeping the doors of the sanctuary. M.

Ver. 15. Into, or “towards, about;” for the priests alone could enter in. Heb. “the Levites shall go in (or be admitted) to do the service of the tabernacle,” and to remove it, &c. H. v. 19.

Ver. 21. Lifted. Hebrew tenupha, Ex. 29:24. Perhaps only a few were received at once. M.—Prayed. Hebr. means also “to expiate, or redeem,” as v. 19.

Ver. 25. Serve, in any laborious functions, as the original imports.

Ver. 26. Ministers. Heb. “to watch over,” (C.) direct, and “train up their brethren.” Sam. Grotius.

NUMBERS 9

Ver. 1. The Lord. The 15 first verses might be placed at the head of this book. God gave orders to celebrate the first passover in the desert, about the 14th of the first month, in the second year of liberty, soon after the consecration of the tabernacle. C.—This is the only passover which the Jews are recorded to have celebrated during the 40 years’ sojournment; as they were not allowed to celebrate it, without having circumcised all the males of their family, (Ex. 12:43,) which they could not do in the wilderness (His cuni, &c.) being uncertain how soon they would have to remove by the direction of God. H.—First month. Hence, Moses does not always observe the order of time, as he spoke (C. 1) of what happened in the second month. D.

Ver. 3. In the. Heb. “between the two evenings.” Ex. 12:6. Sept. “towards the evening, in its season, according to its law, and determination,” sugkrisin, (v. 14,) suntaxin, “arrangement;” in both places we have justifications. H.—God’s law is so called, because nothing can be done right without it. M.—The merit of human actions depends on their conformity with the will of God; (D.) and when he gives directions, we must comply exactly. H.

Ver. 5. In Mount. Heb. “desert (or mountainous country) of Sinai” Ex. 14:3. C.

Ver. 6. Some. Heb. “and there was men,” a solecism, rejected by the Sam. and Arab. copies. Houbigant.—Man. That is, by having touched, or come near, a dead body, out of which the soul was departed. Ch.—Such were forbidden to offer any sacrifice. Lev. 22:4. Yet they could not refrain from burying the dead. Philo. de vita Mos. 3. As, therefore, the action was far from being criminal, and they had partaken of the paschal lamb without restriction in Egypt, and heard that God required all to offer this sacrifice, under pain of excision, (v. 13,) they reasonably wished to know how they were to act, particularly as the 14th of Nisan alone was appointed for this sacrifice, and they could not be purified in less than seven days. If the law, by which they were excluded from the camp, (C. 5:2,) were already published, they consulted Moses by some friend. The Rabbins suppose, that those who buried Nadab and Abiu, are meant. C.—The common people did not properly offer a sacrifice, though they might kill the victim. D.

Ver. 10. Unclean, in what manner soever. Philo.—Nation; or at a great distance, whether in the country or out of it. The Rabbins say 15 miles, or leagues, (C.) which make 45 miles. H.—Sept. all such were bound to observe the passover in the second month, as the whole people did under Ezechias; (2 Par. 30) though the Rabbins falsely pretend, that when the greater part of the people were under this predicament, the law did not oblige, and they might eat the paschal lamb in the month of Nisan. Women were not bound to make the second Phase. Ex. 12:19. C.—This festival was never transferred beyond the second month. M.

Ver. 14. Stranger. Both the Jews who lived at a distance from the promised land, and those of other nations who had embraced their religion, were obliged to observe this law; while the uncircumcised were absolutely excluded. C.

Ver. 15. A cloud, and fire, alternately covered the tabernacle of the covenant, which was 30 cubits long and 15 broad. The pagans, perhaps, hence took occasion to accuse the Jews of adoring the clouds. Nil præter nubes & cœli Numen adorant. Juv. Sat. xiv. C.

Ver. 16. By day. These words are omitted in the Heb.; but the context shews that they must necessarily be supplied; as they are in the Sept. The same cloud assumed different appearances. C.

Ver. 20. For, &c. Heb. “and so it was when the cloud was days of number upon the tabernacle; by the mouth of the Lord they staid in their tents,” &c. Days of number, yamim mispar, most probably means a few days; (see Deut. 4:27,) though Louis de Dieu would translate “a full year;” as yamim, according to him, signifies, v. 22. It is understood, however, by others, to denote a week, a month, a year, or an indeterminate number of days. Gen. 24:55.

Ver. 23. Watches, like sentinels, observing the signal of the cloud; and regulating the time and course of their marches by its direction. H.

Ver. 2. Two trumpets. These were probably deemed sufficient at first, though in the days of Josue there were seven, (C.) and in those of Solomon 20,000. Josep. viii. 2. T.—They were used for all public assemblies. Josephus (iii. 11,) says, one was sounded to call the princes together, and the other to collect the people, which is not quite conformable to the Scriptures. C.

Ver. 4. Once. Heb. “with one trumpet.” If both sounded together uniformly, the people assembled, v. 7.

Ver. 5. Longer, and with interruptions. Heb. teruha, “a signal,” an alarm. Sept. “a loud cry of victory.” Chal. “the taratantara,” as Montanus translates, in allusion to the sound of the Hebrew word, (C.) or of the trumpets. When they were sounded with a variety of notes, or at different intervals, all knew that the camp was to break up, even though they had not been attentive to the motions of the cloud. Then Juda led the van. C. 2:9. H.

Ver. 6. And, &c. Heb. “they shall blow an alarm for their marches.” This must be referred to the camps on the west, which proceeded forward at the third sounding, as those on the north did at the fourth, according to the Sept. H.

Ver. 7. Sound. High mysteries must be reserved for the more learned. Theod. q. 15. W.

Ver. 8. Priests. God's officers and heralds. Curtius (3) observes, that among the Persians at day-break, the signal was given from the king's tent by sound of trumpet.

Ver. 9. Your God, who will reward your obedience with victory.

Ver. 10. And on. This serves to explain what kind of banquet was meant. On the festivals of religion, peace-offerings were made, of which those who were pure, might partake. H.—On solemn and extraordinary occasions, holocausts were also presented to God by the whole nation; and the trumpets announced those public rejoicings. 2 Par. 5:12. 29:26. C.—Months. The day when the moon first appeared, was a festival day among the Jews, (M.) or the first day of the month, while they observed the solar year.

Ver. 11. The second. The Samar. copy here places what we read, Deut. 1:7, 8; and it is certain that those words were addressed to Moses on this occasion, though it be not so certain that they were written by him in this place. C.—Of the month Jiar. The Hebrews had continued near Sinai a year and 20 days. Thence they went to the desert of Pharan, encamping first at the sepulchres of concupiscence, and at Haseroth, which were probably in that desert. Moses only specifies those encampments, where something memorable took place. He mentions none between Asiongaber and Cades, thought the length of the journey required many. Num. 11:34. 13:1. C.—Perhaps he only reckons those among the stations where the people continued a considerable time.

Ver. 17. It. Hence it would appear, that part of the Levites followed Juda's division, which was preceded by the priests bearing the ark, (v. 33,) while the Caathites bore the sacred vessels after Ruben, (v. 21,) and were followed by Ephraim and Gad. But Calmet observes, that the Levites, and the whole camp of the Lord, came in the middle of the four great divisions, immediately after Ruben. C. 2:9. 17. Salien thinks, that the ark and cloud led the way, and returned to the middle at the end of the journey, v. 36. H. T.

Ver. 21. Sanctuary, or holy vessels. They never set them down, till they arrived at the place where the tabernacle was to be fixed. Hebrew may be, "the sons of Caath set forward, bearing the vessels of the sanctuary, (C.) and they (the other Levites, v. 17,) set up the boards and curtains of the tabernacle till they arrived;" that so both the vessels and the ark might be placed in proper order. If the ark had to return into the middle of the camp from leading the way, as Salien insinuates; while it passed between the ranks of Juda, the Levites would have time to arrange every thing. H.

Ver. 29. Hobab; probably the brother of Sephora, and son of Raguel or Jethro, who had departed, leaving this son for a guide to Moses. Though God directed the marches of the Hebrews, he would not have them to neglect human means.—Kinsman. The Heb clothen, and Greek gambros, are not more determinate, as they signify either father, son, or brother-in-law (see Ex. 2:18. C.); or in general a relation. S. Jerom. D.

Ver. 31. Guide, being well acquainted with the country, and consequently able to point out the best places for pasturage and for water, and to inform us what sort of people we are near. Heb. “thou shalt serve us for eyes.” Sept. “as a senator.” The Persians had officers who had the title of eyes and ears of the king. Brisson 1. Some suppose that Moses stood in no need of Hobab, having lived himself in that country 40 years, with Jethro; and that he only wished to keep his kinsman with him, that he might observe the true religion. He supposed at that time that they would presently obtain possession of Chanaan. But the sins of the people caused almost all to perish in the desert. Hobab probably accepted of the proposal, as we find the Cineans, descendants of Jethro, holding a portion of the land. C. Judg. 1:16. His posterity, the Rechabites, were noted for more than usual piety; and were the same with the Essenes, according to Serarius, and the first authors of a monastic life. Jerem. 35. T.

Ver. 33. Journey. During this time, we know not where they encamped. The first place that is specified is Tabera, or “the burning,” (C. 11:3. C.) which S. Jerom believes is the same place which was also called the sepulchres of concupiscence, (v. 34,) the 13th station, (H.) which is described above as the desert of Pharan. M.—Before them. See v. 17. H.—The Rabbins assert that there were two arks; one containing the writings of Moses going before, with the lawgiver, at the head of the army; and the other, carried by the Levites, in the centre. Drusius.—Calmet would rather translate “went in their presence;” that is, in the midst. The kings of Persia always marched in the centre, for greater safety, and that they might communicate their orders with more expedition, as well as to keep all in order, and observe what was doing. Xenophon. Cyrop. iv. and viii. Arian ii. and iii. C.—But the ark of God would probably go before the people, with the cloud, which hung over it.

Ver. 36. Host. Sept. “Bring, or turn back, (H.) O Lord, the thousands, the myriads in Israel.” Some give the same sense to the Hebrew. C.—Prayers are composed, not only for the obtaining of good in general, but also for particular purposes. W.

NUMBERS 11

Ver. 1. Fatigue. Heb. simply, “and the people were like those who complain of evil, or who seek pretexts, inwardly, in the ears of the Lord.” S. Jerom explains this evil to mean the fatigue of the journey, which lasted for three days together. C.—Hence, some who were ready to lay hold of every pretext, took occasion to murmur, and to contrast their present wearisome life with the false pleasures of Egypt. The people of that country were now desirous of returning, and prevailed upon many of the Hebrews to join with them, v. 4. H.—They were chiefly those who were farthest from the ark, the dregs of the people; though some pretend that the uttermost part means the principal men of the camp. See Gen. 48:2. “The fire devoured one part of the camp.” Sept.

Ver. 2. Up, as rain is by the earth. Amos 9:5.

Ver. 3. The burning. Heb. tabherah. Ch.—Calmet uses no reason for confounding this station with that mentioned, v. 34.

Ver. 4. For, seems, however, to connect the burning of some with the destruction of many more, who had eaten the quails, as if both judgments took place at the same encampment. Sept. render the Heb. “and a mixt rabble among them, desired greatly; and sitting, cried, as well as the Israelites, and said,” &c. H.—A mixt multitude. These were people that came with them out of Egypt, who were not of the race of Israel: who, by their murmuring, drew also the children of Israel to murmur: this should teach us the danger of associating ourselves with the children of Egypt; that is, with the lovers and admirers of this wicked world. Ch.—This verse may relate a different history from the preceding ones, as the punishment was of another kind. D.—The murmurers were burnt to death. H.

Ver. 5. Fish. The Nile abounds in fish, which they might catch freely. The fish of the lake Mœris, brought a considerable revenue to the king of Egypt. Herod. ii. 149. The Hebrews had dwelt also near the Mediterranean Sea. Fish was formerly in greater esteem than it is at present. The priests of Egypt abstained from it, (Herod. ii. 37,) and the people from such as had scales, and from eels, because they believed they were sacred. (ib. C. lxxii.). Porphyrius and Ovid even maintain that they refrained from all fish, as well as the Syrians. But they had not probably carried their superstition so far, in the days of Moses.—Garlic. These things are much more delicious and wholesome in hot countries. The Greeks fed much on cucumbers and garlic.

Aristophanes.—The Turks still delight in them, eating the former raw with sour milk, (which would be very dangerous in our climate), and onions, which are as good as our pears. Spon. Bellon. iii. 18, &c. The wounded Machaon feasts upon onions, &c. Iliad ix. The Egyptians afterwards scrupled to eat leeks and onions. C.—Porrum & cepe nefas violare ... O sanctas gentes! quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis—Numina.

Juven. Sat. xv. But in the earlier ages Moses represents them as accustomed to such food. H.

Ver. 6. Dry, like people quite worn out for want of food. Ps. 101:5. 12. Lam. 4:8.—Nothing. An exaggeration. We are disgusted with this light food. C.—They wished not only for the taste, but also for the colour, of other meats. M.—How often do we imitate their folly, when we are disgusted with the bread of life! H.

Ver. 7. Bdellium. Bdellium, according to Pliny, (l. xxi. c. 9,) was of the colour of a man's nail, white and bright; (Ch.) or like wax, (B. xii. 9,) between white and yellow. It might resemble a tarnished pearl or ivory in colour, and coriander-seed in shape.

Ver. 8. Oil; or, when unprepared, like flour and honey. Ex. 16:31. C.

Ver. 10. By. Heb. “for.” Jonathan and others endeavour to excuse their ancestors, by saying that they wept because they were forbidden to marry their near relations.—His tent. Some explain the Heb. of the tent of Moses. But the Israelites more probably staid at home.

Ver. 12. Nurse. We often read of men nursing or watching over others. 4 K. 10:5. Est. 2:11. Thus kings shall nurse the Church. Isai. 49:23. C.—All who have authority should treat their subjects with love. M.

Ver. 14. For me. Had he not the judges, whom Jethro advised him to appoint? But all matters of consequence were still brought to Moses. He was made answerable for all things.

Ver. 15. Evils. Heb. “my misfortune.” The Rabbins say their, or thy, was formerly written, but corrected by the scribes. C.—Moses fears the anger of God falling upon the people. H.—It is very wonderful that the Heb. text here retains the feminine pronoun att, instead of atta; thy, thee; as if Moses were addressing himself to some woman; and this absurd peculiarity is more absurdly accounted for, by saying that Moses was “so exasperated during this his address to the divine Being, as to be incapable of pronouncing both syllables!” The same mistake occurs, 1 K. 24:19. Kennicott i. 412. God does not reprehend Moses as guilty of any disrespect or pusillanimity. H.—The holy man prays with due submission to the will of the most High. W.

Ver. 16. Seventy men. This was the first institution of the council or senate, called the Sanhedrim, consisting of seventy, or seventy-two senators or counselors. Ch.—Calmet calls this in question. Dissert. on the Police, &c. Moses chose these senators from among the officers, whom he had before set over the people, (Ex. 18) or from those who had superintended their affairs in Egypt, according to the Rabbins, (Ex. 3:14,) who say that the traditions explaining the law were entrusted to them. Jarchi, &c.—Ancients; a title of authority in the East. See Gen. 50:7. It was not so necessary that they should be far advanced in year, as that they should be men of prudence and of consummate virtue. These qualifications received a great increase, when they were filled with the spirit of God. C.—They were thus authorized to decide controversies peremptorily, and to consult God, like Moses, being endued also with a prophetic spirit. M.

Ver. 17. Thy spirit. S. Augustine (q. 18) reads “of the spirit which is on thee;” (Sept.) referring it to the indivisible spirit of God, so that these ancients received what was sufficient for them, while Moses suffered no diminution. Thus one lamp communicates light to another, without being impaired. Orig. hom. 6. Theodoret (q. 18,) also adds, that a person confers baptism on thousands, and yet loses no part of the grace himself. Selden (Syn. ii. 4,) shews that the Jews explain this spirit of a certain emanation of divine light, or inspiration, which causes the prophets to speak. They have not in general, a distinct belief of the blessed Trinity. “I will make an increase of the spirit, which is upon thee, and will place it upon them.” Chal. v. 25.

Ver. 18. Sanctified. Prepare yourselves to receive flesh. The word is often used in this sense. Jer. 6:4, &c. Onkelos.—Cease to murmur, and bewail your sin. C.

Ver. 20. Of days complete. So two years of days, means two full years. 1 Mac. 1:30.—Loathsome to you. “Indigestible” Sym. “Bilious.” Sept. “Till it become loathsome to you, and a source of scandal, (Chal.) or of dispersion, as some translate the Heb.

Ver. 21. People, able to bear arms. H.—In all there were above two millions. C.

Ver. 22. Fishes. Moses does not distinguish them from flesh, no more than S. Paul does 1 Cor. 15:39. Fish was not formerly allowed on fasting days. C.

Ver. 23. Unable: Heb. “shortened.” Sept. “insufficient.” Moses had expressed his astonishment, not his doubts; though the words might convey the latter idea to us more than his behaviour in C. 20:10. But God sees the heart.—To pass. Hebrew may be also, “hath called thee;” (C.) Sept. “shall come upon thee,” and execute the thing, as soon as thou shalt promise it. H.

Ver. 25. Afterwards. Some give a contrary meaning to the Heb., with the Sept., Syr., &c.: “They prophesied, (on that occasion) but they did not continue” to do so; except when they were favoured with the influence of the spirit. When it was requisite, they were enabled to declare God’s will and his praise to the people. C.—Saul is said to have prophesied when he praised God, 1 K. 10:5. 10. M.

Ver. 26. Forth, being lawfully hindered, (C.) or out of humility. S. Jer. ep. 127.

Ver. 27. Man. The Rabbins say, without proof, that he was Gersom, the son of Moses, and that the two prophets were half-brothers of the lawgiver, and foretold his death and the persecutions of Gog, &c. C.—Hermas (11. 2.) refers to some of their predictions: “The Lord is nigh to those who are converts.” See Ps. 33:19. H.—But they prophesied probably, by announcing only, as men inspired, the praises of God and sentiments of piety, without diving into futurity. C.—Theodoret (q. 21) thinks they were not of the 70 judges, but equal in dignity to them. Cotelier.

Ver. 28. Chosen among the seventy, and designed, from his youth, to be the general, and successor of Moses; the Heb. may be understood in all these senses. See Ex. 17:10. C.—Josue was afraid lest they had assumed this air of authority in opposition to Moses. S. John addressed our Saviour, under the same impressions of zeal, Luc. 9:49.

Ver. 30. Camp of the people, from the tabernacle, which was in the midst of it. H.

Ver. 31. Sea; the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. The wind blew from the south-west to the west with respect to Moses, or from the south with respect to Jerusalem. Ps 77:26. Many quails are found about Rinocorura, and some have imagined that these had continued during winter at the bottom of the waters, as they say swallows do. Bochart i. 15. God had sent the Hebrews a similar provision for one day, about the same season of the year. Ex. 16:13.—Flew. The Hebrew says simply, “as it were two cubits upon the earth;” whether they were heaped one upon the other to that height, or, as it is more probable, (C.) they flew only so much above the ground, an might easily be killed. H.—The Sept. call them ortygometa, the leader, or the largest sort of quails. Suppose twenty of them filled a bushel, or the thirtieth part of a corus, each person would have at least 6,000 quails; and if there were three million people, they must have had 18,000 million such birds. M.—Philo takes notice, that the Jews were very fond of this food; and Aristotle (Anim. viii. 12,) says, their flesh is as good as that of woodcocks. T.

Ver. 32. Cores. Heb. “Chomarim,” each of contained 100 gomers. One gomer was the daily allowance of manna for each person, and of course their must have been sufficient quails for one hundred days. But Moses tells us that each one collected at least ten times that quantity, or as much as he could eat for 1,000 days. Bochart therefore supposes, that only each family, of ten people, gathered so much: or the Heb. should be rendered heaps, as the core, or chomer, is not a proper measure for birds, but for corn and liquors. The Sept. Syr. &c. have “heaps.” We need not have recourse to a new creation of these birds, as their numbers are very surprising. Plin. x. 23. In Italy above 100,000 have been caught in one day, within the space of 5,000 paces. Blond. The Psalmist compares the number brought on this occasion, to the dust, or to the sand of the sea-shore. Ps 77:27.—Dried them in the sun, having first salted them, as the Egyptians did. C. Athenæus.—Many quails are found in Egypt, and around the Arabian Gulf. Josep. iii. D.

Ver. 33. Plague of fire, v. 3, Ps 77:21. C. a Lapide.—Failed, after the month was expired. M.—They had been accustomed to live upon manna, which was a light food, during the space of a year; and now eating greedily of this flesh, their stomachs were overcharged, and they died of an indigestion. C.—The Rabbins say, God punished their gluttony by death, and obliged the rest of the Hebrews to abstain from all flesh, except from that of the peace-offerings, till they entered the promised land. Seld. Syn. ii. 4.

Ver. 34. The graves of lust; or the sepulchres of concupiscence: so called from their irregular desire of flesh. In Heb. Kibroth Hattaavah. Ch.—Hence S. Augustine observes that, “it is not a matter of so much moment to be heard by God. For some he hears in his wrath, granting their requests, while he refuses to comply with some petitions of his friends.” D.

Ver. 1. Ethiopian. Sephora, the wife of Moses, was of Madian, which bordered upon the land of Chus, or Ethiopia; and therefore she is called an Ethiopian: where note, that the Ethiopia here spoken of, is not that of Africa, but that of Arabia, (Ch.) on the east side of the Red Sea. Ex. 2:15. Jealousy instigated Aaron and his sister on this occasion. C.—Perhaps Sephora had claimed some pre-eminence on account of her husband's gorly, in being a mediator between God and his people, and therefore they pretend to the same honour, v. 2. H.—The Heb. insinuates, that they laid hold on the pretext of Moses having married, or received again, a woman of a different nation contrary to the law which he had promulgated, “for it adds, he had married or retaken an Ethiopian woman.” Others believe that he had put her away, and that Aaron and Mary stood up in her defence. “Mary and Aaron murmured against Moses, on account of the wife whom he had taken, who was a perfect beauty, because he had separated himself from his beautiful wife.” Onkelos.—Some are of opinion, that this woman was Tarbis, the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, whom Moses espoused after he had terminated the wars between him and the Egyptians, before he retired to Madian. But this account of Josephus, (Ant. ii. 5,) and the explication of Onkelos, and of the Rabbins, seem to be destitute of any solid foundation. C.

Ver. 3. Exceeding meek. Moses being the meekest of men, would not contend for himself; therefore God inspired him to write here in his own defence: and the Holy Spirit, whose dictate he wrote, obliged him to declare the truth, though it was so much to his own praise. Ch.—So he mentions his defects without reserve. C.—There are occasions when a person may be not only authorized, but in a manner forced to declare what may be to his own praise. Moses was in such a situation. The peace of the whole nation was in danger, when false insinuations were thrown out against the lawgiver and king, by his own nearest relations, and by them who were next in authority to himself. Aaron, the high priest, countenanced at least the remarks of his sister, who seems to have been the most to blame, as she alone is punished with the leprosy. H.—Some have suspected that this verse has been inserted by a later inspired writer. A. Lapide.—But whether it was or not, there is no reason to infer with T. Paine, that Moses was either “a vain and arrogant coxcomb, and unworthy of credit, or that the books (attributed to him) are without authority.” For if he did not write this verse, it does not follow that he wrote none of the Pentateuch; and if Paine scruples not to write of himself: “the man does not exist, that can say ... I have in any case returned evil for evil.” and is not praising himself as a very meek man, when at the same time he is writing to cause all the mischief he can both in church and state, and thus during the heat of revolutionary madness, to involve thousands in ruin? Watson. H.

Ver. 5. Come to the door of the tabernacle, where Moses also was standing.

Ver. 6. Vision. Other prophets were inspired in a more mysterious manner: Moses, though he saw not the majesty of God in any corporeal figure, was instructed by him in the most secret things with the utmost perspicuity, (C.) as if a man were explaining his sentiments to his most intimate friend. Ex. 33:19. H.

Ver. 7. Faithful: Hebrew Neeman, steward or master of the palace. Such was Samuel, 1 K. 3:20; David, (C.) 1 K. 22:14; Naaman, the general of Syria, 2 K. 5.; and Bacchides, 1 Mac. 7. H.—Ambassadors had this title, (Prov. 13:17,) and fidelity often denotes an office. 1 Par. 9:22. Job (12:20,) speaks of the Namonim. C.—But none among the Israelites was more justly entitled to this honour than Moses. He announced the word of God without any mixture of falsehood, and did not arrogate to himself more than his due, as Aaron seems to have done, v. 2. H.

Ver. 10. Departed from the door to its former place, (C.) as if in abhorrence of Mary's leprosy, (Hiscuni) and still more of the sin, which had brought upon her that punishment. C.—Perhaps the cloud was raised higher in the air than usual, but did not proceed forward; (M.) otherwise the Israelites would have decamped. They remained at Haseroth till Mary was returned into the camp, v. 15. H.—Leprosy, of an incurable kind, like that of Gieze, 4 K. 5:27. It covers the whole skin with a white scurf. Lev. 13:10. Aaron is spared, either because he had sided with his sister only out of complaisance, without any formal malice against his brother; or because God, in consideration for his priestly character, would not render him contemptible in the eyes of the all people, intending to punish him in a more secret manner: for was are not always to judge of the grievousness of a fault, by its present punishment. Perhaps Aaron obtained pardon by his speedy repentance, v. 11. C.

Ver. 12. Dead; consumed by leprosy, or incapable of performing the duties of life. M.—Heb. “an abortive, whose flesh is half consumed before he comes forth from his mother's womb.” Sept. “he eateth half her flesh.” “Permit not her to be separated from us, I beseech you, for she is our sister: pray, I beg, that her flesh may be healed.” Chaldee.

Ver. 14. Answered him. The force of this reply must be very obvious. If a father had been so irritated by his daughter, as to shew his indignation in the strongest manner, (see Job 30:10. Mar. 14:65,) she would surely keep out of sight for a time: and can she complain, if I, who have been more injured in the person of my minister, exclude her from society seven days, after having covered her with the leprosy as with spittle. C.—The excommunication, in the Christian Church, bears some resemblance with this exclusion. Mary did not undergo all the legal purifications, (Lev. 24.) as the miraculous cure dispensed her from them. M.—Origen (hom. vi. 7,) and other Fathers, explain the mystery of this historical event. Moses, taking to wife the Ethiopian, represents Christ calling the Gentiles, which excites the murmurs of the synagogue. Mary shews the deformity of the latter religion at the present day, without head or sacrifice. The encomiums bestowed upon the Jewish legislator, belong in a still stricter sense to Jesus Christ, the mildest of men, fully acquainted with all the secrets of God, and the most faithful in all his house. S. Jer. ep. ad Fab. mansion xiv.

Ver. 1. Pharan, at Rethma, C. 33:48.; though Barradius confounds that station with that at Cades-barne. The Samaritan copy inserts here a long passage, taken probably from Deut. 1:20. 21 and 22, which shews that the Hebrews first proposed the sending spies, out of timidity; which God severely punished in the sequel, though in his anger he here consents to their proposal, which seemed to originate in motives of prudence, v. 3.

Ver. 3. Rulers of a hundred men, according to Hiscuni, inferior to those mentioned, C. 10:14. C.

Ver. 6. Huri: Sept. “Souri.” None of the tribe of Levi, the third son of Jacob, are sent; but two represent the different branches of the tribe of Joseph, v. 9. 12. The tribe of Ephraim comes out of its natural order, and has been overlooked by Calmet. H.

Ver. 12. Sceptre. Heb. matte, means also “a tribe.”

Ver. 17. Josue. His former name Osee, or Hoseah, means “one saved, or salvation:” but the addition of the i, taken from the name of the Lord, intimates, “he shall save, or the Saviour of God.” Some think that Moses had given him this name after the defeat of the Amalecites; but the Book of Exodus, where the name is found, might have been written after he received this commission. C.—The Sept. have, “Ause, the son of Nave, Jesus,” as he was a striking figure of our blessed Saviour, and their names are written with the same letters, Yehoshuah. This Moses foresaw, and also that he should be the happy instrument, in the hand of God, of saving the Israelites, by introducing them to the land of promise, and establishing them in peace therein. M.—The changing of his name imported, likewise, that he should be the chief leader. Theod. q. 25. W.

Ver. 18. South side, which is to the north of where you now dwell. Moses enters into several details for the satisfaction of the people, though they had probably a general idea of the country and of its fruitfulness already, having lived not far off. They might not know, however, but that some part of the inhabitants might dwell in tents, instead of towns, as many of the Arabians did.

Ver. 21. First ripe (præcoquæ;) Heb. lit. “the first-born.” Sept. “the days of spring, forerunners of the grape.” In Madeira, grapes ripen in March. Some suppose the messengers departed in June, others in July. In Palestine, they have fresh grapes from the end of June till Martinmas, and three vintages, in August, and in each of the two following months.

Ver. 22. Sin. The desert of Pharan was contiguous to that of Sin. They departed from Cades-barne, and went along the Jordan to Rohob, at the foot of Mount Libanus, and on the road to Emath; then they returned by the confines of the Sidonians and Philistines, through Hebron, to the camp at Cades.

Ver. 23. And came. The printed Heb. has, “and he came:” but the Sam. and all the versions, as well as some MSS. properly retain the plural, which the Massorets allow is right. Kenn. Diss. 1.—Enac, the founder of Hebron, and father of the giants of Chanaan. Jos. 15:13. The Greek word anax, “king,” was perhaps derived from him, as also the famous Inachides, who settled in Greece, after they were driven out by Josue. Grot.—Tanis, where the tyrants of the Hebrews resided; a city, which the Egyptians represented as the most ancient in the world. Moses represses their vain boasting, by informing them that Hebron was of greater antiquity. It was afterwards assigned to the priests, and for a city of refuge, in the tribe of Juda. Jos. 20:7.

Ver. 24. Torrent. Sept. “vale.”—Its. Heb. “one cluster.”—Two men, Josue and Caleb; (S. Maximus) though the Rabbins say they carried nothing.—Lever, or staff, suspending it thus, in order that it might not be crushed. In that valley, Doubdan (i. 21,) was assured by the religious, that clusters, weighing twelve pounds, might still be found.

Pliny (xiv. 1,) says, there are some in Africa, larger than a male infant. Strabo (xi.) describes some in Carmania, two cubits high. Forster saw a religious man at Nuremberg, who had lived eight years in Palestine, and assured him that two men could hardly carry a bunch of grapes, such as grew in the vale of Hebron: (C.) but this may seem to be an hyperbole. H.—Lucas (T. i. p. 310,) assures us, that he had seen a bunch at Damascus, weighing above forty pounds. The Fathers here contemplate Jesus Christ, suspended between the two testaments, the synagogue and the Church: the juice, or blood of the grape, (Gen. 49:2. Deut. 22:14,) denotes his passion. S. Jer. ep. ad Fab. S. Bern. in Cant. ser. 44. C.

Ver. 27. Cades. The desert of Pharan, or of Cades, is the same. H.—The town is sometimes called Cades-barne, or Recem, (Chald.) which is Petra, the capital of the stony Arabia, and lies rather nearer to the Dead Sea than to the Mediterranean. It was on the high road from the Red Sea to Hebron. In one part of the desert of Cades, the people murmured for want of water. C. 20:1. But there was plenty near the city. Moses continued here a long time after the return of the spies. Deut. 1:19. 46. C.

Ver. 30. South. They had already routed the Amalecites; but the spies insidiously recall to their remembrance, that they would be again in arms to obstruct their passage.—Hethites, dwelt nearest the Philistines, in the country which fell to the shares of Simeon and of Dan. The Jebusites occupied Jerusalem; and the Amorrhites, the most powerful of all those nations, held possession of most of the territory which was allotted to Juda. Nearer the Dead Sea, on the same mountains, dwelt the Cinezeans and the Cineans. Bonfrere places the Chanaanites on the banks of the Jordan, from the lake of Sodom as far as the sea of Tiberias. But they dwelt also near the Mediterranean; and the Phœnicians maintained themselves at Tyre and Sidon, against the most powerful kings of the Jews, and extended their commerce over the old world, to many parts of which they sent out colonies. C.

Ver. 31. Caleb, to whom Josue alone joined himself, to bear witness of the truth against the other ten; whom the people were, however, more inclined to believe, (C. 14:6. Eccli. 46:9,) paying more attention to numbers than to authority, when it suited their humour. H.

Ver. 33. Spoke ill, &c. These men, who, by their misrepresentations of the land of promise, discouraged the Israelites from attempting the conquest of it, were a figure of worldlings, who, by decrying or misrepresenting true devotion, discourage Christians from seeking in earnest and acquiring so great a good, and thereby securing to themselves a happy eternity. Ch.—Devoureth, by being exposed to continual wars from the Arabs, Idumeans, and from its own inhabitants, the monsters of the race of Enac. With this God had threatened the Hebrews, if they proved rebellious. Lev. 26:38. See Ezech. 36:13. C.

Ver. 34. Monsters. Heb. “giants.”—Locusts, or grasshoppers. So much inferior in size were we to them. Heb. insinuates that the spies entertained these sentiments when they beheld the giants, and the latter seemed to look down upon them with contempt; “and so we were in their sight.” These wicked men scrupled not to exaggerate in order to fill the people with dismay. H.—Their suggestions tended to make them distrust the goodness or the power of God; and therefore he would not suffer them to enjoy the sweets of the land. C. 14:23, 29. W. See Deut. 1:28. Isai. 40:21.

Ver. 3. We may. The Latin MSS. and Bibles before Sixtus V. read “in Egypt, and not in this,” &c. But the present translation agrees with the Heb. Sept. and Chaldee. C.—They obtained what they said they wished for, v. 28 C. 14:29. 26:64. W.—And that. Heb. &c. “and wherefore hath God brought us into this land, that we may fall,” &c. In a rage they attribute a malicious design to God. C.—Better. And who would have given them food in the wilderness? M.

Ver. 4. Captain, instead of Moses, whom they could not bring over to their criminal design, no more than Aaron, Josue, Caleb, &c. H.—Some imagine the rebels wanted to choose themselves a king, (C.) or even another god. Drusius.—Every community acknowledges the necessity of having one at the head. W.

Ver. 5. Israel; begging that God would not destroy them, as he had done their brethren. C. 11. M.

Ver. 6. Garments, in testimony of their disapprobation and zeal; to make these insolent people reflect upon the evils into which they are throwing themselves. C.

Ver. 9. To eat, or consume them, as easily as we devour a piece of bread. The expression is proverbial. Ps. 13:4.—All aid. Heb. “their shadow,” which is taken in the same sense. Sept. “their time or opportunity is gone.” The Rabbins refer this to holy Job, who, they say, died at this time. A. Lapide.—He dwelt near the Jordan. Pineda in Job. C. 1:1 and 27.

Ver. 10. Cried out, &c. Heb. “said stone them.”

Ver. 11. Detract. Heb. “despise, irritate, or blaspheme.” God is incapable of anger, says Origen; he only foretells what will come to pass.

Ver. 13. That the. The sentence is left imperfect, to signify the agitation and distress with which Moses was oppressed, as if he had said, Thou wilt thus afford a pretext, that the Egyptians and Chanaanites may say to one another, that thou couldst not perform what thou hadst promised; and therefore, that in vexation thou hadst destroyed thy people. H.—Heb. “Then the Egyptians shall hear it ... and will tell it to the inhabitants of this land ... because the Lord could not," &c. v. 16. C.—Thus they will blaspheme thy holy name. M.

Ver. 15. One man. All at once, (C.) entirely, without sparing so much as one. Vatable.

Ver. 16. Sworn. God swore to give this land to the Hebrews, but not to this particular generation. His oath would be equally fulfilled by raising posterity to Moses, v. 13. But, at his entreaty, he spared the descendants of this people, and gave the land to their children under Josue. H.

Ver. 17. Lord, in overcoming all difficulties, raised either by the enemy, or by thy rebellious people.

Ver. 18. Mercy. Sept. "merciful and true," as Exod. 34:6. 7. On that occasion, it is not written that God swore. H.—But equal credit is to be given to his word, as to an oath. M.—Clear, or, as S. Jerom expresses it in Exodus, and no man of himself is innocent before thee. C.—By these titles God will be addressed; and therefore Moses mentions them all, though some of them might seem to obstruct his petition of pardon. M.—He knew that none of God's perfections were contrary to one another, or to his nature of consummate goodness; and he sued for the pardon of his people, with all due submission to the dictates of his justice. H.

Ver. 20. Forgiven the sins to those who repent; but the punishment due to them must be undergone, though not so soon as I had threatened, v. 12. 19. How happy is that nation, which has one like Moses to intercede for them! H.

Ver. 21. Lord. I will surely punish the guilty; and all the earth shall know that their own crimes, and not my imbecility, prevented their taking possession of Chanaan. My glory shall shine both in my long-suffering, and in the effects of my justice. Let me pass for a dead god, like the idols, if I do not perform what I say.

Ver. 22. The men, above twenty years of age, v. 29.—Majesty, manifested by the signs, &c. H.—Ten times; very often. It is not necessary to specify the number of the rebellions, as some have done, placing the first on the other side of the Red Sea, (Ex. 14:11,) and the tenth here. The expression is often used to express a great but indefinite number. Eccles. 7:20. C.

Ver. 23. It. None of those who murmured ever entered the land of promise. Origen (hom. 27,) believes that the Levites behaved with fidelity, and were not comprised in the punishment. In effect, Eleazar certainly entered Chanaan. Jos. 14:1. Salmon also, who espoused Rahab, had seen the wonders of God, but had not joined with the rest; so that, when it is said (v. 2,) that all murmured, we must explain it by S. Jerom's rule, of the greatest part; as, no doubt, many would abhor the conduct of the seditious. C.—Omnia non ad totum referenda esse sed ad partem maximam. S. Jer. ep. 146. ad Dam.)

Ver. 24. Spirit. The spirit of obedience and of courage. M.—Followed me, as a guide, and hath fulfilled all my desires. Vatab.—This he was enabled to do by God's free grace. But his co-operation merited a reward. See S. Aug. de Grat. & Lib. iv. W.

Ver. 25. For. Heb. "Now," &c. The enemy is ready to attack you in the defiles, and I will not expose you at present to their fury, as you shall not enter the land for many years. Wherefore to-morrow, &c. H.—It seems they complied reluctantly, for they probably encamped in that neighbourhood about a year. C.

Ver. 30. Hand, the posture of one taking an oath. Gen. 15:18.

Ver. 33. Years. Within five days from the departure out of Egypt, (M.) and above 38 from this time. Heb. "they shall be shepherds," without any fixed dwelling, like the shepherds of that country.—Consumed. They had complained that Chanaan consumed and devoured its inhabitants. C.—Their children underwent a temporal, but salutary, punishment for their sin. S. Aug. ep. 75. W.

Ver. 34. Revenge. Heb. "my breach of promise, or if my threats be vain," &c. Sept. "you shall know the fury of my anger." C.—I will convince you by the severity with which I shall execute this sentence, that you had no reason to distrust my former promises. S. Jerom (in Ezech. xx.) entertains hopes of the eternal salvation of many of these Hebrews, who had time to do penance for their sins.

Ver. 37. Lord, by pestilence, (ver. 12; Philo) or by the exterminating angel, 1 Cor. 10:10. They were burnt to death before the tabernacle, or at least died suddenly. Jans. The Jews have appointed a fast on the 7th of the 6th month, to bewail this event. C. v. 39.

Ver. 41. Which conduct shall not, &c. They had been ordered to return: now they will advance, and, though admonished that the Lord will not assist them, they depend upon their own efforts, being ever full of themselves, and distrustful of God, the two sources of all spiritual misfortunes. H.

Ver. 44. Blinded, with presumption, as the Heb. yahpilu, insinuates. "Their heart was puffed up with pride, and they ascended." Deut. 1:43. C.—The enemy was ready to receive them, and easily routed this rabble, abandoned by God, and by Moses, Aaron and his sons, Josue, and other men of virtue and sense. They who before lay lurking in the valleys, (v. 25,) assume fresh courage, when they become the executioners of God's vengeance, and come pouring down from their mountains, with irresistible fury; nor do they stop till they had made a dreadful carnage of the Hebrews. The same place was again deluged with blood, (C. 21:3,) and was called Horma, or "the Curse." The Sam. and Sept. add, and they returned into the camp, Thus, by their own woeful experience, they began to feel that God would keep his word in punishing the common people, as well as the leaders, v. 37. H.

Ver. 2. Speak. This law was probably given towards the end of the 40 years, v. 23.

Ver. 3. Victim "of peace," as some Latin copies read, including all the different sorts, v. 28. C.

Ver. 4. Ephi. Heb. "a tenth of flour," or one gomer. D.

Ver. 6. Oil. Greater libations are required for a ram, as it is larger than the former victim, which was accompanied with only half the quantity of fine flour. H.—Part of the wine and oil was poured on the flour, and burnt on the altar; the rest was given to the priests.

Ver. 11–15. Thus, &c.—Land. In this last verse, the Sam. copy observes a more correct manner of punctuation than the Heb. which is commonly rendered "O congregation." Houbig.—The author of the Vulgate has preserved the sense, but not all the words of the original. The strangers here spoken of are the proselytes of justice, who kept all the law. Those of the gate, who lived in the land, uncircumcised, could only present holocausts, without libations. Lev. 22:25. C.—"The many sacrifices (of the old law) prefigured this one sacrifice" of the new. S. Aug. de C. x. 20. Christ, represented by the oil, offers himself the victim, under the forms of bread and wine. D.

Ver. 20. Eat. Heb. and Sept. "of your dough." They elevated a part towards heaven, and gave it to the priest or Levite, who lived nearest them; and, in case none could be found, as at the present day, they were to burn it in honour of God. Tradition determines the quantity to be between a 40th and a 60th part. S. Jer. in Ezech. xlv. This they do every time they bake, according to Philo, and Leo of Modena, (2. 9.)

though the law be not clear, and some might think it sufficient to give a part, the first time they baked with new flour.

Ver. 22. Ignorance. Other victims are prescribed; (Lev. 4:13,) so that the ignorance here mentioned must be of a different nature. The former was perhaps a sin of commission, and this a sin of omission; such as if the whole people should neglect to eat the paschal lamb. The Rabbins think that the law alludes here to idolatry, committed for want of knowledge. But that is next to impossible in a whole nation. Outram believes, that the Book of Leviticus speaks of those who transgress the negative precepts, without abandoning the true religion; but the present law alludes to those who forget the laws of their fathers, and embrace a false worship. Thus Ezechias offered the victims here prescribed, though more in number, to expiate the idolatry of the people under Achaz, 1 Par. 29:21. See also 1 Esdr. 8:35. Some think Moses has supplied in this place what was left deficient before. But it is more probable, that he supposes here only some of the tribes have sinned ignorantly, while in Leviticus he speaks of the whole nation. C.—No one sins for the sake of the offence, but for some advantage which we falsely persuade ourselves we shall derive from doing so. S. Aug. q. 24.

Ver. 25. And for. Heb. “and their sin (offering) in the presence of the Lord, for their ignorance.” C.

Ver. 30. Pride. Heb. and Sept. “with hand, or with head (Chald.) uplifted,” without shame or control. The Rabbins say, he must deny that God is the author of the law, and sin deliberately, after being admonished, &c. before he will incur this penalty. But why all these restrictions?—Rebellious. Heb. “he hath blasphemed, or irritated the Lord.” Such crimes imply a contempt of the law.—Cut off by God, if the judges neglect to do it. The Hebrews maintain, that each individual has a right to kill such scandalous offenders, as Phinees did Zambri. C. 25:7. 1 Mac. 2:23. It is not clear whether all strangers, living in the country, were subjected to this law. Seld. Jur. ii. 11. Though such crimes were not pardoned by the law, true repentance will free us from them. S. Aug. q. 25. W.

Ver. 32. Wilderness of Pharan, if this crime were committed soon after the murmuring of the people, or in some other part of the desert. This example tends to show the severity and extent of the former precept. The law had condemned the breaker of the sabbath to be put to death. But Moses consulted the Lord, to know in what manner; or perhaps there were some circumstances attending the offender, which extenuated or enhanced his crime. Some of the Rabbins have unjustly aspersed the character of Salphaad, as if he were the person, because it is said that he died in the desert in his own sin. C. 22:3. C.—Those who transgress with full knowledge, deserve to be severely chastised; (Lu. 12:47,) and this is the more necessary, when the law has been lately promulgated, to restrain the insolent. H.—God generally makes an example of those who first transgress his laws, as he did our first parents, Cain, the Sodomites, the worshippers of the golden calf, &c. He punished thus the sacrilege of Nadab, the disobedience of Saul, the lie of Ananias and Saphira. Cajetan. D.

Ver. 38. Fringes. The Pharisees enlarged these fringes through hypocrisy, (Matt. 23:5,) to appear more zealous than other men for the law of God. Ch.—Our Saviour conformed to this law. Luke 8:44. Moses shews that these fringes were to be made for the cloak, which was square, and not for the tunic. Deut. 22:12. The colour, in S. Justin's time, was purple. Dial. It seems that the Phœnicians were accustomed to wear such fringes. Sidoniam picto chlamidem circumdata limbo. Æneid, iv. C.—God ordained that his people should be thus distinguished from other nations. T.

Ver. 39. Astray, (fornicantes). The eyes being left without restraint, easily fix upon dangerous objects, which captivate the heart, and lead to idolatry and the contempt of God's law. C.—We are also admonished to meditate on the law, and not follow our own thoughts or interpretations, so as to render it of no effect, in the regulation of our morals. H.

Ver. 1. Isaar was brother of Amram; and, consequently, his son was the cousin of Moses.—Core engaged the rest in his revolt. Heb. "took or replied," interrupting Moses at the very time when he was speaking, in the name of God, and requiring that he should shew by what right he arrogated to himself alone that authority. "Core separated himself." Chal. "He retired." Syr. "Core spoke ... and Dathan ... and they rose up." Sept. The Caathites encamped near the tribe of Ruben; and hence Core had an opportunity to engage some of them in his revolt, by insinuating that Moses occupied the post in the state which ought to belong to them, as Ruben was the first-born; while Aaron had obtained the high priesthood, and the rest of the Levites, though of equal nobility, were to be treated as his servants. It is not known when this revolt happened. Some place it at the camp of Sinai; others at that of Jetezata. Deut. 10:8.

Ver. 2. Rose up. The crime of these men, which was punished in so remarkable a manner, was that of schism, and of rebellion against the authority established by God in the Church; and their pretending to the priesthood without being lawfully called and sent: the same is the case of all modern sectaries. Ch.—Let them dread a similar punishment; not only the authors of such wicked pretensions, but those also who consent to them. Rom. 1:32. For we find that Core and all his adherents were buried in hell; (v. 33,) and those likewise who complained that their punishment was too severe, fell victims to the raging fire, v. 49. With what earnestness ought we not therefore, to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints! Jude 3. For if those be so severely punished who rise up in opposition to lawful superiors, either in church or state, what swift destruction do they not bring upon their own heads who deny God, who bought them, and make him a liar, by calling in question his most sacred truths? 2 Pet. 2:1. H.—Core and his companions impugned not the law directly, but resisted Moses and Aaron. S. Ignat. ep. ad Magnes. They believed in the same God; yet, because they took upon themselves to sacrifice, they were forthwith punished by God, and their unlawful sacrifices could do them no service. S. Cyp. ep. i. 6. Thus we are warned to keep in the true Church, and to obey those who are set over us; and never, for any temporal consideration whatever, to encourage, by our presence, the sermons or meetings of heretics, or of schismatics, lest we perish with them, v. 26. W.—Assembly. Heb. “famous in the assembly, men of name,” and distinction, senators. It seems Hom left the rest of the conspirators, as he is mentioned no more. The princes of Ruben were desirous of obtaining the temporal power only. But the Levites aspired at that sacred pre-eminence, which had been given by God to Aaron and his sons. C.

Ver. 3. Let it be enough. Heb. rab, “too much you take upon you;” or “suffice it for you.” Sept.—Holy ones, as deserving of the priesthood as yourselves, v. 10. Why then would you treat them as your inferiors? We will throw off the yoke, and assert our just rights. C.—On the same plea, Luther (de abrog. Missa,) rejects all ecclesiastical hierarchy, and will have no distinct priesthood, because all Christians are called priests, (Apoc. 1) and a holy priesthood, 1 Pet. 2:5. W.—But they do not take notice that the apostle immediately explains himself, by saying, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, and to declare the virtues of Christ; in which sense they are also styled a kingly priesthood. ib. v. 9. H.

Ver. 5. The holy ones, whom he has chosen for the high priesthood.

The psalmist, speaking of this sedition, says, they provoked ... Aaron, the holy one of the Lord. Ps. 105:16. C. See 2 Tim. 2:19.—Only those who are chosen by God, can lawfully perform this sacred office, as the Almighty declares by a miracle. H.

Ver. 6. Censers. It was not lawful for the Levites to offer incense: but they had prepared for themselves the ensigns of the priestly power, and Moses permits them to try their success. H.—They might have brought the censers, or broad plates, bowls, or vials, (Apoc. 5:8,) out of Egypt, where every family offers incense to their domestic gods and sacred animals. In Sicily and Greece they were also very common, as well as at Babylon; where married people always purified themselves with the smoke of incense. Herod. i. 197.

Ver. 7. Lord, in his sanctuary, where the priests alone offered incense twice a day upon the altar. C.—Too much. Moses retorts upon them their own words, v. 3.

Ver. 9. To him: Heb. and Sept. “to them,” or instead of the people. God had chosen them for that post of honour, to the exclusion of all the rest, so that they ought, the least of all, to have complained. But it often happens, that those who are the most exalted, take occasion to esteem themselves deserving of still higher honours; and thus, like Lucifer, fall into the bottomless pit! H.—Core was perhaps the more irritated, because he was not at the head of the Caathites, though a descendant of the second son of Caath, while Elisaphan, sprung from a fourth son, was preferred to him. C. 3. T.

Ver. 11. Him. The injury is offered to God, who made choice of Aaron freely.

Ver. 14. Eyes. These princes of Ruben were not desirous of the priesthood, as Core was; they repined, that Moses had got possession of the sovereign authority, and therefore they endeavour to represent him as an imposter, who had promised great things, but in reality had deprived the people of all the happiness which they formerly enjoyed in Egypt, and was now disposed to exercise his tyranny upon their very persons. H.—“Do you wish that we should not see through your impostures?” Heb. “wilt thou put out the eyes of these men,” who have informed us what sort of a country Chanaan is? Sept. “thou hast blinded these men,” who are so stupid as to obey thee. C.—Chaldee, “though thou pull out our eyes, we will not come.”

Ver. 15. Very angry. This anger was a zeal against sin; and an indignation at the affront offered to God; like that which the same holy prophet conceived upon the sight of the golden calf, Ex. 32:19.

Ch.—Respect not. Heb. “thou wilt not have regard for their sacrifices,” as long as they continue in these sentiments of pride and of rebellion. H.—Thou knowest. Heb. “I have not,” &c.—Ass. This expression is proverbial, 1 K. 12:3. The Samar. and Sept. read, chamod, “any thing desirable,” instead of chamor “an ass.” C.

Ver. 22. God, who givest life to all, and searchest the inmost recesses of the heart. M.

Ver. 26. Depart. If we give any encouragement to schismatics, or go to their meetings, we must expect to be involved in their sins. S. Cyp. de Lapsis 5. W.

Ver. 27. People, (frequentiâ). The Sept. generally translate tappam by apokene, “family and effects,” of every denomination. C.—Here was a full assembly waiting for the event, between fear and hope. As these rebels would not come, when Moses sent for them, he condescended to go to them, and denounced the impending ruin, v. 14, 25. He commits his whole cause to God, and is willing to be rejected as a vile impostor, if God do not shew, by a miraculous and exemplary punishment of his opponents, that what he had hitherto done, as the head of the people, and particularly in the consecration of Aaron, was by his direction. H.—He had before proved his mission by miracles. Ex. 4. W.

Ver. 30. Hell. See Ps. 54:16. Prov. 1:12. “They were consigned to the tomb before they were dead,” (S. Optatus, B. i.,) while their impenitent souls were buried in hell. The souls of their infant children, which had no share in the rebellion, might be exempted from the latter part of their punishment. C.—If some have the rashness to blame the severity of this judgment of God, let them shew the disparity between it and the various other accidents occasioned by earthquakes, &c. which involve millions of such “smiling infants” in destruction; or, if they do not infer from these misfortunes, that the laws of nature are unjust; neither ought they to conclude that the religion, delivered by God to Moses, was an imposture, or that the Jewish legislator was cruel. He continued a silent spectator of this transaction, which he was informed by the Spirit would surely take place, and could not be averted by his intercession, which had before rescued the less guilty multitude, v. 22. H.—“They descend into hell alive; that is, feeling their own perdition, who, imitating Core, ... separate from the Church, and presently fall into heresy.” S. Aug. ep. 93.

Ver. 32. Tents. Heb. adds, “all those who belonged to (or sided with) Core, and all their riches.” Moses informs us, (C. 26:10,) how some of Core's children were miraculously preserved. Their descendants were appointed by David to sing and to guard the doors of the temple, 1 Par. 9:19. C.—Samuel was of the same family. 1 Par. 6:33. T.

Ver. 33. Hell. Heb. adds, “they, and whatsoever belonged to them, descended into hell, or the pit.” Salé.—The souls of the impenitent into the former, the bodies of the cattle, &c. into the bowels of the earth. H.

Ver. 35. Incense. Core had left them, and was busy in stirring up the people to rebellion, when a fire proceeding from the cloud, or from the altar, or perhaps a thunderbolt, (C.) came to arraign them before God's tribunal, there to meet their chief, and to hear the eternal sentence of separation from all good, which was instantly pronounced upon all who died impenitent. H.—Perhaps Core might have been offering incense with his 250 men, when the fire seized him, v. 40. D.

Ver. 38. Sinners. These censers were sanctified or set apart for God's altar: 1. By the intention of those who used them, though contrary to his will; 2. by the exemplary vengeance which he exercised upon the rash pretenders to the priesthood; 3. by being a monument of their folly, and therefore placed, by God's order, upon the altar, to deter all others from imitating their conduct. Eleazar was commanded to take them up, and scatter the strange fire; that Aaron might not be defiled with touching the carcasses or ashes of the deceased, nor seem to exult in their death. C.—God was thus also pleased to manifest that the children of Aaron, and not of the other Levites, should succeed him. S. Aug. q. 30. W.

Ver. 39. Altar of holocausts, which was already covered with plates of brass. C.

Ver. 40. Stranger, though he be even of royal dignity. Thus Osias was afflicted with a perpetual leprosy, which rendered him incapable of exercising even the office of king, because he had attempted to offer incense, 2 K. 15:5. 2 Par. 26:17. H.

Ver. 45. Get ye out. Moses and Aaron complied with the spirit, though not with the letter of this injunction. They lay prostrate on their faces, with all humility and earnestness, begging that the Lord would preserve them, and at the same time take pity on the frailty of the multitude, who had been deluded, and had, in words at least, approved the conduct of the rebels. H.—God encourages them inwardly to persevere in prayer, in the same manner as when he said to Moses, (Ex. 32:20,) Let me alone, that my wrath may be enkindled, &c.

Ver. 46. Take. Moses was inspired by God, on this extraordinary occasion, to pass over the common rules, which forbade the high priest to offer incense any where but in the tabernacle, and never to appear among the dead. C.

Ver. 49. Core. We cannot reckon less than 15,000, who perished in consequence of their adherence to this innovator. Behold the first-fruits of ambition and of rebellion. H.

Ver. 2. Speak. The cause of the different families of the Levites now being fully decided, that one of the other tribes might pretend to the honour of the priesthood, God orders Moses to propose another miracle to them, of a less terrible nature than the preceding one.—Man, or prince of the tribe. H.—The name of Aaron was written upon his staff, which was taken from an almond tree; those of the princes of the other tribes appeared upon their respective rods, and represented their different families, v. 3. C.

Ver. 5. They murmur. Hence it seems this miracle was not unnecessary, as the people were still inclined to murmur at the pre-eminence given to Aaron. H.

Ver. 6. Besides, &c. Heb. and the other versions, “the rod of Aaron was in the midst of their rods.” Whence some infer, that there were only 12 rods. But Origen, (hom. 9,) and most others, allow 13, as the tribe of Joseph was divided into those of Ephraim and Manasses; (C.) each of whom had a proper representative or prince. See C. 2:18. 20. 10:22. 13:9. 12. The tribe of Levi is generally placed by itself. If there were only 12 rods, whether would the name of Elisama, or that of Gamaliel, designate the tribe of Joseph? Who was properly the prince of that undivided tribe? H.

Ver. 8. The rod of Aaron for the house of Levi, was budded, &c. This rod of Aaron, which thus miraculously brought forth fruit, was a figure of the blessed Virgin conceiving and bringing forth her Son, without any prejudice to her virginity. Ch.—Almonds. Buds, blossoms, leaves, and fruit just formed, (Is. 18:5,) appeared upon the rod, which before was dry. Tostat believes, that it continued in the same state during the whole time that it was preserved in the ark. “The grace of the priesthood never fades.” S. Amb. ep. 63. or 58. The almond tree is the first which blossoms, and therefore it is styled a watching rod. Jer.

1:11. The Fathers observe in this of Aaron, a figure of Christ's passion and glorious resurrection; and Origen (hom. 9,) remarks, that from his cross proceed the sweet odours of virtue, and the fruits of converted nations. C.—For Christ made peace through the blood of his cross. Colos. 1:20. The blessed Virgin, whom the blooming rod also represents, might as easily become a mother without losing her virginal integrity, as this dry rod might produce fruit, without receiving any moisture from the earth. S. Aug. S. Greg. Nys. S. Bern. &c. W.

Ver. 10. Testimony. S. Paul (Heb. 9:4,) says it was in the ark. See Deut. 31:26. C.—It was not the rod with which so many miracles had been wrought. T.

Ver. 12. All perish. Many had been already destroyed. Those who remained, and were conscious of their seditious practices, feared a similar treatment. H.

Ver. 13. Destroyed. They betray the sentiments of their hearts; though some believe that they were now entering into themselves, and desirous to know what they must do to escape the fate of their brethren. God gives them an answer in the following chapter, teaching them that they must refrain from approaching to the tabernacle, unless they be authorized; and provide such things as are requisite for the maintenance of those, whom he has chosen for his ministers. C.—Afterwards, he passes over the transactions of about 35 years, in profound silence, that the memory of those who had so often murmured, might perish. Salien. A.C. 1505.

Ver. 1. Priesthood. If you transgress, or if you neglect to instruct and watch over those who are employed about the sanctuary, you shall be responsible for it. C.—You must resist those strangers who would intrude themselves into the office, which I have confirmed to you by miracles. M.

Ver. 2. Sceptre. Heb. shebet, denotes also “tribe, family,” &c. The princes of families probably bore a sceptre, as we find all magistrates did in the days of Homer. Iliad i. Æneid xii. C.—All the other children of Aaron's father, were to be in the order of the Levites, among whom even Moses left his own family, though he was himself an extraordinary priest. H.

Ver. 4. Stranger; even born of a woman of the tribe of Levi. Maimonides.

Ver. 7. Priests. Heb. “you shall serve in the ministry of priests which I have given you.” The office was not due to them on account of any superior merit. H.

Ver. 8. Charge, as stewards or dispensers (C.) of what is offered to me; part of which I abandon to your use, as long as your republic shall subsist. M.—First-fruits, or “heave-offerings,” which comprised also the victims, first-born, &c. over which the high priest had a general inspection.—Office. Heb. “unction.” Sept. “as a reward,” or salary for your labour, in performing the duty of priest. C.

Ver. 9. And are. Heb. “This shall be thine, of the most holy things, from the fire.” Some parts of the victims for sin and of the libations were to be consumed, while the rest was given to the priests. These libations were not properly styled holy of holies, (which were to be eaten only in the holy place, by those who were in actual service) no more than the peace-offerings were, of which even women might partake, v. 11. 12. Lev. 10:14.

Ver. 11. House, perpetually. Hired servants were not admitted to eat of them. Lev. 22:10. C.

Ver. 12. The best, (medullam.) Lit. “the marrow.” H.—The fattest and most delicious. M.

Ver. 13. First-ripe, (initia.) “The beginnings” (H.) of the fruit of trees, in the fourth year. Lev. 19:24. It may also comprise all the fruits of the earth. C.—First-fruits must be distinguished from tithes, which were only the tenth part. The former were offered immediately to the Lord, but the latter to the priests, &c. for their support. Besides the first-fruits of ears of corn at the Passover, and of bread at Pentecost, and at every weekly baking, first-fruits were to be given in the 7th month of the harvest and of the vintage, according to each person’s generosity, provided he gave between the 40th and the 60th part of his revenue; and these last are commonly the first-fruits meant in Scripture.—Lord, in sacrifice. If they were given to the priest, the unclean might partake of them. M.

Ver. 14. Vow. Heb. cherem, “anathema:” man, beast, or land might be thus consecrated to God, either for sacrifice, or for the benefit of his priests. Lev. 27:28. H.

Ver. 15. Beast. The Rabbins restrain this to the ass alone, which they pretend was deemed the only unclean animal by the Israelites, in Egypt, when this law was established; and Moses indeed specifies it alone. Ex. 13:13. Abenezra.—But we cannot doubt but that camels, and all other unclean animals, were to be included, if the Hebrews kept them; (C.) and those which were rendered impure by some defect, were also to be redeemed. M.

Ver. 16. Of it; the first-born of man. The child might be redeemed sooner, and sometimes they waited till after the purification of the mother, or 40 days, as our blessed Lady did. Lu. 2:22. C.—Five sicles of silver, or about 11s. 6d. Eng. were then to be paid, unless poverty obliged them to give only two turtles or pigeons. H.—Beasts might be redeemed after they were eight days old. Ex. 13:12. Leo of Modena, (p. 1. c. 9,) informs us, that when a child is to be redeemed, at present, the father sends for a descendant of Aaron, who, after enquiring of the mother, if she have had no child before; and of the father, if he wish to redeem the infant, says aloud, “This child, being the first-born, belongs to me; as it is said, (Num. 18:16,) Thou shalt redeem the child of a month old for five sicles. But I take this (about two crowns of gold) instead.” C.—But how can these priests prove their genealogy, since the distinction of the tribes has been so long lost?—Of silver. Heb. “according to thy estimation, for the money of five sicles, by the sicle of the sanctuary, which hath 20 geras.” H.

Ver. 18. Thine. So that thy wife and children, if clean, may eat the flesh. C.

Ver. 19. A covenant of salt. It is a proverbial expression, signifying a covenant not to be altered or corrupted; as salt is used to keep things from corruption; a covenant perpetual, like that by which it was appointed that salt should be used in every sacrifice. Levit. 2:3. Ch.—Thus God gave the kingdom to David for ever, by a covenant of salt, 2 Par. 13:5. Salt is an emblem of eternity. Oleaster believes, that salt was used in the ratification of all solemn covenants, to denote their stability. C.

Ver. 20. Nothing. No portion of land, like the other tribes; but only some towns and suburbs, allotted to thy children in the midst of the Israelites. They might purchase land as well as others, and might obtain a property by the vows of their brethren. Lev. 27:14. Jeremias (32:7) and S. Barnaby had land. Acts. 4:37. God had provided for his ministers abundantly, without exposing them to much trouble. The Levites enjoyed the tithes of all the produce of the country, besides the first-fruits of corn, dough, &c. and some parts of each beast that was killed in the town. Deut. 18:3. The priests, who were still fewer in number, enjoyed the 100th part of the revenue of all Israel, receiving tithes from the Levites, and innumerable accidental offerings of wine, &c. which made Philo say (de præm. Sacerd.) that “the law of Moses gave the priests all the splendour of kings.” They might, therefore, be zealous to preserve religion for their own temporal advantages.—I am, &c. God promises to reward those who serve him with fidelity. Deut. 18:1. Jos. 13:14. The priests of the new law ought more particularly to serve him with disinterestedness, for his own sake. C.—Of this they are reminded, when they take the first step towards holy orders. The bishop cuts off some of their hair in the form of a cross, while they recite, The Lord is the portion of my inheritance, and of my cup: it is Thou that will restore my inheritance to me. Ps. 15:5. Pontif. Rom. H.—“Some possess riches, while they serve Christ, who appeared in the garb of poverty.” S. Jerom ad Nepot.

Ver. 22. Deadly sin. That is, sin which will bring death after it. Ch.—Heb. “lest they bear sin unto death,” and fall like their brethren. C. 17:13. H.

Ver. 23. People; or the Heb. may be also “they shall bear their own iniquity.” If they prove negligent in performing their duty they shall be punished; and if they do not restrain the people from approaching the tabernacle, they shall be answerable for their offence, and both shall incur death. C.—They shall, however, save their own souls, if they have not been deficient in instructing the people, and in doing their utmost to prevent any profanation. H.

Ver. 27. As an. Thus you will perform your duty, as well as if you gave corn and wine of your own growth. M.—Presses. Heb. yakeb, means also the tub where wine was kept. Jonathan translates, “as the ripe (old) wine of the tub of your wine-press;” insinuating that the wine must be fit for use. C. 5:29. 30.

Ver. 32. By, &c. Heb. “when you have made a heave-offering of the best of it; nor shall you profane the holy things of,” &c. H.—This they would do, if they gave the worst only to the priests. D.—There were only three at this time; yet they received the 100th part of the produce of so many thousands. Well therefore might God say, I will fill the souls of the priests with fatness: and my people shall be filled with good things. Jer. 31:14. T.

Ver. 2. Observance. Heb. “ceremony.” Sept. “distinction, (diastole, S.

Aug. q. 33,) or ordinance." C.—Victim. Heb. "the ordinance of the law." D.—A red cow, &c. This red cow, offered in sacrifice for sin, and consumed with fire without the camp, with the ashes of which, mingled with water, the unclean were to be expiated and purified; was a figure of the passion of Christ, by whose precious blood, applied to our souls in the holy sacraments, we are cleansed from our sins. Ch.—Age, three years old. Some translate, "entirely red." They suppose, that these regulations are in opposition to the customs of the Egyptians, who never sacrificed the cow, esteeming it sacred to Isis, or to the moon. Spencer (Rit. ii. 15) adds, that the red colour was formerly in the highest estimation; and this victim represented the death of Christ, who expiated our defilements. The Egyptians immolated bulls of a red colour, in hatred of Typhon, and to appease that dangerous god, whom they depicted perfectly red. Plut. (Isis) observes, that they hate all animals of that colour; and the Copts precipitated a red ass down a precipice. The ancient kings of Egypt sacrificed red men on the tomb of Osiris or Dyphon; (Diod. Bib. 1,) and Manetho assures us, that they scattered their ashes in the wind. If this custom prevailed in the days of Moses, we need not wonder that he teaches the Hebrews to have so little dread of Typhon, as even to chose a red cow in preference, to purify themselves.—Yoke. Such victims were generally chosen by the Romans, Greeks, and Egyptians, as more delicate and respectful. Intacta totidem cervice juvencus. Georg. iv. Bochart, anim. 2. 33. S. Jerom (ep. 27,) says, that a red cow was sacrificed every year, as in reality one would be requisite for all the people, though the Rabbins pretend that only seven, or ten at most, were treated in this manner, from Moses till the destruction of the temple by Titus. Drusius.

Ver. 3. Of all. Heb. "before his face." Sept. "they shall bring her out, slay and burn her before him," which must be referred to some other priests, who accompanied Eleazar on this occasion, v. 8. C.—Aaron did not perform this office, as the sacrifice was not solemn, but sorrowful, and designed for purification. M.—The Rabbins say, however, that the high priest performed this ceremony ever after; and, since the building of the temple, they did it upon Mount Olivet. This is also marked by S. Jerom, ep. 27. It was thus a more lively figure of Jesus Christ sweating blood on that same ground; as the smoke might represent his ascension. Acts 1:10. Lu. 22:44. C.—He died out of Jerusalem, in full age, (v. 2,) or 33 years old, being wounded in every part for our transgressions, (v. 5,) setting us an example how to suffer, (v. 6,) and by his blood communicating virtue to the sacraments, v. 5. His body, derived from Adam, (or red earth, v. 2,) was buried in a most clean place, (v. 9,) and those who crucified him became more unclean; (v. 8) while even those who were employed in burying him (v. 9,) required to be cleansed by the grace of his passion, which must be communicated to them by baptism, in the name of the blessed Trinity, without which they cannot partake of any of the sacraments. C. 12. The old law could bring nothing to perfection. Those who lived under that dispensation, were forced to wait till the evening, (v. 7,) when in the last ages the new law commenced, that by faith in Christ they might obtain the remission of their sins. Thus we perceive the meaning of many things which to the Jews were veiled in shadows. Heb. 10. S. Aug. q. 33. Theod. q. 36. W.—The Fathers observe also, that the infirmity of our Saviour's flesh, and his liberty in giving and resuming his life, (Jo. 10:18,) were denoted by the cow, which had never been yoked. C.

Ver. 4. And. Heb. “And Eleazar, the priest, shall take part of her blood with his finger.” He looked from the pile of wood, where he was standing, towards the west, and sprinkled the blood, and wiping his fingers upon the skin of the cow, waiting till the fire was kindled, before he opened her belly; he then threw into the fire the cedar-wood, &c. Drusius.—Others believe that this last ceremony was performed by some one else, (v. 7,) as it is not clear that Eleazar became unclean. His being substituted instead of Aaron, might shew that Christ would institute a new priesthood.

Ver. 6. Dyed. With which the cedar and hyssop were tied together, as being deemed most proper instruments of purifications. Lev. 14:4. 49. S. Paul informs us (Heb. 9:19,) that Moses thus sprinkled the people and the book: and branches of this description were probably used when the people took this holy water, v. 18. The ashes intimate that those who have sinned, may be purified by the sacrament of penance, v. 9. C.

Ver. 10. Strangers. Even those who had not embraced the Jewish religion. Grotius.—Thus, the baptism of Christ brings salvation both to the Jews and to the Gentiles. S. Aug.

Ver. 12. Seventh. If he neglect to be sprinkled on the third day, his purification will be protracted till the 10th. As this was the only means of removing the legal uncleanness contracted by touching a dead body, some of the ashes must have been reserved in various parts of the country, after the Israelites were dispersed. C.

Ver. 13. Upon him, unless he be excused by ignorance, (Lev. 5:3. 6,) he shall be slain.

Ver. 14. Days. Almost all nations seem to have considered themselves defiled by the presence of a corpse. Virgin (Æn. vi. 149,) writes, Præterea jacet exanimus tibi corpus amici—Heu nescis! totamque incestat funere classem.

Ver. 15. Cover. Sam. “neither chains nor bands.” Formerly boxes were tied down. Hom. Odys. viii. If the covering of any hollow vessel was off, when a corpse was present, it became unclean. C.

Ver. 16. Grave. The Hebrews buried it at a distance from towns, and set up some mark to apprise all people, that they might not be defiled for seven days. C.

Ver. 17. Burning of the red cow, which was also a sin-offering, v. 9. H.—Upon the ashes they poured some running or spring water. The pagans generally preferred the water of the sea; or if they could not procure any, they mixed salt with common water. Ovid (Fast iv,) mentions a lustration made with the ashes of a calf, mixed with horse blood; and another, which was used in honour of Pales, the goddess of harvests, by the oldest virgins present, who sprinkled the ashes of calves, populos purget ut ille cinis. Athenæus (ix. 18,) observes that a stick was taken from the fire of the altar, was extinguished in water for the purification of the unclean; and the ancient Romans, who had been at a funeral, sprinkled themselves with water, and jumped over fire for the same purpose; as the Greeks were accustomed to place a vessel full of water, at the doors where a corpse was lying, that all might purify themselves when they came out. C.

Ver. 20. Church, or assembly of the people. H.—He shall be put to death by the judges, or by God. M.

Ver. 21. Evening. The victims which were appointed for the expiation of sin, communicated a legal uncleanness to those who were employed about them. They were looked upon as so holy, that the most pure were guilty of a sort of irreverence by touching them. C.

Ver. 22. Is unclean, by touching the dead, must remain defiled seven days. But those whom he touches, as well as all who may have communication with them in infinitum, may be purified in the evening. C.

Ver. 1. Sin, Zin, or Tsin, nearer to Judea than the desert, where the Hebrews encamped before. Ex. 16:1. H.—Moses informs us of very little from the time when the people murmured at Cades-barne, in the second year, till the beginning of the 40th year of their sojournment.

—In Cades. The Rabbins assert, they remained there the first time twenty-nine years, (C. 14:45,) and the second, ten. Genebrard, A.M. 2670. But we do not believe they continued there above a year the first time.—Mary. S. Gregory of Nyssa, and S. Ambrose, suppose she was always a virgin, in which respect she was a figure of our blessed Lady, as well as in her name. She was probably 130 years old, as she was very discreet at the time of the birth of Moses, and employed by Providence in preserving his life, as the blessed Virgin screened our Saviour from the fury of Herod. She had the superintendence over the Hebrew women; (Ex. 15:20. Theod. in Mic. vi. 4,) and hence many apply to her and her brothers those words of Zacharias, (11:8,) I cut off three shepherds in one month. Mary died without being permitted to enter the promised land, on account of her murmuring, C. 12. Thus the synagogue, though proud of her prerogatives, cannot enter the land of rest. C.—There. Some place this Cades not far from the Red Sea, (v. 20,) south of Idumea, while the other was to the north, and nearer Chanaan, being generally called Cades-barne. Bonfrere and C. a Lapide. C. 20:16.—In this place Mary died, four months before Aaron. M.

Ver. 3. Brethren, Core, &c. (C. 16:32,) or with them he died (C. 11) at the graves of lust. C.

Ver. 6. And cried ... to murmur. These words are not found in the Heb., Sept., &c. nor in the new edition of S. Jerom, though they occur in most of the Latin MSS. C.—If it be an addition, it must be very ancient. Mariana.

Ver. 8. The rod, with which Moses had wrought so many miracles, and which was placed in the tabernacle, v. 9. It is called his rod, in the Heb. 5:11. We do not find that the rod of Aaron, which budded, was used to work miracles.—Thou. Sept. “you.” Both Moses and Aaron concurred in the action, (v. 12,) but Moses was the chief agent. C.

Ver. 10. Rock. Your frequent murmurs will stop the course of God’s bounty. If God had not condemned the conduct of his ministers on this occasion, we could hardly find any reason to blame them. But the Fathers observe, that they betrayed a want of resolution, and intended to throw the blame upon the incredulity of the people, in case they failed of success. Because they exasperated his spirit, and he distinguished with his lips. Ps. 105:33. See S. Chrys. and S. Aug. on this psalm. They were not commanded to strike the rock at all; and when the water did not come at first, they struck again, (C.) being afraid lest they should now be taken for impostors. H.—They speak as if the work was their own.—Can we, &c. They exasperate the people, instead of promoting their conversion. In a word, they did not glorify God, (C.) by representing him as the sovereign holiness and mercy; and the God of unbounded power. H.

Ver. 11. The rock. This rock was a figure of Christ, and the water that issued out from the rock, of his precious blood, the source of all our good; (Ch.) while the striking twice with the rod, denoted the cross, composed of two pieces of wood. S. Aug. q. 35. W.

Ver. 12. You have not believed, &c. The fault of Moses and Aaron, on this occasion, was a certain diffidence and weakness of faith: not doubting of God's power or veracity; but apprehending the unworthiness of that rebellious and incredulous people, and therefore speaking with some ambiguity. Ch.—S. Augustine (c. Faust. xvi. 16,) does not think them guilty of any grievous crime. M.—But this must be left undetermined. C.—Land, beyond the Jordan, which is described (C. 34:2,) as the land of promise, though the east side of the Jordan was so too. H.

Ver. 13. The water of contradiction or strife. Heb. Meribah. Ch.—Sanctified: he shewed the effects of his power and clemency towards the people, and he treated his ministers with a just severity. The Samaritan copy here inserts what we read in Deuteronomy, only it places the speech of Moses in an historical form. “The Moses said, Lord, &c. (C. 3:24–28.) Moreover, the Lord said to Moses, you shall pass by,” &c. C. 2:4–6.

Ver. 14. Cades, not far from Mount Hor, on the confines of Idumea, v. 22 and Jud. 11:16. C.

Ver. 16. Angel, who had performed so many wonders in favour of the Hebrews. He is generally supposed to have been S. Michael in the cloud.

Ver. 18. Edom, the people who dwelt near Mount Hor. Those of Seir, lying more to the west, (D.) granted them leave to pass, and to buy food. Deut. 2:28. 29. Grotius maintains, that the Hebrews might justly have forced a passage upon this refusal; as S. Augustine (q. 44,) says, that they might lawfully have waged war upon the Amorrites, on the like occasion; and the holy wars have been defended on the same plea, because the Saracens would not suffer the Christians to go in pilgrimage to the holy land. See Mare, lib. i. 1. But Selden (Mare. claus. 20) asserts, that princes have a right to hinder others from passing through their territories; and S. Augustine only excepts one case, when they are sure the strangers can or will do no harm. But how can they obtain this assurance? Calmet answers, the long continuance of the Hebrews near the confines of Seir, without offering any molestation, and their being conducted by so holy a general, might give the people of Hor sufficient security. But at any rate the Israelites could not wage war upon them for refusing a passage, since they were expressly forbidden by God: Stir not against them, (Deut. 2:5,) the people of Seir, nor against any of the Idumeans, the children of Esau, who had taken possession of the country of Horrites. Gen. 14:6. The Hebrews seem to have been convinced of this, otherwise they would not have feared their multitudes, nor taken such a circuitous road. The angel in the cloud directed them to proceed, without molesting their territory. They went, therefore, towards the south, round the land of the Idumeans, who dwelt near the Dead Sea. H.

Ver. 19. Price. Heb. "I will only do one thing, walk through." Sept. "the matter is of no consequence, we go by the mountain." Louis de Dieu translates, "It is not indeed a word, (or idle pretence) I will pass through on foot."

Ver. 22. Hor, in the territory of Cades, or Rekem, which is the same town as Petra. Onkelos. Josep. Ant. iv. 4. Hor was part of a range of mountains, like Libanus. The Hebrews encamped at a place called Mosera. Deut. 10:6. C.

Ver. 24. People, in the bosom of Abraham, while his body is consigned to the grave.—Incredulous. Heb. "you rebelled against," &c. the words were addressed to both. Sept. "you irritated me." H.

Ver. 26. Vesture, or pontifical attire. Eleazar had been anointed already, so that perhaps he stood in need of no other ceremony to be acknowledged high priest. He was dispensed with on this occasion to attend his dying father. The spirit of God gives great encomiums to Aaron. Malac. 2:4–7. Eccli. 45:7. 27. He, at the same time, prefigured Christ, the gospel, and the old law. He spoke plainly, and was allowed to enter the holy of holies; while Moses was excluded, spoke with difficulty, and had a veil on his face. See S. Jer. ep. ad Fab. man. 33. But on the other hand, he represented the law with all its defects. He falls into several great faults, and dies despoiled of his glorious vestments, to shew the abrogation of his priesthood. The pagans have, perhaps, introduced some parts of his history into that of Mercury, the god of thieves and of travellers, the messenger of the other gods, whom they adorn with a wand, &c. in imitation of the rod of Aaron, who was the interpreter of Moses, and the head of that people, which wandered for 40 years, after plundering Egypt. C.

Ver. 29. Dead, in the 123d year of his age. M.—Neither Moses, Aaron, nor Mary, representing the Law, the priests, and the prophets of the Old Testament, could introduce the people into the promised land. This honour was reserved for Josue, the illustrious figure of Jesus Christ, and of his Church. C.

Ver. 1. Arad. This was either the name of the king, or of his city, which was situated in the southern parts of Chanaan, and which fell to the share of Hobab, in the tribe of Juda. H.—When this king heard, by means of his spies, or was informed that Israel intended to make an irruption into his country like spies, without declaring war, or by the way which their spies had marked out either just before, or in the second year after their exit; or in fine, by the road, which the Sept. leave untranslated, Athrim, and which means “of the spies,” he resolved to be beforehand with them; and, coming suddenly upon them, took some spoils, or, according to the Heb. Sept. &c. “captives.” These, by the ancient laws of war, he might either sell or put to death. Vendere cum possis captivum, occidere noli. Horace. Grot. Jur. iii. 7. The Rabbins pretend that this king took fresh courage on account of the death of Aaron, and the consequent disappearance of the cloud, and that he drove the Israelites seven encampments back, as far as Mosera, which they confound with Haseroth.

Ver. 2. Cities. Heb. “I will subject their cities to anathema, or utter destruction.” This vow they probably made at the place called Horma, or “Anathema,” which was anciently called Saphaad. Judg. 1:17. They fully executed their threat under Josue, who defeated the king of Hered, (Jo. 12:14,) though they destroyed, at present, whatever they could. Arad was afterwards rebuilt by Hobab.

Ver. 3. Anathema. That is, a thing devoted to utter destruction. Ch.—The explanation of Horma is inserted by S. Jerom. H.

Ver. 4. Edom, one of the princes, had refused them a passage; upon which they went by Salmona to Phunon, (C. 33:37. 42,) where they probably murmured, (C. 5) and were bitten by the serpents, as we read in this chapter. C.

Ver. 5. God. They had before often directed their complaints against the two brothers. Now, Aaron being no more, they attack God himself, who had always resented the injury done to his ministers.—Food. So they call the heavenly manna: thus worldlings loathe the things of heaven, for which they have no relish. Ch.—Sept. “our soul is indignant at this most empty bread,” which has no solidity in it, nor support. Many translate the Heb. “most vile bread.” Thus, in the blessed eucharist, the substance of bread is removed, and the accidents only appear; so that to the worldly receiver, it seems very empty and light, though in reality it be supersubstantial; containing Christ himself, who fills the worthy communicant with grace and comfort, and enables him to go forward on the road to heaven, without fainting. H.

Ver. 6. Fiery serpents. They are so called, because they that were bitten by them were burnt with a violent heat. Ch.—Hence they are called seraphim, by which name an order of angels are known. The Egyptians adored a serpent which they called serapis, at Rome; and they represented their god serapis, with a serpent entwining a monstrous figure, composed of a lion, a dog, and a wolf. Macrob. Saturn i. 20. The seraph was a winged serpent. Isai. 14:29 and 30:6. Such often infested Egypt, in spring, coming from Arabia, unless they were intercepted by the ibis. Their wings resembled those of bats. Herod. ii. 76. Mela, &c. God probably sent some of this description into the camp of the Israelites. C.—Some call them proëster, (Plin. xxiv. 13,) from their burning; others the hydra, or, when out of water, the chershydra, the venom of which is most dangerous. The Sept. style them simply, “the destroying, or deadly serpents.” See Bochart. T. ii. B. iii. 13. Deut. 8:15. Wisd. 16:5. 10. H.

Ver. 8. Brazen. Heb. “fiery.” But, in the following verse, it is said to have been “of brass.” We might translate, “make a seraph, and fix it upon a standard,” (C.) in which form it would resemble one suspended on a cross. It was placed at the entrance of the tabernacle. S. Just. apol. Ezechias afterwards destroyed it, because it was treated with superstitious honours. 4 K. 18:4. Thus the best things are often abused. H.—God commands this image to be erected, while he forbids all images of idols. W.—By comparing the different passages of Scripture we may discern the true import of them. Pictures may often prove very useful and instructive. They serve the ignorant instead of books. But then the ignorant must be carefully instructed not to treat them with improper respect, as S. Gregory admonishes. And is not the same caution requisite for those who read even the word of God, lest they wrest it to their own destruction, as both the unlearned and the unstable frequently do. 2 Pet. 3:16. If every thing must be rejected which is liable to abuse, what part of the creation will be spared? The Bible, the sacraments, all creatures must be laid aside. For we read, (Rom. 8:20. 22,) the creature was made subject to vanity—every creature groaneth. H.—It is probable that Moses represented on the standard such a serpent, as had been the instrument of death. This was not intended for a charm or talisman, as Marsham would impiously pretend. Chron. x. p. 148. Such inventions proceed from the devil; and the Marsi were famous for curing the bites of serpents, by giving certain plates of brass. Arnob. ii. See Psal. 58:5. But this image was set up by God's express command; and the Book of Wisdom (16:5. 7,) assures us, that the effect was entirely to be attributed to him, the figure of a brazen serpent being rather calculated to increase than to remove the danger. Kimchi. Muis. Hence Jonathan well observes, that only those were healed who raised their hearts to God. C.

Ver. 9. A brazen serpent. This was a figure of Christ crucified, and of the efficacy of a lively faith in him, against the bites of the hellish serpent. John 3:14. (Ch.) S. Amb. Apol. i. 3. As the old serpent infected the whole human race, Jesus Christ gives life to those that look at him with entire confidence. Theod. q. 38. The brazen serpent was destitute of poison, though it resembled a most noxious animal; so Jesus Christ assumed our nature, yet without sin. C.

Ver. 10. Oboth, where Obodas, an ancient king of the Nabatheans, was adored. Hither they came from Phunon, celebrated for its copper-mines, where Bochart believes the Hebrews were bitten by the serpents, though others say that judgment was inflicted upon them at Salmona; which may be derived from tselem enu, "our image."

Ver. 11. Jeabarim, means "the ford, (of Zared, v. 12,) or the straits of passages, passengers, or Hebrews; or the hills Abarim," which extended over the eastern parts of Moab. It was the 38th station, (C.) at the southern extremity of Mount Abarim. H.—After which Moses specifies those of Zared, (v. 12,) Mathana, Nahaliel, Bamoth, Arnon, (v. 19,) Dibon-gad, and Helmon-dablataim, (C.) all on the sides of that mountain, before they came to the summit, which was also called Phasga and Nabo. C. 33:45, &c. But Pococke reckons only the two last among the stations, and makes those of Abarim and Shittim the 41st and 42d. The Sept. read, "they encamped in Achelgai, on the other side, in the desert." H.—Eusebius and S. Jerom call this station of Jee, Gai or Hai, which they place near Petra. Jer. 49:4.—East. The Sam. here inserts, (Deut. 2:9,) "And the Lord said to Moses, Fight not," &c.

Ver. 12. Zared. The Israelites passed over this torrent, 38 years after the murmur at Cades-barne, (Deut. 2:14,) when God ordered Moses not to attack the Moabites.

Ver. 13. Against. Heb. "on the other, or on this side of (the river, v. 14) Arnon," which runs from the east, almost in the same direction as the torrent of Zared, but empties itself into the Dead Sea higher up, near the mouth of the Jordan. C.—It divides the Moabites from their brethren, the children of Ammon, who lay to the north-east. The Hebrews encamped on the south side of this river, in the desert of Cademoth, (Deut. 2:26,) whence they sent to ask leave of Sehon to pass through his dominions; but, on his refusal, God ordered them to cross the Arnon by force. C.

Ver. 14. The book of the wars, &c. An ancient book, which, like several others quoted in Scripture, has been lost. Ch.—S. Augustine (q. 42) thinks this book was written by one of that country. Others believe that Moses wrote a more detailed account of the wars which he had to wage with the Amalecites, (Ex. 17:14,) and these other nations, out of which he has only inserted some of the heads in the Pentateuch. But whether these two verses were taken from another work of Moses, or from the history of some other person, they are now of divine authority. Saul says to David, (1 K. 18:17,) fight the battles of the Lord, ... and the children of God and of Ruben pass all armed for war before the Lord, (C. 32:29. C.) whence it appears, that the wars of the Hebrews were attributed to God. Tostat is of opinion, that the Book of the Just, is the same with that to which Moses here refers. See Jos. 10:13. 2 K. 1:18. But Theodoret thinks rather, that the former was a more extensive account of the transactions of Josue, out of which the book which bears his name was compiled. Such records certainly existed, to which the sacred historians frequently refer: and it is very probable, that a work of this nature was compiled in the days of Moses, or perhaps before his time. S. Aug. C. D. xviii. As it contained a prediction, respecting the future wars, in which the Hebrews were about to engage, it could not but make a suitable impression upon them. It might already be in every one's mouth, and the Heb. may insinuate, that it would be handed down to the latest posterity: "Wherefore in the history, or account of the wars of the Lord, this also shall be mentioned," jamor, dicetur. According to this interpretation, it would not be necessary to suppose, that Moses refers to any more ancient book, as sepher means also, "a narration" by word of mouth; and Rabbi Menachem believes, that God had revealed this event to Moses, encouraging him with the assurance, that he would give him the victory over the nations bordering upon the Arnon, as he had done over the Egyptians and Amalecites at the Red Sea. See Sixt. Senens. H. —Of Arnon, the waters of which are supposed to have given the Hebrews a passage, as the Chaldee asserts on the authority of Ps. 73:15. Habacuc (3:13) also mentions that several rivers were dried up by God. The Hebrew text is almost unintelligible, "From, or against, Vahab to Supha." As there is no verb, some translate, "he (Sehon) fought against Vaheb (Grotius reads Moab) at Supha, or he came to Veb." But Calmet would substitute Zared instead of Vaheb: "The encamped at the torrent of Zared, and came to Supha, (Deut. 1:1, where we read the Red Sea) to the torrent of Arnon." Protestants translate, "What he did in the Red Sea, and in the brooks of Arnon, (16) and at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling or Ar, and lieth upon the border of Moab." H.

Ver. 15. The rocks. Some assert that the rocks fell upon the enemy: others, that they gave way and opened a passage for the Hebrews, while the rivers were also dried up. Heb. "They encamped on the stream of the torrents, which bends towards the dwelling (or city) of Ar, and rests upon the frontiers of Moab." Thus the book to which Moses alludes, confirms his account of these different encampments. C.—The Sept. give rather a different turn of these two verses: "Hence it is said in a book, The war of the Lord has burnt Zoob and the torrents of Arnon—and has sent the torrents to inhabit Er: and it lies upon the borders of Moab." The river, it seems, had been removed out of its bed by a subterraneous fire or earthquake, and deluged the city of Ar, belonging to Moab. The mighty hand of God terrified those nations, while all nature fought against the wicked and the unwise. Wisd. 5:21. H.—Rocks were hurled upon the heads of the Amorrites, and the waters conveyed their dead bodies into the vale of Moab. W.

Ver. 16. Well. Heb., Beer. H.—This station is not mentioned under the same name at least, C. 33. Probably the inhabitants had covered up this well with sand, and God having discovered it to Moses, he informed the princes, who pushed their staves down. Upon which the waters appearing, the people sung a hymn of thanksgiving and joy. Water is very scarce, and, of course, of great value in those deserts, where even still the Arabs conceal their wells, and often fight to hinder passengers from taking any of the water. C.

Ver. 17. They sung. Heb. "sing ye unto it," in chorus, men and women. Sept. "commence a canticle unto it. This well the princes dug, the kings of nations hewed in the rock, in their kingdom, while they held dominion."

Ver. 18. Mathana. Perhaps they did not stop here, though all the encampments are not specified, C. 33. Nahaliel, "God my torrent," and Bamoth, "the heights," are also situated upon the Arnon.

Ver. 20. Desert. Heb. and Chal. "Yeshimon," (Jos. 13:28. Eze. 25:9,) a city of the Moabites.

Ver. 21. Messengers, not from the city of Cademoth, which was in the midst of Phasga, but from a desert of the same name, situated out of the dominions of Sehon. Deut. 2:24. Euseb.—God had already promised this country to Abraham, and though Moses did not intend to attack the king at present, being eager to fall upon the Chanaanites on the other side of the Jordan, God punishes the refusal of Sehon to let his people pass, by a swifter destruction. C.—The measure of his crimes was full, though the mere denial of a passage to such a vast multitude might even be justified by sound policy. H.

Ver. 22. Wells. We shall content ourselves with the torrents. They had only to travel about thirty miles. C.

Ver. 23. Jasa was not far from the Arnon, between Medaba and Dibon. Isai. 15:4. Euseb.

Ver. 24. Garrison, either against Sehon, or against the Hebrews, whom God did not, as yet, authorize to attack the Ammonites, (C.) though the latter knew it not. H.

Ver. 26. Arnon. Hence this territory, which formerly belonged to Moab, being taken in a just war, the Moabites could not lawfully retain it, as they attempted to do under Jephthe. Jud. 11:13. Grot. Jur. iii. 6.—Hesebon, or Esbus, was the capital, and lay over-against Jericho, twenty miles from the Jordan.

Ver. 27. Proverb. Heb. Moshelim: “Those who speak proverbs, or enigmas, say.” Those were the ancient poets of the Amorrites, who composed this canticle on the victory of Sehon. C.—Moses inserts it in his work, as an additional proof, that the country was entirely lost to Moab, and as a denunciation of the evils which still hung over the head of that people, and would be inflicted upon them by David, &c. 2 K. 10:1 and 4 K. 3:16. Amos 1:13. H.

Ver. 28. A fire and flame, denote the horrors of war. Jud. 9:20.—Ar. Sam. and Sept. read ad, “hath consumed even the country of the Moabites and the lords (or pillars, Sept.) of Bamoth, (the heights mentioned in v. 18, 19,) on the Arnon.” These lords may be the principal men, priests, or gods of the city. Jeremias (48:45,) reads this passage in a different manner, “it (the flame) shall devour part of Moab, and the crown of the head of the children of tumult.” The city of Ar (which some confound with Aroer) always continued in the hands of the Moabites, so that the efforts of Sehon against it, seem to have proved abortive. Deut. 2:9. 18. 29. Bonfrere. See C. 24:17.

Ver. 29. He. Chamos, the idol of Moab, is upbraided as too weak to defend his people. The pagans generally formed their judgments of the power of their gods, by the event; and, if that proved unfortunate, they were ever ready to consign the idols to the flames. Chamos was probably the sun. C.—Some say he was Bacchus, whom the Greeks call Komas. M.

Ver. 30. Hesebon in the north, to Dibon in the southern extremity of the conquered country, near the Arnon, where Moses places the station of Dibon-gad. The yoke, or dominion of the Moabites, was ruined in all those parts. C.—Heb. “We have shot at them; or their lamp, (children or power,) from Hesebon as far as Dibon, is extinguished; and their wives (or we have destroyed them) even unto Nophe and Medaba.” Sept. “Their women have still kindled a fire against Moab.” Nophe is probably the Nabo of Isaias, (15:2,) in the environs of Medaba, where the fainting Moabites had time to breathe. The fire, which the Sept. say the women enkindled against Moab, might seem to indicate that the war was commenced on their account, like that which brought on the destruction of Troy. They entailed a still heavier destruction upon their country, when, by alluring the Hebrews to sin, they enkindled God’s indignation. C. 25. With this verse the quotation, from the Amorrhite proverbial writers, concludes, v. 27. H.

Ver. 32. Jazer, a famous city, 15 miles from Hesebon, given afterwards to the Levites. Moses “took the Amorrhites who were there” prisoners, according to the Heb.; or, “drove them away,” (Sept.) putting to death those who continued to make resistance. C.

Ver. 33. Og, the king of the most fertile country of Basan, was of gigantic stature. Deut. 3:11. The Rabbins relate many fables concerning him.—Edrai was 15 miles to the north of the torrent Jeboc, (C.) which was the southern extremity of this territory. H.

Ver. 1. Plains. Sept. “to the west of Moab.” These plains had formerly belonged to that people, but the Hebrews had lately taken them from Sehon, and intended now to pass over the Jordan. The Moabites, however, being jealous of their growing power, called in the aid of the Madianites, and of the magician Balaam, and, by their wanton provocation, brought destruction upon themselves. We know not exactly the extent of the dominions of the Moabites. They seemed to have lost the greatest part of the country north of the Arnon. Their last town and capital was Ar. C. 21:13. Yet they still kept possession of Mount Phasga. C.

Ver. 3. Of him: Israel. M.—They knew not that God had forbidden the Hebrews to attack the Moabites, unless they were first assailed. Joseph.—Heb. “Moab was much afraid of the people, because of their numbers, and was distressed (and upon his guard) on account of the children of Israel.” H.

Ver. 4. Elders of Madian, who dwelt also upon the Arnon, towards the lake of Sodom. These Madianites were a different people from those who inhabited the country to the east of the Red Sea. S. Jerom—They were not governed by kings, but by an aristocracy, or senate of princes. H.

Ver. 5. Beor. S. Peter (2:11, 15) reads Bosor.—A soothsayer, or magician, (ariolum) as this word always indicates. Jos. 13:22. The Hebrews believe he was once a true prophet, a descendant of Buz, the son of Melcha, and the same as Eliu, the friend of Job. S. Jer. q. 3. Heb. in Gen.) He certainly foretold the Messias, or star of Jacob, by divine inspiration. C. 24:17. H.—He consults and acknowledges the true God, v. 8. 18. 20. Origen (hom. 13,) believes that he left a book of his prophecies, which was known to the wise men, and discovered to them the birth of the Messias; and some Rabbins think that Moses has here inserted from that work what relates to Balaam. S. Augustine (q. 48) shews that he was a wicked man, of whom nevertheless God made use to convey important instructions; and that he is one of those reprobates who will say, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? He is placed with Cain and Core. S. Jude 11. S. Ambrose (ep. 50,) observes, that he might prophesy, like Caiphas, without knowing what he said, and that the gift of prophecy on this occasion, was no proof of his virtue. Many of the Fathers look upon him as a mere magician, who could utter no blessing, but only curses, by the rules of his infernal art. He did not design to consult God, but the Lord puts answers into his mouth. Theod. q. 39. 42. The method of consultation seemed to border on superstition. He wished to make God change his resolutions, as if he were an idol, and attempted to evade the impressions of his spirit. C.—The river, Euphrates, which waters the country of the Ammonites. M.—Heb. “to Pethora, which is by the land of the children of his people.” S. Jerom has translated Pethora “soothsayer,” and left Ammon undeclined. H.—The Chaldee informs us, that he was a resident at Petor, a city of Syria, on the Euphrates. It is probably the same town with the Pacora of Ptolemy, near Thapsacus. Balaam is styled an Aramean; (C. 23:17,) and we know that he came from Mesopotamia. Hebrew Aram Naharaim, (Deut. 23:4. C.) or “Syria, between the two rivers,” the Euphrates and Tigris. Salien.—Me, ready to fall upon my dominions. It appears hence, that Balaam was in high estimation, since a distant king depends more upon his power, that upon the efforts of all his own armies, and those of his auxiliaries, and is willing to pay him for cursing his enemies at do dear a rate. Perhaps he thought that they employed magical arts to conquer their enemies, by prayer. See Ex. 17:11. Orig. hom. 13. H.

Ver. 6. Curse. The ancients placed great confidence in those whom they believed to be under the guidance of a superior spirit, whether good or bad. They thought their blessing or cursing would surely have its effect. By means of charms, they also strove to evoke or draw off the tutelary god of a place, before they could expect to take possession of it. Hence, as it was requisite to mention the true name of the place, fictitious names were given to most cities of importance, while the real appellation was kept a profound secret; and Valerius Soranus was severely punished for discovering the name of Rome, Valentia. See Plin. iii. 5. Solin. ii. Plut. prob. vi. C.—Rome, in Greek, has the same import as Valentia in Latin, and signifies strength. H.—Macrobius has preserved the form of a solemn curse, pronounced by the Roman general against the Carthaginians. Saturn iii. 9. “Dis Pater, or Jupiter, or if you prefer any other title, I beg that you will send fright and terror, and put this city of Carthage, and this army which I intend to specify, to flight, &c. If you will perform these things, according to my intention, I promise to offer in sacrifice to you, O earth, mother of all things, and to you, great god Jupiter, three black sheep.” Thus, probably, Balac wished the Hebrews to be devoted or cursed. C.

Ver. 7. The price. Heb. lit. “the enchantments.” But they took money, to engage the soothsayer to comply more readily with their iniquitous request. 2 Pet. 2:15. Sept. &c. It was customary to offer presents to the prophets. 1 K. 9:7.

Ver. 8. Night. He was accustomed to exercising his art by night; loving darkness, for his works were evil. Jo. 3:19. H.

Ver. 18. Less. Not that he was resolved to comply with God’s will, but because he found an insuperable impediment to oppose it at present. C.

Ver. 19. To stay. His desiring them to stay, after he had been fully informed already that it was not God’s will he should go, came from the inclination he had to gratify Balac for the sake of worldly gain. And this perverse disposition God punished by permitting him to go, (though not to curse the people, as he would willingly have done) and suffering him to fall still deeper and deeper into sin, till he came at last to give that abominable counsel against the people of God, which ended in his own destruction. So sad a thing it is to indulge a passion for money. Ch. S. Aug. q. 48.—Philo (de vita, Mos. i) thinks that Balaam feigned this leave of God, v. 22. C.

Ver. 22. Angry. Either because he had not granted him permission to go, or he saw that Balaam was disposed to curse the Israelites, v. 32. Sept. “the angel (Michael) rose up on the road to oppose him,” diaballein. Lit. “to calumniate, accuse, resist, or to be a satan.” Hence diabolus means an accuser, opponent, calumniator, &c. S. Aug. H.

Ver. 23. Ass. The angel appeared thrice to the ass, before he was perceived by Balaam. C. 29:3. 4. The second time, S. Augustine (q. 50) thinks he was standing in the vineyard. C.

Ver. 28. Opened the mouth, &c. The angel moved the tongue of the ass, to utter these speeches, to rebuke, by the mouth of a brute beast, the brutal fury and folly of Balaam. Ch.—S. Thomas (ii. 2. q. 105,) says, an angel spoke by the mouth of the ass, in like manner as the devil did by that of the serpent. Gen. 3. Infidels deride this miracle, and some have thought that it was only in the imagination of Balaam, that this dialogue was formed. Maimon.—S. Gregory of Nyssa, seems to think that the ass only brayed as usual, and that the soothsayer, being accustomed to augur from the voice of animals, understood its meaning. But S. Peter says, the dumb beast ... speaking with man's voice, forbade the folly of the prophet. 2 Pet. 2:16. God did not endue it with understanding on this occasion, but only formed, by its mouth, such sounds as might serve to repress the cruel folly of Balaam. But he was more stupid than the ass. “Being accustomed, it seems, to such prodigies,” (monstris) and intent upon lucre, he paid no further regard to such a wonderful transaction, but held conversation with his ass, without any emotion. S. Aug. q. 48. 50. C.—The pagan historians relate many instances of beasts and trees speaking; (Grotius) so that they object to this history, and to that of the serpent, with a very bad grace, as S. Cyril remarks, in his third book against Julian. H.—They relate that the ass of Bacchus spoke to him, and the horse and elephant of Achilles and Porus addressed their respective masters, while the oaks of Dodona were famous for their oracles. C.—The river Causus said, “Hail, Pythagoras.” Porphyrius, cited by S. Cyril, &c. H.

Ver. 31. Ground, with religious worship; not as God, but as an angel. See Ex. 20. W.

Ver. 36. A town. Eusebius thinks it was Ar, the capital.

Ver. 39. City, &c. Heb. “Kiryath, chutsoth.” Calmet would read Hares, a city mentioned, Isai. 16:7. 11, and styled the walls of brick, (4 K. 3:25,) being the same with Ar. But then the former town must be situated some where upon the frontiers of Moab, as they came from it to the capital.

Ver. 40. With him. Only two servants were mentioned, (v. 22,) and the princes sent by Balac, v. 15. Perhaps others from Mesopotamia might attend Balaam. H.—The king sent parts of the victims to all. Chal.

Ver. 41. People. From the heights or temple of Baal, or the god of Chamos, where a statue or pillar (Sept.) was erected in his honour, (C.) on Mount Arabim, (M.) the soothsayer was enabled to take a distinct view of all the camp of Israel, (C. 23:13,) and not of a part only, as the Sept. and Arab. versions would insinuate. It was deemed necessary to have those present upon whom people intended to vent their imprecations. C.

Ver. 2. Altar. They both join in sacrificing to Chamos or the devil, whom Balaam styles his lord, Yehovah: but the true God was pleased to hinder the idol from interfering at present, and answered Balaam, in order that he might see the folly of his conduct and repent; and that others, who were more willing to listen to him, than to the servants of God, might be instructed by his declaration. H.—“God’s voice is heard sounding from a profane mouth.” S. Jer. de 42. mans. W.

Ver. 4. Speed. Heb. shephi, may signify also “on the straight road,” (Sept.) “into the plain,” (Louis de Dieu) “all alone,” (Onkelos) or most probably “upon an eminence.” Kimchi. C.—God, in the visible form of an angel. M.—To him. Balaam might suppose that he was addressing his idol. But Moses informs us, that the true God or his angel was present, and forced Balaam to deliver an unwelcome message to the king. H.

Ver. 7. Parable. Beginning to speak in a beautiful and poetic style, like a man inspired. C.—Mashal, denotes a striking and elegant prophecy. M.—Aram, when placed alone, properly means Syria; but when Padan or Naharaim are added, Mesopotamia is meant, whence Balaam came. Deut. 22:5.—East of Moab, though lying to the north, or higher part of Mesopotamia. C.

Ver. 9. Hills. But all in vain. C.—I am prevented from cursing him; and if I should do it, my imprecations would be turned into blessings by a superior Being. H.—Alone, without standing in need of any auxiliaries, and devoid of fear. Deut. 13:18. Jer. 49:31. The Jews had but few connections with foreign nations, keeping at a distance from them, as being of a different religion. C.—Indeed, when they applied for aid to the Egyptians, &c. it generally turned out to their detriment, that they might learn to trust in God alone, who would effectually protect them, if they observed his law, as he had repeatedly promised. H.—Nations. Israel shall not be like other people. He is under the peculiar care of God, covered with glory, full of confidence, and inspired with the love of independence; so that he will have nothing to do with the rest of the world. C.

Ver. 10. Dust. God had promised to multiply the seed of Abraham as the dust of the earth. Gen. 13:16. Balaam had just beheld several thousands of them, and in rapture, exclaims, according to the Heb. “Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel?” Their camp was divided into four great battalions, surrounding the ark and the Levites. Who can tell the number of one of these divisions, much less of all the multitudes there assembled, and what millions may, in a short time, proceed from them? You have reason, therefore, O Balac, to tremble, if they continue faithful to their God. But strive to make friends with them.—Let, &c. Heb. may also admit of the version of the Sept. “May my soul die among the souls of the just, and may my offspring be like this.” We behold in this sentence, the sentiments of all worldly and interested people, who wish to obtain a reward without submitting to the necessary labour. Impotent desires! selfish views! H.—“All,” says S. Bernard, (in Cant. serm. 21,) “wish to enjoy the felicity which Jesus Christ has promised. But how few are willing to imitate Him who invites us to do it.” C.—Thus, infidels desire sometimes to die like Catholics, though they will not live in that religion. W.—Even those who are in the Church, frequently give into this delusion, making fine prayers, and, in the time of temptation, forgetting all their sighs and tears, to whom God will say, as S. Gregory justly observes on those words of Job, 41:3. I will not spare him nor his mighty words, and framed to make supplication. For, like Balaam, when the fit of devotion is over, such people are ready to give the most pernicious advice against the lives of those, whom they pretend they would be desirous to resemble in death. “That prayer is vain, which is not followed by continual perseverance in charity.” S. Greg. Mor. xxxiii. 27. The false prophet says not a word about living like the just; he only wishes, that after his soul has enjoyed all the pleasures of this world, it may depart to joys eternal, while his posterity is left behind in the midst of temporal prosperity.—Soul die, or be separated from its body. Even Balaam establishes the immortality of the soul. H.

Ver. 13. Thence. He has a mind to try a new experiment. We have observed, that the object of malediction was to be in view. C. 22:41. But Balac, supposing perhaps that the multitude made too deep an impression upon the soothsayer, judged it expedient to place him in another situation, where he might see only a part of Israel. Some, however, imagine that he had only seen a fourth part, or the uttermost part of the people, who lay nearest to him before; (v. 10, and C. 22:41,) and hence, would have him to take now a distinct view of the whole; and, in this sense, the Samaritan and Glassius translate from whence, &c. thus, “for thou hast seen only part of Israel, and couldst not see them all.” C.—By a similar superstition, the Syrians imagined that the God of Israel was a God of the hills, and that they could more easily conquer his people on the plain country, 3 K. 20:23. M.

Ver. 14. Place. Hebrew sede tsohpim, or “the field of the sentinels.” Chald. Such were commonly stationed on the top of high hills, to give notice, by kindling a fire, &c. of the approach of an enemy. Is. 21:11. Jer. 6:1. C.

Ver. 18. Hear. Heb. “to me.” Sept. read had, instead of hadai, and translate, “Give ear, thou witness, (martus) son,” &c. H.

Ver. 19. Changed. Heb. “repent.” Sept. “to be overawed by threats.” Origen, “to be terrified.” In the book of Judith, (8:15,) it is said, For God will not threaten like man, nor be inflamed to anger, like the son of man. C.—Do. Will he suffer me to curse Israel, after he has once given me a decided prohibition? M.

Ver. 20. To bless, not by my own intention, or by that of Balac, but by God, who hath only suffered me to proceed on my journey, on condition that I would declare his will. C. 22:35. H.—Heb. “Behold, I have received an order to bless;” or, with the Sept. “I have been chosen to pronounce a blessing; I will bless, and will not revoke, or leave off.” C.

Ver. 21. Image-god, (simulachrum) “a statue.” Chal. “falsehood.” Heb. may also signify “perversity, or punishment.” As long as Israel refrains from idol-worship, and from other transgressions, as they do at present, God will be so far from punishing them, that he will fight their battles, as their king; (H.) and at the sound of the silver trumpets will grant them victory. C. 10:9. M.—The sound. Heb. “the shout of a king among them,” encouraging his people by his presence and by his words. H.—“I behold those who do not serve idols in the house of Jacob ... the word of the Lord their God is helping them, and the majesty of their king is among them.” Chaldee. M.

Ver. 22. Rhinoceros. Heb. ream, which is sometimes rendered unicorn.

Bochart thinks it means the oryx, or the strong Arabian goat. The animal, of which the Scripture so often speaks, was remarkable for its strength, (C.) and could not easily be tamed. Job 39:9. H.—The Sept. generally translate monoceros, which is a fish, with a horn proceeding from its upper jaw. This is often shewn in cabinets for the horn of the unicorn. There are various animals which have only one horn. Pliny and Aristotle instance the oryx, &c. Various authors of credit specify likewise the rhinoceros, which has “a horn upon its nose,” and is found in Ethiopia. The emperor of that country sent one to the court of Persia, which Chardin saw and describes. It is as large as an elephant, and the people have learnt the method of taming both these huge beasts. C.—It seems the art was unknown in the days of Job, if this be the animal of which he speaks. H.—Moses (Deut. 33:17,) seems to attribute two horns to the ream; and Pausanius allows a greater and a less one to the rhinoceros; the latter is very strong and erect. It is of a brownish colour. C.—Whatever may be the precise meaning of ream, it certainly denotes an animal of superior strength, and very formidable. Balaam represents God, or the people of Israel, in this light. God had given repeated instances of his dominion over all nature, in delivering the Hebrews out of Egypt. They were also capable of striking the Moabites with terror, on account of their own prowess, and surprising numbers, v. 24. H.

Ver. 23. Soothsaying. This may be joined to what goes before, as an explanation why Israel is so much to be feared; because the people have no dealings with the devil, in which case neither he nor all his agents can hurt them, since God is their protector, and will direct them when and how to act.—Hath wrought. Sept. “will bring to perfection.” Orig. c. Cels. The Heb. may also signify, “undoubtedly there is no charm powerful enough against ... Israel,” or “Jacob has no regard for the vain art of divination. Israel does not apply to augury. This very time will be memorable among their posterity for the wonders which God has wrought.” Indeed, never was there a greater display of the Divine power in favour of the Hebrews, than in this 40th year after their exit from Egypt; and in the following, which was noted for the victories and miracles of Josue. H.

Ver. 24. Lioness. Sept. “lion’s whelp.” Some explain the Heb. “a lion” of full growth and strength. But the antithesis of the Vulgate is more natural and beautiful. C.—The lioness, being solicitous for its young ones, becomes more furious.—A lion, ready to fall upon its prey. So Israel will not lay down the sword till he has conquered the nations of Chanaan, (M.) and those who dare to molest him. The allusion to the prediction of Jacob in favour of Juda seems very plain. Gen. 49:9. H.

Ver. 25. Neither, &c. When infidels cannot prevail upon people to side with them entirely, in their false worship, they endeavour to induce them at least not to bless, nor follow up the true religion. W.

Ver. 28. Phogor. Heb. “Pehor, which looketh towards Jeshimon, or the desert.” This was a part of the same chain of the mountains Abarim, with Phasga, v. 14. Balac foolishly supposed that in a different aspect, he might still obtain what he wanted; and the soothsayer was no less infatuated in following him. But he soon felt an internal monitor, who informed him, that he need not put himself to no farther trouble, in retiring alone, to prepare himself for the operation of the spirit. More glorious predictions in favour of Israel, presented themselves so forcibly, that he could hardly refrain, and durst no longer forbear proclaiming them aloud. C. 24:1. H.

Ver. 1. Divination. Sept. “to meet the birds.” The augurs judged of future events by the flying, eating, and other appearances of birds. Heb. “enchantments.” M.—Desert. The plains of Moab, where the Israelites were encamped. He found himself, as it were, involuntarily transported by the spirit of God, v. 2. C.—Yet, for all that, he did not become more holy. Some work miracles, and are damned. S. Matt. 7:22. W.

Ver. 3. Up. The same term only occurs again, (Lament. 3:8,) where it may have the same sense, though the Sept. &c. give it here a quite opposite meaning, “the man whose eyes are open,” the prophet. But Balaam alludes to his not being able to see the angel as soon as his ass, as he does, v. 4. C. 22:31. C.

Ver. 4. Falleth. Out of respect to God, or in a trance. Sept. “in sleep, his eyes are uncovered.” He was accustomed to commune with the spirits in the night. C. 22:8. H.—He who is clear-sighted enough in teaching others, neglecteth his own salvation; or, being naturally incapable of diving into futurity, he derives this power solely from the operation of the spirit. M.

Ver. 6. Woody. Heb. also “extensive torrents.”—Tabernacles. Heb. ahalim, which some render lign-aloes, or stacte, as S. Jerom does, Ps. 44:9. Prov. 7:17. Cant. 4:14. The aloe-tree, however, was brought from India, and was not common in Arabia. The Syrian aloe was only a shrub; and this tree, of which Balaam speaks, must have been tall and beautiful.—Pitched. Heb. “planted.” C.—The Sept. agree however with the Vulg. H.—Side. Cedars grow very large on the top of Libanus, and are always green; the fruit resembles the pine-apple; the wood is incorruptible. Sionita 6. By humility we must rise to the summit of perfection. D.

Ver. 7. Waters. Sept. Chal. and Syr. “From his seed a man shall spring, who shall have dominion over many nations.” This must be understood of the Messiah; or, his posterity shall be very numerous; (see Prov. 5:15. 16,) or his country shall be well watered, and his crops luxuriant.—Agag. Saul lost his crown for sparing the king of the Amalecites, who always took this title, 1 K. 15:9. Heb. may be translated, “Above Agag shall his (Israel’s) king be exalted, yet,” &c. or “and his kingdom shall increase.” Philo and S. Ambrose read, “his kingdom shall be raised on high.” The Sam. and some copies of the Sept. have, “Over Gog;” while others have Og, (C.) which may be referred to the king of Basan, who, though lately overthrown, had been possessed of great power and wealth. Israel was not satisfied with the extent of his dominions. H.—Those who read Gog, suppose that the victories of Christ over Antichrist are foretold. Origen, hom. 17. S. Cyp. Test. i. 10. C.

Ver. 8–9. Lioness. See v. 22. 24, of the preceeding chapter. H.—This prediction was accomplished under the reigns of David and of Solomon. M.

Ver. 10. Together, to hinder him from being heard, and through indignation. Job 37:23.

Ver. 11. Honour, or reward.

Ver. 14. Counsel, out of my own head. This he was going to do, (C.) that he might not lose his reward, when again he found himself impelled by the Lord to speak what was contrary to his temporal interest. After complying reluctantly, God ceased to strive, as it were, with his rebellious will any longer, and left him to follow the bent of his corrupt heart. Upon which he proceeded to give that infernal counsel, which involved both many of the Israelites and himself in utter destruction. H. C. 31:16. Apoc. 2:4.—Days. Heb. “Come, I will admonish thee what this people shall do to thy people,” &c. Onkelos and Origen (hom. 18. and 20.) give both senses. C.—Indeed, the transactions of both people were so blended, when they were fighting together, that to give the history of one would be explaining the fortune of the other. H.

Ver. 16. Who knoweth. This is a new title, which he had not before assumed, v. 4.

Ver. 17. Him. The great personage whom I have in view, whose coming is deferred yet for many ages. H.—The whole prediction refers to the Messiah, whom Balaam beheld by the eyes of his posterity, the wise men, (C.) or in the prophetic vision. M.—Some modern Rabbins pretend that he speaks of David, who was indeed a figure of Christ, (C.) and defeated the Moabites, 2 K. 5:8. But the prophecy was perfectly fulfilled only in our Saviour's person, who is called the bright and morning star, (Apoc. 22:16,) to whom all nations were given for an inheritance. Ps. 2. Acts 1:8. W.—Heb. also, “I see this thy ruin, but,” &c. Sept. “I will shew to him, yet not now; I will make him happy, (C.); but (makarizo, I bless) it, or he does not approach.” God executed what he ever promised in favour of all Israel, when he sent them his beloved Son.—A star. Christ, the light of the world, the splendour of his Father's glory, whose birth was made known in the East, by a star, or meteor of unusual brightness. H.—This material star is not the primary object of the prediction, since it did not rise out of Jacob, but it pointed out the orient from on high, and then disappeared. The ancient Jews understood this passage of the Messiah. Onkelos, &c. Hence the impostor, Ben. Cusiba, took advantage of this general opinion, to draw the people after him, as the person designated; when he assumed the title of Bar-chocheba, “the son of the star,” in the second age of the church.—Of Seth. Though David, as the figure of the Messiah, conquered the Moabites, he cannot be said to have subdued all nations, the descendants of Seth, by Noe, nor all the just of whom Seth was the father, in opposition to the children of Cain. But Christ will subject all the just to his empire, and will judge all mankind. Some, nevertheless, take the children of Seth to be the Moabites, who had been already mentioned; and Junius translates the Heb. with allusion to the shameful origin of that people. The Samar. may also signify, if we substitute d for r in korkor, as Jeremias also reads (C. 48:45,) kodod. “He shall penetrate the ends of Moab, and shall overturn the walls of the children of elevation, or of pride.” There were many hills in the country of the Moabites, and the people were noted for haughtiness. Jer. 48:28. 29. 45. C.—Some also assert, that Seth was the name of a king, (Grot.) and of a town of Moab. R. Nathan.—But of this there is no proof. H.

Ver. 18. Idumea and Seir. The children of Esau shall acknowledge the dominion of Israel, from David to Josaphat, and again under Hircan. 3 K. 11:15. 4 K. 3:20. Josep. xiii. 17. C.—Not only the faithful Israelites, but also the profane and headstrong sons of Esau, shall bend the knee before Christ, who will subdue them by the power of his grace, and by the preaching of his disciples. H.

Ver. 19. City of this world. Jesus will destroy their evil habits, (Orig. hom. 18,) and will select some whose lives had been hitherto scandalous, to be his intimate friends. H.—He will save those who abandoned paganism, which had fixed its seat at the great city of Rome, (C.) and he will raise up Constantine (M. T.) to rule over Jacob, his people. At his second coming, he will exterminate all who shall have refused to acknowledge his sovereignty, and who have remained out of the city of the Church. H.—Those who have fled out of the cities for safety, shall be sought out by David, and destroyed. He slew all the male children of Edom, 3 K. 15:15. C.—In this prophecy, some particulars relate to him, as that he shall subject Moab and Idumea by the valour of his troops, while other things can belong only to Christ, the star, who shall destroy the remains of the city. M.—By changing one letter, Calmet would translate, “Princes shall spring from Jacob: but Seir shall perish from his cities.” A long train of princes in Jacob prefigured the Messias, while the Idumeans have been unknown for many ages. C.

Ver. 20. Nations, which rose up to attack the Hebrews. Onkelos.—Saul will punish them, 1 K. 15. The Amalecites were a very ancient people, known in the days of Abraham. Gen. 14:7. But now they are no more. H.

Ver. 21. Cinite. From the top of the hill, he cast his eyes across the Dead Sea, and beholding the strong holds of the Cinite, whose country had been promised to the Hebrews, he is inspired to foretel what would happen to this people. He alludes to their name, which signifies a nest; (C.) and to the manner in which those nations of Arabia lived, in caverns cut out of a rock. Bellon, ii. 61.

Ver. 22. Captive. The Sam. insinuates that they should return, 1 Par. 2:55. “Though thy nest should be entirely consumed, thy inhabitants shall return out of Assyria.” C.—Sept. “If to Beor (the capital) there should be nests of iniquity, the Assyrians will reduce thee to captivity.” Heb. “Yet the Cinite should be wasted, till,” &c. H.—The family of Jethro was now among the Hebrews, and their posterity were suffered to dwell with the tribe of Juda. Abor afterwards removed into the tribe of Nephthali, and was led away by Salmanasar, 4 K. 17. M.—Some of the Cinites were mixed with the Amalecites, 1 K. 15:6. The Assyrians infested the neighbouring nations, as well as the Hebrews, under Sennacherib and Nabuchodonosor, as the prophets inform us. C.

Ver. 23. Things, of which he is about to speak. The time is remote, but very dreadful, when the Assyrians shall be chastised, in their turn, as well as the Greeks and Romans, who shall have destroyed Assur, and even the most favourite nation of God. Balaam began by announcing the prosperity of the Hebrews, but he at last gives some comfort to Balac, by letting him know that they shall also be laid waste, as well as his kingdom, and the powerful nations around him. This is the condition of all human things! H.

Ver. 24. Italy. Heb. “Chittim,” which Bochart endeavours to prove with great erudition to mean Italy; while Grotius contends it means Macedon, and Calmet doubts not but this is the import of the present text. The Macedonians under Alexander and his successors, conquered the countries of Assyria, Palestine, &c. Antiochus Epiphanes raised a cruel persecution against the Jews. But may suppose that the Hebrews here mentioned, are the nations beyond the Euphrates. C.—Heb. “ships ... shall afflict Heber and he also shall perish for ever,” which seems to refer to Heber alone, and not to those who shall oppress them, as the Vulg. Sept. &c. express it. H.—Indeed, we do not find that the Scripture mentions the end of the Roman empire, of which many explain this passage. C.—Grotius (Jur. ii. 9) maintained that it still subsisted in the German empire. Others think it will be destroyed only in the days of Antichrist. T. Dan. 2:40.—But many have asserted that it was overturned by the Goths, and that the Romans are the people who would reduce the Hebrews to the greatest misery, under Titus. M.—The kings of Macedon are, however, styled kings of Cethim, (1 Mac. 1:1. 8:5,) and they were the immediate subverters of the Persian empire, as theirs fell a prey to the Romans. Theod. q. 44. C.

Ver. 25. Place, in Aram. He returned soon after to the country of the Madianites, and was deservedly involved in their ruin. H. C. 31:8.—Perhaps he only began his journey homeward, and stopped on the road. C.—As for Balac, he fought against Israel, (Jos. 24:9,) at least by endeavouring to get them cursed. Severus says, “he was overcome.” But we know not the particulars of the battle. H.

Ver. 1. Settim, which had Abel, “mourning,” prefixed to it, (C. 33:49,) on account of the slaughter of 24,000 of the Israelites, v. 6. 9. It was situated in the plains of Moab, near the Jordan, and was the last station of the Hebrews. C.—In this neighbourhood all the following transactions occurred, which are recorded, till the end of the Pentateuch. M.—Balaam, being convinced that the Hebrews would be invincible, as long as they continued faithful to God, advised the nations, who had sent to consult him, to let their daughters converse freely with the Israelites, but not to yield to their impure desires, unless they consented to offer sacrifice to their idols. C.—Thus they first captivated their hearts, and then subverted their understanding: For some rejecting a good conscience, have made shipwreck concerning the faith. 1 Tim. 1:19. H.—By the same method many have been drawn into heresy. W.—The counsels of an able but wicked man, are often followed by the most dreadful effects. That these women were sent by the Moabites, and also by the Madianites, (v. 6. 17,) instigated by the perverse counsels of Balaam, (C.) appears not only from the event being recorded in this place, but also by the express declaration of Moses, C. 31:7. 8, and of the Apocalypse, C. 2:14. Salien, Mic. 6:5. H.

Ver. 3. Initiated to Beelphegor. That is, they took to the worship of Beelphegor, an obscene idol of the Moabites, and were consecrated as it were to him. Ch.—Heb. “Israel was attached, or married to Beelphegor,” the sun, Adonis or Osiris, whom the psalmist (105:28,) styles, the dead, because the people were accustomed to bewail the death of Adonis every year, with great solemnity. C.—S. Jerom supposes this god “of opening, or nakedness,” Beelphegor, to be the obscene Priapus. M.—The people fell by degrees into the depth of abomination. They first defiled their bodies with women, then their souls were contaminated by the sacrifices of their idols, till they began really to adore them, and even to consecrate themselves to their service, meaning to ratify their base apostacy from the true God. H.—Yet it is probable all those who were cut off by pestilence, were not thus initiated: but only those who were the princes or ringleaders, and who are sentenced to be gibbeted. Salien.—The mother of Asa, king of Juda, was not ashamed to preside over the mysteries of this obscene idol, (3 K. 15:13,) which people worshipped by prostitution. Villalpand. S. Jer. in Osee iv. 9. T.

Ver. 4. People. Assemble the judges, and by their sentence, hang them who have been most guilty. Onkelos.—If any of the judges, or princes themselves, have gone astray, let them not be spared. H.—The Jews assert, that the malefactor was always killed before his body was hung on a gibbet; and that crucifixion was not known among them. But the contrary is asserted by many. It is not clear whether these criminals were hung by the neck, or crucified, after they had been first stoned, as guilty of idolatry, or whether they were fastened to the gibbet alive, for greater torment and disgrace. C.—Sun; publicly. See 2 K. 12:11. M.

Ver. 5. Judges, who had not been guilty. Sept. “to the tribes.” The judges, and even private individuals, were thus authorized to exterminate the guilty, as the Levites had been before, Ex. 32:27. While punishment was inflicted but slowly, and some perhaps of the more noble were spared, so that Zambri, even became more insolent. God began to supply the defect of his ministers, by sending the plague among the people, as Onkelos insinuates. H.

Ver. 6. One, Zambri, v. 14. M.—Went in. Heb. “brought unto his brethren, or came ... with a woman of Madian.” Sept. “introduced one of his brethren to a Madianite woman.” But the Sam. copy agrees with the Vulg.; and the ancient edition of the Sept. must have done so too, since the Fathers explain it in the same sense. Philo de vita Mos. Origen, &c. Josephus (iv. 6,) pretends that Zambri had married the most noble Cozbi, and that Moses finding fault with such infractions of this laws, this prince of the house of Simeon, arraigned him publicly of cruel tyranny and imposture in thus imposing his own laws upon a free people, and that for his part, he would retain his wife and ingratiate himself with many gods, that he might discover the truth. Phinees heard this with just indignation, and following him to his tent, transfixed him with Cozbi, his wife, while those young men who were desirous of imitating his zeal, treated similar offenders in like manner. “God destroyed the rest by the plague, so that not less than 14,000 perished,” as Epiphanius translates, omitting dis, or ten thousand, though many copies have only 23,000, which agrees with the number specified by S. Paul, if indeed he allude to this transaction. 1 Cor. 10:7. Philo observes, that Phinees slew the Israelite who had sacrificed to the idols, and was in the company of the harlot; and, “that 24,000 perished in one day.” H.—Perhaps 1000 of the heads might be gibbeted, and 23,000 of the common people slain. D.

Ver. 7. Dagger. Josephus translates romach, by romphaia, “a sword.” Sept. by seiromasten, a long and sharp iron rod, like a spit, such as people used to try if any smuggled goods be concealed. H.—It denotes any sort of offensive weapon. C.—The Vulg. sometimes translates, a lance or spear. M.

Ver. 8. Parts. Ovid says, Lethifer ille locus, “That place where wounds so often deadly prove.” Heb. kubbak, means brothel-house just before, a bead, vault, cistern, belly, &c. Sept. translate, “through her womb.” The plague, inflicted by God, instantly ceased, to shew the divine approbation of this exemplary punishment, and all were so much filled with terror and repentance, that it was no longer necessary for the judges to sentence any more to death. An effectual stop was also put to the spreading disorder of both carnal and spiritual fornication. H.

Ver. 9. Slain. Heb. adds, “in the plague,” or pestilence sent by God, (Ps. 105:29,) and in the punishments inflicted by the judges, “twenty and four thousand.” H.—The tribe of Simeon, lying to the south, had given way to greater disorders with the Madianites; (C.) so that they were found to have 37,100 fewer than when they were numbered before. C. 2:13. See C. 26:14. H.

Ver. 12. Peace. He has the honour of restoring the people to peace and to my favour, so that my covenant shall still subsist with them. He shall surely be his father’s successor in the high priesthood, and shall not be prevented by death.

Ver. 13. Seed. A short interruption of 150 years (from Heli to Abiathar, of the race of Ithamar) may be accounted trifling in a duration of so many ages, during which the posterity of Phinees enjoyed this dignity. Phinees succeeded Eleazar and had for his successors, Abiezer Bocci, and Elsi. C.—Some add Zararias, Meraioth, and Amarias, upon whose death, 1157 years before Christ, Heli got possession, by some means, and was followed by Achitob, Achielech, and Abiathar, of the same family, till David joined Sadoc with the latter, and he was acknowledged sole pontiff on the rebellion of Abiathar. B.C. 1014. See Lenglet’s tables. H.—We have no proof that the succeeding high priests were of a different family, (C.) till our Saviour’s time, who re-united in his person the right both to his priesthood and to the kingdom of Israel for ever. See S. Aug. C. D. xvii. 6. H.—God did not promise that no interruption should take place. He only granted a perpetual right to the family of Phinees, (Cajetan) which they might forfeit by their misconduct. T.—He was certainly always disposed to comply with his promise, and really granted the effects of it to the posterity of Phinees, at least for almost 1000 years, even if we grant that the Machabees were not his lineal descendants, of which there is no positive proof either way. Thus, for ever, often denotes a long duration. Though Phinees was entitled already to the high priesthood, in quality of the eldest son of Eleazar, he had before no assurance of surviving him, nor of having a succession of children who might be capable of the high office, and free from every blemish; (C.) so that the promise made to him was not only a ratification of his title, but a new and real benefit. H.—Zealous. The Jews allow any person to kill one who publicly, or in the presence of ten people, commits idolatry, sacrilege, fornication with a strange woman, and also a priest who, being unclean, approaches to the altar. This they call the judgment of zeal. Seld. Jur. iv. 4. Grotius ii. 20. This practice they authorize by the example of Phinees, Mathathias, &c. 1 Mac. 2:24. Such liberty was carried to a great excess, by the Zealots, in the last siege of Jerusalem; and it would be very criminal, where such a law is not in force. C.—Phinees was, however, either one of the judges, and thus gave an example of just severity to his fellow magistrates, or he was inspired by God to resent the public injury done to his name. It is never lawful to kill by private authority. Catec. Rom. p. 3. C. 6:5. S. Thomas ii. 2. q. lx. 6. W.—Those who act under the influence of inspiration must be very careful not to give in to any delusion; and the examples of holy persons who are mentioned, with applause, in Scripture, for having been the instruments of God's vengeance, will not authorize us to do the like, unless we can produce the like testimony. H.—Atonement, by averting the scourge of God, (v. 8. 11,) and by putting a stop to the corruption of the people, which might otherwise have greatly increased, if Zambri had escaped with impunity. C.

Ver. 14. Kindred. Heb. “of a chief house among the Simeonites,” as Sur was of equal nobility, “head over a people, and of a chief house in Madian,” v. 15. H.—He is styled king, and one of the five princes of the nation. C. 31:8.

Ver. 17. Madianites. God spared the Moabites for the sake of Lot (Deut. 2:19,) and of Ruth, of whom David and Christ should be born. They were perhaps less guilty, but they did not escape due chastisement under David, 2 K. 8:2. M.—The war against Madian was the last which the Hebrews waged in the lifetime of Moses. C. 31. H.

Ver. 1. Shed. Heb. and Sept. “after the plague,” which destroyed so many. Chal. After all who had murmured were cut off, the new progeny is numbered. S. Jerom. W.

Ver. 2. Number. This was done that the general might know what forces he could muster to attack the nations of Chanaan on the west side of the Jordan, and also in order that the lands might be properly distributed. The war lasted seven years, and the distribution of lands was not completed till some time afterwards. It is not clear that those who were not enrolled at this time, as being 20 years of age, would have any portion, except that of their fathers, allotted to them; but it seems, however, rational that those who were arrived at that age when the distribution was made, would have their share like the rest. There were 1820 people fewer than in the register which was taken before, (C. 1,) thirteen months after the departure from Egypt. The Levites seem not to have been numbered with the utmost exactitude, as only five families are mentioned, (v. 58, Jans.) though there were many more, 1 Par. 23:6, &c. Their numbers amount to only 23,000. C. —They had rather increased in the desert during 38 years; (see C. 3:39,) as had also the tribes of Juda, Issachar, and Zabulon, which lay to the east; of Manasses (who perhaps on that account precedes Ephraim) and Benjamin to the west; Dan and Aser to the north. Nephtali proved deficient; so did likewise the tribes of Ruben, Simeon, and Gad, who were stationed to the south of the tabernacle. When they were numbered the first and the second time, (Ex. 38:25, and Num. 1:46,) they amounted to 603,550, exclusively of the Levites. Now they could only count 601,730 men fit for war. Considering their frequent disasters, it is even a matter of surprise that their ranks were not thinned still more, particularly as we are assured that all who had been numbered before, except Josue and Caleb, the Levites, and such as had kept themselves free from murmuring, had perished, v. 64. H. —In the particular accounts of the tribes, and in the names of persons, the Sept. frequently differ from the Hebrew. But the total amount agrees.

Ver. 4. Them. Heb. “commanded Moses and the children of Israel, who came forth out of the land of Egypt.” The same plan was now to be pursued as formerly.

Ver. 7. Thirty. They had lost therefore 2870 men. C. 1:21.

Ver. 9. Princes. Heb. “men of name in the congregation,” senators. Vatab. C. 16:2.

Ver. 10. Miracle. Heb. “they became a sign,” of reproach, and a memorial of God’s just judgments, who caused the earth to swallow up Core and his companions alive, by a most disgraceful kind of death, to which the faithless vestal virgins were condemned at Rome, being buried alive; while those who had offered incense were consumed by fire. Many of the ancients assert that Core was also burnt, meaning perhaps by the fire of hell; to which he descended. Josep. iv. 3.—Others have thought that the children of Core were swallowed up with their father. But this is not true, with respect to some of them at least, (H.) who by a miracle of divine grace and goodness, were preserved from joining in his sedition; (C.) while Core, his wife and servants, all concurred to shew them such a pernicious example. H.—Lyran. and the Rabbins tell us, that the children stopped to intreat their father to repent; and while the earth opened under them, God supported them in the air, and gave them the spirit of prophecy; so that they sung, (Ps. 45) God is our refuge, &c., or, according to others, the Ps. 41 which has their name in the title. But these accounts are to be received with caution. The Samaritan text, fuerunt in fugam, (C.) may be translated, “out of this world they fled away, (11) and the sons of Core did not perish.”

Ver. 12. Namuel. N has been substituted for i, in the name of Iamuel, as it is read elsewhere, and in the Syriac, both here and 1 Par. 4:24, where Ahod is by mistake written with r, instead of d. See also the Arab. Ken. H.

Ver. 14. Families. Ahod is not mentioned, as he, probably, died without children. See Gen. 46:10. M.—Hundred. Their numbers were the most reduced. See C. 25:9. H.

Ver. 18. Hundred. Sept. add, “4000.” This tribe had formerly 45,650. It had lost 5100.

Ver. 22. Hundred. Juda had increased 1900.

Ver. 25. Issachar had also 9900 more.

Ver. 27. Zabulon was more numerous by 3100; so that this division had an additional strength of 13,100, while the former was diminished by 45,070 men. H.

Ver. 29. Machir: 1 Par. 7:20, we find Ezriel also mentioned. See C. 31:39.

Ver. 30. Jezer, who is called Abihezer. Jos. 17:2 and Paral.

Ver. 34. Hundred. Manasses had increased his numbers by 20,500, while

Ver. 37. Ephraim had lost 8000. H.

Ver. 38. Bela was the father of two families, v. 40. The other five children of Benjamin probably left no issue. Gen. 46:21. D.

Ver. 41. Benjamin had 10,200 added to his former number. Hence this division of the army, though hurt by Ephraim, (v. 37,) had an increase of 22,700.

Ver. 43. Suhamites. Their father is called Huthim in Genesis, and also by the Sept. This branch of Dan was more numerous than formerly by 1700 soldiers.

Ver. 47. Aser had an addition of 11,900; and, both together, 13,600. But they were let down by

Ver. 50. Nephtali, who had lost 8000; so that this division had only 5600 more. H.

Ver. 54. A less. God introduced among his people that equality, which was so much desired by Lycurgus, Solon, &c. The fertility of the land assigned to Benjamin, compensated for the smallness of its quantity.

Ver. 55. Lot. Josue appointed commissioners, who measured the land, and divided it according to its fertility; and the portions assigned to each of the tribes by lot, corresponded with the predications of Jacob and of Moses; God so regulating the lots by his allwise Providence, in order that the people might be more convinced of the truth of the prophecies, and that no undue favour was shewn to any one by Josue, Eleazar, or by the other men in authority. He took the whole upon himself, that none might complain of their rulers. C.—Masius supposes that the different divisions of the land were written down, and placed in an urn, and that the heads of the tribes drew according to their birth. Jos. 15:1.—The heads of families, such as Henoch, &c., (v. 5) probably also drew lots, to know what part of territory allotted to the tribe, should fall to their share; (H.) and they parcelled out their land among their children. M.

Ver. 58. Core. Three other families are mentioned. Ex. 6:17, &c. They were not going out to war. D.

Ver. 59. Levi. Sept. “who bore these (Lobni, &c.) to Levi, in Egypt; and she bore to Amram, Aaron,” &c. as if Jochabed had been wife both of Levi and of Amram, which is very improbable. It is more likely that the wives of these two bore the same name. The Heb. may agree very well with the Vulg. See Ex. 2:1. C.—It was afterwards forbidden for a person to marry his aunt. Lev. 18. W.

Ver. 64. Sinai, if we except the Levites. M. See C. 14:23.—Origen (hom. 21.) makes a very good remark on this subject. This circumcised, but rebellious people, conducted by Moses into the desert, clearly points out the Hebrews, who come to the frontiers of the promised land, but are not suffered to cross the Jordan. The uncircumcised are introduced into the land flowing with milk and honey, not by Moses, but by Josue, the figure of our Saviour, who opens heaven to true believers. “The first people is rejected, which had received circumcision, and the second is introduced, which is gathered from the Gentiles; and it is the people which obtains its father’s inheritance ... If Moses give any inheritance, it is not within the Jordan ... it is a land fit for cattle ... he does not distribute it by lot ... nor can he know the merits of each. This is done by Jesus only, to whom his Father has given all judgment.” H.

Ver. 1. Salphaad, a descendant of Joseph, had departed this life in the desert, being one of those who sinned, by murmuring, at Cades-barne. See C. 14 and 15:32. C.—He only left these five daughters behind him; and, as many others might be under the same predicament, their case deserved the attention of the legislator, who referred it to God. H.

Ver. 3. Father, the portion which would have been assigned him; that so those whom we may marry, may take the inheritance, under the name of Salphaad, which some of the children may also bear. M.

Ver. 4–6. Their. The first of these pronouns is written larger than usual, the second is improperly masculine in Heb.; both, it is pretended, to honour the young women. Kennicott.

Ver. 9. Him. The Jews observe, that if the father of the deceased were still alive, he would take the inheritance. Seld. Success. xii. and xiii. But if his wife were inclined to marry again, she might insist on his next relation taking her, before she could be required to give up his goods. Deut. 25:5. Hence the Gemarra of Babylon says, “If we are the daughters of Salphaad, let them give us his estate; but if we are not his daughters, let them make the brother of Salphaad marry our mother.”

Ver. 11. Uncles. His nephews are at a greater distance from the original stock. The Phœnicians carried the same regulations into Africa. Grot. Jur. ii. 7. The relations by the mother’s side, could claim no part. The husband was heir to all his wife’s goods, except her dowry, which went to her children. People born of a slave, or of a harlot or strange woman, were not lawful heirs. “These regulations have been adopted by all civilized nations.” Orig. hom. 22. C.

Ver. 13. People, in limbo. M.—He was not buried in the grave of his ancestors, but on some part of Mount Abarim, called Nebo. Deut. 34:1. 6. H.—Moses, hoping that this sentence of exclusion from the promised land might be only a threat, had earnestly besought God to let him enter. But being forbidden to speak of the matter any more, he understood that it was as irrevocable as an oath. Deut. 3:26. 4:21. He turned, therefore, his whole solicitude to obtain of God some one, who might enjoy the honour and happiness of conducting the people, and putting them in possession of God’s promises. He regards not flesh and blood on this occasion, (Philo, de caritate. Salien,) but sets a noble pattern for all ecclesiastical superiors to imitate. D.

Ver. 16. Flesh, who gives life, and penetrates the secrets of hearts. C.

Ver. 17. Shepherd. Christ makes use of the same comparison. Jo. 10:1. Kings are often styled shepherds in Homer. Moses begs that his successor may be enabled to conduct the multitude in both peace and war.—To go in and out, means to govern, (3 K. 3:7,) and includes all the occurrences of life. Act. 1:21. Ps. 120:8. C.—Thus, temporal princes are the shepherds of the people. But they are not, on that account, supreme in spiritual causes. For here Josue only receives part of the glory of Moses, while Eleazar is appointed to consult the Lord for him, and to direct him in all matters of importance, v. 20. 21. W.

Ver. 18. Spirit of God, which was given to him, when he was appointed a judge; (C. 11:17,) the spirit of prophesy, (Onkelos,) and of wisdom, (Deut. 34:9,) of which he received a fresh increase, by the imposition of the hands of Moses. By the like ceremony people are confirmed, and ministers of religion are still ordained. Act. 6:6. 1 Tim. 4:14. C.—God endues Josue with all the necessary qualifications for his high office. He makes choice of him, and not of any of the relations of Moses, that the people might not be offended at the supreme power being in a manner engrossed by one family; and he appoints one 93 year old, that the success of war might not be attributed to Josue, though he had been long at the head of the armies, and a man of greatest authority, even the vice-gerent of Moses. He declares his election before all the multitude, with the high priest at their head, that there might be no dispute about the matter; and, on this account, he requires various external ceremonies to be observed. Salien.

Ver. 20. Precepts, to accept of this office, (C.) and to discharge it with integrity. H.—Glory, not that which shone on the face of Moses, as Onkelos would have it, but all the marks of distinction due to a chief magistrate, (C.) the insignia of his office. See Ex. 18:21. Salien.—Treat him with respect, as your successor. M.—Let him henceforward commence to exercise his authority before you, that all the people may hear and obey him. Sararius. T.

Ver. 21. For him. Hebrew adds, “according to the judgment of Urim.” See Ex. 28:30. Nothing better shews the theocracy of the Hebrews, as Josephus styles it, (c. Apion. ii.) than this order for the chief magistrate in civil affairs, to consult and be guided by God’s minister, and by the sentence which he should pronounce in his name. Till the reign of David, at least, we find few wars undertaken, without consulting God: (C.) and the Rabbins assert, that the kings could not declare any war of their own accord, without the consent of the high priest and Sanhedrim. Seld. Syned. iii. 12. Saul lost his crown and life for not complying with the injunctions of God, which were communicated to him by the prophet Samuel. H.

Ver. 23. Commanded. This Moses executed on his birth-day, when he was 120 years old, (Deut. 31:2. 7,) having frequently before given proper instructions to Josue. Deut. 1:38 and 32:44. H.

NUMBERS 28

Ver. 2. Seasons. These precepts had often been repeated already: but perhaps they had not been exactly observed in the desert, so that Moses indicates them once more, as if to remind the people that they will now have no excuse, if they neglect these sacrifices in the promised land. C.—These frequent repetitions may also remind us, with what attention we ought to worship God. D.

Ver. 3. Lambs. Kids would not suffice. See Ex. 29:38. The lambs must not be above a year old. But it is not clear whether they could be offered eight days after their birth, as on other occasions. Ex. 23:19. C.

Ver. 6. Sinai. Hence it seems to have been discontinued for 38 years. C. Lev. 9:17. M.

Ver. 7. In the. Heb. “in the holy thou shalt cause the shecar to be poured out unto the Lord, a drink-offering.” See C. 4:8, on the meaning of shecar. H.—Some believe, that artificial wine of palm-trees, &c., might serve for libations. In this sacrifice, the priests furnished the liquor; so that all was to be poured out on the altar of holocausts, which stood in the court. C.

Ver. 10. Which, &c. Heb. “the burnt-offering of every sabbath, besides the perpetual holocaust and its libations,” which were due for every day. H.—On the sabbath, two more were to be offered of the same age. Jansenius observes, that three belonged to the morning service, and one to that of the evening. M. C.

Ver. 11. Month. This is not reckoned among the festivals. Lev. 23. The Rabbins look upon it as a day of devotion, particularly for women. Buxtorf. Syn. xvii. Spencer (Rit. iii. 1,) maintains, that the Hebrews began their month when the moon first appeared, and that they imitated the pagans in keeping that day holy. But his proofs on both heads are very unsatisfactory. The Hebrews followed the solar year for many ages after Moses, though they might have adopted the lunar towards the close of the republic; and the pagans themselves ridiculed those as vile imitators of the Jews, who kept the new moons as a festival. Hor. Sat. i. 9. Sabbata Vin tu Curtis Judæis oppedere.—The Greeks, Romans, Egyptians, Arabs, and Turks, have given in to various superstitious practices in honour of the moon. See Macrob. Sat. i. 15, &c. C.—The devil is commonly the ape of God, and teaches his votaries to adopt the ceremonies of the true religion, either to delude them more easily, or to bring those practices into discredit. Thus Middleton has endeavoured to shew the conformity of Pagan and Papal Rome, as if the ceremonies of the Catholic religion were to be rejected because some of them have been in use among the heathens. By the same argument he may ridicule the revelation of God himself, on this subject, and represent vestments, holy water, &c. as superstitious. He may pull down altars, condemn all forms of prayer, abolish all worship, both of soul and body. For such things have all been prostituted to idols! But those who are not totally infatuated by prejudice, will deplore the abuse of these things, and will not refrain from adoring the true God according to his will, with all the faculties both of their soul and body, on account of the devil and his false prophets having extorted similar acts of worship from their followers. It is no wonder that Protestants should ridicule our holy ceremonies, since they scruple not to assign so base an origin to those which God expressly prescribed. H.—The sacrifices which were ordered to be offered up on the first day of the month, were probably designed to renew the memory of the world's creation, or rather of the Divine providence, which regulates the seasons. Nothing was sold on this day. Amos 8:5. But people went to hear the prophets, (4 K. 4:23,) and feasted among themselves, 1 K. 20:18. It is thought that many rested also from servile work, though this is nowhere commanded. C.—Tirin agrees with Tostat and Sanctius, in supposing that servile work was prohibited, for which he refers to 1 K. 20:19. He also asserts that the Jews observed the lunar system, and that their months consisted of 29 and 30 days alternately, as 29 days and a half elapse from one moon to another. The sound of trumpets probably announced this solemnity. C. 10:10. Lev. 23.

Ver. 13. Tenth. An assaron, gomer, or chomer, which is the tenth part of an epha, as that is the tenth of a core or chomer, which is the largest Hebrew dry measure, containing 32 pecks and one pint English; so that the gomer would be equivalent to five pints. H.—This quantity of flour accompanied each holocaust at the beginning of every month. C.

Ver. 15. Above. This is the import of the Heb. &c.: for no libations accompanied the sin-offerings, nor incense. See C. 15:3. Lev. 5:12. M.

Ver. 16. Phase, or Passover, the most solemn of all the festivals, when the lamb was to be eaten on the 15th of Nisan, and during the eight days no leavened bread was allowed. The Jews searched all the corners of their houses, lest some might be concealed by mice, and they would not so much as name it. S. Paul exhorts us to do the like, in a spiritual sense, by purifying ourselves from every defilement of sin when we receive the blessed sacrament, and by not even mentioning sins of impurity. 1 Cor. 5:7. Ephes. 5:3. H.

Ver. 23. Offer, as well as that in the evening, which was in less danger of being forgotten.

Ver. 24. Fire. Heb. “food of the sacrifice made by fire.”—Rise. Heb. “it shall be offered besides the perpetual holocaust, and its libations,” morning and evening. All the aforesaid sacrifices and libations were to be repeated on each of the seven days, v. 19. 22.

Ver. 26. The day of Pentecost, seven weeks after the Passover, was the next in solemnity, to thank God for the wheat harvest, of which the first-fruits were now presented. H.—Two loaves, made with leaven, were given to the priests. Lamy. See Lev. 23:17.

Ver. 27. Two calves. Only one is specified in Leviticus, being that designed for the morning; another was immolated at night. C.—The same victims are prescribed as v. 19. M.

Ver. 1. The first. This day was doubly solemn, as being the first day of the month, consequently entitled to all the sacrifices enjoined for it; and also a holiday, for which other victims are requisite, besides the perpetual holocausts, v. 2. 6. C. 28:11. H.

Ver. 7. Tenth. The feast of expiation, on which see Lev. 16:29. 23:27, where we have also explained what relates to the feast of tabernacles, v. 34.

Ver. 12. Seven days, not refraining indeed all that time from servile work, but remaining under tents, and daily performing what is required, v. 13. &c.

Ver. 35. Eighth day, which was more solemn than the preceding ones, but less so than the first. The victims are every day diminished. C.—This day, in the Hebrew calendar, is called the feast of retention, (atsroth) as they staid near the tabernacle. D.

Ver. 39. Vows. The general regulations did not hinder any private ones from being fulfilled. C.—Sacrifice. Mincha, or offering of flour, &c. H.

Ver. 3. Oath, to do something commendable, shall observe his promise, whether any body has heard him or not. The Rabbins pretend, that if the vow be not expressed in words, it is not obligatory. But this is only true before men, who cannot subject their fellow creatures to punishment for internal faults. H.—The obligation of a vow or oath is founded upon common honesty, which requires that we should comply with our lawful promises; and, though all properly belong to God, yet, as he does not strictly require us to do every good work which may be in our power, we may, by vow, testify our desire to please and honour him the more. Some of the Rabbins have very loose sentiments with respect to vows, which they look upon as no better than building an altar, or immolating a victim upon the high places. It is sufficient, they say, to observe the law, apud Fagium. C.—Luther was desirous of introducing the same loose morality among Christians. But we need not ask, what the Rabbins said, or Luther, &c. But what does God and his Church assert? The Scripture repeatedly commends prudent vows; and those who can persuade themselves that they can infringe such solemn promises without offence, will be little solicitous about keeping their word to a fellow creature, unless when interest, or fear of shame, force them to do it. H.—He who makes a vow to abstain from any thing lawful, would be guilty of sin if he should observe it afterwards. S. Aug. q. 56. W.

Ver. 4. Girl in age, not 12; or, if more, at least not married, nor out of her father's house, v. 17. For either of these conditions rendered a girl incapable of binding herself irrevocably. The father, or all who had the care of her, might rescind her vow, provided they did it as soon as it came to their knowledge, or on the same day, v. 15. Boys under 13, were under similar restrictions. Grotius.—Wives, and, in general, all who are under subjection, could not dispose of themselves without the consent of their superiors, as their want of prudence, &c. might have otherwise injured what belonged, in some measure, to another. H.—The law, therefore, submits their case to the decision of their immediate judges. C.—But if the thing, which a person vowed, was already of strict obligation, as to fast on the day of expiation, (Lev. 23:29,) no one could presume to hinder his wife from complying with this double duty. W.

Ver. 7. Husband, whether she live with him, or with her father; whether she be only espoused, or the marriage be consummated. Women often staid for some time at their father's house after they were married; and, in this case, some people say that either her father or her husband might disannul her vow. But others allow this right only to her husband. Bonfrere. See v. 11. C.

Ver. 14. It. The Rabbins restrain this law to fasting and abstinence. But the Hebrew seems more general, (v. 13,) "every vow, and every binding oath to afflict the soul, her husband may ratify or annul." The vows of abstinence are most common, and generally more disagreeable to husbands. C.—S. Augustine (q. 59,) thinks it unreasonable that the husband should have a control over the vows of continency in his wife, any more than she could have over him, in this particular, as their rights are equal: he seems inclined to allow him to annul the vows of abstinence only. Indeed this seems to be the meaning of afflicting the soul, which is done by submitting to various restraints, required on days of fasting. See Lev. 23:27. H.—In things which could nowise hurt the parent or husband, many believe, that the person who had made a vow, was bound to perform it secretly, even though the superior had declared his dissent. But with respect to fasting, pilgrimages, &c. which could not be performed without his knowledge, it does not seem that they were under any farther obligation, even though the superior should retract what he had connived at for a whole day. In doubtful cases inferiors must not refuse to obey. The sin lies at the door of him who exercises his authority in an improper manner. Lyran. T. v. 16.

Ver. 15. Day. Heb. "from day to day." If he has not given his decision on the first day when the vow came to his knowledge, unless he asked for a delay, as some allow, the person was bound to perform what she had promised. C.—Immediately. Heb. "in the day," which seems to restrict the power of annulling the vow to a single day, v. 4. It would be unreasonable for the person to be kept long in suspense; and the law of God requires that we should not defer to perform our vows. Eccles. 5:3. 4. H.

Ver. 16. That. Sept. "the day." If he retract his consent, he shall incur all the guilt. S. Aug. q. 59. The woman need not be under any disquietude, as the fault is not in her. C.—If a person had made a rash vow, he might obtain a dispensation from the tribunal of three judges, or from a doctor of the law, who would enjoin him to offer the sacrifice for ignorance, to punish his levity. See Seld. Jur. vii. 2. Those who break their vow are to be scourged among the Jews, which shews that they do not, in general, approve the sentiments of those Rabbins whom Fagius, a Protestant, alleges, v. 3. They make a distinction between vows and promises confirmed by an oath, v. 11. The former change the nature of a thing, according to them; so that, if a person should vow not to wear the phylacteries ordained by Moses, he must comply, though not if he had only promised on oath to refrain. But this distinction is absurd. No vow or oath can bind any person to transgress the law of God. H.

Ver. 2. Madianites. The five princes, (v. 8) had joined Sehon, in his attack upon the Hebrews. Jos. 13:21. They had united with the Moabites against them, and had been most active in perverting the people of God. They had even the wicked Balaam still among them, who was bent upon destruction; so that God saw the measure of their crimes was full, their provocations unsufferable, and he was pleased to let Moses be witness of their just punishment. This he would effect with a very small force, v. 5. H.—This war of religion was terminated about a month before the death of Moses.

Ver. 6. Trumpets. These are the holy vessels just specified, though some believe that he carried the ark, which was done in some wars. Jos. 6:1. 1 K. 4:5. Priests always sounded the trumpet. Deut. 20:2. Phinees was appointed general of this expedition to reward him for his zeal against the fornicators. C.—Or Josue headed the army, as he did on other occasions, though his name be not here specified. The tribe of Levi was not obliged to go to battle, and therefore only twelve tribes send each 1000. Josue had been elected general by God, so that it was not necessary to mention his name. Salien.

Ver. 8. Recem; by which name Petra, the capital of Arabia Petrea, is known. This petty king probably took his title from this city, over which he presided. C.—All the five had been, perhaps, tributary to Sehon. Jos. 13:21. H.—Sur, the wretched parent of Cozbi. C. 25:15. C.—Balaam. Some think he was a native of Madian, though he had resided in Mesopotamia. He had either stopped in this country, or hearing of the calamities of the Hebrews, had returned to receive the reward of his pernicious counsel. Thus he was overtaken by God's just judgment, and he fell into the pit which his avarice had dug for him. C. 24:25. H.—Probably he was busy with his incantations; for this sort of men is generally cowardly. He had no sword. C. 22:29. Salien.

Ver. 9. Possessions. Lit. “all that they could, they plundered.” It seems they did not advance very far into the country; or many saved themselves by flight; for we find the Madianites soon powerful enough to enslave the Hebrews. Judg. 6:1.

Ver. 10. Castles. Heb. tiroth, means also, “palaces, or shepherds’ huts.” C.

Ver. 13. Camp. They had sent news of their victory, and of the plunder which they were bringing to the camp, (H.) to be divided equally among their fellow soldiers, when they were met by Moses, &c. who came to congratulate with them, and to examine how they executed their commission, as well as to admonish them to be purified before they entered the camp, v. 19. C.

Ver. 15. Women. They had received no positive orders respecting them, and it was customary to spare their lives. But these dissolute women had rendered themselves unworthy of such indulgence, (C.) and the sight of them raised the just indignation of Moses, who was afraid lest their manners should corrupt the victors. H.

Ver. 16. The sin of Phogor. The sin committed in the worship of Beelphegor. Ch.—Many of the prostitutes had returned home, being terrified at the slaughter of their queen, Cozbi. H.

Ver. 17. Of children. Women and children, ordinarily speaking, were not to be killed in war. Deut. 20:14. But the great lord of life and death was pleased to order it otherwise in the present case, in detestation of the wickedness of this people, who by the counsel of Balaam, had sent their women amongst the Israelites on purpose to draw them from God. Ch.—Only those who were under twelve would be thus reserved; and as their tender minds might yet receive the impressions of virtue, by a proper education, they might, one day, be married by some of the Hebrews. The boys were all slain, either because they might be inclined to resent the injury done to their relations, or because they were all consecrated to Beelphegor; the first-born to be his priests, the rest to be victims, if necessary, to avert any evil. For “the heathens in cold blood,” says Paine, “offered their children in sacrifice to Baalpeor.” It was on this account, that the killing of all the first-born in Egypt, was felt so terribly, as the people could not lawfully approach their gods. Forbes.—Moses did not reserve the girls for the purpose of debauchery, as Paine ignorantly pretends; for that was contrary to his own laws, nor did he wantonly kill the innocent, which he also strictly forbade, and which he would have been still more afraid to do, if he had been an impostor. But he preserved the lives of those girls who might be presumed innocent, and who might live to do good, while he took the revenge of the Lord (v. 3,) upon the rest. H.

Ver. 19. Shall be. Heb. “purify yourselves and your captives on the,” &c. The girls, and all the booty, might probably be rendered unclean by the presence of a corpse, &c. C. 19:14.

Ver. 23. Expiation, with which even the vessels which had been through the fire, were to be purified, or washed, as the Heb. Sept. &c. observe. C.—Moses perhaps gave this ordinance by word of mouth, on this occasion, (M.) though something similar be prescribed before. Lev. 6:28. 11:33. 15:12.

Ver. 27. Equally. Those who had been in battle, had about a 50th part more than the rest. They gave the first-fruits to the priests, while those in the camp presented theirs to the Levites. Other rules were afterwards observed. See 1 K. 30:24. 2 Mac. 8:28. The Rabbins assign the greatest share to the king, (Seld. Jur. vi. 16,) and Homer gives the largest portion to the general; after which the rest was equally divided, and even the absent partook. The gods were not forgotten. So also among the Hebrews, Syrians, &c. the general make an equal division. David assigns a part of the booty for sacred uses, 1 Par. 26:26. See Ex. 15:9. C.

Ver. 32. Spoil. Heb. “the remains of the spoil,” which had not been consumed by the 12,000. C.

Ver. 41. Fruits. Heb. “a heave-offering to,” &c. v. 29.

Ver. 49. Wanting. Sept. “all were unanimous,” (Origen,) and “all answered to their names.” Thus God was pleased to shew, that his Providence had directed the battle. H.

Ver. 50. Garters. Sept. “bracelets,” put on the arm, 2 K. 1:10. Sometimes the Eastern nations wore large precious rings on their legs.—Tablets. Heb. tsamid, an ornament of the hand. Gen. 24:22. The armillæ, or viriliæ, were worn by men near the shoulder.—Bracelets, (dextralia) for the right hand. Eccli. 21:14. Heb. hagil, means an earring, Ezec. 16:12.—Chains of gold and silver interlaced, worn round the neck. S. Jerom, ep. ad Marcel. The Madianites went to battle in their richest attire, (Judg. 6:21,) as did also the Persians; (Bellon. 2,) and the Turks do so still, (C.) being descended from Ismael, the half brother of Madian, who both settled in Arabia. H.

Ver. 50. His own. Gold, and such ornaments as might easily be concealed by the soldiers, where not required to be brought to the common stock to be equally divided. C.—There were 840,000 head of living creatures, including the 32,000 virgins, which were distributed. The gold, which was voluntarily presented to the Lord, amounted to above five talents. Salien. B.C. 1470.—The princes made a voluntary offering of their gold, but the common soldiers retained what each man had gotten. D.

NUMBERS 32

Ver. 3. Saban, and Nebo. These towns were afterwards retaken by the Moabites. Isai. 15:2. 8.—Beon. Perhaps the same with Mehon, or Beth Baal Mehon. Jos. 13:17. C.

Ver. 5. Jordan. They are a figure of those who would possess heaven without labour. But none is crowned, except he strive lawfully. 2 Tim. 2:5. W.

Ver. 7. Overturn. Heb. nua, “to discourage,” (H.) break, dissolve, &c. v. 9. M.—The same history is mentioned, (Deut. 3:12. 18,) but without these reproaches. C.

Ver. 11. If, &c. They shall not see Chanaan. M.—In Scripture, odious things are not fully expressed, particularly in oaths. Ps. 88:36 and 131:2. C.—Heb. “surely none ... shall see ... because they have not perfectly followed me.” Grot. H.

Ver. 12. Cenezite. His father was either called Cenez, or a part of the country of the Cenezites, being promised to Caleb at Cades-barne, he assumed his title. Jos. 14:6.

Ver. 13. Led, &c. Sept. “he rolled them over,” to denote their afflictions. H.

Ver. 15. Of all. Heb. “if, or because you will not follow after him. He will stop them in the desert, and you will destroy all the people.” Sept. “because you will turn away from him, to abandon him again in the desert, and you will sin against all this congregation.” God had decreed that all should go together to the conquest of the promised land; so that, if these children of Ruben and of Gad should refuse to comply, Moses was afraid that all might be ruined. Perceiving that his discourse turned on this subject, they approached with greater confidence, and shewed their readiness to fight for their brethren. Upon which Moses was satisfied. H.

Ver. 17. Cities, which in the space of two months they would repair sufficiently, so that their children might be protected against the Amorrites, &c. They left strong garrisons, very prudently, to keep possession of the conquered country: 70,580 remained in the cities; while 40,000 went before their brethren. See C. 26:7. 18 and Jos. 4:13.

Ver. 19. Jordan. Heb. adds, “or forward,” any where, in case fresh conquests be made. C.

Ver. 20. Lord, or the ark, under the guidance and protection of God.

Ver. 21. Man, that may be required: Josue only took 40,000 for the vanguard. H.

Ver. 25. Ruben. No mention is made of those of the half tribe of Manasses. Perhaps they only joined the rest afterwards. C. 5:31. They occupied the northern parts. H.—The Heb. has here a solecism, “the sons of Gad he said;” to avoid which, Onkelos adds, the tribe, &c. Houbig.

Ver. 26. Galaad. Only a small part of the territory properly went by that name, v. 39. C.

Ver. 30. With you. Sept. “armed for war before the Lord; take by force their baggage, wives and cattle, before you, into Chanaan, and let them have shares with you in Chanaan.” H.

Ver. 34. Built, or repaired; for they had been cities of the Amorrites before.—Aroer was occupied by the Moabites after the Israelites were led into captivity. Jerem. 48:1. 19.

Ver. 35. Sophan. Some believe that this is the same city with Etroth, and that it took its name from Saphon, the son of Gad. C. 26:15.—Jegbaa perhaps the Beon, v. 3. See Judg. 8:11.

Ver. 36. Betharan, which Herod enlarged, and called Livias, south of Hesebon. C.

Ver. 38. Nabo. Probably the same as Nebo and Nobe.—Baalmeon. This city had a variety of names, v. 3. 35. Those who rebuilt these cities gave them their own names, v. 42. Heb. Targum of Jerus. Yet they were often known by their former appellations. C.—The rebuilders chiefly objected to the names of idols, Baal, &c. which were joined with these cities. M.

Ver. 40. In it, by means of his descendants. For Machir must have been above 250 years old, if he were still alive. Many children are attributed to Machir and his father, Manasses, who were not their immediate offspring. The latter had only Machir, who survived him; Ezriel was probably a grandson of Machir, as he is styled the son of Galaad. C. 26:31. Jos. 17:2. See 1 Par. 7. Adoptive and legal children are often confounded with those who are really born of a person, as also those places which are inhabited by his posterity. C.

Ver. 41. Jair was born of Segub, the son of Esron, by a daughter of Machir, 1 Par. 1:21. He did not remain in the tribe of Juda, but dwelt in that of his mother, (C.) or perhaps he married a descendant of Machir, and obtained these villages. Seld. Suc. c. xviii.—Havoth, means “a circle of cabins or shepherds’ huts,” in Arabic. Bochart.

Ver. 42. Canath. This town is reckoned among those of Jair, (1 Par. 2:23,) either because Nobe conquered it under his banners, or because it fell to the share of Jair, after the death of Nobe. C.

Ver. 1. The mansions. These mansions, or journeys of the children of Israel from Egypt to the land of promise, were figures, according to the Fathers, of the steps and degrees by which Christians, leaving sin, are to advance from virtue to virtue, till they come to the heavenly mansions, after this life, to see and enjoy God. Ch.—Conduct. Lit. “hand.” Aaron died before they came to the last of these 42 stations, or encampments. H.—The observance of the law, and the true worship of God, can alone insure us eternal happiness, and enable us to sing Holy, &c. S. Jer. ep. ad Fab. W.

Ver. 2. Which. Heb. “and Moses wrote down their departure and their marches, by the commandment of the Lord; and these are their journeys, according to their going out.” These are the places of any note in that wide and dreary desert, near which the Israelites passed. All the encampments are not intended to be specified. The people marched on slowly, and sought for pasturage, with all diligence. The names of these more remarkable places, have been so differently pronounced, that many of them have been greatly confounded; (C.) and interpreters vary so much in their situation, that nothing can be decided with certainty. H.

Ver. 3. Ramesses, a city of great note, about 60 miles from the Red Sea. Ex. 1:11. C.

Ver. 4. Gods. Their idols were thrown down. S. Jer. ep. 127. See Ex. 12:12. M.

Ver. 6. Soccoth, the second station. H.—Etham. Sept. “Butham,” the Butum of Herodotus, (ii. 75,) situated in a plain.

Ver. 7. Beelsephon; perhaps the city of Clysmā, or Colzan, where the Hebrews crossed the sea.

Ver. 8. Etham, or Sur. Ex. 15:22.—Mara, 60 miles to the south of the Red Sea. C.

Ver. 9. Elim. “The wood of palm-trees, five days’ journey from Jericho.” Strabo. See Ex. 15.

Ver. 10. Red Sea. This encampment is not specified before. C.—It was the seventh in order. H.

Ver. 11. Sin. Farther from the promised land than that of Tsin, (C. 20:1,) or Cades-barne.

Ver. 12. Daphca. Sept. and Eusebius read, Raphca; (C.) D and R, in Hebrew, are easily confounded. H.—This encampment is passed over in Exodus, as well as the following at Alus.

Ver. 14. Raphidim and Sinai. See Ex. 17 and 19:1.

Ver. 16. Lust. After three days’ journey, passing by the station of burning. C. 10:33. 11:3.

Ver. 17. Haseroth, near Cades-barne, the same as Aserim, (“the unwall’d towns” of the Heveans, extending as far as Gaza,) or Asor, called afterwards Esron, on the south of Chanaan. Jos. 11:10. Moses does not specify here the memorable encampment at Cades-barne, where the Israelites arrived, after 11 days’ march from Horeb. Deut. 1:2. 19. It was not far from Asor, on the frontiers of Idumea, (C.) in the desert of Pharan. C. 13:1.

Ver. 19. Rethma. The situation of this and the following station, cannot be fixed.

Ver. 21. Lebna. A strong place besieged by Sennacherib, (4 K. 19:8,) between Cades and Gaza. Jos. 10:29. The Hebrews encamped a long while about Mount Seir. Deut. 2:1.

Ver. 22. Ressa was in the same neighbourhood. S. Hiranion converted its inhabitants.

Ver. 24. Arada. Herad, Adar, or Barad, are probably the same place, on the southern limits of Chanaan, four miles from Maceloth, the Malatis of Eusebius.

Ver. 30. Hesmona, or Asemona, a city of the tribe of Juda, towards Egypt. C. 34:4.

Ver. 32. Gadgad. These three stations are placed in a different order, Deut. 10:6. But some word has been transposed, as Aaron died on Mount Hor, when the Hebrews encamped at Mosera, or Moseroth, a second time. C.

Ver. 34. Jetebatha. It may be rendered also “Hills of concupiscence,” famous for torrents of water. Deut. 10:7.

Ver. 35. Asiongaber. Some place this station on the Mediterranean, where Strabo fixes the city of Gassion Gaber, the Beto Gabria of Ptolemy. But the Scripture informs us it lay on the Red Sea. 3 K. 9:16. Cellarius thinks most probably upon the Elanitic gulph, to the east of that of Suez, or Heroopolis, where Josephus maintains Asiongaber or Bernice stood. The Hebrews came to this station from that of Elat. Deut. 2:8. C.

Ver. 36. Sin, or Tsin. Cades is another name of the same desert. Near the city of Cades-barne, the Hebrews encamped a long while, and had plenty of water; but here they murmured for want of it, and Mary departed this life. C. 20. C.

Ver. 37. Hor, at a place called Mosera. Deut. 10:6. This was the road from Arabia to Chanaan, and the Hebrews attempted to enter by it, but were repulsed by the king of Arad, though they afterwards defeated him at Horma. C. 21:3.

Ver. 41. Salmona, where it is thought by some that God sent the fiery serpents. C. 21:6. The Israelites being refused a passage by the Idumeans and Moabites, God orders them to measure back their steps towards Asiongaber, and to go round their territories. C.

Ver. 45. Dibongad, is often called Dibon. Moses observes, (C. 21) that the Hebrews passed by or encamped at various places, before they came to this town. It is sometimes attributed to Ruben, and at other times to Gad, being on the confines of both tribes. C.

Ver. 49. Moabites. Here they were deluded by wicked women. C. 25. H.—From these 42 stations, the Fathers take occasion to shew, how we must advance in a spiritual life. D.

Ver. 52. Pillars. Heb. stones placed on high “to be seen.” Sept. “towers of the sentinels.” Chal. “temples, where they adore their idols.”

Ver. 53. Land of its old inhabitants, and of the places dedicated to superstitious purposes. H.—Heb. “occupy the land.” Sept. “drive out the inhabitants, and dwell there.”

Ver. 55. Nails. Sept. “goads,” &c. by which they will force you in a manner to gratify your curiosity, by an imitation of their idol worship; and thus will prove to you more dangerous, than if you had nails piercing your eyes. See Jos. 23:13. Ezec. 28:24. These abandoned nations must not be spared through a false pity. Deut. 20:16. C.—The Israelites, however, proved negligent, and God made use of the remains of these nations to scourge his people, and to train them for war. D.

Ver. 3. The most salt sea. The lake of Sodom, otherwise called the Dead Sea. Ch.—Limits. These are very properly defined in this place, that the Hebrews may know what nations they ought to destroy. M.—A line may be drawn from the southern point of the Dead Sea, through Adar, as far as the Nile and the Mediterranean Sea, comprising a part of the desert of Sin, or Zin.

Ver. 4. The Scorpion. A mountain so called, from having a great number of scorpions. Ch.—Heb. Hakrabbim. There was a city of the same name, the capital of Acrabathene, (1 Mac. 3:3,) not far from Petra.—Senna, a town of the desert of Zin, (C.) or a mountain specified Judg. 1:36. S. Jerom.—Adar. Heb. “Hasor Adar.” But they seem to be two distinct towns. Jos. 15:3.—Asemona. See C. 33:30.

Ver. 5. Egypt. Many suppose the rivulet of Rinocorura is meant. M.—But it seems more probable that the Nile, the only river of Egypt, or the eastern branch of it, where Pelusium stands, is designated. There is no proof that the former rivulet belonged to Egypt; and though some assert that the Hebrews never dwelt to the west of it, the territory was so barren, that nothing may be said respecting that affair. We find, however, that under Solomon they inhabited as far as the river of Egypt; (1 Par. 13:5. 3 K. 8:65,) and if they had not, God’s promise entitled them to that part of the country; as well as to that which extends to the great river Euphrates, though they perhaps never took possession of it. See Gen. 15:18. Jos. 13:3. Pelusium is commonly reckoned the frontier town of Egypt. Ezech. 30:15. Stabo xvi. In another place, the promised land extends from Emath to the torrent of Egypt, (3 K. 8:55,) or of the desert, Amos 6 ult. C.

Ver. 6. Great sea, compared with those of Palestine, which were only like pools or lakes. The Hebrews call every great collection of water, a sea. The Mediterranean bounded the promised land entirely, on the west.

Ver. 7. The most high mountain. Libanus. Ch.—Heb. “the mountain of the mountain, or of Hor.” Some understand Mount Casius, Hermon, Taurus, or Amanus; which last lies on the confines of Cilicia, and hence the Rabbins draw a line by the straits of Gibraltar to Pelusium, so as to comprise all the islands and the waters of the Mediterranean. Selden. Marc. Claus. i. 6. But Grotius denies that the sea can be claimed by any one, nor was it, even for fishing, says he, before the days of Justinian. Jur. ii. 2, 3. C.—At any rate, Moses here seems to mean the northern limits from the point of the Mediterranean, where Libanus is situated, across the country eastward to Emath, and as far as the village of Enan, v. 9. H.

Ver. 8. Emath. It is of great importance to fix the situation of this city. Some take it to be Antioch, the capital of Syria, on the Orontes. But that was a modern city, founded by Nicanor, and called after his father, Antiochus, and embellished by Callinicus and Epiphanes. Strabo xvi.—Others believe it is Epiphania, at the foot of Libanus, on the same river, and a distinct city from Emath Rabba, or “the great,” of Amos 6:2. Josephus i. 7. (C.) and S. Jerom (in Isai. 10.) seem to be of this opinion. M.—But the city in question was most probably Emesa, of which Amos speaks above. It was also upon the river Orontes, at a small distance to the east of Libanus, on the road to Damascus. This road was the northern boundary. Emesa was perhaps formerly the capital of the country of Soba, (2 Par. 8:3,) and was taken by Solomon. Reblatha, or Rebla, (v. 11,) was a part of its territory. Theod. in Jer. xxxix. 5. C.

Ver. 9. Enan. Heb. “Hazer Henan.” In Ezechiel, (47:17,) it is called the court of Enon. It may be Gaana, north of Damascus, or rather Inna, placed to the south of that city by Ptolemy.

Ver. 11. Sephama, or Apamea. Targum.—Rebla. Sept. “Bela, or Asbela.” H.—S. Jerom understands Antioch, near which was the fountain of Daphnis, or Daphne, a word which is inserted in the Targum, though it be not found in Hebrew. But Antioch did not lie on the eastern borders, and this fountain may be the same place as Enan, v. 9.—Against. Heb. “on the east side of Ain, or the fountain.” C.—Cenereth. This is the sea of Galilee, illustrated by the miracles of our Lord. Ch.—The line was not drawn to this lake of Genesareth, or of Tiberias, as it was likewise called, but comprised a large territory lying to the east of it, (C.) and given to the tribes of Manasses, Gad, and Ruben, which inhabited the country east of the Jordan and of the Salt Sea. H.—Eastward: the Sept. insinuate, “to the south, leaving the sea of Cenereth on the east.”—The fountain of Daphnis may probably be that near the Semechonite lake, through which the Jordan runs. Josep. Bel. iv. 1. It may have received the title of Daphnis, from the laurels with which it is adorned, like the suburbs of Antioch. Bonfrere. M.—It appears that Moses has only in view, the nine tribes for which a provision was not yet made; and their eastern limits extend from Emath, down the Jordan to the Dead Sea, so as to comprise no part to the east of that river, which was already given to their brethren; (see v. 13, 15, 29,) and thus the observation of Calmet, respecting the countries east of Cenereth, will be rather inaccurate, as the line must run through that sea, following the course of the Jordan. These were properly the eastern limits of Chanaan, which country comprised all between Egypt and Idumea, as far as Sidon and Mount Libanus, being bounded by the Jordan on the east. The other three tribes were hemmed in on the north and east by the mountains of Hermon, Basan, Galaad, and Arnon; beyond which, the nations about Damascus, and the descendants of Ammon, Ismael, and Moab dwelt, in Syria and the desert of Arabia, so that the latter country was the eastern boundary of the promised land, taken in its utmost extent. H.—The respective limits must naturally vary, when we speak of the whole or a part only. D. T.

Ver. 3. Cities, in all forty-eight, with a thousand paces round them. This land belonged to the community: but some built upon it, Jos. 21:18. 1 Par. 6:60. The burial place for the Levites lay behind it. Drusius.—In these cities alone, the Levites had houses and gardens of their own; other might live with them, and indeed the cities acknowledged other lords, as Hebron belonged to Caleb, Jos. 14:14. The Levites were dispersed throughout the land, that they might instruct the people both by word and by example. Deut. 33:10. They had a clear revenue without labour of husbandry, equivalent to any two of the other tribes. Abulensis.—Six of their cities were assigned for places of refuge, as they were the proper judges of the cases, in which murder may be excused, and to remind them that they ought to be very merciful. Hence arose the privileges, granted to some churches, of protecting those who fled to them for an asylum. That none might be hindered from enjoying this benefit, three of these cities were situated on each side of the Jordan, and at equal distances. Salien.

Ver. 4. Paces. This is equivalent to 2000 cubits, (v. 5,) or a sabbath day's journey. Selden, Jur. iii. 9. S. Jerom. q. 9. ad algas. Heb. retains the same word, amma, "cubit," in both verses: but some copies of the Sept. Philo, and Josephus, have "2000 cubits," (C.) which Dr. Wall and Kennicott deem to be the original reading. H.—Bonfrere would also correct the Hebrew by the Vulgate as a pace among the Greeks consisted of three feet, and a cubit of half that quantity. The geometric pace of the Romans contained five feet, and the sacred cubit of Villalpand half as much; so that 2000 sacred cubits make 1000 geometric paces. Thus the Vulgate is perfectly consistent with itself. M.—Some imagine that Moses speaks of the common cubit here and of the sacred one, which was doubly as large, v 5. But this is not probable; and the distinction of cubits, (C.) at least in his days, (H.) is very uncertain. Perhaps Moses may first specify the depth of this space of ground from the wall, and afterwards its length, which would be doubly greater. C. See Sevius on Jos. xxi. q. 8, &c.—The semidiameter was probably 1000 cubits. D.

Ver. 5. Sea. Heb. simply, "on the west side 2000 cubits, and on the north side 2000 cubits, and the city in the midst. This shall be to them the suburbs of the city."

Ver. 6. Cities. Maimonides pretends, that all forty-eight cities of the Levites were asylums; though only six were bound to receive the fugitive gratis. Moses had promised a place of refuge, which he now grants. Ex. 21:13. The altar and temple enjoyed the like privilege: the latter even till its destruction. Philo.—Josephus mentions only six cities of refuge. Those who could not be supposed to have killed a person designedly were not obliged to flee to them; as, on the other hand, the murderer was not permitted to enter, if his malice were notorious, or his negligence extreme. Rabbins ep. Seld. Jur. iv. 2. To be secured at the altar of holocausts, it was necessary to touch the grate. If the judges declared that the person's case was such as the law admitted, he was conducted away, under a strong guard, to one of the cities; or, if he were deemed unworthy, he was put to death, out of the holy place. The altar was commonly the refuge only of priests. Those who were not of Hebrew extraction, could not claim the rights of an asylum, according to the Rabbins. But the contrary seems to be asserted, v. 15. The roads to the cities of refuge were to be kept in good repair, and in case more than six should be found necessary, three others might be appointed. Deut. 19:3. 8. This privilege is founded on the law of nature, which decrees that the life of the innocent man, who has had the misfortune to kill another, should not be taken away. Other nations extended this right to almost every crime, that the weak might have an opportunity of defending themselves. The sons of Hercules erected for this purpose the altar of mercy, at Athens. Some of the pagan temples could protect even the greatest criminals, as well as the innocent, who might fear oppression. Those of Apollo, at Delphos, of Bacchus, at Ephesus, &c. were very famous. See Marsham, Chron. sæc. 13. Tiberius found it necessary to recall these privileges among the Greeks, as they were greatly abused. Tacit. An. iii. 6. But his decree was not much regarded. The Romans had their asylums also, at Naples, &c. where those who had been condemned to die, might be secure. Rome itself was an asylum for all strangers, as S. Aug. remarks, de C. D. i. The Christian emperors afforded the like privileges to our churches. But some who were guilty of the crimes of adultery, murder, heresy, &c. were deprived of the benefit. C.—Those who fled to the altar among the Jews were first to be purified; (Philo) and if they had committed murder publicly, like Joab, they were dragged away, 3 K. 2. T.

Ver. 12. Kinsman, the nearest relation, who was called the revenger of blood, (v. 25. 27, H.) or the redeemer, because it was his duty to see that justice was done to the deceased. When the person, who had involuntarily committed murder, arrived at the city, he was to make his appearance before the judges of it, and, if they thought his account satisfactory, they admitted him, but upon condition that he should take his trial before the judges and the people of that country where the murder had taken place, (v. 25. Jos. 20:4. 9, T.) though some think that the judges of the city of refuge, passed sentence. Masius, &c.—If it proved favourable, he was bound to remain in the city till the death of the high priest, otherwise the relations might kill him as an outlaw; as they might also if he was declared guilty. In case the murder were voluntary, the judges of the place where it was committed set to demand the criminal. Deut. 19:11.

Ver. 18. If, &c. Heb. “or he smite him with a wooden weapon, (wherewith he may die,) and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death.” The two former verses are expressed in the same awful manner, intimating that the weapon must be of such a nature that it might easily give a mortal wound, and also that the effect really followed. In these cases, if the person could not clear himself, no refuge or reprieve was allowed. H.—But the deceased must have been killed upon the spot, otherwise the person who struck him could only be required to pay a fine. Ex. 21:19. M.

Ver. 19. Him, with impunity. If the judges have passed sentence, he shall be obliged to put it in execution, v. 21. 31. S. Aug. q. 65. E.—The laws of Athens required also that a relation should put the murderer to death, though the deceased were even of servile condition. Demost.—Those of Rome condemned the involuntary manslayer to retire for a year, and afterwards to appease some one of the relations, and to offer the sacrifices, and submit to the usual purifications. Even at the present day, the Persians and Arabs deliver the murderer to be slain by the kinsmen of the deceased, after sentence has been passed by the judges.

Ver. 21. Kill him. It seems, when the case was evident, he was not only permitted, but commanded to punish the criminal. Bonfrere. Deut. 19:12. M.

Ver. 25. Delivered. Heb. “the multitude shall deliver the slayer.” It seems the judges pronounced sentence, according to the votes of the people assembled; (C.) or the plurality of voices among the 21 judges decided the matter. Grot. H.—High priest. This mystically signified that our deliverance was to be effected by the death of Christ, the high priest and the anointed of God. Ch.—He rescued us from the hand of the revenger, the devil. Theod. q. 50. 51.—Before his death, the way of our true country was not open, nor secure. S. Greg. hom 6. in Ezech. W.—By this law, Moses shewed a horror for murder, and the respect due to the person of the high priest, during whose life even the involuntary murderer was obliged to keep himself retired in a city of refuge. Masius.—At the death of the pontiff, all Israel put on mourning, so that private injuries were to be forgotten, when the public had such cause for sorrow; and in the mean time the vengeance of kinsmen would relent. Maimon. More. iii. 40.—Murder was punished by the Greeks, in the days of Homer, with banishment, though sometimes this was remitted by the relations, for a sum of money. Iliad ix. C.

Ver. 27. Him. Custom explained this law, as giving leave to any person to inflict the punishment upon the wandering murderer, though the relation seem only to be specified. Grot.—Some think, that to kill such a person was still criminal in the sight of God. But others believe that, as he had forfeited the privilege of an asylum, by absenting himself from it, (C.) the law subjected him to the same rigour with which he might have been treated before he came thither; (v. 19. H.) and provided proper moderation were observed, and malicious revenge avoided, no guilt would attach to him who executed the implied sentence of death. The Jews observe, that God allows us to revenge another sooner than ourselves, as there is less danger of excess or of delusion. C.

Ver. 30. Man. A person might be tried on such evidence. Deut. 19:15.

Ver. 32. Cities. Heb. “you shall take no money to retire to a city of refuge, to return into his own country, till the death of the priest.” The Sept. supply, “you shall take no redemption money, to permit (a voluntary murderer) to flee into a city of refuge, (nor of an involuntary one,) to return,” &c. Grotius.—The banished, may refer to people of the former description, who had gone away to screen themselves from persecution. But they could never be allowed to inhabit the country any more. Their presence would seem to defile it. H.—“You shall not take money of him who has fled to a city of refuge, to suffer him to return home.” Chaldee.

Ver. 33. Defile not. To inspire a greater horror for murder the earth was represented as defiled by blood, and only to be purified by the death of the criminal. Without shedding of blood, there is no remission. Heb. 9:22. H.—On the same principle, our churches, &c. are deemed profane when murder, or some great indecencies, have been committed in them, so that they require a fresh consecration. C.

Ver. 1. Galaad. The descendants of Machir, who were settled in Galaad, were particularly interested, in knowing how their female relations of the house of Salphaad, were to dispose of their fortunes, which God had allowed them. They knew that, by the law, their husbands would obtain possession; and if those husbands should be of another tribe, part of the land allotted to Manasses might be lost. See C. 27 and Jos. 17:1. 3.

Ver. 4. That is, an explanation of the jubilee, added by S. Jerom, who gives the sense of the Heb. though not the very words.—Lots. Heb. “when the jubilee of the children of Israel is come, then shall their inheritance be added to that of the tribe in which they are received; so shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of our fathers.” H.

Ver. 6. Tribe. Heb. adds family also: for heiresses were obliged to marry in their own family, to prevent the confusion of the inheritances. If they had a mind to renounce their right, they were at liberty to marry where they pleased. C.—The nearest relations, who chose to receive their land, were under an obligation of marrying them. Ruth 4:6. H.—A similar law prevailed at Athens.

Ver. 7. Wives. Heb. “shall keep to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.” Those who marry heiresses must be of the same family: but others may take wives from any of the tribes of Israel, as the most holy did without scruple. S. Jerom in Jer. xxxii. T. E.—The Rabbins extend this law to all, with the Vulgate: but only during the time that the land of Chanaan remained undivided. Seld. Succ. c. 18.

Ver. 8. Women. Heb. “every daughter that possesseth an inheritance ... shall be wife to one of the family of the tribe of her father.” Commonly the females were debarred from inheriting land, when they had any brothers. The Levites were not concerned in these regulations, as they had no inheritance; and hence, we need not be surprised to find that S. Elizabeth, of the daughters of Aaron, (Luc. 1:26,) was related to the blessed Virgin, who was of the family of David. The mother of S. Elizabeth might be of the tribe of Juda; or a maternal ancestor of the blessed Virgin might spring from the tribe of Levi. C.—Tradition determined the lawfulness of such marriages, and in this case, S. Augustine (Consens. Ev. ii. 23) admires the providence of God, in causing his beloved Son, the great anointed, to be born both of the regal and priestly tribes, in which an unction was required, before the priests and kings were put in possession of their respective offices. Thus Christ was both priest and king, and such were anointed in the law of Moses. W.

Ver. 11. Father. They married their cousin-germans. The original is rather undecisive, as Dod may signify, “an uncle, great uncle, or cousin;” and a son, in Scripture, is often put for any descendant. The marriages of cousins were not expressly forbidden by the law, and if they had, they might have been dispensed with on this occasion, as well as when a brother died without issue. C.—Claudius was the first of the Romans who obtained leave of the senate to marry his brother’s daughter. Sueton. D.

THE BOOK OF DEUTERONOMY

INTRODUCTION

This Book is called Deuteronomy, which signifies a second law, because it repeats and inculcates the ordinances formerly given on Mount Sinai, with other precepts not expressed before. The Hebrews, from the first words in the Book, call it Elle Haddebarim. Ch.—It may be divided into many discourses, which Moses made to the people during the last two months of his life. H.—The first was delivered by him on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year, since the deliverance of the Hebrews out of Egypt, and relates various particulars which had occurred to them. In C. 4:41, and seq., and a supplement from the Book of Numbers is given to this discourse. C. 5, a fresh exhortation to the people commences, which continues till C. 22, where the famous blessings and maledictions, from the mountains of Garizim and Hebal, are related. In the following chapters, Moses exhorts the people, in the most pathetic manner, to be faithful to the Lord, adding the strongest threats and promises to enforce their compliance; and having appointed Josue to succeed him, and repeated that beautiful canticle which God ordered them to write, (C. 31:19,) he gives the Book of Deuteronomy, to be kept with care, (5:9,) blesses the tribes like a good and tender father, and gives up his soul to God on Mount Nebo in the 120th year of his age. C.—There can be no doubt but that Moses was the author of this book, as well as of the four preceding ones; though the last chapter may, perhaps, form a part of the Book of Josue, which formerly was written immediately after the works of Moses, without any such marks of distinction as we find at present. The whole Bible seemed to make but one verse. How easily, therefore, might the account of the death of Moses be taken in, as forming a part of the Pentateuch, when the different books came to be distinguished by separate titles! Such an insertion cannot hurt the general claim of Moses to be the author of the Pentateuch; or, if it should be thought to do so, no absolute proof can be brought to shew that he did not write this chapter also, by the spirit of prophecy. All the people spoke to Esdras, the scribe, to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded, to Israel. The whole nation of the Jews has all along maintained, that Moses wrote these books: and he himself repeatedly asserts that he was ordered to leave on record many things of importance. Hence both internal and external evidence concur to establish his title to them; and if we be not disposed to cavil with all other authors, and to deny that Demosthenes, for example, Cæsar, and others, have written the works which bear their names, we must confess that the Pentateuch is to be attributed to the Jewish legislator. Yet if this were a matter of doubt, the things contained in these books could not, on that account, be controverted. How many anonymous works have been published which are of unquestionable authority! Many of the books of Scripture are of this nature. But as we have every reason to believe, that they have come down to us without any material corruption, and were written by people of veracity, by divine inspiration, they deserve to be regarded as authentic records. This is true, whether we speak of the originals or of the versions authorized by the Church; though it should suffice to stop the mouths of infidels, if we can procure an authentic history of the Bible by the collation of the different copies which are extant. Thus, where the Hebrew editions appear to be incorrect, they may receive great light from the Samaritan copy of the Pentateuch, and from the versions of the Sept., and of other respectable authors on the whole Bible. The variations, which we may discover, are not of such moment, but that, if the very worst copy were selected, we should find the same great outlines of Scripture history, the same precepts of faith and morality. The laws of Moses, which are scattered through his five books, may be seen all together in their natural order, collected by Cornelius a Lapide and Calmet. But the spirit of God was pleased to intersperse historical facts among them, which both shew the occasion on which they were given, and enable us to read them with greater pleasure and satisfaction. The four preceding books might be compared to the four Gospels; Deuteronomy represents the whole, (V. Bede) and may be styled a Diatessaron, as it recalls to our mind the great Creator of all things, who was about to fulfil the promises which he had made to the Patriarchs. Almost all those to whom Moses addresses himself, had been unborn or very young, when their parents received God's commands at Sinai, and wandered in the desert. He therefore gives them an account of what had happened during the last eventful period of forty years. He shews what had brought on so many disasters, and cautions his hearers, that if they imitate the perfidy of their fathers, as he foresees, with sorrow, that they will, (C. 31) they must expect to be treated with no less severity. This prediction we behold verified, at the present day, in the persons of the scattered remnants of Israel. How sublime! how terrifying are the truths which Moses enforces with so much earnestness! The same threats which he denounces against the perfidious Jews, regard us in some measure. If we feel not their effects at present, in being driven out from our country, we have more reason to fear lest we should be excluded from our heavenly inheritance, if we do not repent. H.

Ver. 1. Beyond. The eastern side of the Jordan is so called in Scripture, with reference to the promised land. M.—Heb. may mean also, “on this side, or at the passage” about Bethabara, “the house of passage,” near which the Hebrews were encamped, and where Josue probably crossed over the Jordan, as it was the usual ford. Calmet seems to think that these two first verses have been inverted by Esdras, &c. or interpolated, as he says Moses never crossed the Jordan, and certainly addressed the Hebrews near that river, at a great distance from the Red Sea: but the text does not assert the contrary. It only determines that the place where he harangued them, was a part of the wilderness, or the plains of Moab, over-against the Red Sea, which they had left when they came from Asiongaber, unless the term Suph, which signifies red, may be a proper name of the station Supha, near the torrent Zared, (Num. 21:14,) as Calmet maintains. If this be admitted, this difficulty vanishes, for the camp of Israel was certainly over-against, and not even remote from this place. The other cities may have been in the environs, or Moses may have referred to the stations and places in the desert of Pharan, at Tophel, Laban, or Lebna, Haseroth, (Num. 33:17,) where there is very much gold, (Sept. “gold mines;” Heb. “dizahab,”) and Cades-barne. Lebna, Haseroth, and Cades-barne, were in the territory of the Idumeans, who dwelt to the south-west of the plains of Moab. Tophel and Dizahab are unknown (C.) as well as Laban, Haseroth, and Pharan, if they be not the names of encampments. Geographers vary so much in their descriptions of the road, which the Hebrews followed, and in maps of the adjacent countries, that it is now impossible to decide. H.

Ver. 2. Cades-barne. All the distance between Horeb and the Jordan, by Mount Seir, on the road to Cades-barne, might have been traveled in eleven days’ time, being about 300 miles; or the Hebrews were so long in going thither. Num. 33:17. C.—It was to punish the Israelites for their frequent rebellions, that they were condemned to wander in that wilderness for forty years. D.—They might have entered the promised land when they first came to Cades-barne, from Mount Horeb, (Num. 13:1. 27,) which, even by the circuitous road of Mount Seir, would not have taken them above eleven days. He mentions this to remind them of their folly. Perhaps all the aforesaid places may have been between Horeb and Cades-barne, as Bonfrere maintains that Laban was in the neighbourhood of Sinai, where Moses first received the law which he is now going to explain. His discourse turns upon the chief occurrences of the forty years’ journey; and hence, these are the words, (v. 1,) may refer not only to what he was going to say, but also to the commands which he had already notified to the Israelites, from the passage of the Red Sea till the station Abelsetim, upon the banks of the Jordan. Num. 36:13. H.—Deuteronomy contains a recapitulation of the law, and therefore it was to be read aloud to all the people on the feast of tabernacles, every seventh year; and the new kings, or rulers of the Hebrews, were commanded to transcribe it, and every day read some part for the rule of their conduct. C. 17:18 and 31:10. T.

Ver. 3. Month, corresponding with our January, if the ecclesiastical calculation be followed; but if we date from Tisri, this eleventh month will be our July or August. Moses died on the 7th of the following month. D.

Ver. 4. Astaroth signifies “sheep,” particularly ewes, with their dugs distended with milk. Hence the Sidonians formed the idea of their Astarte, 1 K. 11:5. H.—The Rabbins say, that Astaroth denotes large mountains, generally covered with sheep. Astaroth-Carnaim was the city. Euseb.—Here the famous Og resided, though he was defeated at Edrai, as the Heb. intimates. C.

Ver. 5. Expound. He begins, as usual, with commemorating the wonders of God, in favour of an ungrateful people. This book may be considered as a supplement to the other four books. C.—We need not wonder, therefore, if we find some new observations. The reason why the sabbath is to be kept, is here said to be in memory of the law being given to the Hebrews, and their liberation from slavery; (C. 5:15,) whereas in Exodus, it seems to be designed to remind people that God rested on the seventh day. But here is no contradiction. Watson.

Ver. 7. Turn you. The Hebrews, after the passage of the Red Sea, seemed to turn their backs upon the promised land, to go southward. Now, therefore, they are ordered to bend their course to the north, and to enter Chanaan, (H.) on the western side of the lake of Sodom, where the Amorrhites dwelt. C.—Their mountain, and the other hills, and plains, and vales, (Heb. sephela, mentioned 1 Mac. 12:38,) as far as the Nile and Mediterranean, were the southern limits of the Chanaanites, whose country extended to Libanus. See Num. 34. H.—God promises also to deliver the country as far as the Euphrates to the Hebrews, provided they continue faithful to him. C. 19:8. As they neglected this condition, they never possessed the whole country, not even that of Chanaan, unmolested. Yet the whole was tributary to them in the days of David and Solomon. S. Aug. q. 21. in Jos. Masius. T.

Ver. 9. I said, following the advice of Jethro. Exod. 18:18.

Ver. 15. Who, &c. Heb. “and shoterim (officers like our serjeants, designed to publish and execute the sentence of the judges) over or among your tribes.” The Persians still call such officers chaters. The Rabbins say, that the shoterim were generally selected from among the Cinites, the descendants of Jethro, 1 Par. 2:55. But we find that the Levites were also chosen, 2 Par. 19:11. They seem to have had sometimes the authority of judges, princes, or doctors for the instruction of the people, as the Vulgate here expresses it. C.

Ver. 17. Respect. Heb. “fear.” M.—Those who judge ought to be quite impartial, and never suffer their sentence to be dictated either by love or by fear. H. Eccli. 7:6.—Of God, to whom you must give an account of your conduct. Wisd. 6:4. Speak therefore in his name, and imitate his justice and other perfections. See Ps. 81:1. C.—If any one absolve an oppressor because he is rich, that judge is guilty of partiality. D. Isai. 1:23.—Hear it, as the supreme judge. M.—The people selected such as might be most proper, out of whom Moses made his choice. Salien.—An appeal might be made to himself. Abulensis, q. 11.

Ver. 23. Pleased me. Even Moses was deceived by the appearance of prudence: and God permitted the people to follow the directions of their cowardice, 5:26. 32. C. 9:29. Num. 13:1. C.

Ver. 26. Being. Heb. “but rebelled against, irritated, or rendered useless,” &c. C.

Ver. 27. Hateth us. Such an opinion, can bring nothing but destruction. D.

Ver. 30. For you. Sept. “he will defeat them along with you.” For man must do something. S. Aug. q. 1.

Ver. 37. Neither, &c. Heb. simply, “The Lord was also angry with me on your account,” &c. Moses had been so long witness to the rebellions of the Hebrews, that at last he gave way to a certain diffidence, when he was ordered by God to give them water out of the rock. He was afraid the Lord would not bear any longer with their repeated acts of ingratitude, nor work a miracle on this occasion. C. 3:26. Num. 20:12. H.—He had also consented to the sending of the 12 spies imprudently. D. v. 23.

Ver. 39. Evil. These words were spoken to by God to the Hebrews, after they had refused to go from Cades-barne, to take immediate possession of the land of Chanaan, and not after Moses had offended at the waters of contradiction, which happened only a short time before his death. H.—Those who were not come to the use of reason at the former period, (M.) or who had not arrived at 20 years of age, were now permitted to enter. H.

Ver. 40. Sea. This they deferred complying with for a long time, (v. 46,) and then they directed their course along Mount Seir, towards the west, and encamped at Hesmona. C.—Many years after, they arrived at a different branch of the Red Sea from that which they had crossed. Num. 33:30, 35. H.

Ver. 41. Armed. Sept. “in crowds.” Arab. “quickly.” Syr. “encouraging one another.” Chaldee, “impiously.” C.—The conduct of these people might seem to authorize all these interpretations. The Hebrew term occurs no where else. H.

Ver. 44. Bees do. This similitude shews the vivacity, courage, and numbers of those who pursued the Hebrews from Seir to Horma. See Num. 21:3. Ps. 107:12. Isai. 7:18.

Ver. 46. Time. Heb. adds, “according to the days that you abode.” All the time that the Hebrews spent in that neighbourhood they remained at Cades-barne. The Rabbins say 38 years; but Moses informs us, that they were so long in coming thence to the torrent of Zared. C. 2:14. C.

Ver. 1. Sea, encamping again at Mosera. When they were at Asiongaber, they were ordered to go to the north, by the mountains of Idumea or of Seir. Being arrived at Cades, they attempted to penetrate into Chanaan, by the road of the spies, but were repulsed. Upon which they asked leave of the Idumeans to pass through their country, lying south of the Dead Sea, but could not obtain permission, and God would not suffer them to force a passage, but ordered them to go round their territories. Num. 20 and 21. C.

Ver. 5. Stir. Heb. gur, meddle not, wage not war, do not molest, &c. The Idumeans near Mount Hor, afterwards refused the Hebrews a passage, and the necessaries of life, though their brethren in Mount Seir had granted them the latter, while they passed quietly along their borders, 5:28. See Num. 20:21. H.

Ver. 6. Meats, if they wanted any other sort, besides manna. M.

Ver. 7. Knoweth, or approveth, directing by his loving providence, Ps.

Ver. 9. Moabites. They allowed the Hebrews to pass, as the Idumeans had done; (v. 29,) but they treated them with no particular marks of affection, (C. 23:3,) nor would they suffer them to go across their country. Judg. 11:17.—Ar is sometimes called Rabbah Moab, “the great city of the Moabites,” (Jo. 13:25,) and Areopolis. Euseb.

Ver. 10. Emim signifies “the terrible,” or “men of cubits or length.” See Num. 13:33. They had been probably ruined in the war of Chodorlahomor, (Gen. 14:5,) a little before the birth of Moab. C.—But those few who remained, were sufficient to strike the beholders with terror, as they were not inferior to the other giants who were known, since the deluge, of the race of Enac, or of Rapha. H.

Ver. 11. Giants. Heb. Raphaim, which Grotius thinks is a word retained from the primitive language. It sometimes denotes giants, and those who groan in hell, on account of the great iniquity of the Raphaim. Job. 26:5. Og was one of their descendants, and inhabited the same country, which they had occupied in the days of Abraham. C. 3:2. C.—They lost much of their power in the war of Sodom. Some of them fled into the land of the Philistines, and established themselves there, 1 K. 21:15. As these gigantic nations had been overthrown, as well as the Horrites, when God formerly gave their territories to Moab and to Esau, (H.) so the Hebrews may be assured, that nothing will be able to resist their power, while He is with them. M.

Ver. 12. Gave him, on the east side of the Jordan. They had not yet taken possession of Chanaan. But Moses foresees that they shortly will; and in this sense we may translate, “Esau dwelt there, as Israel will in the land,” &c. v. 29. The neighbouring nations could not rationally object to their coming, as they themselves had dispossessed the former owners of the land, 5:20. 23. C.

Ver. 14. Years. They had continued another year at Sinai, and some months at least at Cades-barne; so that the few remaining months of the 40 years’ sojournment, were spent in conquering the kingdoms east of the Jordan. H.

Ver. 20. Zomzommim, means “wicked wretches,” famous for their stature, &c. M.—They are probably the same nation as the Zuzim. Gen. 14:5.

Ver. 21. Enacims. See on this race of giants what has been said, Num. 13:23. They made place for the Zomzommim, as the latter did for the Ammonites. H.

Ver. 22. Horrhites, so called because they dwelt in caverns. S. Jerom.

Ver. 23. Haserim, the same as Haseroth. Num. 33:17.—Gaza belonged to the Philistines. The intermediate country, or the south part of Chanaan, occupied by the Hevites, was seized by invaders from the isle of Cyprus, (Heb. Caphtorum. C. Gen. 10:14,) or from Egypt, which the Nile intersects, forming many islands, in the Delta. Jer. 47:4. The Cappadocians, who dwelt in Asia Minor, on the Euxine sea, were a different nation, and sprung from Japhet. T.

Ver. 24. Arise. God did not forbid Moses to ask for leave to pass through the land quietly, as the latter did; (5:26) but he gives him to understand that his demand will be rejected with disdain, and he is at liberty to attack this insolent king, and thus to commence his conquests.

Ver. 25. Heaven. All who hear of thy exploits, will have cause to fear. H.

Ver. 26. Cademoth, “to the east,” of the Arnon. There was a city of the same name on the other side of the banks, which belonged to Sehon, and was given afterwards to the Levites, 1 Par. 6:79. C.

Ver. 29. As, &c. These nations had only permitted them to pass along their borders, and furnished them, through fear, (5:4,) with the necessities of life. Sehon will not even grant so much.

Ver. 30. Hardened, &c. That is, in punishment of his past sins, he left him to his own stubborn and perverse disposition, which drew him to his ruin. See the note on Exod. 7:3. Ch.—God did not soften his heart, (M.) nor make him see the danger to which he was exposing his dominions, by provoking such an army. H.

Ver. 34. Killing, according to God’s express command. C. 20:16. M.

Ver. 37. Jeboc, towards its source: for both sides of the torrent were taken by the Hebrews from the kings Sehon and Og, who had already driven the Ammonites farther into the mountains, on the east. H.—When these demanded the conquered country to be restored to them, Jephthe shewed that their claim was inadmissible. Jud. 1:13. C.—They had lost possession when the Hebrews came; and, as God had authorized the latter to take the land from those kings, without enquiring who were the former proprietors, the Ammonites, who had themselves expelled the Zomzommim, came with a very bad grace to assert their title, after a lapse of near 300 years. God only forbids the Hebrews to molest the actual dominions of the sons of Ammon, Moab, and Esau, in consideration of their fathers, to whom they were so nearly related. H.

Ver. 1. Turned. Instead of going forward across the Jordan, we directed our arms against Basan, in the north. See Num. 21:33.

Ver. 4. Country. Heb. “the line” with which lands were measured. C. 32:9.—Argob may signify rich and fertile; “all that fertile region, the kingdom of Og.” Vatable thinks that Basan, Argob, and Trachonitis, denote the same country. But Cellarius observes, that the last mentioned country was ill cultivated and very poor, the inhabitants living mostly in the caverns of rocks, whereas Argob or Basan was adorned with 60 cities.

Ver. 5. Walls. Tacitus remarks, that “a great part of Judea is covered with villages, though towns may likewise be found in the country. Hist. v. 8. See 3 K. 4:13. Sept. “besides the towns of Pherezites, which were very numerous.” C.—The spies had not travelled in this county, when they gave an account of the walled towns being as high as heaven. But Moses here informs us, that the cities on the east side of the Jordan were not much inferior to those on the west, and the land was infested also with giants, v. 13. H.

Ver. 6. Utterly. Yet out of the ruins they soon raised other strong cities. Num. 32:26. All the walls were not probably demolished, (v. 19,) but only a part, so that they might be repaired with no great labour or expense. The inhabitants were all destroyed, that they might not pervert the Hebrews by their bad example; and because God had pronounced the sentence of death upon them, in punishment of their crimes. Hebrew seem to insinuate, that the cities were destroyed only by the death of the inhabitants. “We subjected them to anathema ... utterly destroying the men,” &c. H.—We devoted to utter ruin the men, women, and children of the cities which we took. C.

Ver. 8. Beyond. East of the promised land of Chanaan, which the sacred writers have generally in view. H.—Heb. heber, means, “alongside, opposite to, at the passage, at this side,” &c. See C. 1:1. 3 K. 4:24. C.—There is no need, therefore, to suppose that this and similar passages have been inserted by a later writer. H.—Hermon, which profane authors commonly call Antilibanus, (C.) was a part of the range of the mountains of Galaad, by which name it goes frequently, though it be also denominated Seon, or Sion, (C. 4:48. M.) and the different nations had other names for it, v. 9. H.—It does not appear that Moses went much beyond the torrent of Jeboc. But he knew that the territory, as far as Hermon and Emath, belonged to the Hebrews, and he probably, sent some troops to take possession of it. They did not, however, entirely banish the Hevites, that dwelt from Baal-Hermon to the entering into Emath. These and some other nations were left by God to instruct Israel. Judg. 3:3.

Ver. 10. Plain. Hebrew Mishor, which the Sept. leave untranslated. It has perhaps the same meaning as Argob, 5:4. C.

Ver. 11. Giants. Heb. “Raphaim.” Og was the only survivor of this family in Basan, though there were other giants dispersed throughout the land. 1 Par. 20:6. T.—Some of the stock of Rapha were also seen afterwards at Geth, but they did not reign in the country of their fathers, as Og alone did at this time. Jos. 15:14. 17:15. Heb. may be, “Now Og, king of Basan, was a remnant of the Raphaim.” C.—Sept. “for, moreover, Og ... was left of the Raphaim.”—His bed was 13½ feet long, and 6½ feet broad, taking the cubit at least 18 inches, with Arbutnot; though Calmet allows 20½ French inches, which are greater than ours. As beds are commonly made larger than the person who lies in them, he concludes that Og might be 14 or 15 feet high, unless he was possessed with the same vanity as Alexander the Great, who caused beds five cubits long to be left in his camp, when he returned from his Indian expedition, in order that the people might think that his soldiers were of a gigantic stature. Allowances must here be made for a royal bed; and, at any rate, it will not easily be proved that a human body might not exceed 12 or 15 feet in height, without injuring the just proportions, as T. Paine would have us believe. We know that the difference in size between the inhabitants of Shetland and of Patagonia is still very great; and the people of the former island would act very irrationally, if they would not credit the existence of the Lincolnshire ox, or of the large dray horses in London, because their own oxen are not bigger than mastiffs. See Watson, p. 26.—Iron. Bedsteads are frequently made of iron, brass, silver, or gold, in hot countries, for the sake of cleanliness and grandeur. Prov. 25:11. Est. 1:6. The Parthian kings reserved to themselves the privilege of lying on golden beds. Josep. xx. 20. The Thebans made beds of iron and brass out of the spoils of Platea, and consecrated them to Juno. Thucid. iii.—Ammon. Heb. “Behold his bedstead was of iron; is it not in Rabbath?” &c. This town is called Rabbatamana, by Polybius; and Ammana, by Eusebius, who says it had afterwards the name of Astarte, till Ptolemy Philadelphus gave it the title of Philadelphia. It lay to the east of Jazer, not far from the Arnon. Cellar. iii. 14. It is probable that the bed of Og continued in this city till it was taken by David, 2 K. 22:30. How the Ammonites got possession of it we do not know. It seems that the account of it, and of Jair, (v. 15,) have been given by some one who lived a long time after these events had taken place. C.—This conjecture, however, is not well founded, for though Moses was addressing those who had been witnesses to these transactions not many months before, his appeal to them gives the strongest authority to a narration, which was to be handed down to the latest posterity. They could attest the surprising stature of that giant, whom they had slain, and their neighbours kept his bed as a proof of his having existed, the terror of all that country. Until this present day, (v. 14,) is an expression often used in Scripture to denote an event which had taken place at no very great distance of time. C. 11:4. Thus S. Matthew, (27:8,) writing about eight years after the ascension of our Saviour, says, the field was called Haceldama ... even to this day. See Jos. 8:29. H.—It is sufficient if the thing be still in the same state as it was before. M.—Hand. Heb. “according to the cubit of a man.” from the elbow to the finger ends. C.—Syr. “of giants.” Chal. “of the king;” whence some have imagined, that the bed was nine times as long as the cubit of Og, which is very improbable. H.—The Rabbins, who delight in fables, say that this bed was used by Og only while he was in his infancy: for he grew to be 120 cubits high; and some say his foot along was this length. He would have hurled a mountain to overwhelm all the Hebrews at once, only a bird, or some ants, made a hole in it, and the mountain falling upon his shoulders, he could not extricate his head, God causing his teeth to grow ten cubits, and in this condition he was taken and killed by Moses. Lyran, &c.—Noble discovery of these blind guides! C.—The poets have not been more extravagant in their descriptions of Typhæus, or Typho, whose name signifies burning, as well as that of Og, (or hog, he burnt) with whom he has probably been confounded. Vossius on Idolat. H.

Ver. 12. Galaad. Moses comprises under this name all the conquered country. C.

Ver. 14. Jair. Some have supposed that this was one of the judges of Israel, but without foundation. He was a son or descendant of Manasses. Num. 32:41. Jud. 10:4.—And Machati. These were the most southern towns of this half tribe. C.—Day. If Esdras added these words, he did it not against the law, but to explain it. W.

Ver. 15. Machir's posterity was settled in the same part of Galaad. M.

Ver. 16. Torrent. The other part belonged to the Moabites, (C.) on the south and east.—Ammon. See C. 2:37. The two tribes of Gad and Ruben occupied the territory lying between the Jeboc and the Arnon, hemmed in by the mountains of Galaad, on the east, and by the Jordan and the most salt sea, and that of Cenereth, on the west. Gad occupied the northern division of this country. H.

Ver. 17. Foot. Heb. and Sept. Ashdoth-pisga. Eusebius seems to have taken these for two different towns. The former was situated near Phasga. Jos. 12:3. This mount was the eastern boundary of Ruben. The plain here mentioned was that where Moses was speaking. C.

Ver. 20. Rest. Abulensis says, this took place only 14 years after. M.

Ver. 25. I will. Moses flattered himself that God's refusal to let him cross the Jordan, was only conditional; and therefore he begs, with all humility, for leave to enter Chanaan, at the head of the people. But, though God had pardoned his fault, he would not deprive Josue of the honour, which to fulfil the mystery, was reserved for him. Num.

20:12. 26:64. C.—Moses might very lawfully desire to behold a place, consecrated by the abode of the Patriarchs, and to be honoured still more by the presence of the Messias, a happiness for which he had been labouring now forty years. D.—And Libanus. Whether this and be an explanation of what mountain he meant, (T.) is a matter of doubt. He unquestionably desired to see, and to put his people in possession of, all the country designed for their inheritance, in which various fruitful mountains appeared. That of Bethel was very high, and most delightful where Abraham and Jacob had dwelt. Moria and Sion, the future seat of the temple, might also attract his notice, and the mountains of Judea, as well as all the other lofty hills, which diversify the country for Idumea to Libanus. H.—Egypt was a flat country. New and grander prospects now open to his view. Libanus is styled Antilibanus by the Septuagint, and by profane authors, as it lies, in effect, to the land of the Hebrews. Behind it Coelostria extends, as far as Libanus. This mountain comprises four different hills, rising one above another, and taking in a circuit of 300 miles. The first of these hills, Antilibanus, is remarkable for its fertility in corn; the second has abundance of fine springs: but the third resembles an earthly paradise, being constantly adorned with fruits and flowers. Cedars grow chiefly upon the fourth, amidst the snows which lie there perpetually, notwithstanding the burning heats of the adjacent countries. Lebanon signifies both “whiteness and incense,” for which it is very renowned. C.—De la Roque thinks that it is higher than the Alps or Pyrenees. It stands in the form of a horse-shoe, extending from above Smyrna to Sidon, and thence towards Damascus, (Buffon) unless this be a part of Antilibanus, which runs north, from Damascus, in a parallel direction to Libanus, and includes the hollow Syria. H.—Serarius makes these two mountains run eastward, almost from the Mediterranean sea, as Strabo (xvi.) and Ptolemy seem also to do. Bonfrere.

Ver. 26. Your account. Moses cannot help reminding the people that they were the occasion of his giving way to diffidence, and thus incurring a most sensible chastisement from the hands of God. Their conduct had provoked him so, that he gave some outward signs of the trouble with which his mind was so much disturbed. C. 20:12. Yet God admits of no excuse, particularly in the sins of those who act in his name, and who, of course, ought to guard against the smallest deviation from virtue. Be ye holy and perfect, is addressed to such in a particular manner. H.

Ver. 27. East. It seems, if Phasga was the eastern boundary of Ruben, (v. 17,) there was no occasion for Moses to cast his eyes that way. He is ordered to take a full view of the countries allotted by God to the Hebrews; and if we consider that the territory, as far as the Euphrates, was promised to them, if they would continue to be faithful, and that it was made tributary, under Solomon, we need not wonder if Moses should be pleased to behold it. C. 1:7. H.

Ver. 29. Phogor. Heb. Beth pehor, “the house, temple, or city of Phogor,” where that idol was the object of adoration. The city was probably at the foot of Mount Phasga, and fell to the share of Ruben. Jos. 13:20. C.—The Hebrews dwelt in the valley when Moses made the aforesaid supplication to God, and was ordered to desist; and, after taking a view of the promised land, to give the necessary instructions to his successor, v. 23. H.—Perhaps this might take place before the defeat of the two kings. C.

Ver. 1. And judgments, regarding religion and civil affairs. C.—Live a happy life. M.

Ver. 2. Add any thing repugnant to the spirit of my law. No interpretation of this kind can be admitted. But this does not condemn well authorized traditions, and laws enacted by lawful superiors. The Jews always boast of their close adherence to the letter of the law, but they often forget the spirit of it, and by their traditions render it deformed, like a carcass. Demosthenes takes notice, that the Locrians had such a regard for their laws, that if any one chose to propose any fresh ones, he came with a rope about his neck, that if they did not meet with the approbation of the people, he might be strangled immediately. C.—Moses cannot mean to forbid any more divine or civil commandments being written by Josue and the subsequent prophets. He only enjoins that nothing shall be altered by human authority. The other books of the Old Testament serve to explain the law; and so do the apostolical traditions (W.) afford great assistance to understand the true meaning of all the Scriptures, and hence we learn whatever we have to perform, without danger of being led astray. H.—To these the Scriptures frequently refer. He that heareth you, heareth me, Luke 10. Hold the traditions which you have learnt. 2 Thes. 2. The rest I will set in order, when I come. 1 Cor. 11:34. Hence S. Augustine (c. Cresc. i. 33,) observes, “Though no evident example can be produced from Scripture, yet we hold the truth of the same Scripture, when we do what meets with the approbation of that Church whose authority the Scripture establishes.” See ep. 80. S. Chrysostom in 1 Thess. iv. S. Iren. iii. 4. W.—The Jews themselves never had the folly to imagine with the modern innovators, that all laws both of a religious or civil nature were here proscribed. Under David, Mardocheus, and the Machabees, various laws and feasts were commanded, and observed in the true spirit of the law. 1 K. 30:25. Est. 9. 1 Mac. 4. God does not leave to the discretion of the Jews, the appointing of different victims, &c. in his worship, (C. 12:30,) as they might very easily give way to the superstitious observances of their neighbours, and these things that had been sufficiently determined. But he enjoins all to obey the declarations of the priests and judges. C. 17:10. Bellarm. T.—Thus when the Apocalypse records a prohibition similar to this, (C. 22:18, 19,) it is not intended to seal up the divine volume, so that nothing more shall be admitted into it, for S. John wrote his gospel afterwards. But it must be explained in the same sense as this passage, and condemns all those who, of their own authority, would set up fresh doctrine in opposition to the word of God. Let Protestants consider if they be not concerned in this caution, when they not only cut off whole books of Scripture, but deny the authority of the Church itself, without which the Scripture can be of little service. They are the book sealed with seven seals, impenetrable to man without the aid of the Divine author; (Apoc. 5:5;) and this aid he will never grant to those who obstinately refuse to hear the Church. Mat. 18:17. 2 Pet. 1:20.

Ver. 3. Among you, when the guilty Israelites and the Madianites were slain. Num. 25 and 31.

Ver. 4. Day. Not but that many of these had fallen into sin; but they had not abandoned the Lord to worship any idol. H.

Ver. 6. This is a proof of your wisdom, &c. if you observe these commands. Your conduct will excite the admiration of all. M.—Solomon often inculcates the same truths. Prov. 1:7. Eccli. 1:34. Even profane writers applauded the laws and fidelity of the Jews. See Jos. Bel. i. 5. Strabo xvi. C.

Ver. 7. Gods. Supposing they deserved that title, which of them has the power to shew their votaries such favours as the true God hath shewn to us? The idols are nothing but devils, which seek to destroy. C.—But God had manifested his power and love to the Hebrews in the most astonishing manner. He seemed to choose his residence among them, in the tabernacle. H.—This Jesus does in a still more wonderful manner, with respect to Christians, remaining with them in the sacrament of love. The other sacraments which he has instituted are more noble and efficacious than those of the old law. He was pleased to take our nature, (C.) and to dwell among us. Jo. 1. The providence of God pervades all things; and, though all live in Him, (Act. 17:28,) yet he shews the marks of the most paternal tenderness to his elect. H.

Ver. 8. Eyes. Most of these laws had been already promulgated, so that the people could set a just value upon them. But Moses undertakes to place the in a more beautiful point of view, as it were altogether, and accompanied with some fresh regulations. How imperfect are all the codes of the ancient lawgivers, when compared with this of Moses! H.

Ver. 9. Words. Heb. also, “things.” H.—Both sacred and profane authors use the term of seeing, to denote any of the senses, v. 12. Eschylus (in Prometh.) says, “you shall neither see the form nor the voice of mortals.”

Ver. 12. At all. Heb. “but saw no similitude, only a voice.” See Ex. 20:18.

Ver. 13. Stone. Josephus (Ant. iii. 4. 6,) says, that each table contained five precepts, two and a half being inscribed on one side. The Jews now suppose that four appeared on one table, and six on the other. But each table probably contained an entire copy of the law. C.—It hence appears, that there are just ten precepts. W.—But the manner of dividing them is rather uncertain. S. Aug. and Catholics in general place the three commandments, which regard God, by themselves. See Ex. 20:1. Their greater importance and length would require as much space as the other seven, which ascertain the mutual duties of people to each other. H.

Ver. 15. Carefully. Heb. “Be therefore particularly attentive, as much as you love your own soul." Vatab. By keeping my commandments you can alone obtain salvation, v. 9. M.—Similitude of any living creature, such as were the objects of adoration among the pagans. Some represented their gods under the forms of men, women, beasts, birds, or reptiles; while others adored the sun, moon, and stars. H.—This last was indeed the most ancient species of idolatry. Job 21:26. Baal, Astarte, Moloc, Chamos, &c. were different names by which they denoted the heavenly bodies. But the Egyptians carried their superstition to the greatest excess. There was hardly any sort of animal which did not obtain sovereign worship among them. C.—Their great gods, Isis and Osiris, were sometimes depicted like a man and woman; at other times, like beasts, and frequently they appeared with parts of both. The head of Isis was generally adorned or disfigured with the horns of a bull; (H.) and that animal, either alive or in a picture, as well as dogs and cats, were adored throughout the country, while some places had their peculiar idols. The lion, the wolf, and the fish called latus, gave their names to the cities Leontopolis, &c. which had a particular veneration for them. Moses takes care to inform the Hebrews that the true God is like none of these things; and that they cannot pretend to represent him under any such forms, without doing him an injury. C.—If Catholics endeavour to put the people in mind of the blessed Trinity, by representing a venerable old man, Jesus Christ in his human nature, and a dove, under which forms the Scripture has introduced the three divine persons, they do not pretend that their divine and most spiritual nature can be thus expressed. "If," says the Council of Trent, Sess. 25, "the historical accounts of Scripture be sometimes set forth in paintings, for the benefit of the illiterate, let the people be informed that the Divinity is not thus represented with a design to insinuate that it may be seen with the eyes of the body." So neither can the figure of a triangle, with the ineffable name of God in Heb., &c., explain this adorable mystery. But such things may recall to our remembrance, the innumerable benefits which we have received from the three divine persons, after we have been once informed what we have to believe respecting them. This is the laudable motive which has induced the Church to encourage the keeping of such pictures, as well as those of the saints, with due respect. "Not as if we believed that any divinity or virtue resided in them for which they were to be worshipped, or that we should ask any thing of them, or place our confidence in images, as the Gentiles formerly did, who hoped in their idols, (Ps. 134) but because the honour given to them is referred to the originals, which they represent," &c. C. of Trent, Ses. 25. H.

Ver. 19. Service. How then could the nations give way to such stupidity, but because they had forgotten the design of God in creating the heavenly bodies, which Moses therefore takes care to inculcate? Gen. 1:14. Heb. and Sept. "which God has divided unto all," &c.; whence some have falsely supposed, that God had tolerated the worship of the stars in other nations. See C. 29:26. Drusius. C.

Ver. 20. Furnace. This expression gives us some idea of the cruelties to which the Hebrews had been exposed, 3 K. 8:41. Iron and other metals were melted in furnaces: Heb. cur. Ezech. 22:20. In the countries of the East, workmen have them in the middle of their shops, and sit round them to work. Bellon. iii. 45. C.

Ver. 21. Words. The murmurs of the people occasioned the diffidence of Moses, and he often reminds them of it, that they may reflect how severely God will punish them, if they transgress, since he spares not his greatest favourites. C.—Even venial faults must be punished. W.

Ver. 23. Made. Heb. "and make to thyself a sculpture, the likeness of any thing which the Lord thy God commanded thee." He ordered them to abstain from idolatry. D.

Ver. 24. Fire. God often appeared in the midst of fire. All the land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy. Sophon. i. 18. and iii. 8. C.—By these expressions, we are exhorted not to do any thing which would excite the indignation of our true lover, nor ever be unfaithful to him. H.—The pagans thought that fire was the fittest symbol of the divinity. Porphy. de Abstin.

Ver. 26. And earth, or all their rational inhabitants. S. Jer. and S. Bas. in Isai. i. 2. Moses conjures the Israelites, by all that is most sacred, to continue faithful. He speaks with the greatest earnestness, as he does again, C. 32:1. C.—He makes use of a sort of oath, by the creatures, in which God shines forth. M.—Destroy you. He will take from you that delightful country, though he will save a remnant of you out of the captivity at Babylon, and in the latter days, v. 31. The Jews, in the promised land, were almost always prone to idolatry; till God severely chastised them by the hands of the Babylonians. Since that time, few of them have willingly yielded to the worship of idols, though some have fallen by compulsion, as we read, Dan. 3. 1 Mac. 1:53, and 2:16. Jeremias (5:19) foretold that this would be the case. As you have forsaken me and served a strange god in your own land, so shall you serve strangers in a land that is not your own. H.

Ver. 27. Nations. This prediction we see verified at the present day. They are despised by all. No one of their numerous masters embraces their religion. No one of their numerous masters embraces their religion. They are so few, as to hardly possess a single town. C.

Ver. 29. There. Heb. “thence” from the place of captivity, or returning from the love of idols to the services of the true God.—Soul. Heb. “with all thy soul. (30) In thy tribulation after,” &c. C.—God often sends chastisements as the most effectual means of salvation, to make his children enter into themselves. In this state, the soul is more at liberty to consider the folly of adhering to any thing in opposition to the sovereign Lord. Then she is forced to confess that her idols cannot afford her any protection. How, in effect, could any one fall into such an abyss of corruption and stupidity, as to imagine those things to be gods which have not even the dignity and advantages which they themselves possess? Their soul must first have been strangely blinded, and their heart corrupt. Even the more enlightened pagans acknowledged the folly of pretending to represent the Divinity under sensible forms. “God, says Empedocles, has no human members ... He is a pure and ineffable spirit, who governs the world by his profound wisdom.” Numa would not allow any picture of Him, conformably to the doctrine of Pythagoras; and, for the first 170 years of Rome, no representation of God was set up in the temples. Plutarch—The ancient Phœnicians seemed to have acted on the same principle, as the temple of Hercules, at the Straits, had no image. It is well known that the Persians rejected both the statues and temples erected in honour of the gods; and the Germans esteemed it beneath the majesty of the heavenly Beings, to represent them under any human form. Tacitus, Hist. v. C.—Yet these sages gave way to the folly of the people, and, against their better knowledge, adored the stupid and senseless idols. H.

Ver. 30. Voice, after the captivity of Babylon, or rather at the end of the world. The nation at large has not embraced the worship of idols since the former period. But it will not be perfectly converted until the fulness of the Gentiles ... come in.—And so all Israel ... be saved. Rom. 11:25. C.—S. Paul terms their present state a blindness in part, because, though few have embraced the revelation of God, made to all by his only Son, the far greater part have obstinately shut their eyes, so that, even while they read the clearest prophecies, they seem to have a veil on them. But, after they shall have been the sport of their passions and errors till the latter time, when the man of sin shall be fully revealed, they will see how wretchedly they have been deluded, and, the grace of God touching their hearts, they will remember the covenant, and embrace Christ, the end of all the law. Happy those who do not defer their conversion till that awful period! H.

Ver. 32. Heaven. To our senses the sky seems to rest upon the horizon. So Jesus says, Then he ... shall gather ... his elect ... from the uttermost part of earth, to the uttermost part of heaven. Mat. 24:31. Vatable translates, “from the east to the west.” In no age or place did God ever declare his will, as he had done at Sinai. C.

Ver. 33. And lived. It was generally supposed that those who had seen a vision of God, or of his angel, would instantly die. See Gen. 16:13. H. C. 5:24.

Ver. 34. Temptations. The Chal. and Arab. understand this of the prodigies which God wrought in favour of his people; though they may also denote the trials to which the Patriarchs and the Hebrews had been exposed, that their virtue might shine more brightly. Many indeed lost courage under these trials, but they were of great service to form a perfect people; and those who continued to lead a virtuous life received the reward of their labours. C.—Visions, during the three days’ darkness mentioned, Wisd. 17:9. 18, &c. (M.) or those terrible appearances on Sinai, v. 33. 36. C. 5:22. C. Heb. may be, “by great terrors.”—In Egypt. God himself fought for his people, when he brought them out of that country. He repeatedly made the king and his people feel the impressions of terror, but as they presently recovered their wonted insolence and pride, he at last miraculously divided the Red Sea, and buried vast multitudes in its waters. H.

Ver. 38. Day. They had already conquered the mighty kingdoms of Sehon and of Og. M.

Ver. 39. Other. The power of the true and only God is not confined to the sea, or to the land, &c. (C.) as the pagans believed that of their various idols was. H.

Ver. 41. Then, &c. This piece of history seems to be placed out of its natural order, by another hand. C.—Yet if we attend to the method of Moses, in his other works, we shall not hastily conclude that it is an interpolation. He frequently repeats what has already been specified. He had received an order from God to appoint these three cities of refuge, (Num. 35:14,) after he had given the land to the tribes of Ruben, &c. Num. 32. This he executes at the conclusion of this discourse; and hence takes occasion to mention how they had taken possession of this country. H.

Ver. 42. Before. The Rabbins say, when two people had refused to speak to one another for three days, it was a sufficient indication of their enmity. Seld. Jur. iv. 2.

Ver. 43. Wilderness, or plains of Moab, at the mouth of the Jordan. It is sometimes called Besor, and is very different from Bozra of Idumea, (Isai. 63:1,) a very famous city, known to profane authors by the name of Bostra.—Ramoth, one of the strongest towns of Galaad, 15 miles west of Philadelphia, (Euseb.) where Achab, king of Israel, received a mortal wound, 3 K. 22:3.—Golon, or Gaulan, gave its name to Gaulanitis, a part of Batanea, lying on the southern parts of the division of Gad, though the city belonged to Manasses. The lower Gaulanitis lay towards the lake of Genezareth, and had Gamala for its capital. Cellarius.

Ver. 48. Sion begins here with s, being the northern boundary of the tribe of Manasses, east of the Jordan; whereas the famous Sion, on which the temple was built, is written with ts, and lay on the west side of the Jordan, (H.) in the tribe of Juda. C. 3:8. C.

Ver. 49. Wilderness, which Moses commonly calls the salt sea, (on account of the asphalte with which it abounds,) or the sea of Araba, as it lies at the extremity of the plains of Moab, which are sometimes called Araboth, “deserts,” because they were more fit for pasturage than for ploughing. C.

Ver. 1. All Israel: not one was wanting, C. 29:10. God enabled all to hear the words of their lawgiver, (M.) by an evident miracle. Jansen. C.

Ver. 3. Fathers, the ancient patriarchs, who were not favoured in such a signal manner. M.—Though many of those who had heard the words of God at Horeb, were dead, and had not enjoyed the full benefit of the covenant, some still remained, and the children of the deceased were about to enter the land which had been there promised. H.—God did not make a covenant with the Patriarchs only, but also with their posterity at Horeb. D.

Ver. 4. To us. Heb. and Sept. “to you.”—Face to face, in such a manner that no doubt could be entertained of his presence. S. Aug.—God addressed the decalogue to all the people, who saw no similitude. But to Moses he delivered the rest of his ordinances, with as much familiarity and condescension as one friend would use in speaking to another. Ex. 33:2. C.

Ver. 5. Mediator. S. Paul acknowledges this title of Moses, (Gal. 3:9,) who was a figure of Jesus Christ, the mediator of the New Testament. Heb. 8:6. 9:15. 12:24. C.—Let not Protestants, therefore, reject this title with so much indignation, when it is applied in the like limited sense to the saints, to denote that they pray for us, as we pray for one another. Christ is the one mediator (1 Tim. 2) of redemption. H.

Ver. 7. Sight. Chaldee, “Thou shalt not have any other god but me.” Elohim often designates the true God. C.—See the decalogue explained, (Ex. 20,) where we have observed, that pictures are only forbidden when they are the objects of sovereign worship, as the context here plainly shews, v. 9. Other images God himself authorized, (W.) even in the old law, and in the most sacred place, where people were ordered to fall prostrate before the ark, to adore his footstool. Ps. 98:5. If, therefore, a people so prone to idolatry as the Jews were, might have pictures in the temple of God without danger, how can any one suppose that the images of Jesus Christ, and of his saints, are necessary incentive to idolatry among Christians, who all know that God will allow of no rival! H.

Ver. 9. Serve. We must neither treat idols, nor their images, with the honour due to God alone. S. Aug. q. 61. in Gen.—If we do, he will punish our infidelity.—Generation, for a long time, or as long as the remembrance of the parents’ wickedness subsists, so as to have an influence upon others. H.—God mercifully defers correction. S. Jer. in Ezec. xvii. He chastises those who imitate their wicked forefathers.

Ver. 11. In vain, by perjury. See v. 20, where the same word is used, (D.) or by any irreverent speech. M.

Ver. 15. Therefore. This is another reason why the Jews were to observe the sabbath with particular rigour. The institution of a day of rest every week, (H.) was intended to preserve the memory of the creation. C.—God also requires that his people should be grateful on this day for the rest which he had granted to them, (H.) and preserve carefully all the monuments of the true religion. C.

Ver. 18. Adultery. Under this name God forbids every species of impurity. S. Aug. q. 71. M.

Ver. 20. False. Hebrew shave, “vain,” is synonymous with sheker, “false,” used Ex. 20:16.

Ver. 21. His. Here the Samaritan copy inserts the order for erecting an altar upon Mount Garizim, which we have given, Ex. 20:26. It occurs below. C. 28:2, &c. C.

Ver. 22. More to the people: the other precepts were communicated to Moses. The Chaldee and others give a contrary turn to the Heb. “and he ceased not” ever since to instruct us. C.—Moses gives the sense, not the very words of the decalogue, in which he is not guilty of any lie. S. Aug. q. 8. D.

Ver. 23. You said, by the mouths of your princes. Ex. 20:19.

Ver. 25. Die. Past experience did not entirely remove from them the fear which was so generally entertained, that the sight of the heavenly beings would prove destructive. So Daniel (C. 10:17,) said on a similar occasion, my breath is stopped. H.

Ver. 29. A mind. God speaks like men, and insinuates how agreeable to him is a disposition influenced by a salutary fear. He does not mean that He cannot convert the heart of man. E.—God exerts his power over our will by persuasive invitations. Maimonides.

Ver. 32. Left: a proverbial expression, to signify that no sort of transgression is to be allowed. M.—It is of the same import as, You shall not add, &c. C. 4:2. C.

Ver. 3. Hear. The Jews have a particular respect for the seven following verses, which they write on vellum, and recite every day, as a preservative against the devil. Clarius.—To do. It will not suffice to hear nor to learn the law, we must also put it in execution. C. 5:1. W.

Ver. 5. Whole heart ... soul ... and strength. God admits of no partner, nor will he suffer any rivulet to be drawn from the fountain of love, which is not ultimately referred to himself. Our neighbour we must love only for his sake, and by the observance of this two-fold precept, we shall fulfil the whole law and the prophets. Matt. 22:40. H. See S. Aug. de Doct. i. 22.—We must love God disinterestedly for his own sake: we must sacrifice our soul and life for his honour, with all our strength, beginning every good work with fervour, and persevering in our undertakings. All our faculties and senses must be consecrated to the divine service, as well as all our goods; in which sense the Chaldee, &c. understand the word strength. Heb. lit. ex toto valdè tuo. By this singular expression Moses seems to insinuate, that he cannot find words to specify how much we ought to love the Sovereign Good. C.—“The measure of loving God, is to love without measure.” S. Bernard. H.—By many words, the same thing is more forcibly inculcated. T. M.—In the gospel we find, with thy whole mind, (Luc. 10:27,) added by the lawyer. H.—We must give God the preference before all, and thus have our heart perfect before him, like David, &c. T.

Ver. 7. Tell. Heb. “thou shalt chew them” as nurses do bread for their little ones; or thou shalt “sharpen,” like a razor, “explain clearly and often,” these precepts, which are of the utmost importance.—Meditate; speak of them to others, (C.) and entertain thyself with them in thy own heart. The mouth of the just man shall meditate wisdom, and (that is) his tongue shall speak judgment. Ps. 36:30. Ex. 13:9.—Sleeping. The spouse, in the canticle, (5:2,) says, I sleep, and my heart watcheth. If we carefully direct our intention, we may merit even when we are incapable of thinking. God will reward our good desires. Our last and first thoughts ought, in a particular manner, to be consecrated to God, (H.) when we go to rest and when we arise, (M.) as he is our first beginning, the source of all graces, and our last end, to whom we ought to refer every thing, even our ordinary actions of sleeping, labour, and diversion. If we make his divine perfections and his law the subject of our daily meditations, our soul will naturally be affected with the same sentiments during the night. Quicquid luce fuit tenebris agit. “The occurrences of the day have an influence upon our dreams;” (Petronius) and as we are accountable for many things by placing the cause, which in the hours of sleep or of drunkenness we are not able to prevent, so it cannot be doubted but that we shall increase in virtue, if we regulate our thoughts and actions in a proper manner, even when our soul is incapable of exerting her faculties. Hence we may perceive, of what vast importance it is to have a pure intention. H.

Ver. 8. Sign, or seal, (Cant. 8:6. C.) attached to the ring which the Jews wore on their fingers, (H.) to seal their letters, after they were enveloped and tied with linen. The Jews have bandages of vellum on their hand, with sentences of the law inscribed upon them, (C.) as well as others upon their forehead; while many get the whole law, particularly the Book of Deuteronomy, by heart: for which purpose, the Rabbins inform us, there were above 4000 schools and synagogues at Jerusalem, where the law of God was learnt and explained. The design of this injunction was not, however, to enforce the wearing of such bandages, as the Pharisees imagined, (Mat. 23:5,) but to put all in mind that they ought to meditate frequently upon the commandments, (T.) and regulate their lives by their direction.—Shall move. Sept. adds a negation, but to the same import, “it (the sign) shall not be removed from before thy eyes.” H.—Heb. “they shall be as totaphoth, frontlets,” ornaments hanging between the eyes. (Ex. 13:9. C.) “Tephilim,” (Chald.) or “spectacles.” Grotius.

Ver. 12. Full. Our Saviour seems to apply this to his disciples, in a spiritual sense, remarking that Moses and the prophets had prepared the way for them. Others have laboured, and you have entered into their labours. Jo. 4:38. H.

Ver. 13. Only. This is omitted in Heb.; but the Sept. and Jesus Christ retain it, (Mat. 4:10,) as the sense requires. You cannot serve God and mammon. Lu. 16:13. C.—Name, and not by that of idols, whenever you may be authorized to take an oath. H.—To swear by any other, is to acknowledge him in some sort for a god. When we take an oath on proper occasions, and with due respect and caution, we perform and act of religion. C.

Ver. 16. Temptation. Heb. “in Massa,” where Moses gave the people water from Horeb. Ex. 17:7.

Ver. 25. Merciful. Heb. “he will justify us.” Chal. “reward us.” Justice often denotes the mercy which God shews to his people, and the punishment which he inflicts upon their enemies. C. Mat. 6:1.—Past, present, and future benefits concur to make the Hebrews observe the commandments. God had rescued them from slavery; (v. 21,) he had already given them great possessions, and would grant them still more if they would be faithful; as on the other hand, all will be lost if they prove rebellious, v. 15. H.

Ver. 1. Destroyed. So the Vulgate often expresses the Hebrew term, which signifies, “to cast out.”—Seven. Ten are mentioned, Gen. 15:9.; but some of the less powerful nations were either mixed with the others, or were exterminated. The Hevites are omitted in the passage of Genesis, and sometimes no notice is taken of the Gergezite or the Pherezite. The latter had been already conquered by Moses, as well as the Raphaim and Amorrites, over whom Og and Sehon ruled. C. 3:5. C.—It seems, however, that some of the same nations, on the other side of the Jordan, remained to be subdued, and that any one of them was naturally too strong for the Hebrews, v. 7. Hence the latter might be convinced, that their victories were to be attributed to God.

Ver. 2. League. Yet Josue, (9:3,) by mistake, entered into one with the Gabaonites, and observed it; (H.) whence we may conclude, that only such leagues are forbidden as would leave these nations in possession of their lands and idols. C. 20:10. 23:6. With foreign nations it was lawful to make leagues defensive and offensive, as David, Asa, and the Machabees did with Hiram, Benadad, and the Romans, 3 K. 15:18, &c. If the Hebrews were so hostile to the nations of Chanaan, it was in execution of God's decree, who had sentenced them to die; and Tacitus hence unjustly inferred, that they hated all but their own nation. See Grot. Jur. ii. 15.—Them. This was ill executed. Jos. xiii. 13. Judge. 1. M.

Ver. 3. Marriages. Some believe that it was unlawful to marry the people of Chanaan, if they were even converted, and also those of other nations, as we find that Esdras (1 C. 10:2. 12,) ordered such strange wives to be sent away. But the context shews, as well as the practice of most pious Hebrews, that it was only forbidden to marry with those who adhered to their idolatry, v. 4. Salmon took to wife Rahab, of Jericho; Mahalon and Booz successively married Ruth, the Moabitess, and Moses himself allows the Hebrews to espouse their captives, and to preserve the lives of women and children, C. 20:14. 21:11. C. See Ex. 34:15.—Hence all the Chanaanites were not necessarily to be slain. The few exceptions did not hinder the rule from being general. See v. 16. Num. 14:23.

Ver. 4. Gods. So great is the natural tendency to evil, that though a woman be generally inclined to follow the inclinations and religion of her husband, yet, when his method of living is more repugnant to flesh and blood, she is but too apt to influence him to glide smoothly with her down the hill of pleasure, into the very abyss of dissolution. The prediction, she will turn, &c. is so often verified, that those who marry with unbelievers ought to tremble. H.

Ver. 5. Things. This was to be done with regard to the idols of Chanaan, when it was first conquered, v. 25. Afterwards David made no scruple in wearing a crown, which had been taken from the spoils of Melchon, the idol of the Ammonites. 1 Par. 20:2. C.

Ver. 6. Peculiar. Heb. sogula, laid up like something most precious and desirable. M.—God seemed to have abandoned other nations to the corruption of their own heart. “This was, by a particular mystery, a prophetic nation.” S. Aug. ep. cii. Ex. 19:5. C.—Therefore must they destroy every idol in their land, to set a pattern to all other less favoured nations how they ought also to treat them.

Ver. 7. Joined. Heb. “has set his love upon you.” God is the most disinterested lover. H.

Ver. 9. Strong. Heb. el, means also God. He requires us to imitate his perfections as much as we are able. Being faithful, he will comply with his covenant exactly, and will punish those who neglect it. C.

Ver. 10. Deserve. Heb. “he will repay to his face,” or “he will punish immediately the person who hateth him to his face.” God does not always defer the correction of the wicked till their death. C.—But this seems to be spoken principally of those who have engaged in the covenant, 2 Mac. 6:12. D.—Thus he immediately chastised those who adored the calf, Core, Mary, &c. (M.) and he does not dissemble the faults even of his chosen servants. T.—The Chaldee and some Rabbins give another interpretation. “The Lord rewards his enemies for the good works which they perform in this life, reserving their judgment till the life to come. He does not delay to reward was good they do, but he will punish them (for their crimes) in another world.” C.

Ver. 12. If. The promises of God to the Hebrews were conditional. W.

Ver. 13. Womb. He will grant thee many children. M.—This was esteemed a very great blessing, at a time when they might hope to give birth to the Messias. C.

Ver. 14. Cattle. This shews, that no precept to marry is here given, but only a blessing. Even men cannot be commanded not to be barren, as that is not in their own power. It was, however, deemed a mark of some secret transgression when married people had no children. Vasques. T.

Ver. 15. Sickness, sent in punishment of sin, (H.) like the plagues of Egypt. Ex. 9. M.—Egypt was afflicted with some peculiar disorders, such as the leprosy, called Elephantiasis. Plin. xxvi. 1. The people were also much troubled with sore eyes, or blindness, and with ulcers upon their legs. Juven. Sat. xiii. 91. One-fourth of the inhabitants of Grand Cairo have sore eyes, or are blind. Brun.—Joinville speaks of the diseases which attacked the army of S. Louis in Egypt, preying chiefly upon the legs and gums, and causing them to putrify. C.

Ver. 16. Consume. Kill the inhabitants, plunder their effects, (M.) destroy their idols.

Ver. 19. Plagues. Heb. “trials.” God manifested by this means the latent dispositions of the Egyptians, while he punished their wickedness at the same time. H.

Ver. 20. Hornets. Abenezra understands the leprosy, which the Hebrew may also signify. But hornets and such like insects are very destructive in hot countries; and Pausanias informs us that the Minsiens were driven out of their country by them. C.—God destroyed the army of Sapor II. the Persian king, by sending an army of gnats, at the prayer of S. James of Nisibis, A.D. 350. "Lord, said the saint, thou art able by the weakest means to humble the pride of thy enemies, defeat these multitudes by an army of gnats." Butler, July 11.—We may, therefore, explain this text in a literal sense. C. Wisd. 12:8 and 16:9. Jos. 24:12.

Ver. 21. Fear. Sept. "be wounded." In the war with the Madianites, not one was killed, (Num. 31:49,) as Josephus (iii. 2) informs us, was also the case when king Amalec and his people attacked the Hebrews. Ex. 17:13. The people seem to have expected such a miraculous interference of Providence in their favour; and hence, when 36 were slain at the siege of Hai, all were greatly dejected. Jos. 7:5. H.

Ver. 22. Thee. Three millions of people not being sufficient to cultivate the land. Ex. 23:29. M.—God could easily have destroyed those mighty nations at once; but he would not give the Israelites any occasion of boasting. D.—If they never succeeded to expel them entirely out of the country, they might attribute it to their own negligence and other sins. H.

Ver. 25. Graven things. Idols, so called by contempt. Ch.—Made. Heb. "gold (plates) on them," to cover the wood, &c. See v. 5.

Ver. 26. An anathema. That is, a thing devoted to destruction; and which carries along with it a curse. Ch.—Like it. The curse rested upon those who kept any of the spoils. This brought death upon Achan, (Jos. 7:1,) and upon some of the soldiers of Judas the Machabee, who had secreted some of the donaries of the idols of Jamnia, which the law forbiddeth to the Jews, 2 Mac. 12:40. C.

DEUTERONOMY 8

Ver. 1. Live a long and happy life; which was often promised to the carnal Jews, to encourage them to fill God's commands. Christians are willing to forego these temporal advantages, that they may obtain such as may last for ever. C.

Ver. 2. Prove, which is done frequently by posterity also, v. 3. 12. 14. After trying the fidelity of his people by various means, to make them sensible of their own weakness and inability to do good, God takes pity on them, v. 16. C.—Known. Heb. "to know (by experience) what was in thy heart, whether," &c. The original term signifies also to make known to others. Gen. 22:12. H.

Ver. 3. Not in bread alone, &c. i.e. That God is able to make food of what he pleases for the support of man. Ch.—Obedience to his law will insure a happy life, v. 1. God can support a person's life without any sustenance, as he did Moses, Elias, &c. for a long time. When the usual food is wanting, he can send some of a supernatural kind, as he did the manna.—Word. Heb. “by whatever proceedeth,” &c. The Sept. and our Saviour (Mat. 4:4,) cite it, however, agreeably to the Vulgate. The word of God and Jesus Christ nourish our souls. S. Chrys.—Philo says, “God feeds us with his most universal word ... which is more ancient than the creation.” C.—God could make the most poisonous things afford more nutrition, if he commanded us to eat them, than even the most delicious viands. Abulensis. T.—God can make food of whatever He pleases, or sustain men without meat. W.

Ver. 4. Worn, for want of shoes. C. 29:5. Chaldee. This miracle of the Hebrews, being so well provided with raiment in a desert country, is mentioned, 2 Esd. 9:21. Cosmas (B. v.) allows only that merchants constantly supplied them, and Abenezra thinks that they had brought plenty for change out of Egypt. C.—But the Scripture seems to acknowledge something more wonderful; namely, the good condition of the people's feet, and of their garments, after they had been worn for such a length of time. As their numbers had not increased, the children might be supplied with the clothes of the deceased; so that there is no need of making the miracle still greater, by asserting, as some have done, that the garments grew larger with the bodies of those who wore them. H.—The miracle was in favour both of good and bad, like manna, &c. T.

Ver. 5. Up, by mildness and correction alternately. Heb. “chastiseth thee.” Prov. 3:12.

Ver. 7. Out. The Jordan was the only river of consequence; but there were many torrents, &c. which rendered the country very different from that where they had been travelling for 40 years. H.—Heb. “of fountains, of abysses, which spring in vales and on mountains,” having their origin in the sea. Chal. Eccli. 1:7.) “Judea is famous for its waters, says Solinus, (35,) and the Jordan, a most enchanting river, runs through regions of equal beauty.” C.

Ver. 8. Honey, extracted from dates. D.—Almost all the luxuries of the earth might be found in the promised land; so that it was justly said to flow with milk and honey. H.

Ver. 9. Iron, equal in hardness, and used to cut things, in the same manner as we use iron or steel. Isai. 60:17.—Brass. There were mines of both in Mount Libanus; and David collected great quantities of such metals from Coelosyria. 3 K. 18:8. 1 Par. 22:3. 14. Sidon was noted for its brass. Homer, Odys. xv. 425. Sarepta probably took its name from the “foundry” established there. Dan and Aser had abundance of iron and brass. C. 33:25. Ezec. 27:19. Cadmus brought from this country the art of melting gold, &c. into Greece. Plin. vii. 56. In latter ages, many Christians were condemned to work in the mines of Palestine. Euseb.

Ver. 10. Bless, not forgetting to give thanks after meat, as well as to beg God’s blessing before: for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer, 1 Tim. 4:4–5. M.—In all things give thanks, 1 Thes. 5:18. Our Saviour did so at the last supper. Mat. 26:26. At taking the cup, the Jews say, “Blessed be thou, O Lord, who createdst the fruit of the vine.” At the end of the repast, one of the most dignified at table, holding a cup full of wine, says, “Let us bless Him, who has fed us with his goods, and who preserves our life by his goodness;” and all answer, “Blessed be He from whom we have received food and life:” after which a long prayer is recited. Fagius.—In compliance with this custom, our Lord took the cup after supper, and recited (H.) or sung a hymn. Lu. 22:20. Mat. 26:30. C.

Ver. 15. Breath. Heb. saraphh, or the basilisk, as it is rendered, Isai. 30:6. It destroys both the grass and animals, by the burning infection of its breath. Galen. Plin. viii. 19. See Num. 21:6. T.—Scorpion stings with its tail.—Dipsas. A serpent whose bite causeth a violent thirst: from whence it has its name; for in Greek, dipsa signifies thirst. Ch.—It is impossible to quench this thirst, (W.) and those who are bitten by this serpent can discharge no water. C.—They drink till they burst, unless they can procure some treacle, or remedy against the poison. Dioscorides. T.—Some translate the Heb. “scorpions, and (at the place of) drought, where there was no water: he brought,” &c. whether Tsommaon be the name of a particular place, (Isai. 35:7. Onkelos. C.) or it may be applied to the greatest part of that desert, where the want of water so often occasioned the murmurs of the people. H.

Ver. 17. For me. Heb. “hath procured me this wealth,” or strength, v. 18.

Ver. 19. Thee. Heb. “I attest this day against you, (Sept. add heaven and earth,) that you shall,” &c. God had already forbidden the worship of strange gods. Ex. 20:3. He now threatens to punish the transgressors most severely. All nations have deemed it criminal to abandon the religion of their ancestors, unless when there is evident proofs of its absurdity, as was the case when so many embraced the doctrine of Jesus Christ, for which they were so cruelly persecuted.

The Athenians would not suffer a word to be spoken against their gods; (Josep. c. Ap. ii.) and Cicero (Leg. ii.) lays down this as a law, "Let no one have gods to himself, nor any new ones: let him not adore, even in private, strange gods; unless they have been publicly acknowledged." C.

Ver. 20. Destroyed. Heb. "destroys." Some were already subdued, others on the brink of ruin.—Disobedient to. God punished this sin in the most exemplary manner. H.

DEUTERONOMY 9

Ver. 1. This day, very soon, (M.) within the space of a month. C.—Sky: an hyperbole to denote their surprising height. W.

Ver. 2. Stand. Heb. "who can stand before the sons of Enak?" as if this were a sort of proverb. C.—The spies had formerly terrified the people with the report of the high walls and gigantic inhabitants of Chanaan. Num. 13:18.

Ver. 3. Fire. See C. 4:24. The conducting angel would fight for the Hebrews. H.

Ver. 7. Strove. Heb. "irritated." C.—Sept. "continually disbelieved the Lord." Moses hence takes occasion to lay before the people their frequent and most heinous offences, on account of which they might justly have feared being destroyed, as much as the infamous nations whom they were about to supplant. They might thus be convinced that they had been chosen gratuitously. H.—For God hates nothing more than ingratitude and presumption. C.

Ver. 8. Would, if He had not been appeased by earnest supplication, as v. 20.

Ver. 12. Have quickly. Heb. "have become corrupt; they have quickly abandoned the way which I commanded them." H.—Sept. "the people hath sinned ... they have quickly transgressed," &c. C.—Idol. Protestants have "image." The Hebrews had called the similitude of a calf their god. Ex. 32. H.

Ver. 16. Sinned, by idolatry, which comprises every sort of sin. Hence the Scripture only specifies that Jeroboam caused Israel to sin, when it means to assert that he engaged the people in the worship of idols. C.

Ver. 18. Sins. Many believe that Moses spent the whole time in obtaining pardon. Hiscuni agrees herein with the other Rabbins, only he thinks Moses was all the time in the tabernacle. Other 40 days, or a third rigid fast, were requisite to obtain the second tables of the law, as the text seems to insinuate, (v. 25. C. 10:10,) unless Moses repeat what he has here asserted, as many able chronologers suppose. Torneil, Usher, &c. C. T.—The former opinion is maintained, however, by Salien, &c. Ex. 34. H.

Ver. 21. Sin. The Scripture designates by this name not only the evil action, but also the propensity to it, the object, matter, occasion, punishment, or victim of sin.—The calf. He broke the idol in pieces, and then ground it small. Ex. 32:20. C.

Ver. 22. Burning, &c. The places called in Heb. “Tabera, Masa, and Kibroth Hattaavah.” H.—At the first, the murmurers were burnt; (Num. 11:1) at the second or at Raphidim, (C.) the people demanded water, and were supplied from Horeb; (Ex. 17:2. 7. M.) though some confound this with the former place. It seems rather to refer to the temptation, or murmur of the people, on account of quails. Num. 11:34. Ps. 77:18. C.

Ver. 23. Slighted. Heb. “rebelled against,” &c. as v. 24. Sept. “you were incredulous to.” See Num. 13:3.

Ver. 24. To know you. When Moses slew the Egyptian, and would have pacified two of his contending brethren, they refused to receive his mediation; so also, when he returned from Madian, to rescue them from slavery, they presently began to murmur against him, and continued to do so frequently for 40 years. H.—Sept. refers this to God, “from the day that he was known to you,” and received you for his peculiar people. Ex. 12:25.

Ver. 25. Nights. See v. 18. C.—After specifying various seditions of the people, Moses returns to what he had been saying respecting the tables of the law, and shews with what difficulty he obtained pardon for the people, and the second tables. H.—Some people believe that Moses was thrice 40 days in the mountain. He mentions the prayer which he addressed to God before his first descent. Ex. 32:11. M.

Ver. 1. Wood. Moses had received this injunction, before he ascended the mount the second time. Ex. 25:10. But he executed it only after he had received the second tables of the law. Ex. 37:1. M.—Some pretend that the made an ark of setim-wood, to contain the tables, till Beseleel should have completed his, which was covered with gold, and inclosed the former. Drus.—But this seems unnecessary. C.

Ver. 3. I made, or gave orders to have one ready against my return. C.

Ver. 4. To me. God had already promulgated the same laws in the hearing of all. Ex. 19:17. H.

Ver. 6. Mosera, by Mount Hor, for there Aaron died. Num. 20. This and the following verses seem to be inserted by way of parenthesis, (Ch). as far as the 10th. The reason of their insertion here cannot easily be explained; but we must adore, in silence, the designs of the Holy Spirit. C.—Moses had just mentioned the ark, designed to contain the tables of the law; and as the priests and Levites were to be the guardians of those sacred things, he takes occasion to specify something with respect to their institution, &c. Mosera was perhaps twice visited by the Hebrews. The first time, they came thither from Beroth-Benejaacan, or from “the well of the children of Jacan,” and thence measured back their steps; though, the second time, Mosera, or Moseroth, is not noticed, because it had been specified already, and they did not stop long there, but proceeded to Gadgad. Num. 33:30. Bonfrere. M.—Others think that Mosera and Benejaacan are not the same places as Moseroth and Beroth Bensacan, though the names be similar. A. Lapide.—Perhaps it will be more satisfactory to acknowledge, that Mosera has been transposed by the copyists, as it ought to come before Beroth, particularly as Moses places it in that order, where he gives an account of the 42 stations; and the Samaritan copy agrees with him in this place. C.—It also retains many words which have been omitted in Hebrew, and in all the versions taken from it; whence the omission seems to have taken place before the appearance of the version of the Septuagint. The Samaritan version, which is acknowledged to have preceded the Septuagint, agrees with its text, and reads, “And the children of Israel journeyed from Moseroth, and pitched in Benejaakan: from thence they journeyed, and pitched in Hagidgad: from thence they journeyed, and pitched in Jotbathah, a land of rivers of waters: from thence they journeyed, and pitched in Ebronah: from thence they journeyed, and pitched in Eziongaber: from thence they journeyed, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh: from thence they journeyed, and pitched in Mount Hor. And there Aaron died,” &c. Kennicott. 2. Dis.—Thus Mosera will be the 27th, and Mount Hor the 34th station; (Pococke) whence the Israelites departed, after the death of Aaron, to Salmona, directing their course to the countries east of the Jordan, which had been promised to them. The appointment of Eleazar to succeed Aaron, and the separation of the Levites unto the Lord, should be all placed together, after the different encampments. H.

Ver. 8. Time, during the pontificate of Aaron. Num. 3:6. M.—God had made this appointment at Sinai, (Ex. 28:1,) where he ordered the tabernacle and the priests to be consecrated. Upon the sedition of Core, which probably took place at Jetebata, he confirmed the rights of the Levitical tribe. Num. 16:17 and 18. C.—Ark. The priests carried it, on more solemn occasions, (Jos. 3:3,) as they also blessed the people. M.—Yet the Levites sung the praises of God, in which sense the word is often used, 1 Par. 23:13. Hence Castalio translates, “to celebrate his name.”

Ver. 10. Stood. Moses does not follow the order of events, but recalls to the minds of his audience what might serve to make the deepest impression upon them. He mentions some farther instructions which he had received from God on Mount Sinai, during the second term of 40 days. C.—It might have been placed in a more natural order at the head of this chapter. M.—Some believe that Moses speaks of the third fast of 40 days. Salien.

Ver. 12. And now. He shews what advantages may be derived from a constant observance of the commandments, that it may be well with thee, v. 13. God stands not in need of our services, (v. 14,) but chooses whom he pleases to display the treasures of his love, (v. 15,) which ought to move us strongly to make him a suitable return of gratitude, (C.) by withdrawing our affections from every thing that may be displeasing to him, v. 16. If we refuse, we must expect to fall under the rod of his indignation, notwithstanding all the efforts of his clemency, which he holds forth for our imitation, v. 17. 19. He will judge all alike, the rich and the poor. H.

Ver. 14. Of heaven. The Scripture mentions the third heaven, (2 Cor. 12:2,) where the majesty of God most gloriously appears. The second is the region of the stars, and the first the atmosphere, where the birds and the clouds move about. C.

Ver. 15. Joined, (conglutinatus) as it were, with glue, (H.) to shew the vehemence of love. M.

Ver. 16. Circumcise. The Hebrews esteem circumcision as a mark of their greatest glory. All who had it not were looked upon as profane. They call the ears, mind, and heart uncircumcised, when they would not hear, understand, or obey the law of God. S. Paul (Rom. 2:28) frequently inculcates this interior circumcision, to which Moses alludes in these his last exhortations. C. 30:6. The people had not regularly practised circumcision in the desert. Moses takes care to raise their thoughts to something more spiritual; and declares, in clearer terms than he had hitherto done, the necessity of loving God. All must be banished from the heart which might resist this love. C.—Vanity, blindness, luxury, must be retrenched. M.

Ver. 17. Gods. Idols are nothing, 1 Cor. 8:4. Hence Theodoret supposes, that all who have authority upon earth are here designated. But admitting the false notions of the pagans respecting their gods, the superiority of the true God is here asserted; (C.) and all, both in heaven and on earth, gods and lords, must bow before him. H.

Ver. 18. Widow. God resents the injuries done to such. Ex. 22:22.

Ver. 20. Only, a word not found in the Hebrew, but deemed necessary by the Sept. to express the true meaning of this passage. See C. 6:13. C.—Name, when an oath is necessary. Thou shalt never swear by false gods. W.

Ver. 21. Praise, the object whom thou must praise, and the source of all thy happiness and glory. Other nations will revere the Jews on this account. C.—An ancient oracle could not refuse giving them this singular commendation, though to the prejudice of idolatry. “Chaldees alone philosophy may claim—but Hebrews worship God, the self-born King—with pure religion.” H.—agnos, (C.) S. Cyr. c. Julian 5. and S. Just. Exhort. read auton, him. But the meaning is clear from the context. The palm of wisdom is given to the Chaldees for natural learning, and to the Jews for divinity. Watson, Proleg. xii. Porphyrius owns the oracle. Theodoret. H.

Ver. 22. Seventy. Some copies of the Sept. add “five,” with S. Stephen. See Gen. 46:26. C.

Ver. 2. Know, &c. Reflect on the wonders of God, which you must explain to your children, who were not born, or able to discern them, when they were effected at the Red Sea, and in the punishment of the seditious, v. 7. Heb. “know ye this day, for I do not address myself to your children, who know not, (or have not understanding,) and saw not,” &c. C.

Ver. 4. Day. So that none of the Egyptians have since been able to molest you.

Ver. 8. That. Fear might stimulate them to observe God's command, lest they should be overtaken by a similar chastisement. H.

Ver. 10. Gardens. Heb. "where thou didst sow the seed, and water it with the foot, as a garden," by means of various machines or wheels, which were turned by the feet. Philo.—Solinus (ii. 22. 36,) takes notice of this inconvenience in Egypt. The country is watered only by the Nile, which overflows for six weeks, about the beginning of June. Various canals or reservoirs are formed to preserve a sufficient supply of water during the remainder of the year. Pliny (xviii.) observes, that "if the Nile rise less than 12, or more than 16 cubits high, famine is inevitable." C. See Gen. 42:3.—Prince Radzivil saw the canals of Egypt, which the people said had been dug by the Hebrews. Augustus ordered his soldiers to clean them out. Sueton. c. 18.—After the seed was committed to the earth, it was necessary to water it frequently, as the sun would harden the soil too much. No rain falls in that part of Egypt where the Hebrews had dwelt, according to many respectable authors; (T.) or at least what little may fall is not sufficient to keep the earth moist. Proclus allows that some showers are felt in Lower Egypt, which lies nearest to the Mediterranean Sea; and travellers often take notice of them, in their journeys from Alexandria to Memphis. Yet the country in general is destitute of this advantage. Zac. 14:18. Lloyd. H.

Ver. 14. Rain, which falls in Judea, chiefly about the vernal and the autumnal equinoxes, in March and October.—The latter rain (Heb. malkosh,) is that which falls when the seed is just sown, though the Rabbins pretend that yore has this signification, in opposition to the Sept. It fell at the beginning of the Jewish year, which commenced in September. Joel 2:23. Zac. 10:1. C.—Rain contributed to make the seeds take root, and to bring the fruit to maturity, and God promises to give what may be requisite, provided his people serve him with fidelity. H.—His grace helps us to begin and to perfect every good work. W.

Ver. 15. Hay. Seed-grass was sown, like corn, in Palestine, as it is still in the Levant, where meadows are unknown. The hay consisted chiefly of trefoil, and was carried on beasts in long journeys. Gen. 43:27. Judg. 19:19. Cattle fed commonly on straw and barley. The hay grass which grew on mountains was of a different sort, and used for pasturage, (Job 40:15,) though it might also be cut. Prov. 27:25. C.

Ver. 17. You. In all this discourse, Moses attributes the fertility of the promised land to the blessing of God, and indeed it seems to be naturally far from being so luxuriant as to be able to feed so many inhabitants. Travellers inform us, that a great part is incapable of cultivation. But it is no longer the object of God's complacency, v. 12. It is under the curse. C. 28:23. C.

Ver. 18. Place. Heb. "that they may be as frontlets between your eyes." C. 6:9. Ex. 13:9. H.

Ver. 20. Posts. Upon one post the Jews hang boards, enclosing a piece of parchment, with the 13th to the 21st verse of this chapter; and from v. 4 to the 9th of the 6th chapter, they hang with great solemnity upon the other post.

Ver. 21. Earth, as long as the world shall endure. The psalmist (88:30,) expresses the duration of the reign of the Messias nearly in the same terms. See Bar. 1:2. C.—If the Jews had continued faithful to God, and had submitted to the Messias, they might never have been banished from their country. H.

Ver. 24. Yours. The nations of Chanaan, how strong soever, should fall, and their country be lawfully possessed by the Hebrews.—Western sea. Heb. "the sea of the back." The Jews speak of the different parts of the world, with respect to a man who has his face turned towards the east. Gen. 13:9. The countries, from the desert of Zin to the Euphrates, were never entirely occupied by the Israelites, except under the reigns of David and Solomon. C.—God never intended to subject the whole world to their dominion, as the Rabbins would hence infer. M.

Ver. 26. Curse. Their respective effects you shall experience, according to your behaviour. C.—God helps our free will to do good. S. Aug. q. 15. W.

Ver. 29. Put the blessing, &c. See Deut. 27:12, &c. and Josue 8:33, &c. Ch.—Six tribes were to be stationed on each of these mountains. C. 28.—Garizim. Eusebius says that the Samaritans are grossly deceived, in placing this mountain in the vicinity of Sichem, instead of Jericho. But this is a mistake; for Jotham addressed the inhabitants of Sichem from that mountain. Judg. 9:7. Morizon informs us that it is of the same shape as Hebal, and separated from it only by a valley of about 200 paces, in which the town of Sichem stands. Hebal is a barren rock, while Garizim is very fertile, (Ludolf.) though an ancient poet makes both equally covered with verdure. Ap. Euseb. præp. ix. 22. C.

Ver. 30. Far. Heb. "over against Galgal, beside the plains of More, or Aluni More.” Samar. reads, “the plain of More, near Sichem,” as Ex. 20:17. H.—This is styled the noble vale. Gen. 12:6. C.—The road from Jericho to the Mediterranean Sea, left these mountains on the north. The Chanaanite inhabited all that region, from Galgal to Sichem. How far these places were distant from each other, is not here specified; though Eusebius seems to have inferred from this text, that Garizim was near Jericho. But the plain might be very extensive or noble, and reach from Sichem as far as Galgala.

Ver. 32. Fulfil. How inconsistent must such exhortations be, if, as Protestants assert, the commandments be impossible, and “the law exacteth impossible things.” Luther in Gal. iii. H.

Ver. 1. These. Having inculcated the general precepts, and the obligation of loving God above all things, Moses now descends to particular duties. C.

Ver. 2. Tree. See Gen. 21:33. All the monuments of idolatry must be destroyed. The very names of the idols must be abhorred and obliterated, (Ex. 23:13,) to shew that they have lost possession of the country. So, (v. 5,) to put his name there, means to take possession of a place.

Ver. 3. Statues. The most ancient idols were not finely carved, but only rough stones. The Phrygian goddess, sent to Rome by Attalus, was a small dark-coloured stone of this nature. Arnob. c. Gentes. 8.—The Venus of the Arabs was but a stone in the form of a pyramid. C.

Ver. 5. It, where the ark was to be kept. H.—Before the building of the temple, it was removed from one tribe or place to another. Jerusalem was thenceforward styled the city of the great king. Ps. 47:1. 9.

Ver. 6. Hands, which you have procured by your industry, (M.) or what you are able to present to the Lord. Lev. 5:11.

Ver. 7. You. In gratitude, you shall therefore offer your victims. H.—The Jews were accustomed to make a feast thrice a year in the holy city. They might also eat some parts of the peace-offerings. M.

Ver. 8. Himself. Some confine this to the sacrifices, which each person might offer, where he thought proper, till the ark was fixed at Silo. But many other parts of the ceremonial law, seem not to have been in force till the Hebrews crossed the Jordan. Amos 5:25. Circumcision was omitted, as well as most of the festivals. Several laws were, however, designed for the people during their sojournment, such as those which regard the order of judgment, the cleanness of the camp, the purification of women, and of those who had touched a dead body, &c. Ex. 18:25. Num. 5:2. Lev. 15:31. It was not left to their option to observe or to neglect the sabbath, (Num. 15:32,) the loaves of proposition, or the perpetual fire, &c. Num. 4:7. 13. C.

Ver. 11. Therein. While you are performing your duty to God, you need not fear the incursions of your enemies; or, according to the Heb.

Sept. and Chaldee, "There shall be a place which ... Thither," &c. M.—Hands. Aquila, &c. have, "your voluntary oblations."—Gifts. Heb. "your choice-vows." C.

Ver. 12. You. The Levite hath no portion of the land like the rest. He and all people in distress shall be invited to these feasts. C. 16:11. M.

Ver. 13. See. On the high places, &c. as the heathens did, (v. 2,) or in any other place but that which God appointed.

Ver. 15. But. Heb. "Yet thou mayst kill and eat the flesh which thy soul desireth in all thy gates, with which the Lord thy God hath blessed thee, the unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the roe buck," &c. H.—The Vulgate translates v. 22 in this sense, intimating that these meats did not contract any such peculiar sanctity, as to exclude those who were unclean, v. 20. Lev. 17:3. Fagius pretends, that only the clean were allowed as yet to eat of such meats, though the unclean might eat in the promised land what was lawful, without bringing the beast to be slain before the tabernacle. But this opinion seems to have no solid foundation. Unclean beasts could never be eaten. C.—But those which had any defect, were excluded from being sacrificed. Lev. 22:22. M.

Ver. 16. Water, without any ceremony. It was afterwards to be covered. Lev. 17:13.

Ver. 17. Tithes. These were of an extraordinary nature, destined for feasts. C. 14:22. Lev. 27:30. The usual tithes belonged entirely to the Levitical tribe. C.—First-born, or the most excellent, v. 11. Ex. 12:11. 12. The first-born, if it proved to be without defect, and a male, was given to the priests. Num. 18:15.—Voluntarily. If the thing was vowed to the Lord without restriction, it fell to the share of the priests alone: but if the person specified that he intended it for a peace-offering, &c. the priest could only claim what was allotted to him by the law. C.—Hands. The fruits of trees, in the fourth year, may be insinuated. Josep. iv. 8. M.

Ver. 18. Hand, in all thy undertakings and labours, (H.) and in all thy goods. M.

Ver. 21. Far off. Hence many conclude, that those who lived near the tabernacle, were bound to bring the animals which they designed for their own use, to be slain there, as they did in the desert. Others suppose that all were under the same predicament, and are hereby authorized to follow the same regulations, and to eat the flesh, whether they be clean or otherwise, provided they abstain from the blood. See Lev. 17:3. C.—The custom of bringing the beasts to be slain before the door of the tabernacle, was to be no longer obligatory. M.

Ver. 22. Alike. This must be understood of those who had contracted only a smaller stain, which did not communicate the uncleanness to others, but debarred people from approaching to sacred things. C.—Those who had touched the dead, &c. were not allowed to eat with people, who were not under any such legal uncleanness. M.

Ver. 23. Soul. See Gen. 9:4. Blood maintains the life of animals, and it would seem cruel to begin to eat them before they were perfectly dead. But the obligation of this positive law has long ago ceased, as it was intended chiefly for the Jews.

Ver. 27. Oblations. Heb. “holocausts ... and the blood of the sacrifices,” of peace. Parts of the latter were eaten by the offerer, but the former victims were entirely burnt. H.

Ver. 30. Imitate. Heb. “be ensnared by imitation them.” The example of the wicked, is one of the most dangerous snares which the devil can place in our way. Notwithstanding these repeated admonitions of God, we see how prone the Hebrews were to adopt the superstitious customs of these nations, whose destruction ought surely to have warned them to keep at a distance. H.

Ver. 31. Fire. See Lev. 18:21.

Ver. 32. That only do thou, &c. They are forbid here to follow the ceremonies of the heathens, or to make any alterations in the divine ordinances. Ch.—To adopt fresh regulations, in the same spirit, was not forbidden. Thus David ordered those who had kept the baggage, to share equally with the soldiers who had gone into battle; (1 K. 30) and our Saviour approved, by his presence, the feast of the dedication of the temple, instituted long after Moses. 1 Mac. 4. Jo. 10. W.—He perfected the law by the precepts of the gospel. Mat. 5:17. Josephus (c. Ap. ii.) says, “During so many years, no one has dared to retrench any thing from, (the sacred books) or to make any addition to them. We look upon them as of divine authority, ... and we would lay down our lives, if necessary, to defend them. (C.) Among us, who believe that the law was first given by the will of God, nothing is pious but the exact observance of it. For who can introduce any change, or invent any thing better?” C. 4:2. Christ is full of grace and truth. Jo. 1. He has fulfilled the law and the prophets. H. S. Aug. c. Faust. xvii. 2. and xix. 9.—“Grace,” says he, “pertains to the fulness of charity, truth to the completion of the prophecies.” D.

Ver. 1. If ... a prophet, or even an angel from heaven, as S. Paul (Gal. 1:8,) says on a similar occasion, (C.) should work a miracle, and afterwards adduce it in proof of a false religion, believe him not. The Jews and Christians had already received such convincing proofs from God, of the truth of what they had been taught, that they had reason to conclude either that the miracle was false, or that the person who would persuade them to embrace a different religion had fallen, after God had honoured him with miraculous powers: or, in fin, that if he were an impostor at the time when he exercised that power, like the magicians of Egypt, or Balaam, the miracle was either not wrought in confirmation of what he preached, or at least it was eclipsed by some greater miracle in favour of the truth. Whether God will ever suffer a real miracle which may seem to countenance error, or not, this appears to be unquestionable, that he will never deny himself, or, in a contest of miracles, permit falsehood to gain the victory. If the magicians performed wonderful works, they were forced at last to confess their inferiority, and yield to Moses. Ex. 8:18. 19. Miracles are generally a proof of any doctrine; but when the doctrine is already established, as in this case of the unity of God, (v. 2,) it may be adduced with propriety as a criterion of miracles. Truth can never be in contradiction to truth. The light of reason suffices to evince that there is but one God. The same truth had been repeatedly confirmed by miracles, particularly during the last forty years, during which God had manifested his power over all nature, in the sight of all the Hebrews, and had trampled on the idols of the Gentiles. If therefore any person should attempt, by his dreams or predictions, to invalidate this most fundamental and undeniable article, his testimony could not be received. H.—The Jews, in vain, allege this passage against the religion of Jesus Christ. He did not subvert, but fulfilled the law; so far was he from endeavouring to persuade them to abandon the true God. C.—If he had not come to act in this manner, the law would have contained in itself the seeds of dissolution, by falsely holding forth the expectation of a future Messiah, who would bring all things to perfection. C. 18:15. Gen. 3:15 and 49:10, &c. Hence when he really appeared, the Jews desired him to prove his mission by a miracle, as he did repeatedly. Mat. 12:38. Jo. 8:40 and 10:25.—A dream, of a mysterious kind, like those of Joseph and of the prophets. H.

Ver. 2. To pass. The completion of a prophecy does not always prove, that the person who uttered it was a true prophet. Chance, a knowledge of natural causes, &c. may enable an impostor sometimes to hit upon the truth. God may also, for reasons known to himself, declare what will come to pass, by the mouth of a false prophet, or of a wicked man, as he did by Balaam and Caiphaz. Judas wrought miracles before his apostacy. C.—Yet if any who had been so highly favoured, should attempt to enforce by their preceding miracles, any false doctrine, let him be anathema. Gal. 1:8.—Not. The Hebrews had inconvertible proofs of the existence of one God. They could not therefore acknowledge any other. H.—Novelty in religion is a mark of idolatry or of heresy. W.

Ver. 3. Trieth you, not in order to induce you to embrace evil, (Jam. 1:13,) nor to discover your real dispositions, but to lay open your hearts to yourselves and to the world, (H.) that, if you continue steadfast, others may be encouraged to imitate you; but if you fall, they may take warning, and stand with all humility and circumspection. C.—Appear. Heb. “to know, or to disclose.” M.

Ver. 5. Forger. Heb. “dreamer,” to whom God reveals his secrets in the night, as he does to the prophet while he is awake.—Slain. Philo says, without any trial or delay; but the Rabbins allow that, although the impostor was not to receive an admonition, no ignorance being able to excuse him, as in other cases, he was to be brought before the Sanhedrim, at Jerusalem, and strangled. See Luc. 13:33. The Jews, it is thought, condemned our Saviour on the plea that he was a false prophet. Mat. 26:57. They commonly required before this condemnation, that a person should have assumed the character of a prophet, and not barely that he should have performed some wonderful work by his ingenuity. For if he only did the latter, and thereby endeavoured to withdraw the people from the service of the true God, he was punished as a seducer. They also refused to condemn one who had foretold evils, if they did not take place, because God, being merciful, might have pardoned those who did penance, (C.) as was the case with Jonas and the Ninivites. H.—But those who taught or did any thing contrary to the law, in quality of prophets, were in danger of condemnation, unless their great reputation might screen them from suspicion. Thus Elias offered sacrifice on Mount Carmel, without giving offence, 3 K. 18:23. If a true prophet bore witness to another, the latter might also claim respect. C.—Yet though S. John the Baptist had repeatedly commended Jesus Christ, the Jews did not hesitate to call him a seducer, and to put him to death. H.—The evil “one.” Syr. 1 Cor. 5:13.

Ver. 6. If thy own brother, to distinguish him from the rest of the Jews, who were all styled brethren, as being descended from the same stock of the Patriarchs. M.

Ver. 9. Presently put him to death. Not by killing him by private authority, but by informing the magistrate, and proceeding by order of justice. Ch. W.—Philo seems to assert the contrary. But he perhaps speaks of those who publicly endeavoured to lead the people astray. Presently in not in Heb. Other criminals were allowed twenty-four hours after condemnation. No delay was granted to false prophets. No excuse was admitted. If he had even been once acquitted, he might be examined again.—Thy hand. The accuser of witness first threw a stone, after the wretch had been conducted out of the city. C. 17:4. Acts 7:58.

Ver. 12. Cities. If the inhabitants agreed, in general, to introduce the worship of idols, they were to be first admonished, (C.) and if incorrigible, to be utterly destroyed. H.—The obligation of seeing that this was executed was left to the magistrates. D.

Ver. 13. Belial: that is, without yoke. Hence the wicked, who refuse to be subject to the divine law, are called in Scripture the sons of Belial. Ch.—The devil is called Belial, or “an apostate, rebel,” &c. The word is also applied to Antichrist, to idols, and to those who are notoriously wicked. S. Jer. in Nahum i. and Isai. xxvii. 3 K. xxi. 13.)

Ver. 15. Even the cattle. Nothing at all must be spared. Yet the Rabbins and some who argue that penal laws must be restrained as much as possible, exempt the women, and boys under thirteen years of age, and understand this law only of the central cities, v. 13. If the city was seduced by one man, or by women, or by people of a different tribe, the culprit was only to be stoned, and the Sanhedrim had to take cognizance of the whole affair. If many cities joined in the idolatry, or if any of them were cities of refuge, &c. they were not included. Seld. Syned. iii. 5. Grotius.—But these limitations seem visibly to contradict the law. The goods of the innocent were involved in the common ruin, that they might learn to make all possible resistance to the introduction of so abominable a crime; and those of the guilty were destroyed wherever they were found. C.—But the persons of those who fled away, to shew their disapprobation, and denounce the attempt of their brethren, (H.) would no doubt be saved. C.—If they continued among them, their indolence or connivance deserved punishment. H.—Grotius (Jur. ii. 15,) maintains, that the magistrate is authorized by the law of nature to punish those who deny the existence of God or his Providence, as these errors strike at the root of all society.—For the Lord, as a victim of expiation, and to manifest your zeal for the honour of the only true God.—No more. Sept. “it shall be uninhabited.” The Rabbins are so exact, as to entertain a doubt whether the place might even be used as a garden. C.

Ver. 17. Hand. Thou shalt reserve nothing for thyself, (M.) as Achan did. Jos. 7. H.

Ver. 1. Be ye. Heb. “you are,” &c. It may be connected with the preceding chapter.—Cut, as the barbarians and infidels do, who have no hope, 1 Thes. 4:12. Lev. 19:29.—Dead idols, Adonis, &c. The Arabs and Saracens cut the hair on the forepart of the head only, and so did the ancient Scotch monks, in imitation, as they pretended, of S. John. The Egyptians cut off the hair of their head and eye-brows when they were initiated in the mysteries of Isis, (S. Amb. ep. 58,) to testify that they partook in her sorrow for the death of her husband, Osiris. Hence it is probable that Moses forbids any conformity in such superstitious practices; particularly as the Israelites were consecrated to the service of the living God. C.

Ver. 3. Unclean. See the annotations on Leviticus 11. Ch.—Some of the beasts here specified were not mentioned before, as the buffle, &c.

Ver. 5. Buffle. Heb. yachmur, which some translate “the fallow-deer.” The Arabs give this name to a beast resembling a hart, which has horns and red hair. C.—It was served up on the table of Solomon, 3 K. 4:23. Pliny (viii. 13,) mentions the bubalus of Africa, which is like a calf. M.—Chamois, (tragelaphum) a beast which has the head of a he-goat, and the carcass of a hart. Scaliger. Plin. viii. 33.—Bochart translates akko after the Arab. “the wild goat.”—Pygarg, another species of goat, (Plin. viii. 53,) of the colour of ashes. Bellon. q. 51. Dishon means “ashes” in Hebrew.—Goat, (orygem) “a wild goat, (Sept.) Bochart; &c.) or ox.” Aristotle allows it only one horn. Juvenal mentions that the Getulians feasted on its flesh; and the Egyptian priests, according to Horus, were allowed to eat it, without any scrupulous examination of the sealers. C.—Camelopardalus. This animal resembles a camel in its head and longish neck, and the panther in the spotted skin. Plin. viii. 18.—Bochart (iii. 21,) thinks that the Heb. zamer, means “a wild goat,” noted for “leaping.”

Ver. 7. Cherogril, or porcupine. Lev. 11:5. S. Barnabas and Clem. Alex. (Pæd. ii. 10,) subjoin the hyena to the hare, though the name occur not in Moses. This animal was supposed to change sexes every year, and was a symbol of incontinency. M.

Ver. 10. Unclean. S. Barnabas adds, “Thou shalt not eat the murena, polypus, or cuttle fish;” and these are in effect of the description given by Moses. C.

Ver. 13. Ringtail (ixion). Heb. raa. The same bird seems to be called dae in Leviticus, by the change of the first letter, though it is there translated the kite. The ixion is a sort of white, quick-sighted vulture. —Kite. Heb. diae, according to Bochart, means the vulture, as Isaias (34:15,) insinuates that this bird goes in flocks, while the kite is a solitary bird.

Ver. 15. Ostrich. Heb. “the daughter of the june.” The Rabbins say only the young ones were eaten. But this seems doubtful, with respect to many nations, which formerly served up ostriches at table. Heliogabalus presented some of these, as well as camel, to his guests, falsely asserting, (C.) that the Jews were commanded to eat them, præceptum Judæis ut ederent. Lamprid.

Ver. 19. Wings. Heb. “every reptile that flieth,” such as bees. C.

Ver. 21. Of itself, or by suffocation.—Stranger, who has not embraced your religion. M.—Hence it is inferred, that the Jews might keep unclean animals, and sell them; as they did not defile till they were dead. Jans.—If they had been unclean by nature, they could not have been sold, which shews that this ceremonial law regarded only the Jewish religion.—Dam. All appearance of cruelty must be avoided. Christ, who is signified by the kid, on account of his assuming our sinful nature, shall not be slain in his infancy. S. Tho. 2. q. 102. a. 6. W.—Some take this prohibition literally, and extend it to calves and lambs. The Arabs use milk in almost all their ragouts. Roger. ii. 2.—Others think that kids must not be eaten while they are as yet too tender, Qui plus lactis habet quam sanguinis. Juv. Sat. xi.—But we believe that God forbids the paschal lamb or kid to be offered while it sucks. It must be of a competent age, of one year. Ex. 12:5 and 23:19. Other victims would do if they were only eight days old. Lev. 22:27. C.

Ver. 22. Tithes. The Jews carried with them some money to buy peace-offerings. E.

Ver. 26. Herds. Heb. “oxen.”—Sheep; under which name are comprised goats.

Ver. 29. Filled. Of this feast the owner did not partake, (S. Aug. q. 20,) as he did of the former, v. 26. M.—Josephus (iv. 8,) acknowledges three sorts of tithes: but Calmet thinks that only two were paid every third year, and that the same tithe is mentioned, v. 22 and 28. Tobias

1:7. The only difference is, that on the third and sixth years, the products were consumed on the spot, and in other years they were spent at Jerusalem. See Lev. 27. Many, however, believe that three tithes were then exacted: 1. For the Levites. 2. For a feast at Jerusalem, and to defray the expenses on the road. 3. For the poor at home. D. &c. H.

Ver. 1. In the. Heb. “at the extremity of seven years,” which some erroneously refer to the end, though the original signify also the beginning. C.

Ver. 2. Again. Heb. does not mention friend. H.—“He shall not exact it, (or urge) his neighbour or his brother, because,” &c. Whence Cajetan gathers, that debts might be demanded after the expiration of the seventh year, on which the products of the earth did not enable the Jews to pay any thing. Grotius also asserts, that perpetual debts might be required; and Menoch, includes things lent under the same regulation. But all debts became extinct as soon as the seventh year commenced; (v. 9. C.) at least they could not be demanded till it was expired; though things merely lent, might be taken back. D.

Ver. 3. Stranger, who has not received circumcision. Such were entitled only to the common privileges of people in distress. They could not claim a share in the feasts, made out of the tithes of the Jews, &c. Grotius.

Ver. 4. There shall be no poor, &c. It is not to be understood as a promise, that there should be no poor in Israel, as appears from v. 11, where we learn that God’s people would never be at a loss to find objects for their charity: but it is an ordinance that all should do their best endeavours to prevent any of their brethren from suffering the hardships of poverty and want. Ch.—Beggar, is not expressed, though it be implied in Heb. or the Sept. which connect this with the preceding verse, (H.) “because (or save when) there shall be no poor among you;” as if the rich could not derive the benefit from the remission of debts. Vatable.—God had made abundant provision for the poor. He might have prevented any from falling into distress. C.—But he suffered this sometimes to take place, to try the dispositions both of the rich and of the poor. H.—If they had faithfully complied with his laws, he would not have permitted them to fall into the last degree of misery. C.—He allows no public begging, which all well regulated nations discountenance. M.—The Jews carefully relieve their brethren. They gather alms, and one of the judges distributes what may be sufficient for the ensuing week. Leo, p. i. c. 14.—Those who refused to give according to their abilities, were formerly ordered by the Sanhedrim to be scourged, till they had complied with their duty; and sometimes, things were taken forcibly from their houses. Maimon.—They relieve the distressed in proportion to their former condition. Seld. Jur. vi. 6.

Ver. 6. Lend. The Jews give a wrong interpretation to this passage, to authorize usury with regard to strangers. But God can never sanction injustice. He promises such riches to his people, if they be faithful, that they shall be in a condition to lend to many, without wanting themselves. C.—Over thee. Hence the Jews submitted to a foreign yoke with so much reluctance. But they should have remembered to keep God's law. H.

Ver. 8. Need of. The Rabbins understand this of giving freely without any prospect of receiving again, much less of any advantage by usury. They esteem themselves bound also, by the laws of humanity, to assist even idolaters, though they will not beg of such, in public. Some assert, that they never allow public beggars among themselves, and indeed such are seldom to be seen. Yet no law forbids it; and Juvenal (vi. 541,) upbraids them with begging slyly at Rome. Arcanum Judæa tremens mendicat in aurem. C.—If people be in extreme want, the law requires that necessities should be given them; but if they be not so far reduced, but that they may be able to pay again in a little time, it may suffice to lend. H.

Ver. 9. Eyes. Heb. “and thy eye be evil against,” &c. This expression denotes one who is a prey to the base passions of avarice, jealousy, envy, &c. C. 28:54. Mat. 20:15. C.—A sin, or draw on punishment. M.—“If thou hast not fed, thou hast killed” thy neighbour in extreme want. S. Amb. Off. ii. 7. W.

Ver. 10. Neither. Heb. “thy heart shall not be evil in giving: for to this end the Lord ... hath blessed thee.” Imitate his clemency.—Hand, in all thy undertakings and possessions.

Ver. 11. Needy. Heb. expresses the order to be observed in giving alms, “open thy hand wide (give with profusion) to thy brother, (or relations,) to thy needy, (in extreme want,) and to thy poor in the land,” whoever they may be. C.—To exercise the charity of his people, God suffered some to be poor. W.

Ver. 12. Free. The Hebrews might sell themselves only to their own countrymen; and the judges might condemn those who had committed a theft, and had not wherewith to make restitution, to be sold to their brethren. See Ex. 21:2.

Ver. 14. Way. Heb. lit. “Thou shalt put round his neck, (or furnish him abundantly) out of thy flock,” &c. This is not specified in the Book of Exodus.

Ver. 17. House, before a judge. It is supposed that this law regarded only those who had sold themselves, or had been condemned to be slaves. Fagius.—For ever; that is, till the year of jubilee.—Also, not by piercing her ear, as some have thought, but by setting her at liberty, and giving her something, v. 14.

Ver. 18. Hireling. His freedom is due to him, as much as wages are due to the hireling. He is also entitled to a decent provision, for which he has laboured. Heb. “he hath been worth twice as much to thee as a hired servant,” by his greater diligence, labour, and fidelity. Servitude has also rendered his worth doubly severe. C.

Ver. 19. Firstlings. Some belonged to the priests. Others, of which Moses speaks here, might be disposed of by the owners. C. 12:17. C.—Thus females, which came first, belonged to them, but they could not work with them; (M.) with such at least as were the best, and fattened for a religious feast. Sheep designed for this purpose were not to be shorn; or, as the original term means, their wool was not to be “torn away.” Bellon observes, that this is still the custom in some parts of the East, as it was formerly in Italy, according to Varro. Plin. (viii. 48,) also remarks, that fleece was torn off in some places, (C.) and the same method is said to prevail still in Shetland. H.

Ver. 22. Unclean. This shews, that they could not be peace-offerings. M. C. 13:15. C.

Ver. 1. Corn. Heb. abib, “green ears of corn,” when barley begins to ripen, and wheat is yet green in Palestine; at the time of the year which corresponds with half of our March and April. The Chaldees called this month Nisan, “of the standards;” because the armies then left thir winter quarters. The first-fruits of the barley harvest were offered on the second day of the paschal solemnity. Lev. 23:10. Ex. 13:4. C.—Night. We read (Ex. 12:22, and Num. 33:3,) that the Hebrews were ordered not to leave their houses till morning, and that they departed from Ramesses on the day after the passage of the destroying angel. They began, therefore, to prepare for their journey on the evening of the 14th, and began their march at day-break on the 15th of Nisan, v. 6. Their departure may be considered in its different stages: 1. Of eating the paschal lamb, with their staves in their hands; 2. of being urged by the Egyptians to depart, at midnight; 3. of their leaving their respective homes, to meet all together at Ramesses; and lastly, of their beginning their march from that place to leave Egypt. They did not, however, quit the confines till they had passed the Red Sea, which took place effectually in the night. Ex. 14:20. 24. H.—Thus they departed in the evening, at night, in the morning, and in the open day. C.

Ver. 2. Phase. Heb. and Sept. “the Phase (or lamb) to the Lord thy God, sheep and oxen,” or “of the flock and the herd,” (Protest.) offered on the same festival, (H.) or victims proper for the solemnity, besides the paschal lamb. Num. 28:19. 2 Par. 30:15. Peace-offerings were also made; (Lev. 6:12. 2 Par. 35:7,) and of these free offerings some explain the words of the Jews, Jo. 18:28,) as they suppose the lamb had been eaten the night before. M. Bochart. T.—They might, however, have refrained from eating of these on that day. C.—But they perhaps did not choose to be debarred of that privilege.—There. The place peculiarly consecrated to the worship of God, for length of days. H.

Ver. 3. Affliction. Heb. also, “of poverty.” Syr. “of humility.” Sept. “of evil treatment;” or such bread as the poorest sort of people and slaves are forced to eat. The Jews serve the bread in small pieces, to denote their former poverty. This unleavened bread is also less palatable, and less wholesome.—Fear. Sept. “in haste.” Ex. 12:11. The psalmist (104:43,) mentions the exultation and joy of the Hebrews, but it was mixed with fear, lest they should lose so great a benefit.

Ver. 6. Phase, or paschal lamb, which was to be sacrificed between the two evenings, during the space of about four hours, in the court before the ark. Some think that this precept was binding only in times of peace; and that when the people could not assemble in the place appointed, they might sacrifice the lamb elsewhere, which seems very probable, though no positive proof can be adduced. In the reign of Amon, when the priests could not perform their sacred functions in the temple, they removed the ark to another place: but Josias caused it to be brought back. 2 Par. 35:3. C.—As the Jews have now no temple, they cannot sacrifice the paschal lamb. T.—The priests were very expert, and observed an admirable order in offering such a surprising multitude of victims, (C.) as would be offered by every family of ten people. H.—The blood, and perhaps the fat also, was presented on the altar of holocausts, which was very large, and the court exceedingly spacious. C.—Which. This may not signify the precise hour, but may refer to all the time while the Hebrews were preparing for and commencing their journey. M. v. 1.—Heb. “at the (return of the) season in which,” &c.

Ver. 7. Dress, (coques.) Heb. bashal means frequently, to boil, and sometimes to roast, as it must here, if it refer to the paschal lamb; the other victims might however be boiled, and the Sept. use both expressions, “Thou shalt boil and roast.” See 2 Par. 35:13. It seems that Moses speaks only of the lamb, the method of preparing which he had abundantly explained before. C.—Heb. has not it, and of course the passage may be understood of all the victims offered on this solemnity. On the morning after it was concluded, people might all depart to their respective homes. The Rabbins observe, that they could not do this on the morning of the 15th Nisan, as it was a solemn festival, on which long journeys were prohibited, and they ought to wait till the end of the seventh day, to make their offering. Under Ezechias and Josias the people appear to have continued together during the whole octave. 2 Par. 30 and 35:17. H.—Others are of opinion that the people might retire home after the 15th, (Tostat) or in the morning after they had eaten the paschal lamb. C.

Ver. 8. Six days after the solemn day is ended, or in all seven (Ex. 13:7. C.); or the seventh day is here remarkable for some particular distinction. M.—Assembly. Heb. “the feast of prohibition, or of withholding,” or rather the festival day, in which all must make their appearance, to do homage to their Lord. Lev. 23:36. C.—Sept. “on the 7th is the dismissal, (or termination) a feast to the Lord.” H.

Ver. 9. Corn: that is, from the 16th of Nisan, (M.) the second day of the paschal solemnity, on which new barley was presented before the Lord, as new wheat was on the second day of Pentecost. Lev. 23:10.

Ver. 10. Hand. Heb. and Sept. “as much as thy hand is able;” an offering, bearing a due proportion with what God has bestowed upon thee. H.—Each one was exhorted to make peace-offerings and feasts, at Jerusalem, in honour of God, v. 11. On these festival days the first-born, fattened animals, were brought to be slain. C. 12:17 and 14:23. The Jews think that by these feasts their solemnities are very much honoured. But the intention of the lawgiver, was only to keep them at a distance from the profane rejoicings of the pagans, and to raise their thoughts and their hearts, by degrees, to the more solid spiritual delights. There were, however, too much inclined to stop at the gratification of the senses, and understood in that sense the sabbath, which Isaias (58:13,) calls delightful, or delicate. Buxt. Syn. x.

Ver. 12. Commanded, in gratitude for past favours.

Ver. 15. In joy. Heb. adds, “surely, or wholly.” Hence the Rabbins esteem it unlawful to marry on these days, lest they should blend sacred and worldly joy together.

Ver. 16. Empty. All were bound to make some offering, which was left to their option, and thus the festivity was much increased, by the abundance of all things; so that all might find a particular pleasure in being present at these feasts, even though they were not influenced by sentiments of piety and of religion. See Ex. 23:15. C.—While the masters of families were from home, thrice in the year, God protected their houses and children from the incursions of enemies, so that they were never more secure. Sanctius. T.

Ver. 18. Magistrates, (magistros,) “masters;” people learned in the law, who may assist the judges with their counsel in any emergency. Heb. shotrim, “officers, heralds, lictors,” &c. C. 1:15. H.—Bonfrere (in Ex. 18:25,) thinks that these were the judges set over each tribe, or else the assessors of the judges. M.—The Rabbins mention three tribunals of the Jews: 1. The Sanhedrim, consisting of seventy judges, with a prince at the head of them; 2. the twenty-three judges, who resided in considerable cities; 3. the tribunal of three judges, who administered justice in the villages, which had not above 120 inhabitants. But Josephus (iv. capt. ult.) only mentions, that Moses established in each city seven judges, who had each two officers of the tribe of Levi.—Gates, where the judges sat.

Ver. 19. Just. Avarice is like a cloud, (C.) which darkens the understanding. Oppression troubleth the wise, and (Heb.) “a present destroyeth the heart.” A timid or interested judge is unfit for his office. Sir Thomas More was very careful not to receive presents, while he was high chancellor of England. H.—If even the just are in danger of being perverted by presents, what must we think of others? D.

Ver. 20. Just. Heb. “thou shalt follow justice.” Thou shalt be guided solely by the dictates of justice, in passing sentence. Ex. 23:1. 9. C.—That judge who passes sentence according to truth, executes his office unjustly if he be actuated by the love of a temporal reward. S. Greg. Mor. 9.

Ver. 21. Tree. The pagans had consecrated different sorts of trees to their idols. They always planted groves near their temples, to increase the reverential awe, and but too often to hide the abominations which were there committed. The Hebrews frequently imitated them in these particulars. Yet Hecateus observes, that no tree was to be seen near the temple of Jerusalem.

Ver. 22. Statue. Heb. matseba, means also a pillar, monument, heap of stones, image, title, &c. Gen. 28.—Hateth, when they are designed for superstitious purposes. On other occasions, statues and pictures may be very instructive and commendable. H.—The patriarchs set up pillars, altars, &c. as did also the Israelites, (Jos. 22:10.) Samuel, &c. even after this prohibition, and without any offence. The Rabbins allow, that the proselytes of justice do well in erecting such monuments of religion, provided they be not intended for false worship. Seld. Jur. ii. 6. H.

DEUTERONOMY 17

Ver. 1. Ox. By this name all bulls, cows, &c. are designated. For it was not lawful to sacrifice any thing which had lost any member. Ex. 12:5. Lev. 1:3.

Ver. 2. Covenant, by incurring the evil of idolatry. C. Heb. 10:29.

Ver. 3. The host of heaven. That is, the stars. Ch.—This species of idolatry was the most ancient and common in the East. Job (31:26, 28) takes notice of the adoration of the sun and of the moon, and calls it a very great iniquity, and a denial against the most high God. He lived in Arabia, and probably not far from the place where Moses was addressing the Israelites. H.—The pagans looked upon the sun and moon as the king and queen of heaven, and the stars as their guards. Plato says (in Phædro) that “the sun marches at the head of the gods, in a winged chariot, and the eleven other gods lead on their bands of demons,” or the stars, &c.

Ver. 5. Stoned, not far from the gates, where they received sentence. Thus the sabbath-breaker was stoned without the camp, (Num. 15:35,) and S. Stephen out of the city of Jerusalem, Acts 7:57. When only a few were concerned, the twenty-three judges passed sentence: but if a whole tribe had been guilty, the cognizance of the affair was left to the Sanhedrim. When a city was infected with this abomination, it was wholly destroyed. But no one was punished, except two witnesses (v. 6,) attested that formal idolatry, by sacrifice, &c. had been committed.

Ver. 6. Slain. When the action was public, this formality was not requisite. C. 13:9.—Him. One witness was never admitted to prove any crime; neither would the Jews receive for witnesses, women, infants under thirteen, slaves, publicans, thieves, &c. Josep. iv. c. ult. The Rabbins also reject other notorious offenders, enemies, relations, and those who had not a competent knowledge of the law, &c. Ap. Seld. Syn. ii. 13. 11. and Grot.—But we could wish for some authors of more credit. C.

Ver. 7. Kill him. Thus testifying that they approve the sentence, and are willing that his blood should be required at their hands, if they had accused him falsely. The criminal was hurled down a precipice by one of the witnesses, and, if he survived, he was stoned by the other, and by the whole people. Maimonides asserts, that the execution took place on some great festival, for the terror and instruction of the multitude; but others call this in question. Fagius. C.

Ver. 8. If thou perceive, &c. Here we see what authority God was pleased to give to the church-guides of the Old Testament, in deciding, without appeal, all controversies relating to the law; promising that they should not err therein; and punishing with death such as proudly refused to obey their decisions: and surely he has not done less for the church-guides of the New Testament. Ch.—Hard. Heb. also means, “doubtful, hidden, divided;” so that the opinions of the judges do not agree. In matters of fact, the thing is more easily investigated on the spot. But in these cases, where the law is ambiguous, as even the divine ordinances frequently are, being delivered in human language, (Grot.) a living judge is necessary. God remits the Jews in the council of the priests, at the head of whom was the sovereign pontiff, who was the natural and supreme judge of such difficulties, v. 9. 12. H.—And blood, to decide when murder must be punished with death, and when the right of an asylum may be claimed. C.—The Vulg. renders the same words, 2 Par. 19:10.—Between kindred and kindred, as the different degrees cause many embarrassments, with regard to marriages, &c. T.—The Rabbins understand that the judge had to declare when a woman was rendered unclean. Lev. 12:4. Lyran.—And cause, or law-suit; some thinking that a greater sum for reparation of an injury should be required, others judging that one of the contending parties should be set at liberty, while the other judges are of a contrary sentiment. Heb. “between judgment and judgment,” when a doubt arises whether laymen or the Levites may be the proper judges. The Rabbins only remit three cases to the tribunal of the latter, respecting, 1. The red heifer; 2. the woman accused of adultery by her jealous husband; 3. the heifer to be offered in sacrifice, for a murder committed by a person unknown. C. 21:5.—And leprosy. Various difficulties might arise concerning this matter, of which the priests had to pass sentence. Lev. 13. Some render the Heb. negah, “wound.” The law of retaliation required a scrupulous nicety. Blood, cause, and leprosy, may denote lawsuits of a criminal, less important, and ceremonial nature. Jans.—Vary. Heb. “which are matters of contention within thy gates.”

Ver. 9. Judge. Moses does not specify whether the contending parties, or the judges themselves thought proper to have the matter debated before a higher court. The Rabbins observe, that appeals to the Sanhedrim were only the last resort, and that the sentence of that tribunal was to be complied with under pain of death, v. 12. Seld. Syned. iii. 2. 2. The judge here mentioned, according to them and the generality of commentators, after Josephus, Philo, &c. is no other than the high priest, as the Scripture plainly indicates. C. 21:5. Eze. 44:24. He abode near the tabernacle, and God enabled him to explain the law, when he was arrayed with the ephod, and the Urim and Thummim. Some moderns, who have an interest to lessen the authority of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, with Calvin, Ainsworth, &c. pretend that an appeal was to be made to the priests, in disputes which concerned religion, and to the civil magistrate in other cases. The latter were indeed commissioned to pass sentence in the different cities. 2 Par. 19:5. C.—But an appeal to the high priest, in doubtful cases, could not be denied. The government of the Jews was a theocracy, and the pontiff acted as the vicerent of God. H.

Ver. 10. Preside. The high priests who are to succeed each other. W.

Ver. 11. According, &c. This law was to be the rule of the priests, in passing sentence. It was not left to the judgment of individuals to comply or not, according as they might explain the law for themselves. Such a proceeding would be nugatory, as they would thus be themselves the ultimate judges of their own cause. H.—They shall seek the law at his (the priest's) mouth. Mal. 2:7. Protestants make, therefore, a very frivolous restriction, when they allow his sentence to bind only “so long as he is the true minister of God, and pronounceth according to his word.” Bible, 1603. W.—If any had been proud enough among the Jews, to persuade himself that he understood the law better than the high priest, he would not on that account have escaped death. H.—The authority of the Christian Church is not inferior to that of the Synagogue, only, “instead of death, excommunication is now inflicted” on the rebellious. S. Greg. Mat. xviii. 17. S. Aug. q. 38. In effect, S. Paul assures us that the priests of the law, serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. But now he (Christ) ... is the mediator of the better covenant, which is established on better promises. Heb. 8:5. If therefore the privilege of deciding points of faith and morality, without danger of mistake, was granted to the synagogue, can any one doubt but that Christ would provide as ample a security to his Church, with which he has promised to remain for ever, and with his Holy Spirit to teach her all the truth? H.—S. Augustine dwells upon this argument (Doct. 4.) and proves the infallibility both of the Jewish and of the Christian Church. Hence Christ said, with respect to the former, which was not yet rejected, All therefore whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do: but according to their works, do ye not: for they say the truth, and do not practise what they require of others. If the heads of the Catholic Church should be equally immoral, their true doctrine must not therefore be despised, lest Christ and his Father be at the same time despised. For this is the express admonition of our heavenly lawgiver, hear the Church: (Mat. 17:17,) and this he does not require without giving us a full assurance, that we may do it without fear of being led astray. The sole command of God implies as much, if he had said no more. For can he order us to sin? The pretended reformers, who blushed not to make this blasphemous assertion, might easily swallow down the other, respecting the defection and fallibility of the whole Church; and might even believe, that the whole world had been drowned in abominable idolatry for eight hundred years and more. Hom. on the peril of idolat. p. 3. How much more they do not determine, lest they should be forced to tell when the religion of the Catholics began, and that they will never do without dating from Christ and the apostles, the foundations of the only true Church. H.—The Jews had such a respect for the decisions of their Rabbins, in consequence of this command of God, that some hesitate not to assert, that if one of them should declare that the left hand was the right, they would believe him; and they condemn the refractory to most grievous torments in hell. Buxtorf. Syn. i.—We must shew the most profound submission to the decrees of the Church. C.—Yet we are not bound to assent to the decisions of every teacher. Only, when the Church speaks, we must not refuse to obey, nor pretend to appoint ourselves judges of what she teaches. A private doctor, however eminent, may fall into some absurdities, but the major part of the pastors of the Church, with the Pope at their head, never can. In vain have the records of nineteen centuries been ransacked, to find a single instance of such a general agreement in error. If the Synagogue passed a wicked sentence upon Jesus Christ, we must reflect that the forms here required (v. 8,) were neglected; and it was then expiring, and giving place to a better covenant, as the prophets had foretold. Yet even in that sentence, which was so unjust on the part of Caiphas, S. John (11:51) acknowledges the truth of God. And this he spoke not of himself: but being the high priest, that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for the nation, and not only for the nation, but to gather together in one the children of God that were dispersed. The Synagogue could claim submission no longer, after the great prophet had come to abrogate the law of fear, and to substitute that of love. Hence while he was there to teach himself, (Heb. 1:2,) there was no danger of deception for the people. But the covenant which he has established is to last for ever: no prophet or lawgiver is promised to introduce any change, or greater perfection, so that no one can plead for an excuse of his rebellion, that the Church may deceive and pass an erroneous judgment; or, if he do, he must be cut off from the society of the faithful, by the spiritual sword; and, dying in that state, without the Church for his mother, he need never expect that God will acknowledge him for his son. See S. Cyp. Unit. Ecc. If an individual pastor should pass such a perverse sentence, the case would be very different. Yet, even in such trying cases, an humble conduct will be the best security and proof of innocence, and God will reward those who have suffered unjustly. H.

Ver. 12. And the decree. Some copies read with Sixtus V. ex decreto, by &c. “decree,” (H.) as if a lay-judge stood ready to put the sentence in execution. C.—But there was no necessity of any farther judgment after the high priest had spoken, who is here declared the sovereign judge. S. Cyp. ep. 55. Heb. “or to the judge.” Amama ridicules his friend, Ant. a Dominis, for saying that the Heb. and Vulg. have et decreto. H.—The Rabbins inform us, that if any judge refused to acquiesce in the decision, and endeavoured to draw others into his opinion, in matters of consequence, (as those are where the guilty is ordered to be cut off,) he was to be strangled, on a festival day, at Jerusalem, that all the people hearing it might fear, v. 13. Seld. Syned. iii. 3. C.

Ver. 13. Pride. Heb. “do presumptuously,” as the Prot. translate. How will they excuse their leaders, Luther, &c. and themselves, from this grievous charge? If the person, who presumed to assert that the leprosy had not infected some one, whom the priests condemned, (v. 8,) could not escape death, shall we esteem those innocent whom the whole Church rejects? Hic niger est, hunc tu Romane caveto. Hor. H.

Ver. 14. King. The Rabbins observe, that one was to be elected before the place for the temple was fixed upon, that the tribes might not contend about that honour. Grotius.—God foresees that the people will insist upon having a king, and gives his consent, reserving to himself the choice, and appointing laws for him, that he may not forget that he is the only lieutenant of the most high. Yet God testified his displeasure, when the Israelites demanded a king, because they did it in a seditious manner, so as to reject the prophet Samuel, whom he had given them for a ruler, in whom they could discover no fault. C. 1 K. 8:7 and 10:19.

Ver. 15. Choose, as he did Saul, David, and Solomon, who succeeded to the throne of his father, though he was not the eldest son. M.—Then the throne began to be hereditary, in virtue of God's promise to David. C.—Brother. The Jews neglected this law, when they willingly recognized the authority of Herod, two years after the birth of Christ. See Gen. 49:10. H.—A stranger might attempt to draw off the people from the service of the true God, and mutual love would not so easily subsist between them. M.

Ver. 16. Horses. Josue and David rendered the captured horses useless, (Jos. 11:6. 2 K. 8:4,) and the judges rode on asses. Judg. 10:4 and 12:14. Solomon began to keep some, and in his days in Egypt was noted for the traffic of horses; though, after Sesostris had intersected the country with canals, they were more neglected. Marsham. Canon. sæc. xiii. and xiv. God did not wish his people to engage in the tumults of war, nor would he permit their king to be puffed up with his own strength. Ps. 19:8 and 32:17. Philo says he would not have them to listen to any one who might promise to conduct them to a better country and thus teach them to lead a wandering life. C.—He precludes also the attempt to conquer Egypt. Heb. “he shall not make the people return to Egypt, in order that he may multiply horses,” by their buying them for him in that country, 3 K. 10:29.—Way. When the people proposed returning, God severely punished them. Num. 14:5.

Ver. 17. Mind, and reign in his name. Heb. “and his heart turn not away” from the worship of the true God, as it happened to Solomon, and to many other kings, whom Moses seems to have had in view. Too great a number of wives would tend to perplex and enervate the king, and to eat up the treasures of his people. The Jewish lawyers allow the king only 18, and they say David and Roboam had that number. But the latter had moreover 60 concubines, (2 Par. 11:21,) and Solomon had many more. In effect, the number seems not to be restricted, and, what is very singular, the Rabbins allow all but the high priest and the king as many as they can keep, though the sages advise people to have no more than four, which seems to be the sentiment of the Mahometans. This liberty was taken by the Jews till the emperors restricted them, A.D. 593. Seld. Uxor. i. 8, &c. Plurality of wives was not formerly a sin, though Solomon offended by too great excess. S. Aug. q. 27. W.—Gold. Immense riches are seldom possessed even by kings, without the oppression of their subjects, and great danger of falling into extravagance. If David amassed so much gold, it was destined for the building of the temple. But Solomon laying on heavy taxes, alienated the hearts of his people, and gave occasion to the revolt of 10 tribes; and Ezechias brought on a severe chastisement by making a parade of his treasures to the ambassadors of the king of Babylon, 4 K. 20:15. C.

Ver. 18. Of this law, perhaps from the 14th verse to the end of the chapter (H.) or the whole Book of Deuteronomy, which contains an abridgment of the law, (Jos. 8:32. M.) or even the five books, which were formerly written without any division, and went under the name of the law. Grotius, &c.—Heb. seems favourable to this last opinion, (C.) “he shall write a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is kept by the priests,” unless Moses might only require that he should have a copy of what he was then delivering. H.—Some say that the king was obliged to take two copies, one of which he was to have always about him. It is not certain whether he was obliged to write himself, as Philo asserts, or another might do it for him. The diadem and the law were presented to Joas, when he ascended the throne, 2 Par. 23:11. C.—If (H.) Josias had not seen a copy of the law before the 18th year of his reign, this precept must have been very ill observed, 4 K. 22:11. C.—But, very probably, that book, which Helcias discovered in the temple, was the autograph of Moses, and therefore made a deeper impression upon all who saw and heard it read, than if it had been read than if it had been only an ordinary copy. This copy might have been mislaid or secreted in those troublesome times; and then the high priest brought it to light again, he as well as the king and all the people, were filled with joy and amazement. H.—It was the custom of the Jews to present a copy of the law to their kings, when they first sat upon the throne; and hence, perhaps, they make a similar present to the Pope, when he goes to take possession of the Lateran church. Morus.—They presented one to Innocent II when he made his entry into Paris, 1146, and another to king Louis the Fat, as Suger informs us. C.—Priests. Temporal princes who desire to become virtuous and wise, will ever take the law of God at the priest’s hands. W.

Ver. 19. Law. Pious Christian emperors and kings have esteemed it their greatest glory and happiness to read and meditate on the holy commandments of God, in order to regulate their conduct, amid the various dangerous occupations of their station. H.—Constantine the Great, Charlemagne, S. Stephen of Hungary, Alphonsus I. of Spain, were noted for the zeal which they shewed in the particular.

Alphonsus of Arragon, had read the Bible, with the Commentaries, 14 times over, and the great Alfred wrote all the New Testament twice over with his own hand. C.—He had translated into English Saxon all or most of the Bible before 900, as king Athelstan did about 925. Encyc. Brit. Bible, &c. Yet the Catholic Church never condemned this conduct of her children, as Protestants would insinuate. Cath. Doct. by N. G.

Ver. 20. With pride. This is not expressed in Heb. but it is clearly (H.) implied. Humility is the most difficult virtue for a prince to practice, amid the flattery of his courtiers, and the splendour with which he is environed. See S. Aug. C. D. v. 24. C.—His sons. Wicked kings seldom left a quiet possession of the throne to their heirs. M.—David and his posterity reigned in succession, by an effect of the divine bounty. C.

Ver. 1. Oblations. Heb. “they shall eat the holocausts of the Lord and his inheritances.” The priests shall have the parts of the sacrifices for peace allotted to them, &c. tithes shall be given to support the Levites. (H.) These parts are what God claims from the people, as their Sovereign, (C.) and these he assigns to his ministers. Sept. “The fruits of the Lord are their inheritance, they shall eat them.” H.

Ver. 3. Due, (judicium.) Moses only mentions a part, having explained the rest. Ex. 29:27. Lev. 7:32.—Breast, (ventriculum.) In the other places pectusculum occurs. Heb. “the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the maw, or caul,” called in Latin omasum, being the last and fattest of the four ventricles, and highly esteemed by the ancients. The cheeks or chaps are specified no where else; so that some think Moses here supplies what he had left imperfect, assigning to the priests the cheeks and tongue. Jansenius supposes that this is only a part of the breast, which appears to have two cheeks when the shoulders are cut off. But Moses here probably speaks not of the peace-offerings, but of the beasts which were killed by the Israelites at home for their own uses, &c. (Clerc) as Philo explains it, (de præm.) and Josephus (iv. 4.) only specifies the right shoulder and the breast, which were given to the priests on these occasions. C.—Sept. “the shoulder, the cheeks, and the last ventricle.” The victims were not, therefore, of a sacred nature; as they were only sacrificed, inasmuch as the blood was to be offered to the Lord. H. See Gen. 43:16.

Ver. 4. Corn, besides those which were offered to the Lord at the feast of Pentecost. Each landholder was bound to give between the 40th and the 60th part of his produce. S. Jer. See Ex. 22:29.

Ver. 5. Stand. This was the usual posture of the priests ministering in the temple, as well as of people praying.—Minister. Sam. and Sept. add, “and to bless in,” &c.

Ver. 6. Levite. In the days of Moses, all the Levites probably assisted in the service of the tabernacle, when they thought proper. But, after they should be dispersed, he encourages them to come willingly. David afterwards divided the priests and the Levites into classes, which were obliged to serve in their turns, 1 Par. 23. &c. Though he derogated from the words of the law, he followed the spirit of the injunction, which was intended to promote the great glory and decency of religion; and even after this regulation, (C.) those who desired, like Samuel, (M.) to consecrate their labours to the Lord for life, or for a long time, were in all probability entitled to the privileges here granted. C.

Ver. 8. Portion. Whence this was taken, whether from the tithes in general, or from the treasury of the temple, or from the revenue of the high priest, &c. does not appear. C.—Fathers. The Levites might possess houses, suburbs, and cattle. M.—Heb. “besides that which ariseth from the sale of his patrimony.” H.

Ver. 10. Fire. This impiety is not punished with death, (Lev. 18:21,) as the burning of children was. Lev. 20:2. Grotius.—It was done in imitation of the latter, and became more common, as it was less cruel; the person who was thus expiated, being to pass between or to jump over fire. The council of Trullo (c. 65,) was forced to condemn this remnant of an abominable superstition. But the other inhuman worship of Moloc, and of other pagan divinities, was certainly very common, and chiefly brought down destruction upon the people of Chanaan. See Jer. 19:5. Ezech. 23:37. Ps. 105:37. 4 K. 17:31. Ennius says, Pæni sunt soliti suos sacrificare puellios. See S. Aug. C. D. vii. 17. S. Jer. in Jer. vii. 31. C.—Soothsayers. The original term may also signify, “that useth divination.” Both those who set up for diviners, and those who consult them, are condemned. H.—Hisconi explains it of a superstitious practice, by which a person measured a stick with his finger, saying first I will go; and then I will not; and if, when he came to the end of the stick, he had to say I will go, he determined to begin his journey. See Ezech. 21:21.—Dreams. Heb. mehonen, (Lev. 19:26,) may denote one who judges from the sight of the clouds, or feigns revelations.—Wizard. Heb. “witch.” Sept. “poisoner,” or one who gives things to do harm. Rabbins.

Ver. 11. Charmer of serpents. Ps. 57:6. One who makes a compact with the devil.—Spirits. Python was the name of the serpent which Apollo slew. It might be derived from the Heb. patah, “to seduce,” because a serpent seduced Eve, and dealers with the devil generally deceived those who consult them. Sept. “a belly talker,” as these impostors muttered some sounds, imitating that a spirit gave answers from their belly, See Isai. 29:4.—Tellers. Heb. “wise men.” H.—Those who promise great knowledge from the secrets of the caballa, or magic.—Dead. Necromancy was already very common. Thus the witch of Endor made the ghost of Samuel appear to Saul, 1 K. 28:7. The Rabbins say that the person took a bone, or the skull of the dead, when he intended to enquire into futurity. Drusius.

Ver. 13. And without spot. This is by way of explication of the word perfect. Any mixture of superstition in the worship of God is hateful to him; and that man who acknowledges any other spirit capable of foretelling what will come to pass, freely (H.) denies the Lord. C.

Ver. 14. God, who has already informed thee how to proceed in difficult emergencies, (C. 17:8,) by having recourse to the council of priests, and will also, after any death, send in due time a succession of true prophets. Heb. “God hath not suffered thee” to imitate those nations; (H.) or those prophets, whom the Lord thy God will give thee, shall not resemble these (C.) soothsayers (or observers of times) and diviners. H.—They shall be filled with my spirit. C.

Ver. 15. Prophet. This passage plainly proves, that the Scripture may have many literal senses: for the context insinuates that God would supply the wants of his people, so that they should not need to go far in order to consult diviners, since they should have leaders and prophets, after the death of Moses, who might explain to them God’s will, as they had desired; but, at the same time, it clearly refers to the Messias, as it is explained by S. Peter, (Acts 3:22. W.) and by S. Stephen, Acts 7:37. The Jews, at that time, were convinced of the truth of this application: but they only denied that Christ was the Messias. They have since gone a step farther, and deny that it regards the Messias, some referring it to Josue, others to Jeremias, &c. Ap. Munster & Fag. But surely what other prophet could be compared with Moses? C. 34:10. What other man reunited in his person the qualifications of lawgiver, chief of God’s people, mediator, &c. or who was like him? Hence prophet is written in the singular, to denote his eminent dignity. S. Aug. c. Faust.—S. Philip recognized the claim of Jesus, as did the people after the multiplication of bread, Jo. 1:45 and 6:14. God the Father seems to allude to this passage, according to the remark of Tertullian, (c. Mar. iv. 22,) when he says hear ye him, (Lu.

9:35,) as S. Cyprian believes our Saviour does also, Jo. 5:46. S. Athanasius (c. Arianos 2,) condemns the error of the Jews, who would apply this passage to any other prophet but to the Messiah. If they could be excused for denying him this latter claim, they surely cannot in calling in question that Jesus was a true prophet, since he has all the marks of one; (Grotius) and if they would once acknowledge this, they must soon confess that he is also the Messiah, and the Son of God, as these truths are so necessarily connected. C.—The miracles of Moses were far exceeded by those of Jesus Christ, and the latter conversed more intimately with this eternal Father, &c. M.

Ver. 16. Die. This promise is not recorded, Ex. 20:19. God will send you a mediator, who shall hide the splendour of his divinity C. under the form of a servant. Phil. 2:7. H.

Ver. 18. Mouth. So Christ says, The words that I speak to you, I speak not of myself. Jo. 14:10.

Ver. 19. Revenger. S. Peter (Acts 3:23,) reads, And it shall be that every soul which will not hear that prophet; (instead of Heb. “my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him,”) or he shall be destroyed from among the people. Tert. c. Mar. iv. 22. H.—God now chastises the faithless Jews. D.

Ver. 20. To say. These denote heretics, as the following point out apostates. W.

Ver. 22. Fear him. Sept. “you shall not spare him,” but cut him off by death. H.—Though the completion of what has been foretold be not a sure sign of a true prophecy, (C. 13:2,) yet when the thing does not come to pass which the prophet had spoken unconditionally, he must undoubtedly be rejected; as also when he speaks in the name of false gods. No miracles can then establish his credit. The prophecy of Jonas, and many of the other prophecies, were conditional. C.

DEUTERONOMY 19

Ver. 2. Cities. These were Hebron, Sichem, and Cades, on the west side of the Jordan. Jos. 20:7. Those on the east were already appointed. C. 4:41. Three others might also have been added, (v. 8. C.) in case the Hebrews had gotten full possession of the countries as far as the Euphrates. H.—The cities of refuge were not above forty-five miles distant from each other, in the land of Chanaan. Those in Galaad were not so far off, as the territory was smaller. C.

Ver. 3. Way, and keeping all in good repair, with guide-posts at the crossroads, on which Oleaster says moklot, “escape,” was written. See Num. 35.

Ver. 6. Grief. The law granted so much to the sudden passion of a relation, who met the man slayer out of the cities of refuge, as not to punish him if he gave way to the dictates of vengeance, how unjust soever. C.

Ver. 7. At equal, &c. This addition is not in Heb. (C.) or the Sept.; (H.) but is conformable to the regulation given, v. 3. C.

Ver. 8. And when. Sept. “but if.” This condition was never fulfilled, at all times; (v. 9,) and therefore the Israelites could blame only themselves, if the promises which God had made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (Gen. 15. 26. 28 and 35) were not realized. H.—Though the country was conquered under David and Solomon, the Israelites did not drive out the former inhabitants, (C). nor did they keep possession for any long time. H.

Ver. 12. His city. Strict enquiry was made into the circumstances attending the manslaughter. Num. 35:12. If the refugee was proved guilty, he was delivered up to the next relation of the deceased to be put to death. H.

Ver. 13. Innocent. Many Latin copies have “guilty blood,” noxium. By putting the offender to death, Israel was expiated from the blood which had been shed unjustly. C.

Ver. 14. Landmarks, either which divided the tribes, or the inheritance of individuals. The former were strictly kept up till after the captivity. Those who removed the latter were to be scourged for theft, and again for disobeying this law. Seld. Jur. vi. 3. Josephus (iv. 8) understands that encroachments on the territories of others, which give rise to many wars, are hereby prohibited. C.—So are likewise innovations in religion. The Romans had a superstitious veneration for these landmarks, which they adored under the name of the god Terminus, (H.) crowning them with flowers, and offering cakes and sacrifices to them. Spargitur et cæso communis Terminus agno. Ovid. Fast.—They punished the crime of removing them either with death, banishment, or a fine.

Ver. 15. One would suffice to make an enquiry into the affair, and to oblige the person accused, in pecuniary matters, to take an oath that he owed nothing. Maimonides.—Stand. This expression was become proverbial, to denote the certainty of a thing. Mat. 18:16. 2 Cor. 13:1. Two witnesses can not so easily carry on a cheat, (C.) as was seen in the case of Susanna. H.—The law is satisfied with moral certainty. C.

Ver. 16. Transgression against the law, by apostacy or by idolatry, (Junius) or by any other grievous crime. The person accused might, in this case, be examined, but he could not be condemned unless another witness appeared. Demosthenes (c. Aristocrat.) informs us how (C.) the Athenians (H.) required the witness in criminal matters, to swear on the flesh of a wild boar, ram, and bull, that he spoke the truth, and to utter horrible imprecations against himself and family, if he did otherwise. C.

Ver. 17. Lord, in the tabernacle. M.—Judges. Hence it appears evidently that the priests were to pass sentence in all difficult questions, as well in those which regarded individuals, as in those which attacked the worship of God; since the false accuser is to lose his life or limb, according as he had attempted to injure his neighbour; (v. 21,) and the Lord ratifies their sentence. C.

Ver. 20. Things. This is the design of penal laws, to render justice to the innocent, and to prevent the spreading of a contagious evil, by cutting off the hopes of impunity. Grot. Jur. ii. 10. 9.—“I would cause the criminal’s throat to be cut, says Seneca, (de Ira ii.) with the same countenance and mind as I kill serpents and venomous animals.”

Ver. 21. Pity. This regarded the judge, who must act with impartiality. W.—The law admits of no mitigation, but inflicts the same punishment on the calumniating witness, as he intended should fall upon his brother. Lyran. &c.—Some Rabbins (apud Fag.) pretend that this was executed with rigour, only when the innocent had sustained some real injury. See Ex. 21:24. C.

Ver. 1. Egypt. Hence it appears that the doctrine of the Quakers, who condemn all wars, is contrary to that of God. If they were always essentially unlawful, He would never have authorized them. H.

Ver. 2. Priest. Eleazar, the high priest, acted in this capacity in the war against Madian, and sounded the trumpet, as it was not beneath his dignity. Many priests always attended the army, (C.) the captain of whom (H.) first made the declarations (v. 5. 6. 7,) to the whole army; and these were repeated by the inferior priests at the head of each company, when the army was set in array. So were also the promises of protection, (v. 3. 4,) when all were ready for battle. The Rabbins assert, that the option was granted only in those wars which were undertaken without the express command of God, and that officers were placed in the rear with hatchets or scythes, to cut the legs of those who attempted to flee. Grotius, &c.—But this seems to be an invention of their own, and Moses makes no distinction between voluntary wars and those of precept. These regulations were, no doubt, observed, through the sacred historians do not mention the particulars. C. See 1 Mac. 3:56.

Ver. 3. Back. Heb. “do not quake,” (H.) or fall into disorder, hurry, &c.

Ver. 4. God. All must be done in his name, by the direction of his ministers. The Jews pretend that the ark was carried in the midst of the army. But this does not seem to have been generally the case. C.—Of you. “We must co-operate, being assisted” by God, as S. Aug. (q. 30,) observes, in our spiritual conflicts. D.

Ver. 5. Captains. Heb. “shoterim, (Sept. grammateis,) shall proclaim to the people.” Whether these were the chief officers, or only heralds, does not appear. C.—They were probably the priests attached to the army, v. 2. See C. 1:15. H.—Dedicate it. Heb. “begin to use it,” on which occasion a feast was made. Jans.—Ps. 29 seems to have been intended for such a solemnity. At the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem great rejoicings were made, 2 Esd. 12:27. Josephus and the Rabbins allow a whole year for the occupation of the house, before the builder or new owner, could be obliged to go to war, in like manner as that term is specified for a person who had lately married a wife. C. 24:5. The ancient Greeks deemed it a great misfortune to leave a house unfinished and a new wife desolate, which was the case of Protesilaus. Homer, Il. i.

Ver. 6. Common. Heb. “hath not profaned it.” M.—During the three first years, the fruit was not eaten. In the fourth it was sacred to the Lord, and given to the priests, so that the owner could not partake of the fruit till the fifth year, when it ceased to be in a manner sacred. Jonathan translates, “and has not redeemed it,” by paying the first-fruits of the fifth year. Sept. “has not rejoiced in it,” by feasting, as was probably the custom at the first vintage. Other fruit-trees entitled the owner to the like privilege. Schikard. Jus. reg. 5.—Whereof all may eat, is added by the Vulg. to explain what is meant by common. C.

Ver. 7. Taken her. It was customary to leave the espoused virgin in her father's house for the space of a year, (during which time, if she proved unfaithful, she was punished like an adulteress. C. 22:23, &c.) and she could not be given till she was 12 years old. If she were 13 complete, when she was asked in marriage, she was only obliged to wait 30 days. Seld. Uxor. ii. 1. C. 25:5. Philo allows this immunity from war, only to those who had espoused a virgin. They were also freed from paying taxes, mending roads, &c. C. 29:5. C.—Those who are entangled with worldly cares, are apt to discourage the valiant, and to dissuade fighting, for fear of losing these advantages: much more are those in danger who have to fight for a heavenly kingdom, if they be too much attached to the things of the earth. W. H.—“That man who is enslaved to his wife, cannot serve in the warfare of the Lord.” S. Jer. c. Jov. i.

Ver. 8. Fear. Such often occasion the loss of battles. Alexander sent away all who had not courage to follow him in his expeditions. Curt. x. The Rabbins condemn these faint-hearted soldiers to carry water, &c. for the army, to prepare the roads and places for encampments. C.—But this seems contrary to the intention of the lawgiver, who sends them back to their houses.

Ver. 9. Man. Heb. and Sept. “when the officers have made an end of speaking to the people, they shall appoint captains of the armies to lead forth the people.” H.—It seems rather late to have this to do, when the battle was ready to commence, unless perhaps the whole was arranged in a general assembly, when no one was at the head of the people, (C.) as was sometimes the case in the days of the judges. H.—Heb. of the Massorets implies, “The princes of the army shall make a review (or take down the numbers) at the head of the people.”

Ver. 10. Peace. Interpreters are not agreed whether this law was general, and included the nations whom God had ordered the Hebrews to exterminate, or not. They were nothing but the executioners of his decree. They were commanded not to marry any of their daughters, but to put all to fire and sword. Ex. 34:15. 16. The cities which were not assigned to them for a possession, were to be treated in a different manner; (v. 15,) and hence the Gabaonites, being convinced that they were comprised in the number of the devoted cities, pretended that they came from a great distance. Josue, (9:4. 7,) and the heads of the people, acknowledge that they could not make a league with those nations whose land they were to possess. Yet the Gemarra of Jerusalem asserts, that Josue proposed to the Chanaanites, “flight, peace, or war.” The Gergesites hereupon fled into Africa, the Gabaonites accepted peace, and 31 kings declared for war. Seld. Jur. vi. 13.—Maimonides and Grotius (Jur. ii. 13,) maintain, that no war can be lawful, unless an offer of peace be made. The latter undertakes to prove, that the commands respecting the Chanaanites were conditional, and presupposed that they would not yield to the terms which were offered. Hence Rahab was saved, the league with the Gabaonites was kept, even after it was known who they really were. Solomon, who conquered some of the surviving Chanaanites, did not think himself bound to destroy them, 3 K. 9:2. 2 Par. 8:7. The reason why they seem to be consigned to death without pity, is because God foresaw their evil disposition, as Josue (11:20,) insinuates, and the Israelites under his eye gave quarter to some Chanaanites. "War, says S. Aug. (ep. 189. ad Bonif.) is waged only that peace may be obtained." But these arguments do not seem so convincing, as to take away the opposition which God has established between these devoted nations and others, v. 15. What he commands cannot be unjust, and the army only executes his sentence. S. Aug. in Jos. q. 10. Grotius allows that he foresaw the obstinacy of the Chanaanites, so that it would have been useless to offer them any terms; and if effect, we find no vestiges of any being offered in the books of Moses or of Josue. C.—Yet see C. 21:10. H.—The Israelites might have many reasons for going to war either with their brethren, or with foreign nations, as to punish a heinous crime, a rebellion, &c.; (see Judg. 20. 2 K. 10:4 and 20:15,) on which occasions they were bound to offer terms. C.—"A wise man ought to try every expedient before he takes up arms." Terence.

Ver. 11. Tribute. This was usually imposed by the victor, to defray the expenses of the war, and to prevent its breaking out again. The kings of Moab had to pay 100,000 rams, and as many sheep, to the kings of Juda, 4 K. 3:4. Hiram gave 120 talents of gold to Solomon, by way of tribute, 3 K. 9:15. Josue and Solomon condemned some of the Chanaanites to manual labour, 2 Par. 8:8.

Ver. 12. Besiege it. The Rabbins assert, that when the city of Madian was attacked in the days of Moses, one side was left unmolested, that the inhabitants might escape, and that this practice was afterwards observed as a law. But we see nothing of the kind in Scripture.

Ver. 14. Excepting women, &c. These were supposed incapable of making any resistance, or of carrying arms. Slaves also were excused, on account of their want of liberty to choose for themselves, and old men, unless the war was undertaken by their advice. "I am not accustomed to wage war with captives, nor with women," said Alexander. Curt. 5.

Ver. 16. Live. Heb. "thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth."

Josephus (iv. 8.) acknowledges that all were to be slain; though some of the Rabbins have supposed that they might be spared, if they would abandon idols, &c.

Ver. 17. Jebusite. Sam. and Sept. add “the Gergesite.” C.

Ver. 19. Not a man. Heb. “the tree of the field, man.” Which the Protestants supply, “is man’s life to employ them in the siege.” Sept. “is the tree ... a man?” H.—We might render the Heb. “as for the tree of the field, it shall come to thy assistance in the siege.” v. 20. H.—They are “like men,” and may be of great service in making warlike engines. They are here contrasted with fruit-trees, which must not be cut down, unless they be in the way, or of service to the enemy. All other things of the same nature, as houses, corn, water, &c. must be spared, as well as those who do not bear arms. Yet God ordered the houses to be demolished in the war with the Moabites, 4 K. 3:19. C.—Pythagoras enjoins his disciples not to spoil a fruit tree. Jamblic and the greatest generals have complied with this advice. C.

Ver. 20. Engines. Heb. matsor. Besieged cities were surrounded with palisades, for which a great deal of wood was requisite. Lu. 19:45. Josephus (Bel. v. 31,) informs us, that Titus surrounded Jerusalem with a wall in the space of three days, having cut down the wood all around. See 4 K. 6 and 17. and 25. Ezech. 26:7. C.

Ver. 1. Land. The Jewish doctors hence infer, that if the corpse was found hanging or drowned &c. or nearer a town of the Gentiles than one of the Israelites, this law did not oblige. They are so exact as to dispute whether the distance must be measured from the nose or from the naval of the deceased. Seld. Syned. iii. 7. But the law shews us, that the author of the murder must be discovered, if possible, as the crime is so grievous as, in a manner, to defile the land, and draw down the vengeance of God, if it be carelessly left unpunished. C.

Ver. 2. Ancients and judges. After the strictest inquiry, if the murderer could not be discovered, the magistrates and senate of the neighbouring cities measured which city the corpse was nearest. Josep. iv. 8. The Rabbins pretend that five of the Sanhedrim were commissioned to make this enquiry, along with the magistrates of the neighbourhood. Others think that the ancients were only the old men. The measuring took place only when the point was contested, and those cities are probably meant, which were of sufficient importance to have twenty-three judges fixed in them. C.—It was presumed that the nearest had been guilty of greater negligence. H.

Ver. 3. Heifer, not above three years old, say the Rabbins. The pagans esteemed those victims more agreeable to the gods, which had not been yoked. Chermon observes, that the Egyptians rejected such as had been once “consecrated to labour.” Grotius.—This circumstance might here indicate, that the murderer was a son of Belial, or “without yoke;” (C. 13:13. M.) and the heifer was slain to shew what he deserved, and must expect if he be discovered. H.

Ver. 4. Valley. In such places murders are most frequently perpetrated. Heb. may signify, “a desert,” deep or inaccessible torrent, (H.) on the side of which the heifer was to be slain, and its body was then, it seems, thrown into the water. The ancients first washed their hands over her. Thus the victim of malediction against those who break a covenant, is buried in a ditch, or cast into the sea. Hom. Iliad i.—Was. Some translate the Heb. “shall be,” as if the place was to be hereafter considered as unclean and accursed. C.—The roughness and depth of the valley, denote the hardness of the murderer’s heart, and the depth of his malice. M.—Strike off, or cædent, “cut the neck,” (H.) at the top, without perhaps separating it entirely from the body. Blood was given for blood, and this was the chief design of the bloody sacrifices. For this reason, the Egyptians impressed a seal upon the horns of the victim, representing a man kneeling, with his hands tied behind his back, as if ready to receive the stroke of death. Plut. Isis.

Ver. 5. Judged. We see here again the great authority of the priests. C. 17:9. Heb. “by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried,” as the Prot. render it. H.—Some understand by stroke, the leprosy, of which they were undoubtedly the judges. But it is better to explain it of all wounds, and even of death, (C.) concerning which Moses is here speaking. H.—The Rabbins restrain the authority of priests as much as they can, to give greater power to their chimerical Sanhedrim. They pretend here that they had only to pronounce the blessing, v. 8. Josephus (iv. 8) joins the magistrates with them in the whole ceremony. This awful meeting of so many people, tended to discover the authors of the murder, as all would naturally converse together on the subject, and each person declaring what he knew, some suspicions might at last be formed, which might by degrees lead to the detection. Josephus says rewards were proposed to any who might make a discovery. Draco decreed, that on the very day when a murder was announced, if the author was not known, the whole people (of Athens) should be purified. C.—Abulensis insinuates, that if the murderer was present in the crowd, he might be detected by blood gushing from to corpse of the deceased, &c. as God often brings murder to light in a wonderful manner. Cic. Div. 1. T.

Ver. 6. Wash. This was intended to testify that they were not guilty of the blood which had been shed, and that they wished to remove the punishment of it from themselves upon the head of the heifer, (C.) the representative of the unknown murderer. So Pilate conformed to this custom, when he condemned Christ on the bare accusation of the Jews; (Mat. 27:24,) and the priest, at mass, washes his hands, as an emblem of that innocence, with which he ought to approach the holy of holies. H.—Asterius was stricken with lightning, for touching the altar of Jupiter without having washed his hands. Natal. Myth. i. 10. 14. The pagans generally purified themselves with fumigations, or by sprinkling sea water upon their bodies. Achilles ordered the things which had been used to purify the Greeks, at the siege of Troy, to be thrown into the sea, as being unclean. Iliad i.

Ver. 7. It. Magistrates are in some degree responsible, if by their neglect the high roads are unsafe. C.—They had testified that they had done their duty. W.

Ver. 9. And, &c. Heb. “Thou shalt put away,” (H.) or “extinguish the voice of innocent blood,” which otherwise would cry to heaven for vengeance. Gen. 4:10. In this sacrifice, (C.) though it deserves not the name, (M.) we may consider Jesus Christ suffering for the sins of others. C.

Ver. 10. Captives. Some Rabbins say this was only lawful in what they call voluntary wars, which the Lord had not commanded, as in those which were waged against the devoted nations it was not permitted to reserve the women, even though they should embrace the true religion. Calmet seems to be of the same opinion in the proceeding chapter, to which he even refers. But here he thinks that, upon their complying with the condition specified, they might be married, as Rahab was, and consequently this law must be considered as an exception to those general laws, which prohibit matrimony with those nations of Chanaan, which were otherwise ordered to be entirely destroyed. C. 6:16. “We believe,” says he, “that if these women changed their religion, they might be espoused, of whatever nation they may be.” He seems still to exclude the Chanaanite women, (C. 23:3,) which variation of sentiment shews that the point is not to be easily decided. H.

Ver. 11. Lovest her. The Jewish doctors explain this of an action, which modesty disallows, and which they tolerate nevertheless in the first transports of victory; (Seld. Jur. v. 13,) though the pagans condemned it as unjust and contrary to reason. Grot. Jur. iii. 4.—All know with what reserve Alexander treated women; and the Romans banished one Torquatus, for having violated a prisoner of war. Plut.—Yet the Jews blush not to assert, that such liberties might be taken even with married women, as their former marriage with a pagan was by some deemed null, and by others thought to be dissolved. Josep. iv. 8. C.—The law, however, seems only to allow the marrying of those who had no husbands before, as the women are only said to mourn for father and mother, v. 13. H.—On these occasions the Chinese, and probably the Egyptians also, and the Roman matrons, formerly clothed themselves in white, while almost all other nations assumed black. T.

Ver. 12. Hair. In mourning, people did the reverse to what they were accustomed to do in the days of joy. The men let their hair grow, the women cut this ornament of their head, a thing which the prophets often threaten. Is. 15:2–3. Jer. 47:5. &c. C.—Nails. Some would translate the Hebrew “she shall make her nails grow,” as a mark of sorrow, perhaps usual among the pagans faciet ungues. But the Sept. Philo, &c. agree with the Vulg.; (M.) and the Heb. may very well have the same sense. We must not judge of the idea which others have of beauty, by our own sentiments. Some women in America have long nails, and esteem them as marks of beauty and nobility; and in China, they let those of the left hand grow, and cut them in mourning. Hist. Sin. iii. 1. The people of Mauritania take a pride in having long nails. Strabo xvi. The Duke of Burgundy, not 300 years ago, was distinguished among the slain, before Nancy, in France, (H.) by the length of his nails; (C.) and, in ancient times, people never cut them in voyages at sea, unless to express their grief in extreme danger. Huic fluctus vivo radicitus abstulit ungues. Propert. iii. Petron. Why, therefore, might not these captives follow the same custom, as all depends on fashion? C.—The woman being deprived of her ornaments, the passion of the soldier might probably abate. S. Jerom (ep. 84,) applies this to worldly learning, which he endeavoured to make subservient to the truth, after he had cut away what was dead and pernicious in it. D.

Ver. 13. Raiment. In mourning, people wore different clothes from what they did at other times. 2 K. 14:2.—One month. So long the mourning for Aaron and Moses continued. C. ult. Num. 20. M.

Ver. 14. Her. Nothing shews the weakness of the Hebrews more than this liberty, which the law was in a manner forced to allow, to prevent greater evils. The soldier who has married a captive, may abandon her, if he set her free, (C.) which was but a slight punishment for his inconstancy.

Ver. 15. Two wives. Moses never expressly (H.) sanctions polygamy; but he tolerates it frequently, as excused by custom, the example of the Patriarchs, &c. a toleration which Christ has revoked, as contrary to the primary design of God, and the institution of matrimony. C. Mat. 19.

Ver. 16. Hated, or less loved. H.—The inheritance goes to the first-born independently of the father's disposition, in order to prevent the disturbances which would otherwise have taken place in families, where the different wives would have been continually endeavouring to get their respective children preferred before the rest. David, indeed, assigned the throne to Solomon, to the exclusion of Adonias; but this was done by the command of God. 3 K. 1:17. The regulation of Jacob, in favour of Joseph, was made prior to this law. The Jewish doctors inform us that a father cannot disinherit any of his lawful heirs, except the judges ratify his sentence, while he is in health. But if he be dangerously ill, his verbal declaration will suffice, provided he appoint some one whom the law does not reject. For if he were to make a Gentile his heir, the will would be null. The testament must be made in the day time, for which they cite Eccli. 33:24. They say likewise that a father may, while living, give his effects to whom he pleases, and by this means disinherit his children; or he may give the succession to one of them, who is then considered as a tutor of the rest, and is bound to maintain them with necessaries till the year of jubilee, when each may claim his respective share. Seld. Succes. c. xxiv. But all these regulations seem to contradict the law. C.

Ver. 17. Double portion. If a person left six children, his effects were divided into seven equal parts, and the eldest son received two of them, though others think that he was entitled to one-half of the whole, (C.) in order to enable him to support the dignity of the family, (H.) and the greater expenses which he had to incur for sacrifices and solemn feasts. Grot.—If he were dead, his children or heirs were entitled to his portion. This was the prerogative of the first-born, 1 Par. 5:2. Selden.—The right to the priesthood, if they might have claimed it before the law, was now given to the family of Aaron. Females had no privilege above one another. They received equal shares, when there was no male issue, Num. 36. H.—First. Heb. “the beginning of his strength.” See Gen. 49:3.

Ver. 18. Son. The Rabbins do not look upon children as bound by the law, till they be 13 years old. Their faults, before that age, are imputed to the father, and he is to be punished for them. When, therefore, a son has attained the competent years, the father makes attestation of it in the presence of ten Jews, declaring that he has instructed his son in the commandments, customs of the nation, and daily prayers; and that he now sets him at liberty to answer, in future, for his own faults, praying that God would enable him to lead a virtuous life. C.

Ver. 19. Ancients. In considerable cities there was a tribunal of three, and another of 23 judges. The former took cognizance of the first accusation, and condemned the stubborn child to be scourged: but the latter sentenced him to be stoned in case of a relapse, provided both parents concurred in prosecuting their son, as they would not both surely be guided by passion. Theod. q. 20. The Rabbins, according to their custom, modify this law, and exempt girls, orphans, and boys under 13 years of age. Seld. Syned.—Josephus (xvi. 17,) says that the parents laid their hands on the head of the undutiful, and then all the people stoned him. Moses has not specified the punishment of parricides, (C.) as he deemed it next to impossible. H.—But we may hence judge how he would have chastised so heinous a crime. The Romans formerly sewed such wretches in a leathern sack, (Cic. Invent. ii.) but afterwards they enclosed with them a dog, a cock, a viper, and a monkey; and having first whipped them so as to fetch blood, placed them in a chariot drawn by black oxen, and hurled them into the sea or into some river. Justinian.—Solomon sentences those who contemn their parents to be the food of crows and eagles. Prov. 30:17. No restraints were laid by the ancient Greeks on the authority of a father, as he was esteemed the most equitable judge. Sopater, ap. Grot. C.

Ver. 22. Gibbet. Whether the person was first killed, as the Jews assert, or he was left to die upon the gibbet, see Calmet's Diss. It is also a matter of doubt, whether he was nailed to the gibbet, or hung on it by a rope. Bonfrere.

Ver. 23. Of God. Chal. "he has been fixed on the gibbet for sinning against God." Sym. and Arab. "he has blasphemed the Lord." Syriac, "the man who has blasphemed shall be hung." Only people accused of great crimes such as blasphemy and idolatry, were condemned to this reproachful death, and prayers were not said for them in the synagogue, as they were for other persons, during the 11 months following their decease. C.—They are not to be remembered before God. Their dead bodies are to be buried before sun-set, that the country may not be defiled. The punishment itself is extremely infamous, and the name of God is often used by the Jews, to express something in the highest degree, as the cedars of God, &c. H.—Some understand this passage, as if the body were not to be left on the gibbet, because man, being created to the likeness of God, he will not allow the body to be insulted. Homer (Il. xxiv.) says that Achilles offered an insult to the earth, when he dragged the dead body of Hector round the walls of Troy. Others think, that the criminal having been treated with due severity, as accursed of God, his corpse must not be deprived of decent burial. Res sacra miser. The Jews refused this privilege to none but suicides, (Josep. Bel. iii. 25,) while the Egyptians and Phœnicians suffered the bodies to rot upon the gibbet, whose inhumanity God here reproves. S. Paul reads this verse in a different manner both from the Heb. and Sept. leaving out of God, and substituting, with the Sept. the words every one, and on a tree. Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree. Gal. 3:13. S. Jerom remarks, that on this, as well as on other occasions, he adheres to the sense, without following the express words of Scripture. He also observes, with Tertullian, that only those are declared accursed by the law, who are hung for their crimes; and as Jesus Christ suffered not for any fault of his own, but being willing to appear in the character of one accursed, he has procured for us all blessings. C.—In a mystical sense, that man is accursed who is obstinate in sin, hanging as it were on the tree, which was the occasion of our first parents' transgression. W.—S. Jerom seems to think that the Jews have inserted of God, to intimate that Christ was accursed of him. H.

Ver. 1. Pass by. Heb. "hide thyself," pretending not to see it.—Brother. Any fellow creature. Ex. 23:4. Lu. 10:30. C.—"We are very inhuman, not to shew as much concern for a man as the Jews do for a beast of burden." S. Chrys. ser. 13. D.

Ver. 2. Not nigh, either in blood or in place, (C.) though the latter signification seems more applicable; as, if the person lived at too great a distance, it would suffice to inform him where he might find what he had lost; and, if the owner was unknown, the thing must be taken care of by him who finds it till he be discovered. D.

Ver. 3. If, &c. Heb. "thou must not hide thyself," so as to pass it by, nor yet conceal it from the right owner. When a thing is certainly abandoned by him, it belongs to the person who seizes it first; but if it be only lost it, must surely be restored, if possible, (Grot. Jur. ii. 10,) as nature forbids us to take advantage of another's misfortune. Cicero.

—The Rabbins have corrupted this law, like so many others, by their evil interpretations. They pretend that a Jew must restore what he has found belonging to another true believer, if it have certain marks by which it may be known, but not if it belonged to a prevaricator or infidel. In the former supposition, they got the thing cried on a high stone near Jerusalem four times, and if the owner did not then claim his property, the finder might keep it. Seld. Jur. vi. 4.—The inhabitants of Cumæ condemned the next neighbour to restore what had been lost; as Hesiod (op. 348,) very well remarks, that things would not easily be lost, if the neighbours were not ill-disposed.

Ver. 4. With him. Heb. “thou shalt not hide thyself, but help him to lift up.” Ex. 23:4.

Ver. 5. God. Some take this literally, as the contrary practice is contrary to decency, and might be attended with very pernicious consequences. All know what noise was occasioned by the action of Clodius, who put on women’s apparel, that he might be present with the Roman ladies at the feast of the good goddess. Yet others think that Moses here forbids some superstitious practices. S. Ambrose (ep. 69,) remarks, that in some of the mysteries of the idols, it was requisite for those present to change clothes in this manner, sacrum putatur. Lucian testifies, that men put on women’s clothes at the feasts of Bacchus. They did the like in those of Venus, while the women took men’s clothes in the festivals of Mars. Jul. Hirmic. c. 4. Maimon.—In the East, people honoured the moon, to which they attributed both sexes, and Venus in like manner. Josephus (iv. 8,) believes that women are here prohibited to engage in warfare. Heb. “the vessels (armour) of man shall not be upon a woman.” Semiramis gained a great name by her martial exploits, and commanded all her subjects to dress like herself. Justin. i.—The Amazons were likewise very famous in war, and it is said that half the army of Bacchus was composed of women. Alb. Gentil maintains that Moses here condemns an abominable crime, which he did not wish to mention, at which the Book of Wisdom hints, (C. 14:26,) and which S. Paul condemns more explicitly. Rom. 1:26. Moses had already denounced death against the perpetrators of it; and surely the manner in which he now speaks, seems to forbid something more than simply putting on the garments of the other sex, for he, &c. C.—Yet that disorderly conduct deserved to be reprobated in strong terms, (H.) when it was not excused by some necessity or proper motive, such as actuated some holy virgins, S. Theodora, &c. T.

Ver. 6. Thou shalt not take, &c. This was to shew them to exercise a certain mercy even to irrational creatures; and by that means to train them up to a horror of cruelty; and to the exercise of humanity, and mutual charity one to another. Ch.—Some were of opinion that the person who could take the old bird on the nest might assure himself of good fortune, fecundity, &c. S. Thom. i. 2. q. 102. a. 6. Such superstition is reprehensible. Phocilides advises not to take all the young ones, nor the hen, in consideration of one's having more birds. C.

Ver. 7. Time. Those who refrain from cruelty, even towards beasts, will be induced more easily to shew mercy to their fellow creatures, (Tert. c. Marc. ii.) and will draw down the blessings of God upon themselves. M.

Ver. 8. Battlement. This precaution was necessary, because all their houses had flat tops; and it was usual to walk and to converse together upon them. Ch.—King Ochozias had the misfortune to fall from the top of his house, (4 K. 1:2,) and David saw Bethsabée when he was walking on the roof of his palace, 2 K. 11:2. Saul slept at the top of Samuel's house, 1 K. 9:25. See Jos. 2:6. Mat. 10:27. H.

Ver. 9. Together. If wheat was sown in a vineyard, it would ripen much sooner than the grapes; and as the first-fruits of both were offered to the Lord, the owner would lose the profit which he had too greedily sought after, the place being esteemed both pure and impure at the same time. This mixture of seeds would also impoverish the land, so that it would be like a place defiled, and unfit for cultivation, Jansen. in Lev. xix. 19. Maimonides supposes that the practice of the Zabians is here reprobated. They sowed the land with corn and dry grapes, in honour of Ceres and Bacchus, (More. Nev. p. 3. c. 37,) who presided over the harvest and vintage among the pagans. Wm. of Paris. Leg. 13.—Moses might also, by this symbolical language, condemn unnatural connexions, as he perhaps does, v. 10.

Ver. 10. Plough. In Levit. 19:19, this law is expressed, so as to forbid the procreation of mongrels. See Judg. 14:18. People who have treated on agriculture observe, that it is a pernicious practice to make animals of unequal size and speed work together. Colum. 6:2.—S. Paul explains to us the mystical sense of this passage. Bear not the yoke together with infidels, 2 Cor. 6:14. C.—Marry not with such. H.—Employ not in the sacred ministry the imprudent and wicked with those of a virtuous disposition. S. Greg. Mor. i. 16.

Ver. 11. Together. This is now lawful. But a virgin consecrated to God, must not dress like a married woman: the different states of life must not be confounded. S. Aug. c. Faust. vi. 9. D.

Ver. 12. Strings, Probably to gird the outer garment round the loins. See Num. 15:38.

Ver. 14. Name. Heb. “and occasion reports against her to bring an evil name upon her,” (H.) that he may not have to return her dowry. For, according to many of the Rabbins, he might give her a bill of divorce, simply if he did not like her. Seld. Uxor. iii. 1, &c.—They allow the proof here specified, only with respect to a Hebrew woman between twelve and twelve and a half years old, during the period of her being espoused, but not taken home by her husband. The cause was to be tried before the 23 judges. Oftentimes only witnesses, probably matrons, were examined in defence of the woman. Josephus iv. 8. S. Ambrose (ep. 8. 64. ad Syagr.) highly disapproves of such unsatisfactory methods. The marks assigned by the law were commonly observed in Syria, Persia, &c. The Arab physicians speak of them. See Valesius, c. xxv. The age in which women were then married, the climate, &c. caused these indications to be more clear, and deposed for or against the fidelity of the bride. The mother had them entrusted to her care by the friends of the husband, who had kept watch at the door on the wedding night. M. Nachman, ap. Fagium.

Ver. 15. Her. It does not appear that the woman was present at the trial: she remained at her father’s, or rather at her husband’s house, till sentence was passed. C.—Heb. “then shall the father of the damsel and her mother take and produce the damsel’s virginity,” or the tokens of it.

Ver. 18. Beat him. Heb. “chastise.” Sept. may signify also, “reprimand him.” But (H.) Josephus says the husband was to receive 39 lashes; and Philo informs us that the woman might leave him, if she thought proper, though, if she were willing to stay, he had not the power to divorce her, v. 19.

Ver. 19. A hundred. Josephus only mentions 50. As it was presumed that the false accusation proceeded from a desire to defraud the woman of her dowry, the law obliged the husband to allow her double (C.) the usual sum. Yet this punishment, together with the scourging, was very inadequate to what the woman would have had to suffer if she had been condemned. H.—S. Augustine (q. 33,) is surprised at this decision, as in other cases calumny was subjected to the law of retaliation, or punished with death. This shews also that wives, among the Jews, were considered as little more than servants. C.

Ver. 21. Die. It was concluded that she had committed the sin after her espousal. If it had happened before, she was to receive only 25 sicles for a dowry; though, if she took an oath that violence had been offered to her, she was entitled to 50: which opinion of the Rabbins seems very equitable. Æschines (in Timarch.) relates, that a man at Athens punished the transgression of which his daughter had been guilty, while she was at home, by shutting her up with a horse, in order that she might be torn in pieces by the famished animal. C.

Ver. 22. Die. The man was to be strangled as well as the married woman; if she were espoused only, she was to be stoned. The daughter of a priest was burnt alive. Rabbins. C. See Lev. 20:10.

Ver. 24. Wife. After the woman was espoused, (v. 23,) she was called a wife, and punished accordingly, if she proved unfaithful.

Ver. 25. Hold. Sept. “offering violence,” as also v. 28. H.—Die. Moses supposes that the woman in the field had made all possible resistance, and that the one in the city had, by silence at least, consented. But if the case were otherwise, the judges were to make all necessary inquiries, and pass sentence accordingly. C.

Ver. 29. Life. A law nearly similar occurs, Ex. 22:16, (H.) only there Moses speaks of seduction. M.—If the father or the woman refused their consent to the marriage, the person had only to pay 50 sicles; which the woman received, if her father was not alive. But if they consented, the person who had been condemned by the judge, was bound to marry the woman, how deformed soever. Seld. Uxor. i. 16. C.

Ver. 30. Covering. See Lev. 20:11. A wife should be hidden from all but her husband. H.

Ver. 1. Eunuch. By these are meant, in the spiritual sense, such as are barren in good works. Ch. Theod. q. 25. W.—The Heb. also specifies three sorts of eunuchs, though the Sept. and Chald. have only two. No mention is made of natural eunuchs, who are not excluded from the church of the Lord. C.—This outrage of castration was first offered to nature by Semiramis. Am. Marcellin. 14.—Church. That is, into the assembly or congregation of Israel, so as to have the privilege of an Israelite, or to be capable of any place or office among the people of God. Ch.—Philo says, they were not to enter the court of the temple. See Lament. 1:10. Others think they could not embrace the Jewish religion. Ex. 12:48. But this privilege could not be refused. Most probably the custom of making eunuchs is forbidden, and if any were found among the Jews, they should not be admitted to any place of authority. Isaias (56:5,) speaks of some faithful eunuchs, to whom God will give a place in his house; but he alludes to those of the new law, who embrace the state of celibacy. Mat. 19:12. Eunuchs were rejected from the magistracy among the Romans; and when some were at last received, it was deemed unnatural, as their disposition is generally cruel and selfish. Omnia cesserunt Eunuchis Consule monstra. Claud. in Eutrop. i. C.—Those who had the misfortune among the Jews to be eunuchs, did not perhaps (H.) lose the right of citizenship. T.

Ver. 2. Mamzer, &c. The author of the Vulgate adds the explication of mamzer, which only occurs again, Zac. 9:6. It may in both places denote a stranger, or one of a different religion from the Jews, as Jephthe was the son of a prostitute, (Jud. 11:1,) and yet became a judge of Israel. But strangers, as long as they professed a false religion, could not be entitled to the privilege of Jewish citizens; and even after they had relinquished their false worship, they were bound to wait ten whole generations, or a long time, before they could fill the posts of honour and command. C.—This, however, seems to be contrary to the disposition made in favour of the Idumeans and Egyptians, who were admitted in the third generation. A mamzer may, therefore, be (H.) a bastard of a different nation from the Jews, (M.) which was not the case of Jephthe. H.—The Rabbins specify three sorts of mamzers: 1. those born of parents who, by the law, are forbidden to marry, being to near akin; 2. those who are the fruit of adultery, or some criminal commerce, which is punished with death; and 3. those whose birth subjects the parents to be cut off or retrenched from the people. Seld.

Jur. v. 16.—The Sept. &c. exclude the children “of a harlot,” which is the sense of mamzer in the canon law. The Christian Church rejects such from holy orders, and the Athenians would not suffer bastards to offer sacrifice in the city, but only in the cynosarge, dedicated to Hercules, whose birth any doubts might be entertained. C.—It is observable, that such often imitate the wicked conduct of their parents; in which case, they are unfit for the magistracy; and though they may lead a very exemplary life, the law is intended to discourage such practices in parents, which may entail dishonour and loss upon their children; that, if they be not sufficiently restrained by their own personal disgrace, they may at least by the love for their innocent offspring. H.—Tenth. In the 11th generation, when the stain was obliterated, the descendant might become a magistrate. M.—Some understand that they were excluded for ever, as when the judges of the Areopagus ordered a man to appear again before them in 100 years’ time, they meant that his cause was entirely rejected. Vatab. Casaub. in Athen. vi.

Ver. 3. Ever. This shews that the former verse only excludes bastards for a time. But why are these nations treated with more severity than the Edomite and Egyptian? Because their enmity seemed to proceed from pure malice, and they attempted to ruin the souls of the Hebrews by lust and by idolatry, without any prospect of interest to themselves. Their parents were also of very base origin, and Abraham had rescued their father, Lot, from destruction; so that for his children to oppose with such virulence the descendants of Abraham, manifested a degree of ingratitude and perversity. C.—They had found their attempts to hurt Israel abortive, and yet ceased not to persecute their near relations, (H.) by drawing them into carnal sins. Those who are obstinate in their evil ways can never be rightly received into the Church of God. W.—Achior and Ruth embraced the Jewish religion, but it does not appear they were admitted to places of trust. Jud. 14:6. H.—These regulations were observed till the Babylonian captivity, while the genealogies might be ascertained. C.—In cases of extraordinary merit, as in that of Achior, the Ammonite, (Judit. 14) a dispensation might be granted. T.

Ver. 4. Water: the necessities of life. This inhumanity is highly resented.—Son. Heb. “of Beor, of Pethor, a city of Mesopotamia, to curse thee.” H. Num. 22:5.

Ver. 6. Peace. Heb. “ask or seek not their peace nor their advantage” as a nation; keep at a proper distance; have no familiarity with them. H.—Their vices, not their persons, are to be hated. David behaved in a friendly manner with the king of Ammon, 2 K. 10:2. He was afterwards forced to make war upon the people, though, without such extraordinary provocations, war was not to be declared against them. C.—Prosperity. Have no intercourse with them. M.—Sept. “Salute them not, wishing them what may tend to their peace and advantage.”

Ver. 7. Brother. Esau and Jacob were twins.—Land. The Egyptians had for some time afforded the Hebrews an asylum in their country, and though the kings of late had persecuted them, the people seem not to have entered into the views of their rulers, and spared the male children notwithstanding their cruel edicts. They gave them also very rich presents before their departure. Ex. 12:35. Gratitude required that these things should be considered, (H.) and God orders his people generously to pass over the subsequent ill treatment of these two nations.

Ver. 8. Lord. The Rabbins explain this of the permission to marry the grand-children of such as had embraced the Jewish religion, though some of them suppose that an Idumean or an Egyptian woman might be taken to wife, as Solomon took the daughter of Pharaoh; but the Israelites could not give their children in marriage to the men of those nations. The grand-children of converts are rather hereby entitled to the privileges of other Jewish citizens. C.

Ver. 9. Thing, rapine, libertinage, &c. which are but too common among soldiers. C.—We know what instructions S. John the baptist gave to those who followed that lawful profession. Lu. 3:14. H.

Ver. 10. Camp of the Levites, according to the Rabbins. C.—Bonfrere explains this of priests. M.—But it rather refers to all who dwelt in the camp, where the ark seems to have been generally present, along with the armies, v. 14. Num. 31:6. C.—It is not clear, however, that the law alludes to any other camp, but that in the midst of which the tabernacle was fixed; and Calmet elsewhere, denies that the ark commonly followed the army. H.

Ver. 11. Water of the fountain. M.

Ver. 13. Girdle. Heb. azon, means “a balance,” as the Hebrews generally carried weights, &c. about them. C. 25:13. Moderns translate, “a paddle upon thy weapon,” But the Sept. seem to have read ezor, “a girdle,” (C.) which is more intelligible, as the Jews were accustomed to carry the necessary utensils, money, &c. not in their pockets, as we do, but in a bag, which they fixed to their girdles, or belts. All the Jews who dwelt in the camp, were bound to have a paddle, for the purpose here mentioned. H.—Josephus (Bel. ii. 7,) observes, that the Essenians always made use of one, with which they made a hole a foot deep, and covered it with their robes, that nothing indecent might be exposed to view. H.—The Turks still follow the same custom, when they are encamped. Busbec, ep. iii. C.

Ver. 14. No uncleanness. This caution against suffering any filth in the camp was to teach them to fly the filth of sin, which driveth God away from the soul. Ch. Those who have had the misfortune to fall into the sink of iniquity, must not fail to use the sharp instrument of compunction, with which they may hide the enormity of their crimes. H.—Incessanter terram mentis nostræ pœnitentiæ dolore confodiat & ... abscondat. S. Greg. Mor. iii. 13.—In a camp where three million people were collected, if some such regulation had not been made, great and serious inconveniences would have ensued. The lawgiver, therefore, descends to several particulars which to us might appear minute; but besides the obvious meaning, which is very rational, the words convey other mystical instructions of the highest importance.—God was pleased to assume to character of a powerful monarch, residing among his people, and hence every appearance of indecency must be removed. H.

Ver. 15. To thee, from among the Gentiles. The promised land was thus declared a land of liberty, (C.) to encourage poor slaves to embrace the service of the true God, and to flee from the slavery of the devil, and from the society of those who adored him in their idols. The whole earth belongs to the Lord, and He was thus pleased to punish those who might claim a right to these slaves. H.—Some believe that the price was given to the owner, at the public expense. The Rabbins allow this privilege of an asylum, only to those who fled from a foreign country, or from an infidel master, to embrace the true religion. Circumcision was given to them as an inviolable mark of liberty. Chald. Those who had been sold for their crimes, or for debt, by the sentence of the judge, could not claim this exemption. Grot. Jur. iii. 7.—Philo (de humanit.) says, it would be unjust to give up a slave who has sought refuge with us. We ought either to reconcile him to his master, or sell him to another, and give the price to the former owner. Some translate the Heb. in a contrary sense, “Thou shalt not shut up the slave who has fled to thee from his master,” as if it were unjust to refuse to deliver him up. But the law points out some cases where it is lawful for a slave to flee away, and consequently people must be allowed to receive him. The following verse is decisive in favour this explanation.

Ver. 17. Israel. Some hence very erroneously infer, that before this prohibition the thing was not criminal. Seld. Jur. v. 4. Notwithstanding the law, such lewd practices continued to be very common. The original expresses that both the women and men were consecrated, "kadash," in all probability to some idol, whom they intended to honour by abominable prostitutions, a thing very common in all the East, as we learn both from profane and sacred authors. Athen. xiii. 5. 4 K. 23:7. The men were called the effeminate, 3 K. 14:24. C.—Some copies of the Sept. have a double translation of this verse, and add, "None of the daughters of Israel shall bear the mysteries, nor shall any of the sons of Israel be initiated (in these mysteries of idols) to make every vow." Telesphoros denotes a strumpet for hire, v. 18; or, according to Vossius, one who is initiated or performs the pagan mysteries, as fornication and idolatry, commonly go together in the sacred writers. Hesychius seems to understand, that it refers to "the house where a person has been delivered of a child." But Tertullian (pudic. ix.) explains it thus, "No one ... shall pay tribute;" as telos means tribute, (H.) and the Jews are supposed to have refused to pay any to the Romans on the authority of this verse. See Casaub. in Bar. 2:19. Grot. C.—But it seems far more probable, that it is a farther elucidation of the text, and prohibits that scandalous impiety by which many were not ashamed publicly, like dogs, to commit the most obscene actions, and to present the hire of their bodies to the idols. Mic. 1:7. Clem. Alex. Exhort. Villal. in Ezec. 43. We could hardly give credit to those who have attested such things, did not God here find it necessary to caution his people not to fall into such blindness and delusion. That the poor ignorant idolater should think by these means to appease those gods who, while here on earth, had been infamous for the like excesses, needs not so much to excite our surprise. But that the Gnostics, Manichees, and other heretics, almost of all ages since the light of the gospel shone forth, should have thought that they could honour the true God by abusing the flesh, is truly astonishing. Yet they gave into this delusion, by first persuading themselves that the flesh was the creature of an evil principle, fighting against the author of the spirit and of all good, with whom they intended to take part. The way of a fool is right in his own eyes. Yea, there is a way that seemeth to a man right, and the ends thereof lead to death. Prov. 12:15 and 16:25. These wretches grounded their opinion on the authority of their gods, or of the Scripture. Will this excuse be admitted by the Sovereign Judge? But these delusions are perhaps now at an end.—A principle, however, is still maintained of a far more pernicious tendency, inasmuch as it strikes at the root of every law, divine and human. This horrible doctrine was inculcated by J. Wesley for above thirty years, as we have already observed. C. 16:22. "O natural man," says he, (Serm. on Orig. Sin,) "thou canst do good. Thy natural actions are sin; thy civil actions are sin; thy religious actions are sin. As many thoughts, words, and actions, so many sins; for nothing but sin comes from thee. Thy duties are sins. Can an evil tree bring forth good fruit?" Thus Scripture teaches him that to work for one's family, to pay taxes, to pray, read the Scriptures, or even to believe, will be a sin! "Knowest thou not that thou canst do nothing but sin, till thou art reconciled to God." Sermon on the Righteousness of Faith. Hence arose the Still-Methodists, Jour. iv. p. 92. Even after this celebrated reformer had begun, when almost 70 years of age, to discover "the subtle poison which," he says, (Jour. viii. p. 90,) "has infected, more or less, almost all, from the highest to the lowest among us," it is astonishing that he still acknowledges those who were infected with it, as "the real children of God by faith." Many of these, he says, (sermon on the law) lay it down as an unquestionable truth, that when we are come to Christ, we have done with the law; and that in this sense, Christ is the end of the law to every one that believeth. We need, therefore, no longer wonder that the pagans should think they honoured their idols by prostitution, (which on other occasions they condemned as "a great disgrace," oneidos mega, as Musonias calls it,) since in this enlightened age, a man of no mean abilities, and far advanced in years, a man who requires that all the preachers in his connexion shall conform to his Sermons and Notes on the New Testament, or be superceded, (Jour. xx. p. 34,) could decide that those who maintain this principle, and make it a branch of their religion to bread the law of God on purpose, are the "real children of God by faith;" people, "whom God has taken out of the world." As well might he say that a man may live on subtle poison, and please God, by following a doctrine than which "nothing can be more false," as he styles this very principle of Antinomianism, to which he and his preachers had "leaned" for such a length of time. "If, says a great admirer of his, Mr. Fletcher, (1 Check, 4th letter,) the three first propositions of the minutes are scriptural, Mr. Wesley may well begin the remaining part, by desiring the preachers in his connexion to emerge along with him from under the noisy billows of prejudice, and to struggle quite out of the muddy streams of Antinomian delusions which have so long gone over our heads, and carried so many souls down the channels of vice into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." This is then to be the abode of those whom "God has taken out of the world, and who are real children of God by faith!" This is the heaven, of which they may boast in dying that they are infallibly sure of! At least, the man whom they have so eagerly followed as their judge, has passed this woeful sentence upon them, as if he had a mind to laugh at their credulity. If he join us also in the same condemnation, and say, "I have the same assurance that Jesus is the Christ, and that no Romanist can expect to be saved, according to the terms of his covenant;" (Jour. iii. p. 94) we are not solicitous about his good opinion; we have not chosen him for our judge, nor have his writings given us reason to think that he knew the nature of our covenant. If he did, so much the more dreadful must have been his reckoning with that unerring Judge, before whom he has appeared 20 years ago. It is the glory and happiness of the Catholic Church, that no one attempts to assail her, but he presently betrays the spirit by which he is inspired, the spirit of calumny, and of the perverse application of Scripture. It was thus that our divine head was treated by the father of lies, who alleged Scripture to encourage suicide, or presumption Mat. 4:6. So in the various points of faith which Mr. Wesley attacks, he shamefully misrepresents our doctrine, that he may have something to oppose. We have seen how unjustly he accuses us of idolatry. C. 16:22. But in order, perhaps, to comfort us with the reflection, that we have many partners in guilt, he represents the Protestants as equally criminal. "They set up their idols in their churches; you set up yours in your heart ... Oh how little is the difference before God! How small pre-eminence has the money worshipper at London over the image worshipper at Rome; or the idolizer of a living sinner over him that prays to a dead saint." (Word to a Prot.) How much soever the Protestants may be entangled in this species of idolatry, they do not at least pretend to authorize it by the principles of religion, as some of the Methodists have done. Witness the man with whom J. Wesley conversed at Birmingham. "Do you believe that you have nothing to do with the law of God? He answered, I have not, I am not under the law ... Have you also a right to all the women in the world? Yes, if they consent. And is this not a sin? Yes, to him who thinks it is a sin; but not to those whose hearts are free. The same thing that wretch, Roger Ball, affirmed in Dublin. Surely these are the first-born children of Satan." Journal vi. p. 133. Witness Mr. Fletcher, a celebrated clergyman in the Methodist connexion, who has informed us that Antinomian principles and practices had spread like wild fire among the Methodists. Nor need I go far, says he, for a proof of this sad assertion. In one of his (Wesley's) societies, not many miles from my parish, a married man, who professed being in a state of justification and sanctification, growing wise above what is written, despised his brethren as legalists, and his preachers as persons not clear in the gospel. He instilled his principles into a serious young woman; and what was the consequence? Why they talked about finished salvation in Christ, and the absurdity of perfection in the flesh, till a perfect child was conceived and born; and, to save appearances, the mother swore it to be a travelling man that cannot be heard of. Thus, to avoid legality, they plunged into hypocrisy, fornication, adultery, perjury, and the depth of ranterism, &c. Check i. Let. 2. But enough of such absurdity.

We may now easily believe to what lengths the dissolute examples and maxims of the heathenish mythology would lead their unhappy votaries, when we behold the purest lessons of the gospel so strangely perverted. H.—Whoremonger. It is very probable that the Scripture here means such as were guilty of unnatural impurities, “consecrated,” as it were, to some idol of lust, as these crimes were common under several faithless kings of Israel and of Juda, 3 K. 15:12 and 22:47. Simple prostitutes are styled zona. C.—God will not allow these to be publicly tolerated, though they contrived but too often in private to ensnare the hearts of God’s people, 3 K. 3:16. T.—Onkelos translates, “No Israelite shall give his daughter in marriage to a slave, nor take one for his son’s wife,” as the contract would be null, according to the Rabbins, for want of liberty. C.—He may, perhaps, have given this singular turn to this verse, because the preceding one speaks of fugitive slaves.

Ver. 18. Dog. Many explain this in a figurative sense, as we have done in the last verse, to denote the public impudence by which some thought to honour their gods. H.—Such impiety the Lord abhors, though practiced by all the surrounding nations, as ancient records unanimously attest. How incredible soever it might otherwise appear, that a false notion of religion, joined to a natural depravity, could prompt people to such excesses, we cannot call in question the veracity of so many historians. See Herod. i, and ii. Just. xviii. 5. Euseb. præp. iv. 6. S. Aug. C. D. iv. 10. and the sacred writers, Bar. 6:42. Prov. 19:13. The Rabbins explain dog literally, and observe that a prostitute, or one who has had any commerce with a man with whom it was not lawful for her to marry, could not offer what she had thus gained to the Lord, nor what had been received in exchange for a dog. Josephus (iv. 8,) understands it of such hunting or shepherds’ dogs as had been lent for hire to propagate the breed. Maimonides thinks that what the strumpet had received in kind, could not be presented, but with the price of it she might buy suitable victims. But Josephus and Philo admit of no such exceptions. They reject all sorts of presents made by strumpets, in detestation of their crimes; and it was probably from the same motive that the Jews concluded it was unlawful to put the price of blood into the treasury of the temple. Mat. 27:6. In the Christian Church, the offerings of public sinners were not received, even to be distributed among the poor. These would not even take an alms from the hands of S. Afra, while she remained a courtesan of Augsburg. Even the pagan emperor, Severus, refused to admit into the sacred treasury the tribute arising from such unworthy means. Lamprid.—Some believe that Moses forbids the price of a dog to be presented, as the Egyptians had a sovereign respect for dogs; and many nations offered them in sacrifice, particularly for expiation. All the Greeks purified themselves, by making a dog be carried round them. Bochart, p. 1, B. ii. 56. Isaias (66:3,) seems to insinuate that dogs were sometimes immolated. S. Augustine (q. 38,) and others, believe that dogs are not to be redeemed, as the first-born of other things are, probably because they were too mean, and the price too insignificant to purchase another victim. But we may adhere to the explication which was first proposed. C.—Both. The dog was an unclean animal, and strumpets defiled their own bodies, and draw down the indignation of that God, who is a pure Spirit, and loves chaste souls. Without are dogs and sorcerers, and unchaste, and murderers, and servers of idols. Apoc. 22:15. H.

Ver. 20. To the stranger. This was a dispensation granted by God to his people, who, being the Lord of all things, can give a right and title to one upon the goods of another. Otherwise the Scripture every where condemns usury as contrary to the law of God, and a crying sin. See Exod. 22:25. Lev. 25:36. 37. 2 Esd. 5:7. Ps. 14:5. Ezech. 18:8. 13, &c. Ch.—The stranger means the devoted nations of Chanaan, &c. whom God authorized his people to destroy. “Exact usury of him whom thou mayst kill without a crime,” says S. Amb. (de Tob. c. 15,) though this principle will not always excuse usury. This practice was always considered as unjustifiable, except when God gave permission to his people to get by this means the possession of the property of the stranger, the right to which he had already given to them; unless we may consider, that he only tolerates this practice towards the stranger, on account of the hard-heartedness of the Jews. Christ has now expressly declared it unlawful for any one. See Ex. 22:25. C.

Ver. 21. Delay, beyond the time appointed. M.—If no time was specified, the vow must be fulfilled without any unnecessary procrastination. See Num. 30:2. H.—Vows induce an obligation which before did not exist. W.

Ver. 24. Thee. Heb. “thou shalt not put into thy vessel,” or basket. This privilege is restrained by the Chal. &c. to vintagers. But Josephus (iv. 8) extends it to all; and he says that those who did not even invite travellers to partake of their grapes, and other fruit, were to be punished with 39 lashes.

Ver. 1. Uncleanness. Tertullian (c. Marc. iv.) reads, “if she be found guilty of any impurity,” negotium impudicum. Sept. “unseemly action;”

and many learned commentators suppose that Moses only allows a divorce in cases of adultery, or in those which render the woman dangerous to a family, as if she had the leprosy, or some other infectious disorder, or was likely to corrupt the morals of her children, or if she were barren. The Pharisees were divided among themselves in determining the sense of this law, (C.) and they endeavoured to inveigle our Saviour, by proposing the question to him, If it were lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause, quacumque ex causa, or for any reason whatsoever. Mat. 19:3. H.—Our Lord does not take notice of the limitation here added by Moses; (Mat. 5:31) nor do the Pharisees, when he asks them, What did Moses command you? Mar. 10:3. Whence it seems, that the liberty which was taken was very great, and that the limitation was not regarded. Our Saviour, nonetheless, alludes to it, when he admits that Moses permitted a divorce, in case of adultery. But he recalls them to the institution of marriage, and will no longer allow people to marry again, even in this case, as Moses had been forced to permit the Jews, on account of the hardness of their heart. C.—Before this permission, the Jews were therefore, it seems, much addicted to this practice.—Bill. The law does not command divorces; but in case the parties come to such a determination, it requires a bill to be given to the woman. The Jews require the greatest formality in drawing it up, and witnessing it, and they say the divorce must take place upon a fountain or river. Schikard. Jur. iii. 9.—Munster gives this form of a bill: “The 4th day of the month of Sivan, of the year 5293 from the creation of the world, in this place and in this city of N, T. N, son of N, had a mind to divorce, and has divorced N, daughter of N, who hitherto has been my wife; and I grant her leave to go whither she has a mind, and to marry whomsoever she pleases, so that no one shall hinder her. In witness whereof, I have given her this bill of divorce, according to the ordinances of Moses and of Israel.” The Jews still assert their right to put away their wives. Buxt. Syn. xxix. C.—But it is sinful for them, or for any other, to marry the woman divorced till the first husband be dead. If they do they are guilty of adultery, as our Saviour and S. Paul repeatedly inculcate. S. Aug. de Adult. Conj. i. 11. W.

Ver. 4. Defiled. This insinuates that the second marriage was a real adultery, (C.) and only tolerated by the law to prevent greater evils. H.—It might be said indeed that the woman was defiled, with regard to her former husband, who could not take her back without condemning his former proceeding; (C.) as he would seem to have only lent her for some mean consideration. M.—Domitian took the privilege of a judge from a Roman knight, who had resumed his wife after he had divorced her for adultery. Sueton. viii. But how then is the woman abominable before the Lord? Some say the thing itself is extremely dishonourable, as the Heb. intimates, thought the woman have done nothing but what the law allows. Grotius believes that the man might take back his wife, at any time, before she was married to another. But the Rabbins limit this privilege to three months after the date of separation. God forbids his priests to marry with those who had been divorced, as it is to be presumed that they have not been rejected by their former husbands without good reason. Lev. 21:7. The an who cohabits with an adulteress, is deemed a fool; (Prov. 18:22,) and some have believed, that it was necessary to put such away. But S. Paul advises a reconciliation, 1 Cor. 7:11.—To sin, or to incur the punishment due to it. C.—If the state connived at the transgression of the law, the judgments of God would fall upon the people.

Ver. 5. Wife. This indulgence was granted to those who had married a widow also. Heb. “a new wife,” as she was new to him, (H.) which right he could not claim, if he only resumed the one whom he had divorced. R. Salom. Drus. See C. 20:7.

Ver. 6. Life, or the means of supporting himself. H.—The upper millstone was deemed the lest necessary. In more ancient times it was customary to dry the wheat by fire, and afterwards to pound it in a mortar. Then millstones were invented, which slaves of the meanest condition had to turn. Pliny (xviii. 10,) mentions, that some few water-mills were used in his time. But this useful invention had been neglected, till Belisarius restored it again in the fifth century, when he was besieged in Rome by the Goths. Procop.—Jonathan, and the paraphrast of Jerusalem, explain this quite in a different sense: “Thou shalt not use any enchantment for the consummation of marriage, since it would be to destroy the lives of the children to be born.”

Ver. 7. Soliciting. Heb. “stealing a soul;” (M.) or decoying one to a distance from home, where he may have an opportunity of selling him for a slave. H. Ex. 21:16.

Ver. 8. Leprosy. Do nothing which may expose you to the danger of being infected, and if you have the misfortune to contract it, obey the directions of the priests. C.—It seems from this and the following verse that God frequently punished disobedience to his ministers, as he did Mary, (Num. 12) by inflicting upon them this shameful disorder. H.—So he punished king Ozias, 2 Par. 26. M.—The design of this precept is, therefore, not so much to order people not to contract a disease, which they cannot perhaps always avoid, as to caution them against pride and rebellion. H.

Ver. 10. Pledge. This was left to the choice of the debtor, provided he gave sufficient. The Athenian and Roman laws allowed a person to search his neighbour's house, for what he had lost: but he was to enter covered only with a short garment round his middle, (C.) to prevent his taking away any thing which did not belong to him.

Ver. 12. Night, if it be a garment or bed covering, which may be necessary for the poor man. H.—By allowing the creditor to keep the pledge such a short time, God wished to discourage the taking of any from such as were in real distress. M.—The same regulation required, that if a necessary implement for labour, during the day time, was pledged, it should be returned in the morning. C.—This was done every day, to admonish the creditor and the debtor to exercise mercy and justice in their respective situations. The debtor was to remember to do his utmost in order to pay his debts. S. Aug. q. 41.—These daily debts were not remitted in the sabbatic years, according to the Rabbins, whose opinion seems very hard and inconsistent. H.—Solomon advises not to stand bond for another's debts. Prov. 20:16 and 22:26. Many nations in the Indies allowed no action at law to recover debts, as the creditor ought to have taken his precautions before he parted with his money or merchandize. Stobæus. Strabo xv. C.

Ver. 13. Justice, or mercy, which never enters the breast of the unjust. Prov. 12:10. M.

Ver. 14. Hire. Heb. "Commit no violence (or fraud) towards an hired servant." Lev. 19:13. H.

Ver. 15. Maintaineth: encourageth him. C.—Sept. "in it he placeth his hope." H.—Day labourers are obliged to support themselves and families with their wages; (M.) so that if they agree to have them paid every day, it would be an injustice to detain them. H.

Ver. 16. Sin. Judges have no right to punish any but those who have transgressed. C.—God may for reasons known to himself, which cannot be unjust, visit the sins of the fathers upon their children; (Ex. 20:5) and hence, (Jos. 7) he ordered the family of Achan to be involved in his punishment. Temporal sufferings, or death itself, are not however always a misfortune. They frequently prove a source of inconceivable blessings. Rom. 5:3. H.—The Rabbins understand, that fathers and children are not to be received as witnesses against each other, (Onkelos) which seems foreign to the sense of the present law. C.

Ver. 17. Pervert. Thou shalt not pass an unjust sentence upon any one, particularly (H.) upon those who are least able to defend themselves. M.

Ver. 18. This thing. It is uncertain whether this refer to the preceding or to the following law. It may be applied to both, as the remembrance of the Egyptian slavery might teach God's people not to oppress, but rather to shew mercy to those in distress. As the same thing is however repeated, v. 22, it seems more probable that the present verse forbids any oppression. H.

Ver. 19. Forget. The Rabbins say, that both the owner and the labourers must forget the sheaf: but his is a vain subtlety. C.—Josephus (iv. 8,) is more agreeable to the spirit of the law, when he (H.) observes that gleanings, and some of the fruit of the vine and olive trees, were to be left on purpose for the poor. Lev. 19:9. M.

Ver. 2. Down, tying him to a low pillar; (M. Grot.) though many assert, that the criminal was forced to lie prostrate on the ground, as the Jews still do, in Germany, when they undergo this punishment. Buxtorf, Syn. 20. The Jews do not commonly give above 39 strokes, and double the number is inflicted on the back, from what fall upon the breast.

Ver. 3. Eyes. Heb. “depart covered with confusion (or more vile) before thy eyes.” Hence the Jews do not consider this chastisement as ignominious. C.

Ver. 4. Not muzzle, &c. S. Paul understands this of the spiritual labourer in the church of God, who is not to be denied his maintenance. 1 Cor. 9:8. 9. 10. Ch.—Other labourers, and even beasts, must likewise be treated with humanity. It was formerly the custom in Egypt, Judea, Spain, &c. to have a clean spot in the field, round a tree, where, during the heat of the day, they spread the sheaves, and made oxen continually go round, to tread out the corn. Some had the ill nature to muzzle them, or to cover their mouths with dung; (Ælian iv. 25,) whence arose the proverb, “an ox in a heap” of corn, to denote a miser, who amidst plenty will not eat. Suidas.—Moses condemns this cruelty; as it is not just, says Josephus, to refuse these animals so small a recompence for the assistance which they afford us in procuring corn. C.—Besides this literal sense, God had principally in view the mystical one, which S. Paul unfolds to us. M.—Paine hence takes occasion to ridicule priests, who, he says, “preach up Deuteronomy, for Deuteronomy preaches up tithes.” But this book enjoins them no more than other books of Scripture, and common reason dictates that the labourer is worthy of his hire. If the artizan, &c. will not work for nothing, why should priests spend their lives and fortunes, for the benefit of the people, without deriving any advantage from them? Who has served in the wars at his own charge at any time? 1 Cor. 9:7. Whether the mode of paying tithes be the most eligible for the support of God's ministers, is a question of smaller importance. It may at least plead a very high antiquity, (H.) as it was in force 400 years before the law of Moses. Abraham paid tithes to Melchisedeck, who was both king and priest; and Pisistratus received tithes from the people of Athens, to be expended in the public sacrifices, and for the general good. Laert. in Solone. Watson, let. 2.

Ver. 5. Together, as the sons of Juda did: (Gen. 38:8,) though custom (C.) and analogy extend this to other brothers, at least to those who live in the promised land, and have the inheritance in common, as appears from the history of Ruth, 1:13, &c. Noemi supposes that all the sons whom she might have had, would have been under the same obligation towards her daughter-in-law. The Rabbins restrain this law as much as they can, asserting that if the deceased left an adopted or natural child, the brother need not marry his widow, nor was any obliged but the next in age, and not married. S. Justin (q. 132,) teaches the reverse. C.—Half-brothers were included, (M.) and indeed every relation, in order, who, upon the refusal of the next heir, wished to take possession of the deceased person's land. Ruth 4. H.—The Jews no longer observe this law, as they have not possession of Chanaan. Cuneus i. 7.—Fagius asserts that it was neglected after the captivity of Babylon, because the inheritances were confounded. C.—This, however, does not seem to have been the opinion of those who have undertaken to reconcile the genealogy of our Saviour, given by SS. Matthew and Luke, by supposing that S. Joseph was the son of Jacob by birth, and of Heli according to the law. S. Hilary Africanus says (Ep. to Aristides) that "Heli dying without issue, Jacob was obliged to marry his widow, by whom he had Joseph, a descendant of Solomon by Jacob, and of Nathan by Heli," as their common mother, Esta, had married successively Mathan and Melchi, (or rather Mathat) who sprung from those two branches of David's family. Dupin. H.—The Athenians followed a similar regulation with respect to orphan young women, whom the next of kin were bound to marry and to endow. The Tartars assert their right to marry the widows of their brethren. The Egyptians did not consider the marriage as real, nor any relationship contracted, in case the woman had no issue, on which principle there was no impediment to prevent the brother from marrying the widow of his brother. On other occasions such contracts were declared illegal. Lev. 18:16. C.—This was a positive law, (W. Gen. 38) which admitted of an exception.

Ver. 6. Name. Josephus (iv. 8) takes this literally, as S. Aug. once did, though afterwards he retracted that opinion, (B. ii. 12,) on considering that Booz called his son Obed, and not Mahalon, which was the name of the first husband of Ruth. C. 4:17. C.—Houbigant thinks some omissions have taken place in the very short genealogy of David, mentioned in that chapter, and instead of Obed, he would substitute Jachin, as the first-born of Ruth. He thinks that Solomon alluded to two of his ancestors, when he styled the two pillars before the temple Jachin and Booz. “In strength it shall stand or establish.” 3 K. 7:21. Heb. “the first-born which she beareth shall arise (or succeed) in the name (or by the right and title) of his brother.” See Num. 24:3. H.—Name is sometimes put for succession, (C.) or instead of another. M.

Ver. 9. In his face, or presence, upon the ground, as appears from the Gemarra of Jerusalem, where we read this form: (H.) “In our presence, (the three judges are specified) N, widow of N, hath taken off the shoe of N, son of N. She brought him before us, and took off the shoe from his right foot, and spat in our presence, so that we saw her spittle upon the ground; and she said to him, So shall he be treated who will not establish the house of his brother.” Before this ceremony took place, the widow was obliged to wait three months, to prove that she was not in a state of pregnancy; for if she were, the brother could not marry her. He was never obliged to do it, but if he refused he was deemed infamous. The taking off the shoe was intended to humble him, as well as to shew that he relinquished all his claim to the inheritance. Josephus (v. 11) says, that Ruth gave the relation, who would not marry her, a slap on the face, or rather, as it ought to be printed, “she spat in his face,” which was a mark of the greatest ignominy. C. 12:14. Isai. 50:6. Mat. 26:67. C.

Ver. 10. Unshod. Those who have no consideration for their brethren, or for the commonwealth, deserve to be despised. Much more do they who are appointed pastors of the Church, if they do not zealously endeavour to increase the number of God’s servants, whom they must attach to him, and not to themselves. Thus the disciples of S. Paul were known by the general name of Christians. S. Aug. c. Faust. xxxii. 10. W.

Ver. 12. In her regard: words supplied also by the Sept. conformably to the context. C.—The indecency and impudence of the woman, left her no excuse; (H.) though the Rabbins falsely maintain, that she might transgress this law in case of necessity, and might cut off the hand of her husband’s antagonist. Grotius. C.—She would thus put the man in danger of having no posterity. M.—If even the imminent danger of her husband would not authorize her to act in this manner, when the person was stripped to fight, how severely will God punish all wanton liberties!

Ver. 16. Injustice. Prov. 20:10. To have a greater weight for buying and a less one for selling, is the way to grow rich here, or to obtain the mammon of iniquity; though, when such mean practices are detected, the man who cheats often loses more than he had gained; and at any rate, must either make restitution, if possible, or receive the wages of his unjust labour and craft in the world to come. H.

Ver. 17. Amalec. This order for destroying the Amalecites, in the mystical sense, sheweth how hateful they are to God, and what punishments they are to look for from his justice, who attack and discourage his servants when they are but just come out, as it were, of the Egypt of this wicked world, and being yet weak and faint-hearted, are but beginning their journey to the land of promise.

Ver. 18. God. This circumstance is not mentioned, Ex. 17:14.

Ver. 19. Heaven. Destroy him entirely, a sentence which Saul was ordered to put in execution, 1 K. 15. H.

DEUTERONOMY 26

Ver. 1. It. The land where Moses was speaking, which had been already conquered, was no less under the obligation of paying the first-fruits, &c. than Chanaan, and the parts of Syria which were promised to the Israelites. H.—All the products of the earth seem to have been liable to be offered, (Mat. 23:23,) in proportion as they ripened, at the feasts of the Passover and of Pentecost, (C.) and of tabernacles. M.—Yet we find no mention here of the therumah, or offering, of which the Rabbins speak so much, as distinct at least from the first-fruits, which were heaved both by the priest and the offerer towards heaven and earth, on the right and left hand. Each (C.) landholder, (H.) and even the king himself, was bound to bring his own basket to the temple, and to recite the words here prescribed. The wheat and barley were first winnowed, and the grapes and olives made into wine and oil. Before the offering was made to the Lord, no one was allowed to taste any of the produce. Lev. 23:10. Num. 18:12. &c. Whether legumes were to be tithed, seems a matter of dispute. C.

Ver. 5. The Syrian. Laban. See Gen. 27. Ch.—Heb. “My father was a Syrian, poor, (or ready to perish) and he went down,” &c. The ancestors of Jacob had, in effect, come from beyond the Euphrates, and he had dwelt in Mesopotamia for twenty years. But the translation of the Sept. seems preferable, "My father abandoned (apebalen) Syria." C.

Ver. 8. Terror. Sept. "with surprising visions," (Heb.) or "with astonishing prodigies," &c. C.

Ver. 10. God, with profound humility, acknowledging that all comes from him, (H.) and praying for a continuance of his fatherly protection. M.

Ver. 11. Feast. The Jews could not yet be required with propriety to raise themselves to delights purely spiritual. C. 12:7. Strabo (x.) observes, that the Greeks and barbarians accompanied their sacrifices with feasting and music, which served to take off their thoughts from worldly concerns, and gave them a sort of foretaste of the divinity. C.

Ver. 12. Third. It has been remarked (C. 14:28 and Lev. 27:30,) that the Jews gave two tithes every year, the second was for feasts at Jerusalem, or on the third year at home, if there was not also a third tithe due on that year. H.

Ver. 13. Taken. Heb. "burnt." C.—I have brought all that was due, (T.) so that no more can be found in my house than what the fire would have spared, if it had been thrown into it.

Ver. 14. Mourning. It was then unlawful to taste what was set apart for the Lord, and even to touch a thing, at that time, would render it unclean. Osee 9:4. Others explain it thus: I have not eaten, how much soever I was distressed; or, I eat it with a cheerful heart. But these interpretations seem unnatural. Spencer (Rit. ii. 24,) thinks rather that the Jews thus disclaim having given any worship to Isis, whom the Egyptians invoked after the harvest, with mournful cries. Diod. Sic. i. About the same season of the year, lamentations were also made for the death of Adonis, (Marcel. xxii.) and for that of Osiris. Firminus.—The Phœnicians mourned in like manner for the desolate appearance of the earth, after the fruits were collected. The Egyptians thought that Isis had discovered fruits and corn, and therefore offered the first-fruits to her. But the Jews are here taught to refer all such favours to God alone, and they testify that they have taken no part in the superstitious rites of other nations, nor spent any thing in funerals. Heb. "upon the dead;" Osiris, &c. here styled uncleanness, by way of contempt. C.

Ver. 16. This day. In this last solemn harangue of Moses, the covenant between God and his people was ratified. M.

Ver. 19. To his own praise. Heb. Sept. &c. “higher ... in praise, reputation, and glory.” H.

DEUTERONOMY 27

Ver. 1. Ancients, particularly the priests, v. 9. H.—These exhorted the people to observe diligently, what they had all heard from the mouth of Moses. C. 5:1. C.

Ver. 2. Stones. The Latin translation of the Sam. copy, defines the number to be two, (Ex. 20:18,) and shews that the law, which was to be written upon them, was no other than the decalogue, to which the curses and blessings here recorded have a direct reference. When no number is specified, the dual is commonly understood. H. Lev. 12:5, &c.—Two large stones would be sufficient to contain the words of the decalogue, and they would more strikingly represent the two tables written with the finger of God. They were probably first polished, and the letters raised upon them in relievo, as the Arabic marbles in the University of Oxford are done. The white plaster being then used to fill up the interstices between the letters of black marble, the words would appear very plainly. Kennicott, Dis. 2.—Others think that a high and durable monument was raised both for an altar and for the inscription, though some would allow four others for this purpose. C.—Plaster. The Heb. does not specify all over; and Houbigant supposes, that the cement was only used to join the stones together. Neither do the Heb. or Sept. intimate that the plaster was laid on for the purpose of writing more easily.

Ver. 3. That, &c. Heb. and Sept. “And thou shalt write upon them (stones) all the words of,” &c. H.—This law, the decalogue, (Masius in Jos. viii. 32,) or all the laws of Moses, leaving out the historical parts of his work, or the 20th and three following chapters of Exodus, or the discourses of Moses in this book, &c. Josue, in effect, wrote upon stones the Deuteronomy of the law of Moses, which Josephus explains of the curses and blessings inscribed upon the two sides of the monument, as an abridgment of the whole law. C.—The Jordan is not in Heb. expressly, but in the Sept. After the Israelites had crossed this river, they were thus to make a solemn profession of their adherence to the law of God, (H.) as they did (v. 12,) after they had taken Hai; though Josephus insinuates, that they deferred for five years the accomplishment of what is here required. H.

Ver. 5. Stones: the same as those which composed the monument, (C.) or rather different from them, (M.) as those were polished, v. 2.

Ver. 6. Polished. Heb. simply, “of whole stones.”

Ver. 8. And clearly. Heb. “very plainly;” (H.) so that they might be easily read. Some Rabbins say that Josue wrote them in 70 different languages, that all nations might read them. Happy expedient! C.

Ver. 12. Garizim. The children of Jacob, by Lia and Rachel, have the more honourable function of blessing, while those of the handmaids, with Ruben and Zabulon, the first and the sons of Lia, at their head, on Hebal, have to answer to the various curses which were to be proclaimed by the priests and Levites, v. 14. These were stationed with the ark, between the two mountains; and when they pronounced, for example, “Blessed is he that maketh not a graven or molten thing,” &c. those on Garizim answered Amen; and when they turned towards those on Hebal, and said, Cursed, &c. they replied in like manner. In the mean time, the body of the Levites might be with the other five tribes on Mount Garizim, though the priests, and those of greater dignity, might remain beside the ark, to perform this sacred function; as we read in Josue that they were stationed between the two divisions of the army. Bonfrere.—Some think that Levi is placed with the rest only according to the order of his birth, and that Joseph stands for two tribes. Vatab.—Josephus asserts, that the whole army was divided into two parts, as well as the tribe of Levi, part of which stood on each of the mountains. Then the tribes on Garizim prayed that God would bless the observers of his law; and those on Hebal answered, Amen; and after they had repeated the same blessings, those on Garizim made a similar acclamation. In like manner they repeated the curses one after another. C.—But this would make both the mountains equal in dignity. He places the altar likewise, with the inscription of blessings and curses on each side of it, in the midst of the valley, or rather nearer to Garizim; as he says it was not far from Sichem, which was built at the foot of that mountain, on the north side, while Hebal lay still farther to the north of the city, and being scorched with the sun-beams, was rendered fruitless and unpleasant. H.—If Josephus afterwards (Ant. v. 1) say that the altar was on Hebal, we must either acknowledge that his work has been there interpolated, or that he contradicts himself. Kennicott also takes notice of a strange mistake in the grand edition of S. Ephrem, in the Latin translation, by Benedict; which, in opposition to the Syriac, has (v. 13,) “these shall rise to curse on Mount Garizim,” though Hebal is universally allowed to be the mount of cursing.

Ver. 14. Pronounce. Heb. “answer,” as the older Protestant editions, 1540, &c. had it; though “our last translators, 1613, says Kennicott, in this, as in several other instances, altered for the worse,” shall speak. A select company of Levites in the valley repeated what had been declared from Hebal.

Ver. 15. Thing. Protestant, any ... image. They insert the word any, and translate image, as they almost constantly do where idols are meant, to make the ignorant believe, that all images are to be rejected with the utmost abhorrence, as cursed things. Why then do they not observe the injunction themselves? C. 16:22. H.—Secret. The magistrates had to punish all acts of public idolatry with the utmost severity. But God will not suffer those to escape who do such things even in the most private manner.—Amen, truly; (C.) so be it.

Ver. 16. Honoureth not. Heb. “curseth.” Sept. “despiseth.” See Lev. 20:9.—“Ex. 21:17. Moses proclaimed, He that curseth his father or (Heb. and) mother, shall die the death.” But here he goes still farther and denounces a curse on those who make light of (Heb. makle, vilipendit) their parents; or, as the Carthusian expresses it not amiss, on him “who does not honour, by shewing them obedience in due time, or by not relieving their wants as far as possible; and chiefly, if instead of honouring, he curses and uses opprobrious language towards them.” “I have made this remark, says Amama, (p. 376,) “in order to admonish the Germans and the Dutch that this passage has been translated by Luther with too great carelessness, curseth, as if the same Heb. word, kalal, were here used as in the text of Exodus. But those who are not too brazen, will confess that the Heb. text, and the more accurate versions, require greater reverence to be shewn to parents. Etiam illi judicabunt qui nondum ære lavantur.” This author, in his animadversions upon the Vulg. often takes occasion to mention the blunders “of B. Luther,” as well as of the Sept. and other interpreters; for he seems to be satisfied with no version which has hitherto been published. H.

Ver. 17. Landmarks, contrary to the prohibition, C. 19:14. The Rabbins say that Cain first adopted such distinctions. The ancient Greeks placed little pillars at the end of their fields, with the name of the owner engraven upon them. Pollux, iii. 9.—All Thrace was divided in this manner. Xenophon, Anab.

Ver. 18. Blind; or, according to the Rabbins and Grotius, those who are on a journey, and do not know the road. “Cursed, said Diphilis, is the man who does not tell the right road.” Those who lead the simple astray, are no less blameable. Lev. 19:14. C.

Ver. 23. Mother. Some copies of the Sept. have “daughter-in-law;” and some Latin MSS. add, “Cursed is he who sleepeth with his neighbour’s wife; and all the people shall say, Amen.” C.

Ver. 24. Secretly, as is commonly the case; though such as committed murder in public were equally if not more guilty. H.—Assassins, traitors, and those guilty of calumny, &c. are to be abhorred.

Ver. 26. In the. The Sam. Sept. and S. Paul (Gal. 3:10) read, in all the words, &c. which must probably be understood of the principal points of the law, specified in the preceding verses. C. See v. 4.—The Jews could derive no advantage from the omission of the word all, as the general proposition would be equivalent. Capellus.—Some are of opinion, that the blessings which Moses ordered to be proclaimed, were the reverse of these curses, v. 12. But, is that man truly blessed who observes one point of the law, while he perhaps is transgressing the rest? At this rate, the same man might be blessed and cursed at the same time. Kennicott.—They are more probably, therefore, expressed in the following chapter, where the observance of all the commandments is previously required. The curses are denounced indefinitely, to imply that those who transgress the law, must stand before an unerring Judge, to receive an adequate punishment in eternity for their crying sins against the law, which was given on Mount Horeb. C. 29:1. Against such criminals the preceding curses are levelled. But those recorded in the ensuing chapter, are of a temporary nature, and to be publicly inflicted without delay upon those who refuse to adhere to the service of the Lord. “God had made such a covenant with the Israelites, says Houbigant, that he would so long uphold their republic as they should worship the true God.” H.—The foregoing curses may thus refer to the ten commandments; v. 15, denounces vengeance against all who transgress the first table of the law, which relates to God; v. 16, sanctions the honour due to parents; v. 18, 24, and 25, condemn those who injure or kill; as v. 20–1–2–3, do those who are guilty of impurity; v. 17, curseth those who steal; and v. 19, those who bear false witness; v. 26, is intended as a general sanction of the law, as the two last commandments secure the observance of it most effectually, by forbidding even the thought or desire of doing evil. See Kennicott, Dis. ii. p. 86. H.

DEUTERONOMY 28

Ver. 1. Earth. Similar denunciations are made. Lev. 26. M.

Ver. 2. All these blessings, &c. In the Old Testament God promised temporal blessings to the keepers of his law, heaven being not opened as yet; and that gross and sensual people being more moved with present and sensible things. But in the New Testament, the goods that are promised us are spiritual and eternal: and temporal evils are turned into blessings.

Ver. 3. Field. Wherever thou art, all thy undertakings shall prosper. C.

Ver. 4. Womb. This was most fully verified in the birth of the Messias, as the Holy Ghost insinuated, by causing S. Elizabeth to address these words to the mother of Jesus Christ. Luc. 1:42. C.

Ver. 5. Barns. Hebrew tene, is translated (C. 26:2,) basket, in which bread was kept, and served up at table. Loaves were placed thus in baskets, near the altar of holocausts.—Stores. What thou hast laid up for thy provisions in corn, fruit, &c. C.

Ver. 6. Out, in all thy actions and affairs, (M.) at home and abroad; in peace and war.

Ver. 7. Down. Heb. “dead.” Sept. “bruised to pieces,” v. 25. C.—Seven. This denotes the confusion and hurry with which the enemy shall endeavour to escape. M.

Ver. 10. Upon thee; so that thou art called God’s people (C.) with truth. M.—He has taken thee under his protection, and defended them against every attack. H.

Ver. 12. Lend. To do this with usury, is far from being a blessing; but to be able to assist those who are in distress, is a happiness; particularly for that nation which as yet does not know the merit of evangelical poverty. C.

Ver. 13. Tail, as he had promised, v. 1. M.—You shall have dominion over others. C.—So Isaias (9:14,) says, the Lord shall destroy the head, (the magistrate) and the tail, or (v. 15,) the lying prophet. H.

Ver. 15. All these curses, &c. Thus God dealt with the transgressors of his law in the Old Testament: but now he often suffers sinners to prosper in this world, rewarding them for some little good they have done, and reserving their punishment for the other world.

Ver. 20. Rebuke, or “curse.” Sept. the pestilence, (C.) or destruction, (analogin.) H.

Ver. 22. Cold. The word occurs no where else. The Chal. Syr. &c. have the reverse, “heat.”—Blasting. In the original, either the mildew destroying the corn, (H.) or the jaundice, which attacks the human body, may be meant. C.

Ver. 23. Of brass, and yield no rain. M.—Pindar says, (Pyth. x.) “The heaven of brass they never can ascend.” See Lev. 26:19.

Ver. 24. Consumed. Prot. “The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven it shall come down upon thee, till thou be destroyed.” H.—The dust coming instead of rain shall render the land more barren. C. In those dreary regions, where clouds of sand and dust overwhelm the poor traveller, the Israelites would have a good idea what inconveniences would attend such a state of the atmosphere, if it were only for a short continuance. But when it was intended for destruction, how could they possibly support life!

Ver. 25. Scattered, as they are at present. The real import of the Heb. is doubtful. Some agree with the Vulg. and Sept.; (H.) others translate, Thou shalt be trembling, an object of astonishment and horror. Others, All who see thee shall quake; they shall insult over thee, wagging their head. C.

Ver. 26. Away. No threat could be more terrible to the Jews. They did not refuse burial to those who had been hung on the gibbet. C. 21:23. Even the high priest, if he should find a corpse in the field, was obliged to bury it; though he was not allowed on other occasions, to attend the funeral of his relations. God threatens the impious king (C.) Joachim, that he shall be buried with the burial of an ass. Jer. 22:19. H.—The ancient Christians allowed the sacred vessels to be sold, in order to bury the dead. “For we shall not suffer the figure and the work of God to be exposed a prey to the wild beasts and birds.” Lactant. 6.

Ver. 27. Egypt. See C. 6:15, 28:60. Ex. 9:9, and 15:25; or with such diseases as those with which he afflicted Egypt. C.—Out. Heb. “with the emerods, scab, and itch.” H. 1 K. 5:6. 12.

Ver. 28. Madness, folly, or phrensy; with such Saul was attacked, and David feigned himself (1 K. 21:13,) to be in a similar condition at the court of Achis.

Ver. 29. Ways. Is not this visibly the present condition of the Jews, amid the blaze of the gospel light, the miracles and divine conduct of the Son of God! They shut their eyes, and will not acknowledge him for the Messias. C.

Ver. 30. Her. Job makes use of the same imprecation. C. 31:10. Let my wife be the harlot of another. But he immediately subjoins, For this is a heinous crime, &c. which may be applied, both to him who seeks to commit an impure action, (v. 9,) and to those who attempt to punish it by a similar abomination. No person is allowed to wish that a sin may be committed. The Hebrew and Sept. very properly render all these imprecations in the future tense. "Thou shalt marry (or betroth) a wife, and another man shall," which, no doubt, would be an intolerable provocation. H.

Ver. 31. Slain, (immoletur,) for a feast, and not for a sacrifice. M.

Ver. 32. Hand. Heb. also, "thy hand shall not be lifted up towards God." Targ. of Jerusalem says, Thou shalt possess nothing, wherewith thou mayest render God propitious. C.—Thou shalt not be able to rescue, (M.) or to assist thy distressed children.

Ver. 33. A people. The Gentiles, whom the Jews so much despised, and whom the Scripture styles not a nation, have supplanted the Israelites, and entered into the inheritance, which they had lost by their prevarications. Rom. 10:19. H.

Ver. 34. Astonished. Heb. "go mad," become stupified at such a scene of misfortunes.

Ver. 36. Thy king. Nabuchodonosor thus led Joachin and Sedecias, with almost all their people, captives to Babylon, 4 K. 24 and 25:7.—Stone. The ten tribes mixed with other nations, (C.) and for the most part followed their idolatrous worship. Only some few returned with the tribes of Juda, Benjamin, and Levi, and became more careful than before not to irritate God by that hateful sin. H.

Ver. 37. Lost. Heb. "an object of desolation, a fable and a mockery." Sept. "thou shalt be a riddle, a parable, and an example," to employ the thoughts and tongues of all nations, who will not be able to comprehend the greatness of thy distress. C.

Ver. 38. All: so that the little which thou mayest gather will not be worth mentioning. H.—Heb. may also signify, "Thy field shall produce a great deal, and give thee abundant expectations, but the locusts shall consume it," to mortify thee the more.

Ver. 42. Blast. This is a different word from that mentioned, v. 22. Tselatsal may here probably denote a grasshopper, which delights in the shade, and has a shrill note. In hot countries it does great hurt to trees, &c. C.

Ver. 43. Lower. Hebrew repeats this word, to signify the utmost abjection. H.—The Fathers gather hence the glorious superiority to which the Christian Church is raised. Orig. Rom. ii. Theod. q. 34.

Ver. 46. For ever. The nations which were employed by God to scourge the Jews, recognized that they were the instruments of his indignation. We are accustomed to consider many evils as the necessary appendages of human nature; but the surprising misfortunes, with which God visited his people, subjecting them to the Babylonians, Greeks, and Romans, could not be taken in this light. C.

Ver. 47. Things: as in gratitude thou oughtest to have done. On the contrary, the more the Jews were cherished by God, the more insolent they became. C. 32:15.

Ver. 49. Swiftly. The Chaldees are designated in the same manner. Jer. 5:5. Ezech. 17:3. 12. The Romans also carried an eagle, as their chief standard, and the rapidity of their conquests astonished all the world.

Ver. 50. Insolent. Heb. “of a fierce countenance.” It is well known how the Babylonians treated the princes of the Jews. C.

Ver. 51. Until thou be destroyed. This was not expressed in the Sept.

Ver. 53. Womb; a cruelty which the Jews were guilty of in the sieges of Samaria and of Jerusalem. See Bar. 2:2. 13. Lament. 2:20 and 4. 4 K. 6:28. Josep. Bel. vii. 8. C.

Ver. 54. Delicate, (luxuriosis,) abandoned to his pleasures. Josephus (Bel. vi. 11,) seems to have had this passage in view, when he informs us, that parents and children snatched from each other’s mouths the wretched food, with which they endeavoured to support themselves. C.

Ver. 56. Envy. Heb. “her eye shall be evil towards the husband of her bosom,” &c. H.

Ver. 57. And the filth, &c. They will eat the child just born, through extreme hunger. Lament. 2:20. The Chal. Sept. &c. agree with the Vulg. which conveys an idea of the most horrible distress. C.—Indeed it is so horrible and disgusting, that we find no vestiges in history of the completion of the prophecy, taken in this sense. Some, therefore, explain the original, “And her feast, or dressed meat, (shall be) between her feet, even of her own children, which she shall bring forth.” Bate, p. 71. Parkhurst on itsoth. Others believe that the Hebrew is corrupted by the insertion of b before another b, in children; and by the transposition or addition of i in the first word; so that to translate, with the generality of interpreters, “She shall grudge ever bit, or her eye shall be evil towards her husband, and towards her son, and towards her daughter, and towards her afterbirth ... and towards her sons which she shall have brought forth," seems absurd enough. If the woman's eye be evil towards her son, and towards her afterbirth, (which, however, is incapable of depriving her of food) what need of repeating, and towards her sons? Yet the present construction requires this translation; though it is obvious that the woman must have been actuated in a different manner, with respect to these different things, as all allow that she was afraid lest those who were grown up, how dear soever to her, might deprive her of her abominable food, while her eye was evil towards her afterbirth, (or secundines, if the word ssolithe can have this meaning) because she was designing to eat it privately. The Sept. translate Korion, "the skin," or Chorion, "a little girl," (Houbigant) unless (H.) the former word may rather have this signification. Hill.—The Arab. deviates a little from the Heb. "She will deny her husband, her son, and her daughter, her secundines, which fall from her." If, therefore, the two corrections proposed by Houbigant, and approved by Kennicott, (who produces for one of them (ubnie) the authority of the oldest Heb. MS. in England) be admitted, all will be clear and conformable to the event. "56. Her eye shall be evil towards ... her son, and towards her daughter. 57. And she shall boil, (ubossilthe, instead of ubossolithe) that which cometh out from between her feet, even her children, (ubnie, not ubobnie) which she shall bear; for she shall eat them, for want of all things, secretly." This prophetic and terrible denunciation was realized in the siege of Samaria, when two women agreed to eat their own children, one of whom was actually boiled, and the very word here in dispute is used, 4 K. 6:29. Kennicott.—And in the last siege of Jerusalem we read (Joseph. vii. 8) of a mother killing her own child, to satisfy the cravings of hunger and rage against the rioters who had repeatedly plundered her house. Her name was Mary. She also boiled her suckling infant, and actually devoured a part of it. H.

Ver. 59. Increase. Heb. distinguish, or render thy plagues wonderful. C.—Perpetual. Heb. "lasting." H. See v. 27.

Ver. 65. Fearful, dejected, distrustful. The Jews are under continual alarms. C.

Ver. 66. Thy life, being in danger from all sides. The Fathers explain this verse of the behaviour of the Jews towards their Messiah, who was crucified before their eyes; and still they will not believe in him, though he is their life, (C. 30:20,) the way, the truth, and the life. Jo. 14:6 and 1:4. S. Leo. S. Aug. c. Faust. xvi. 22, &c. H.

Ver. 68. With ships, so that thou wilt have no means of escaping by flight. M.—The Romans had a fleet in the Mediterranean, with which they would probably convey the captives into Egypt. Josephus (Ant. xii. 2, &c. Bel. vii. 16) informs us, that many of the Jews had been conveyed into that country after Jerusalem had been ruined by the Chaldees; (C.) and after it was at last destroyed by the Romans, some of “those who were above 17 years of age, were sent thither in chains to work at the public works;” others were reserved to grace the victor’s triumph, or “to be destroyed by the sword, or by wild beasts in the theatres, while those who were under 17, were sold. During the time that Fronto was making the selection, 12,000 were starved to death, either by the cruelty of their keepers, or because they refused food; the multitudes causing it to be very scarce. In the course of the war 97,000 were taken prisoners, and in the siege 1,100,000 perished. For then the whole nation was shut up in prison, as it were by fate, and the city was besieged when full of inhabitants,” at the feast of the Passover; “so that the number of those whom the Romans slew publicly, or took prisoners, was greater than ever was destroyed,” at once, “by the fury of man, or by the wrath of God.” ib. C. 17. Pompey had carried away many captives into Egypt about 120 years before. Pharaoh Sesac took and pillaged the city, under Roboam, 2 Par. 12:2.—That. Heb. “by the way, concerning which I spoke to thee (that is, by returning back, through this wilderness, as thou formerly desiredst,) thou shalt see it no more.”—Set to sale, (venderis,) lit. “shall be sold.” After the Jews had been sold, their new masters could not find any to take them off their hands. H.—Buy you. Protestants, “there ye shall be sold ... and no man shall buy you.” Can a man be sold without being bought? Whereas if the verb hithmaccartem was rendered, and ye shall offer yourselves to sale, the sense would be proper, and expressive of the most bitter sufferings. Kennicott.—Hegesippus (v. 47,) says, “there were many to be sold, but few purchasers; because the Romans disdained receiving the Jews as slaves, nor were there any Jews left to redeem their countrymen.”

DEUTERONOMY 29

Ver. 1. Covenant renewed, and confirmed with an oath, v. 12. M.—Horeb. Thus the speech of Moses is concluded, (C.) and consequently this verse should be at the end of the last chapter, as it is placed in the celebrated editions of Michaelis and Houbigant. The latter observes that, beside that covenant, &c. shews, that the curses here recorded, are not by way of explication of those mentioned in the preceding 27th chapter, “but of a quite different kind. The former are denounced against those who violate the law of the decalogue, which was given at Horeb; neither do they threaten that the chastisements shall be inflicted in this life: the latter maledictions threaten present punishments, and those of a public nature.” See C. 27:26. H.—Josue put in execution in a more solemn manner, what Moses here describes, (Jos. 8:30,) to intimate that Jesus would give the last finishing to the outlines of the old covenant.

Ver. 3. Seen. Many who were present had seen the plagues of Egypt, and what the Israelites themselves had suffered in the wilderness. C.

Ver. 4. Hath not given you, &c. Through your own fault, and because you resisted his grace. Ch.—If they had not been guilty, Moses would never have made them this reproach. “But he shews that they could not understand or obey without God’s assistance, ... and yet if ... it be wanting, si adjutorium Dei desit, the vice of man is not on that account, deserving of excuse, since the judgments of God are just, though they be hidden.” S. Aug. q. 50.—Others explain it thus: Hitherto you have not been able to discern the designs of God in your regard: but now, being on the point of crossing the Jordan, to take possession of the land which God had promised to your fathers, you ought to place an unbounded confidence in him. Others read with an interrogation, which entirely removes the evil interpretation of the wicked, who pretend that God requires impossibilities. “Hath not the Lord?” &c. C.—God sometimes delivers over to a reprobate sense, and to their own will. Theod. q. 37. W.

Ver. 6. Bread, &c. as your ordinary food, (M.) though they might have both bread and wine on some occasions; as when they adored the calf, &c. S. Aug. q. 51. See C. 8:4. C.—Your God, providing a miraculous food for you. M.

Ver. 9. Understand. Heb. “succeed in all your undertakings.” C.

Ver. 10. Doctors. Heb. Shoterim. Sept. Grammateisagogeis, (C.) “officers, heralds,” &c. C. 1:15. 19:18, they are translated magistros, “masters of magistrates.” H.

Ver. 11. Besides, (exceptis,) which may signify all were present; or rather that the strangers of Egypt, &c. who were employed in servile offices, were alone excluded, as having no part in the covenant made with the Israelites. C.—S. Jerom seems to have rendered min, præter, in the latter sense; but the Chal. Sept. &c. take it in the former, as if none at all were absent, from the highest to the lowest. M.

Ver. 12. Pass; alluding to the custom of people who pass between the victims, when they engage in a solemn covenant, as Abraham did, Gen. 15:10.—Oath. Sept. “imprecations,” specified in the preceding chapters, v. 14. C.

Ver. 15. Absent. Heb. “with him that standeth here this day before the Lord, and with him that is not here with us this day.” If all were present, (v. 11,) the absent must here denote the posterity of the Israelites yet unborn. H.—God made the covenant with Abraham and with his seed, before he had any children in the world.

Ver. 17. Idols. Heb. “you have seen their abominations and their filth, (or idols,) wood,” &c. Sept. “their abominations and their idols.”

Ver. 18. Bitterness; an Israelite, who cherishes now in his heart any idol, (H.) and who may draw God’s judgments upon the people, (C.) or induce them to follow his wicked example. H.—Let all watch over their children, lest they fall off. Chaldee, “Let there be none among you now whose heart may be filled with the sin of pride.” See Acts 8:13 and Heb. 12:15, where this text is cited. The Heb. seems to allude to some very bitter herbs. Rass is mentioned as growing in the ground, and the juice of it is often alluded to. Ose. 10:4. Jer. 8:13. Ps. 68:22. Lane is generally joined with the former term, and God threatens to make the faithless Israelites eat of it. Jer. 9:15. Prov. 5:4. It may denote a poisonous bitter herb, as well as rass, which signifies “the head, gall, wormwood, aconite,” &c. C.—The root designates a mind secretly infected with idolatry, and the appetite, being once drunken with pleasures, thirsteth still more. W.

Ver. 19. The drunken, &c.: absumat ebria sitientem. It is a proverbial expression, which may either be understood as spoken by the sinner, blessing, that is, flattering himself in his sins with the imagination of peace, and so great an abundance as may satisfy, and as it were, consume all thirst and want, or it may be referred to the root of bitterness, spoken of before, which being drunken with sin may attract, and by that means consume such as thirst after the like evils. Ch.—S. Jerom seems to have translated sephoth by assumat, as the MSS. and interpreters read, before the correction of Sixtus V. who adopted the other signification of the Heb. absumat. C.—The sense however seems to be the same, as evil communications corrupt good manners, the wicked draw on those who before were dry, or thirsty, and superior to the allurements of pleasure, but not quite so sincere and constant as to shut out from their hearts the desire of tasting, what the man of the world so highly extols, and thus the just give way to the temptation, and become the companion of the libertine and of the idolater, and of course share in his destruction. The feasts of the idols were generally celebrated with the most dissolute mirth, which seemed more congenial to the depraved heart of man, than the sober feasts, which the Lord allowed his people. The drunken revellings in honour of Bacchus, who was worshipped in Arabia, &c. were a disgrace to human nature. Yet it is well known with what eagerness the deluded pagans joined in these religious sports. How prone to such excesses the Israelites also were, sacred history too plainly shews, so that they might well be described as thirsty, and willing to imitate those who were already drunk with dissolute pleasures; and this proverbial warning was not unnecessary to remind them what they had to expect from such conduct, at least if the people should become generally addicted to the service of idols. The most terrible chastisements mentioned below, (v. 20, &c. and in the preceding chapters, and still greater, C. 28:61,) hung over their guilty heads. But the man who should give occasion to such a defection from the Lord, and, like Jeroboam, cause Israel to sin, must remember that he will have to suffer for the sins of all those whom he has perverted. Hence this cutting remark almost always accompanies the mention of Jeroboam's name, He made Israel to sin. Such a one walked in the way, or imitated the sins of the house of Jeroboam, &c. A similar infamy and destruction attend arch-heretics and impostors. H.—Chal. translates, “Let him not say.... lest he should add sins of ignorance to sins of pride.” C.—Sept. “lest the innocent be involved in the destruction of the sinner.” Cornelius a Lapide would leave out the negation, and translate, “that the innocent may be,” &c. M.—Bonfrere believes that the earth is to be understood; “and the earth drunken or deluged with rain, may take away its former dryness, yet so as to be rendered unfit for cultivation.” The proverb affects those who wish for things which will prove destructive to them: so the man who expects to derive great pleasure and advantage from the practice of idolatry, will be miserably deceived, and will only bring on his own ruin; or, if his passions be gratified for a moment, he must, if he die in that state, endure eternal torments in destruction from the face of the Lord. Homer (Odys.) says, “Crimes prosper not; the low outstrips the quick.” Festina lente. Hasten slowly, is an old and useful admonition. Ebria, a drunken woman, is a very indifferent partner for one that is sober at a dance. H.—The flesh being indulged, presently perverts the understanding. D.

Ver. 20. Enkindled, (fumet.) Lit. “smoke.” H.—Heb. “the anger (lit. nose) ... smoke.” The Greeks and Romans adopt similar expressions, to denote the wrath and eagerness with which a person is actuated. “Fierce anger always sits upon his nose.” Theocrit. So Persius says, Disce, sed ira cadat naso, rugosaque sanna.

Ver. 23. Of salt. This salt was of a bituminous or sulphureous nature, which would burn like oil, and was sometimes used in lamps. Herod. ii. 62. Plin. ii. 104. It dried up the moisture of the earth, and rendered it barren. For which reason, it was scattered upon such places as were no longer to be cultivated, or inhabited. Abimelech sowed some on the ruins of Sichem. Jud. 9:45. It seems that Palestine now feels the effects of this curse; as, for the most part, it is uncultivated, and a desert, though once so flourishing. C.

Ver. 26. Knew not, as their gods. M.—Indeed the gods of the heathens, were for the most part more recent than the days of Abraham, or of Moses, and only newly come up; (C. 32:17,) which was a sufficient proof that they were not gods. H.—Assigned. It seems, as if God had in a manner abandoned other nations to the dominion of idols, while he chose Israel for his peculiar people. Hence, if they followed another god, they were to be treated as rebels. Heb. may have another sense, “and from whom they have received nothing.” Chal. and Syr. C.—Sept. “gods to whom they were not faithful, (or whom they did not believe) and whom I did not appoint for them.” Even while the people pretended to follow the worship of idols, they could surely place no confidence in them, knowing that they were either mere creatures, or even the work of their own hands. H.

Ver. 29. Secret things, &c. As much as to say, secret things belong to, and are known to God alone: our business must be to observe what he has revealed and manifested to us, and to direct our lives accordingly. Ch.—The nations full of surprise, at the miseries, which were inflicted upon the Jews, and upon their country, could not comprehend what might have brought on so severe a chastisement, as they little suspected that it was their worshipping those gods, which they themselves adored, v. 2. But those who had been converted, and had been able to penetrate the secrets of God, by means of his gracious revelation, answered, (v. 25, &c.) that idolatry had been the chief cause of such inconceivable distress, and a crime of no less enormity, the refusing to acknowledge the true God, in the person of the Messias, and the putting him even to a disgraceful death, when he came unto his own, (Jo. 1,) had served to complete their misery. H.—Moses resumes his discourse, and says that these chastisements had been reserved in the treasury of God’s wrath, and he had not denounced them to their fathers; but now, since he had told them so plainly, what they had to expect, they would be inexcusable if they ran into the danger. Heb. may signify, “The secrets of the Lord ... are manifest to us.” He has shewn us this favour, in preference to other nations. Ps. 147:20. Vatab.—Secret things are known to God, while those only which are manifest can be discerned by men. Theod. q. 38. W.—Amama wonders at the negligence of B. Luther’s version; and observes, that his commentators illustrate “the word of Luther, not of God,” in this place, p. 378. H.

DEUTERONOMY 30

Ver. 1. Or the curse. The sequel shews that this would prove their portion, and that they would have to do penance among all the nations. H.

Ver. 3. Before. The Jews are still in expectation of this deliverance, as they say this prediction does not relate to the captivity at Babylon. But Nehemias understood it in this sense, (2 Esd. 1:8,) though it will not have its perfect accomplishment till the latter days, when the Israelites will embrace the true faith. Rom. 11:25.

Ver. 4. Poles. The arctic and antarctic, the northern and southern poles; that is, into the most distant regions. M.—Heb. “the end of heaven,” where it seems to rest upon the earth. C.

Ver. 5. Fathers. Some sinners have risen to greater eminence by sincere repentance, than others who have offended less. W. See Luc. 7:47.

Ver. 6. Circumcise. Sept. “purify.” Chal. “take away the folly from.” After the captivity, idolatry was never very prevalent among the Jews. H.—But this prediction will not be fulfilled till the Jews acknowledge the Messias. C.—Those whose hearts are circumcised, as God here promises, are enabled to love him above all things; and no doubt he will fulfil what he has thus engaged to do, with regard to some. W. S. Aug. q. 53.

Ver. 9. Fathers. He will again take a pleasure in bestowing favours upon thee, (C.) of a spiritual and more lasting nature. Hence the Jews may understand that they have not yet repented, as they ought to do; since they have been under the wrath of God for above 1500 years. Salien. H.

Ver. 11. Above. Heb. “separated, unknown,” &c. Sept. “too heavy.” S. Paul (Rom. 10:6,) adapts this to the Christian law, which is the perfection of that given by Moses. The precepts of Jesus Christ are well known, and easily accomplished (C.) by the sincere lover of justice, (H.) assisted by powerful grace. S. Aug. q. 54. S. Peter (Acts 15) insinuates, that it was very difficult under the old law, to comply with all the regulations, at a time when the sacraments did not convey such great graces. D.

Ver. 12. Work. There is no need of studying the mysteries of astrology, as the Magi do, to understand the will of God. Grot.—S. Paul adds, (v. 7,) or who shall descend into the deep? which is not in Heb. C.—But he probably alludes to the following verse, as the sea is often styled the deep. It was not necessary for the Jews, or for Christians, (H.) to undertake long voyages, to discover the true God, as the ancient philosophers were obliged to do; and after they had obtained some idea of the truth, they were afraid to declare it, on account of the prejudices of the people. C.—But the most illiterate among us, may easily obtain sufficient knowledge to regulate his life. H.

Ver. 14. Heart. Sept. add, “and in thy hands.” Thou art often obliged to talk about the law, and to learn it by heart. Nothing hinders thee, with the grace of God, from putting it in practice. C.—No teacher could more plainly inculcate the liberty of the human will. Theod. q. 38. S. Aug. de Nat. 69. S. Amb. &c. W.

Ver. 15. Evil. Obedience will insure eternal life: but if thou give the preference to evil, the second death must be thy portion, v. 19. H. Eccli. 15:17. M.—It may also refer to the goods and evils of the present life, of which Moses has been speaking. C.

Ver. 19. I call. He begins his canticle in the same emphatical manner, (C. 22) as Isaias does his prophecy. H.

Ver. 20. He is. From God all advantages are derived. We may render the Heb. with the Sept. “Because this is thy life (C.) ... to dwell,” &c. By observing the law of God, long life and possession of the promised land can be alone attained. H.

DEUTERONOMY 31

Ver. 1. Went. Began. M.—“Concluded.” Sept. continued, or, just before he dismissed the audience, he spoke to them as follows. Josephus (iv. 8,) thinks that this took place the day after his first harangue. C.

Ver. 2. Come in, to conduct you. M.—Especially. Heb. “and the Lord.” It was not the want of strength which hindered Moses from continuing to perform his arduous functions, as he was still full of vigour both in soul and body; (C. 34:7. C.) but it was his submission to the will of God, who had resolved thus to punish his former diffidence. H.

Ver. 3. Then. This word is not in Heb. or the Sept.; neither does Moses mean to insinuate, that God would take his place in conducting the people; but only that after he should be no more, the divine Providence would no less watch over his people, and direct the councils of Josue, who stood beside him. H.—The ark preceded the army, (Jos. 3) and God invisibly put the enemies of Israel to flight. M.

Ver. 7. Called. Heb. “unto Josue.” He did this publicly that no dispute might arise after his death, respecting the choice of a successor. H.—Lot. Heb. and Chal. “thou shalt put them in possession of it.” C.

Ver. 9. This law of Deuteronomy. M.—Some think that he had written so far before he came to the assembly, as well as the Canticle; because God commanded him the same to ascend the mount. C. 32:48. C.—But Moses did not speak the discourses recorded in this book, at one time. After he had, therefore, dismissed the people with his blessing, and with an assurance that God would be their newly appointed leader, he committed to writing what he had delivered by God’s order, at different times, and gave a copy of the Pentateuch to the priests, who were to keep it carefully on the side of the ark, and explain it to the people, particularly every seventh year. The Jews understand this law to mean the whole Pentateuch. It may denote also, more particularly H. Deuteronomy, as far as this place, or the 27th, and three subsequent chapters of it. He gave two copies; one to be deposited beside the ark, and the other (v. 26,) to be kept by the priests. In all contracts of consequence, this method is observed, one copy being laid carefully by, and the other left in the hands of those who may be concerned. Jer. 32:12. The Rabbins say that 13 copies were taken; one for each of the 12 tribes and one to be placed on the side of the ark. But of this new assertion we must not expect to hear any proof.—Priests, whose duty it is to instruct the people. Mat. 2:7. C.—Ancients, or magistrates, who must put the law in execution, and guide their decisions by it. H.—The mention of the ark in this place is to insinuate that the book was to be deposited on one side of it, v. 26. The priests might carry the ark, if they thought proper, (M.) as they did sometimes on the more solemn occasions; (Jos. 3 and 6. 1 K. 4:4,) though the duty belonged to the Levites. Num. 3 and 4. The pagans placed their sacred books in their temples, under the care of the priests, who were obliged to transcribe them. C.

Ver. 10. Years commenced. Heb. “at the extremity of seven years.” The sabbatic years began at the expiration of every six years, (H.) after the land of Chanaan was conquered, (C.) or perhaps after the passage of the Jordan, which took place soon after this discourse was made. Josue spent above six years in the conquest of the country, and then divided it among the tribes. The seventh year was the first year of remission; as the Israelites, particularly on the east side of the Jordan, had already enjoyed the benefits of the country for a considerable time. If they had been required to wait till the whole had been conquered, no sabbatical year would have been of obligation before the reign of Solomon, as he had still some of the devoted nations to subdue. See Ex. 23. Lev. 25. Salien. A.C. 1463. At this time, the ark was removed from Galgala to Silo, where it remained about 350 years. Jos. 18. H.

Ver. 11. Thou shalt. Sept. “you shall read.” Josephus says, the high priest had to perform this office; while the Rabbins assert, that the chief magistrate, Moses, and his successors, the kings of Juda, had to read the law publicly. The princes did this in the court of the temple, designed for the women, as they also were bound to hear it. We find that Josias read aloud in the temple the words of the covenant, which have been lately discovered, 4 K. 23:2. C.—But Esdras, a Levite, did the like; (1 Esd. 8:2,) and the command seems to be directed chiefly to the priests, from whose number Moses was not excluded. Ps. 98:6. H.

Ver. 12. Children, (parvulis.) Those who were above 12 years of age, attended the festivals as much as possible, particularly the three great ones. Even little children came to the temple, when they did not live at too great a distance. The lawgiver knew of what importance it was to inspire their tender minds with a love and respect for religion, and for the laws. C.

Ver. 14. In the court, as none but priests were allowed to enter the tabernacle. M.

Ver. 17. My face, as one indignant and much displeased. C.—I will withdraw my special protection and favours from them. M.

Ver. 19. This canticle, which will be given in the following chapter. Hence this law, (v. 9,) may comprise not only what had gone before, but also the remaining part of the book of Deuteronomy. This Moses would write before his death, and deliver entire, with the preceding books, to be kept with the utmost care, by the priests, as a testimony to remind all of what had happened in past ages, and what would befall the transgressors of God’s law. H.—The canticle, containing an abridgment of the book of Deuteronomy, (C.) as the latter did of the whole law, was to be copied out more frequently, (H.) and committed to memory. Some suppose that Moses and Josue are here ordered to see this put in execution. Others think that Moses gives this commission to the priests.—That they. Heb. “put in their mouths, (C.) that this song may be a witness for me against,” &c. God foresaw that the Israelites would prove rebellious; but he leaves them without excuse, as they could not plead ignorance. H.—This testimony against them was written in the form of a canticle, that it might be more easily remembered. W.

Ver. 20. Despise, (detrahent,) “detract,” (H.) and represent me as an unjust and weak God. Heb. “they will despise, or blaspheme,” &c. Sept. “they will irritate me.” C.

Ver. 21. Thoughts. Heb. “imagination.” Sept. “wickedness.”—Them. Heb. “concerning which I swore.” Sept. add, “to their fathers.” H.

Ver. 23. The Lord. Heb. has not this word, so that it would seem as if Moses had given this charge to Josue; but the context shews (C.) that it was the Lord; (v. 14,) for he swore to give the land of Israel. The Sept. insert the words of Moses and the Lord. “And Moses commanded Josue ... the land which the Lord swore.” H.—This is the first time that God addresses Josue, in order to confirm his authority. M.

Ver. 26. Side. But not within, (M.) according to the generality of interpreters, whom Calmet follows. Ex. 25:10. But here he adopts the contrary opinion of Jonathan and Grotius, and asserts that this writing, containing the 29th, 30th, and 31st chapters, on thin boards, was placed in the ark, beside the tables of the law, in the same manner as the Philistines placed in it a coffer of gold, 1 K. 6:8. We read (3 K. 8:9,) that there was nothing in the ark except the two tables, which might be true at the time that book was written; though S. Paul (Heb. 9:4,) tells us, that the golden pot, and the rod of Aaron, were in the ark. If they were there in the days when the author of the first book of Kings lived, the passage in question must be understood with these exceptions. C.—This difficulty cannot, however, be now easily decided, as the Scripture often uses the word in to denote near to, &c. v. 14. The coffer of the Philistines might also be on the outside of the ark. H.—Thee. This act of ratification of the covenant, which had been made at Horeb 39 years before, (C.) was placed in or near the ark. H.—The three chapters, of which it probably consisted, seem to have been what was discovered in the reign of Josias; as the threats and blessings which they contain, would naturally tend to make a strong impression upon all, 4 K. 22:8. C.—Kennicott thinks that Helcias discovered the very MS. which Moses had written with his own hand, and which he deposited neither in, nor fastened to any side of the ark, but only placed by the side (mitsad, juxta, Noldius) of it, or upon the same table; so that it might not be taken by the Philistines, but kept in some suitable place. Dis. ii. It is surprising that Huet cites Jonathan as delivering this sentiment, in capsâ ad latus dextrum. H.

Ver. 1. Speak. Heb. and Sept. "Heaven attend, and I will speak." H.—Never was there an exordium more pompous, or better adapted to the subject. Moses calls those who never die to witness what he asserts, as if to insinuate that these truths ought never to be forgotten. See Num. 4:6. Virgil (xii.) imitates this style, Esto nunc sol testis & hæc mihi terra precanti, (C.) which puts in the mouth of Æneas, to whom Latinus replies, Hæc eadem Ænea, terram, mare, sidera juro.

Ver. 2. Gather, as rain does from vapours; (M.) so let the sum of what I have taught you be collected into this short canticle, and penetrate your hearts. H.—Chal. "may my discourse be as delightful as the rain." Sept. "may my apophthegm (or sententious discourse, C.) be expected with earnestness, like rain," when the soil is thirsty. H.—Preachers are compared to clouds, and their speech to rain. Is. 60:8. Eccli. 39:4.—Drops. Some explain this and the former term in the original, of "a stormy and vehement shower," while others attach this idea only to the last part of the sentence. C.—The lawgiver wishes to engage the hearts of his audience by mildness, though he is forced also to thunder, in order to rouse their attention, v. 15. H.—Sound doctrine produces much fruit in good dispositions, as rain causeth the seed to push forth which has been sown in an excellent soil. W.

Ver. 3. Invoke, or praise. Vatab.—Magnificence; admire and fear this greatness. C.—The first duty of men is to praise God, the next to confess their sins, v. 5. W.

Ver. 4. Right. You cannot complain of having been first abandoned by God. All his works and proceedings are entitled to praise. Heb. "This rock, (hatsur) his works are perfect." C.—Sept. "God, his works are true." H.—God is often styled a rock, to denote this strength. v. 18. Ps. 62:8.

Ver. 5. Filth, or idolatry. The fidelity of God is contrasted with the infidelity of his people, who deserve not to be called his children. The Sept. Chal. Syr. and Arab. seem to have read in a different manner from what the Hebrew does at present. C.—As it stands it is quite unintelligible: Corruptit, non filii ejus, macula eorum. Two letters have been carelessly inserted, and la has been placed after lu, contrary to the Samaritan text, which is perfectly clear: "They are corrupted, they are not his, but filii maculæ, children defiled." Houbigant, prol. 75.—Capellus (p. 288,) condemns the Sept. as he follows a wrong punctuation, and translates, "they did not sin against him, reprehensible children;" whereas, it more properly signifies, "they sinned, not his, but children deserving reprehension, (or children of blame, they did not belong or stick close to him) being a crooked and perverse generation." H.—Their wickedness cannot be attributed to God. He is no less powerful and holy, though they have given themselves up to the service of idols. S. Aug. q. 55. C.—He had given them all necessary instructions and assistance; so that, finding them always prone to evil, the more favours he heaped upon them, he was on the point of exterminating all the guilty at once, v. 26. H.

Ver. 6. Possessed thee, as his peculiar inheritance. M.—Heb. "has purchased thee, made thee, and established thee." C.—The Sept. render this last word like the Vulg. as they seem to have read, ibnoc. C.

Ver. 8. Israel. He suffered the people of Chanaan to occupy as much land as would be requisite for the Israelites. Sept. "according to the number of the angels of God." Hence many of the ancients gathered that there were seventy angel guardians of provinces, and as many languages; while others did not pretend to determine the exact number. But the version which they have followed, is in opposition to all the rest. C.—They have also disputed, on this occasion, whether the elect will be equal in number to the good angels, as S. Greg. thinks; (hom. 34, in Luc. 15) or they will only fill up the places of those who have fallen. See Mag. Sent. ii. 9. Abenezra observes, that interpreters understand this text as alluding to the dispersion of nations, (Gen. 11,) when God decreed that the land of the seven nations should belong to and be sufficient for the Israelites. Amama. H.—The Heb. may be rendered, "He fixed the limits of each people. At that time the children of Israel were few in number, (9) when the Lord chose his people," &c. Long after the division of the earth, (which the Lord had ordered, Acts 17:26,) the Israelites were very few in number, as Jacob observes, Gen. 34:30. See C. 26:5. Ps. 104:9. 12. C.—But this explication does not satisfy Houbigant, (p. 76, Prol.) no more than that of Le Clerc. He is convinced that a word has been transposed, and another left out, as the Samaritan copy has Israel twice, and he would therefore translate, "He divided his people according to the number of the sons of Israel." In his eternal decrees, He allotted twelve portions of land in Chanaan to the descendants of Jacob, and these Josue was ordered to mark out for them. See Jos. 4:5. H.

Ver. 9. Lot. Heb. lit. “the cord,” in allusion to the ancient method of dividing lands with a cord. Herodotus (ii. 6,) observes, that the length of one, in the Upper Egypt, was 60 stadia, or 7700 paces, while it was only half as much in the Lower Egypt.

Ver. 10. He found. Sept. and Chal. “he gave him what was sufficient, in the desert land.” God made a choice of a nation destitute of every thing, that they might confess with gratitude that they had received all from him. C.—“Taught him” both by “instructions,” and by various “chastisements.” Sept. epaideusen. H.—The space of forty years was necessary (C.) to eradicate the propensity to evil, and the corrupt manners of the Hebrews, who were therefore conducted through a wilderness, where they might not be contaminated by the company of other nations, (H.) but might have leisure to meditate on the law of God. C.—Eye, with the utmost care. M.—He protected those whom he had chosen out of pure mercy. W.

Ver. 11. Shoulders, as (Ex. 19:4,) upon the wings of eagles. It is said that the eagle hovers over the nest, to encourage her young ones to fly, and when she sees them exhausted, she takes them upon her back. This similitude shews the extreme affection of God towards his people. Heb. and Chal. may also be, “as an eagle makes (C. or stirs up) her nest, hatches her young, spreads her wings over them, and bears them upon her wings, so the Lord alone was his leader.” H.

Ver. 12. With him, to stand up in their defence, though the Israelites adored but too many others in the desert.

Ver. 13. High land, in a place of safety, both against the enemy, and the inundations of water. The Nile renders Egypt like one continued sea for about 80 days, in the summer season. C.—God had already begun to put the Israelites in possession of the fertile countries east of the Jordan, where there were several high mountains. H.—But when this canticle should be recited, in after ages, they would also enjoy the other regions, which had been promised unto them, on the west. Moses speaks, like a prophet, of things to come, as if they were already past. M.—Stone. Bees make honey in such places, and olive trees flourish on the side of a hill. Vestiges still remain of the industry with which the Jews have formerly cultivated their territory, supporting the earth with walls (C.) when it was in danger of falling down, or of becoming barren, for want of moisture. H.

Ver. 14. Butter, or “cream,” as the former article was probably not yet discovered. Gen. 18:8. C.—The proofs of this assertion, from the original, chemath, and from the Scripture, frequently representing butter as a liquid, seem not, however, very solid. See Judg. 5:25. Prov.

30:33. The Sept. have lit. "the butter of oxen," but the latter name includes all of the species. H.—Basan. The Sept. have "the young of bulls and of he-goats;" though they generally translate "fat sheep." See S. Jer. in Isai. liii.—Wheat. Heb. "fat of the kidneys of wheat."—Grape. See Gen. 49:11. Androcides wrote to Alexander, who loved wine too much, "when thou art about to drink wine, remember, O king, that thou art drinking the blood of the earth." Plin. xiv. 15.

Ver. 15. Beloved. Hebrew yeshurun, is supposed to be a diminutive of Israel. C. 32:5 and 26. C.—Prot. "Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked; thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God, which made him, and lightly esteemed the rock of his salvation." This sudden change of persons is not found in the Sept. "And Jacob eat, and was filled, and the beloved kicked; he grew fat, thick, and broad, and he abandoned God ... and revolted from God his Saviour." H.—Temporal prosperity occasioned the revolt of the Jews against their benefactor. W.

Ver. 17. Devils. Heb. "to the destroyers, or to those of the fields." See Lev. 17:7. Baruc. 4:7. 35. C.—Knew not. Sept. "revered not." H.—Heb. may be, "who knew them not," who had bestowed nothing upon them. C. 29:26.—Come up. Heb. "of the neighbourhood;" gods whose origin they knew, (C.) as well as the people who had given them that title; (H.) gods of human invention. M.—Novelty allureth to the worship of idols and to heresy.

Ver. 18. Created. Sept. "gave thee food." Heb. "of the rock that begat thee, thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten God that formed thee, (H.) or praises thee," the source of thy felicity. C.—Calvin (Instit. i. 11. 9,) to insinuate that Catholics adore pictures, as the Israelites did the golden calf, pretends that they could not have forgotten that God delivered them out of Egypt. Thus he contradicts the Scriptures! W.

Ver. 19. Daughters. The women of Israel, who were not less addicted to idolatry than the men. H.

Ver. 20. From them. The Jews themselves acknowledged, in the siege of Jerusalem, that God had abandoned and given up to destruction his once beloved people. Joseph. Bel. vii. 8. C.—Consider, or look on their utter ruin with indifference, or rather with complacency. H.—I will laugh at your destruction. Prov. 1:16. C.—God loves without seeing any preceding merit in his creatures, but he never abandons them till they have first proved unfaithful. W.

Ver. 21. Vanities. Sept. "idols." H.—Nation. The Gentiles were of this description, when they were called to the true faith. This excited the indignation of the Jews, as they would neither enter heaven themselves, nor suffer others to obtain that happiness. Rom. 1:19. Theod. q. 41. "An association bound together by law, constitutes a nation. A multitude which has no laws, or bad ones, is unworthy of the name." Grot.—The Jews looked upon all others with sovereign contempt. C.—Now, in their turn, they are despised. W.

Ver. 22. A fire. He alludes to the destruction of Sodom, (C.) which may be considered as a figure of that which will overtake the whole world at the last day, and excruciate both the souls and the bodies of the reprobate in the flames of hell. H.—Fire also denotes war, the horrors of which overwhelmed the Jews both at the first and the last sieges of Jerusalem. C.

Ver. 23. Arrows. Pestilence, famine, war, sickness, and death, are termed the arrows of God.

Ver. 24. Birds. This refers in a particular manner to those who are deprived of sepulture, and hung on a gibbet. C. 27:26. Josephus (Bel. vi. 12,) informs us, that the multitude of Jews who were to be crucified, was so great, that sufficient wood could not be procured to make crosses for them, nor was there place for them to stand. Heb. "they shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured with burning heat;" (H.) or with the disease called the carbuncle. C.—But the Sept. and Chal. explain it of "birds." H.—Bite. Sept. "with a painful contraction of the nerves." Chald. "infested with evil spirits."—Beasts. Thus God forced the people of Samaria to obey his law, 4 K. 17:25.—Fury, "venom." Pagnin. M.

Ver. 26. Men. Heb. "I said I will disperse or exterminate them." Samar. "my fury shall consume them." We may translate, "I had resolved to destroy them; 27. But," &c. (C.) or Prot. "I said I would scatter them into corners, and would ... were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy," &c.—Where are they? in the mouth of God, shews an utter destruction, so that no vestiges of them remain. Their memory is perished. H.—God sometimes defers punishing the sinner for just reasons. W.

Ver. 27. Wrath. The enemies of the Israelites wished nothing more than their destruction. If therefore God had gratified this desire, by punishing his people as they deserved, the enemy would have presently insinuated that He had not been able to drive them out, or that (H.) he was fickle, &c.—Mighty. (excelsa;) "lifted up." This expression shews the pride and insolence of those who make use of it, as if they despised God and all his laws. Procopius mentions this wicked inscription, to be still seen at Rome, "I lift up my hands to (or against) God, who destroyed me, though innocent, in the 20th year of my age." Pos. Procius, (C.) who seems to have been a woman, quæ vixi, &c. H.

Ver. 28. Wisdom. Interpreters generally explain this and the eight following verses, of those nations whom God employed to scourge his people, though some understand it all of the Israelites. C.—The words may be applied to all who transgress the law of God, as this is a sure mark of folly and impiety, and the Lord earnestly wishes that all should be converted, v. 29. True wisdom reflects on the past, present, and future, (W.) in order to make provision for the last great conflict. H.

Ver. 30. Thousand. In the battles which the Israelites had fought, the hand of God had appeared so visibly in their defence, giving them the victory over nations much more numerous, (C.) that all must confess their defeat must be in punishment of some former transgression, and that it is not the mighty hand of the enemy, but God himself, who chastises his people, as he had foretold. C. 28:7. 25. 49. H.—Of this the neighbouring nations were convinced, as Achior declared to the Holofernes. Judit. 5:17. When the Hebrews neglected the law of God they were oppressed, and their conversion was presently rewarded with liberty, (C.) and a profusion of blessings.

Ver. 31. Judges. The Egyptians, Amalecites, &c. had witnessed the miracles which God had now wrought for 40 years' time, in favour of his people. H.—They knew also how the Israelites had been punished for their sins. M.—Though they followed a false religion themselves, they could discern the beauty of the true one. W.—Video meliora proboque—Deteriora sequor. Ovid.

Ver. 32. Bitter. The enemies of Israel, were of an accursed progeny. H.—They imitated the vices of those wicked cities. Moses cautioned his people to beware of the root of bitterness. C. 29:18. C.—If they should neglect the admonition, and become like the Chanaanites, they knew what they had to expect. H.—Their works being hateful to the Lord, (M.) he would surely punish them. The fruits which grow near the lake of Sodom, though sometimes fair to the eye, (H.) are full of dust, "black and empty, they fall to ashes," in cinerem vanescunt. Tacit. v. Jos. Bel. v. 5. Growing on a bituminous soil, they could not but have a disagreeable taste. C.—The authors of the Universal History call in question what the ancients have reported concerning the fruits of Sodom. H.

Ver. 34. Treasures. Whether we refer to the preceding remarks to the faithless Israelites, whose corruption was less pardonable, as they had received so many favours from above, or to their proud and cruel enemies, who exceeded the bounds of moderation in their wars, God keeps an exact account of all, and will shortly punish both according to their deserts. H.

Ver. 35. Time. Men are eager to punish their enemies, for fear lest they should escape. But God defers his chastisements frequently in this world, designing to make his enemies feel the weight of his indignation for all eternity. How consoling it is for the just, to think they have God for an avenger! “If thou, says Tertullian, remit the injury, which thou hast received, into his hands, he is the avenger ... How much ought patience to endure, in order to make God a debtor.” Adeo satisidoneus patientiæ sequester Deus.—That. Sept. “when” (C.) they shall fall and come to ruin. M.

Ver. 36. People who have been guilty, that he may spare them, when they repent. M.—“He will give judgment in favour of his people,” &c. Houbig.—Servants. He will not involve the innocent in the ruin of the rebellious. M.—But, at the same time, he will have them to be convinced that their salvation came not from themselves. He will assist them when all human aid has proved abortive, (H.) and when they are reduced to the utmost distress. See Isaias 35:3. 3 K. 21:21. Those who may have thought themselves secure in their sins, will not escape punishment. W.

Ver. 38. Wine. Hence the Jews abhor the wine of Christians, whom they consider as the greatest enemies of God. The pagans were accustomed to make libations to their idols, even in their ordinary repasts. C.—The fat was always sacred to God. Lev. 3:17. M.

Ver. 40. For ever. God can swear by no one greater than himself. Heb. 6:13.

Ver. 41. Lightning, equally terrible and penetrating: fulminis acta modo. Æn. ix. C.—Judgment, to punish with rigour my declared enemies. H.—These verses seem to regard the idolatrous nations, (M.) though God will not fail to punish the guilty, wherever they may be found. H.

Ver. 42. Enemies. I will tear the crown from off their head. Chal. I will destroy the king, as well as the meanest captives. Prot. “from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.” At the very first I will completely destroy them. H.—I will punish them for the slaughter and captivity of my people, whom they have shaved, as a mark of their servile condition. M.—Their bare head, or vain counsels, will be detected and punished. W.

Ver. 43. People. Though God afflicted the Israelites for a time, he was always disposed to receive them to his favour again upon their repentance; and he will even receive them into his Church before the day of judgment. Rom. 11:25. C.—This decided predilection for them, would naturally induce other nations to praise them. Grabe's Sept. reads, "Rejoice ye heavens with him, and let all the sons of God adore him, and let all the angels of God strengthen them, because He avengeth the blood of his sons; and he will continue to do so, and he will punish his enemies, and will render to those who hate him; and the Lord will purify the land of his people." H.—In some editions, after Let all the angels of God adore him, (cited Heb. 1:6. Cappel.) they read, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people, which S. Paul quotes, Rom. 15:10; and then they add, "And Moses wrote this canticle on that day, and he taught it to the children of Israel; (C.) 44 and Moses came forth to the people, and spoke all the words of this law, in the ears of the people, he and Jesus, the son of Nave," by which name they designate Josue, the son of Nun. H.—He assisted Moses in singing the canticle, as his colleague in office, to whom the obligation of withdrawing the people from idolatry would henceforth devolve. M.—God always preserved some of the Jews from the general corruption, till the time of the Messias. W.

Ver. 47. Live. Heb. "it is your life." They were to cherish the law as their own lives; for their prosperity and length of days depended on their observance of it.

Ver. 49. Passages. The author of the Vulgate has given this explication of Abarim. C.

Ver. 51. Cades. Heb. "at the waters of Meriba-Cadesh," &c.

Ver. 52. Into it. By repeating this reproach and judgment God excited in his servant the most lively sentiments of repentance for his fault. Num. 20. H.—Aaron had been deprived of the sight of this delightful country. If they had been labouring for its acquisition alone, the reflection must have been very cutting. But they had a better country in view, though they had greatly desired to enter into that land which was to be ennobled and purified by the birth and blood of the Son of God. H.—Having received the order from God in the evening, after Moses had taught his canticle to the people, he immediately set his house in order, and on the following morning he gave his last blessing to the tribes of Israel, and was attended by the chief to the foot of the mountain. Salien.

DEUTERONOMY 33

Ver. 1. Blessing. The Fathers, S. Aug. (q. 56,) &c. explain this of the Christian Church, rather than of the Synagogue. Theod.—Man of God. A title given to a prophet, 1 K. 2:27 and 9:6. The prophets often speak of things to come, as if they were past, as we have seen in the conduct of Balaam. Num. 24:3. Moses here delivers his last testament, and speaks as one no longer in the world, so that there is no reason to affirm that this chapter has been added by another hand; (C.) though Kennicott thinks it probable. He suggests, that the first verses of this blessing have been corrupted in the Heb. and should be translated: 2. He, Jehovah, came from Sinai, and he arose upon them from Seir; (Judg. 5:4.) 3. He shone forth from Mount Pharan, and he came from Meriba-Cadesh. (Num. 20:1. 13.) From his right hand a fire shone forth upon them. 4. Truly he loved the people, and he blessed all his saints. 5. For they fell down at his feet, and they received of his words. 6. He commanded us a law, the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob. 7. and He became king in Jeshurun, when the heads of the people were assembled, together with the tribes of Israel. See (Dis. i. p. 423,) the arguments which he produces in favour of this version. H.

Ver. 2. Pharan. Habacuc 3:3, mentions this apparition. See also Ps. 67:9.—Saints. God was accompanied by legions of angels, when he delivered the law to the Israelites, who are styled a nation of saints. Num. 16:3. Sept. “he hastened from Mount Pharan, with ten thousands to Cades. At his right hand are his angels attending.” H.—Kodesh does not mean saints, but holiness, or the city of Cades; and the preceding word, which Protestants translate, with ten thousands, more probably refers to another title of the city, as it is specified Meriba-Cadesh. C. 32:51. Ezech. 48:28. Ken.—Law. Chal. “from the midst of the fire he has given us a law, written with his own hand.” We may translate, “He hath shone from Mount Pharan, and multitudes accompanied him. The Holy One, who hath in his hand fire and the law.” See Isai. 6:3. God conducted his people, like a victorious general, through the wilderness, frequently appearing to them to strike terror into the rebellious. C.—When he first descended upon Sinai, his glory shone on Pharan and Seir, as it were in its progress thither. M.—The law is styled fiery, not only because it was given from the midst of flames, but also because it was to be put in execution with the utmost rigour. H.—But doth is Chaldee, and no where else used for the law in the books written before the captivity, nor is it acknowledged by the Sept. Syr. &c. Perhaps it was originally aur, as it is in the Sam. version, “shone forth,” conformably to a similar passage, Hab. 3:4. "His brightness was as the sun, horns, or rather splendours (issuing forth) from his hand," &c. Ken.

Ver. 3. People, (populos.) God loves and watches over all, but particularly (C.) over the nation which he has chosen. Chal. See Wis. 3:1. Isai. 49:16.—Doctrine. It was formerly the custom for disciples to sit at their master's feet, (Act. 22:3,) as it is still in the Eastern countries. Bellon. iii. 12. Sept. "and these are under thee;" (H.) subject to thy orders. C.—Heb. is here extremely confused: "Yea, he loved the people; all his saints are in thy hand, and they eat down at thy feet; every one shall receive of thy words." Moses here addresses the Lord. How could he say therefore, all his, &c.? whose saints, and in whose hand? The Vulg. and Chal. have not the same difficulty, as they read, in his hand, bidu. but the Syriac has, "and he blessed all his saints." Boroc is not very unlike the present Heb. bidoc, (Ken.) r and d being frequently mistaken for each other, and i as often neglected by the Hebrew copyists. H.—The Sam. version confirms this alteration; and the text also has the v, and, at the beginning, which makes the whole to be clearly connected, particularly if we allow that c, which stands for thy, has been substituted for v, his, in the following words, thy feet and thy words, which ought to be his, as all the context speaks of God in the third person. This is agreeable to the Vulg. and to the Sept. also, in the last instance. In the former, the Heb. is printed thy foot, though the Sam. and several MSS. read thy feet. Instead of yissa, "he shall receive," (H.) the plural ought to be substituted, v being omitted both at the beginning and end, as it is in the name of Benaihu, 1 Par. 11:22. See 2 K. 23:20. The Sam. Syr. and Arab. read and they received, (Ken.) and the Vulg. they shall receive. The Sept. seem to refer this to Moses, "And Moses received from his words, the law which he enjoined to us." H.—That Moses should speak of himself, in this manner, seems very unaccountable, and therefore a word may perhaps have crept in, on account of its resemblance with the following term, Mursse. If it has not, Moses must have assumed the title of king, (v. 5,) which he seems nevertheless to have disclaimed; (C. 17:14,) and there was none in Israel before Saul. 1 K. 8:7. Ken.—We may, however, suppose that he puts these words in the mouths of the people, who would repeat this blessing after he was dead, and mention with gratitude how Moses had delivered to them so excellent a law, and administered the affairs of state with all the power and dignity of a king. H.

Ver. 4. Moses. He expresses himself as if the people were speaking. The change of persons is very frequent in this discourse.—Inheritance. So the psalmist (118:111,) says, I have purchased thy testimonies for an inheritance for ever. C.

Ver. 5. He shall, &c. Erit rex, may perhaps be as well rendered indefinitely, "There shall be a king;" or, with the Sept. "And there shall be over the beloved a ruler," as (H.) some understand this of Moses, others of Saul, though it most probably refers to God himself, who gave the law, and was acknowledged, in the most solemn manner, for the king of Israel.—Right. Heb. yishurun, a term which S. Jerom translates, with the Sept. (C.) C. 32:15, the beloved, as it is supposed to be a diminutive of Israel, to express greater tenderness. Thus Cicero called his daughter Tulliola. H.

Ver. 6. Number. This is conformable to the prophecy of Jacob, who deprived Ruben of his birth-right, on account of incest. He is even treated with indulgence, in being permitted to form one of the tribes. Yet some copies of the Sept. Syr. (Theod. q. 42,) and many interpreters, take this in quite a contrary sense, "let him be numerous, or not few;" the negation being supplied from the former part of the verse, which is not unusual in Hebrew. See Gen. 2:6. Psalm 9:19. Prov. 31:1, &c. The tribe of Ruben was in effect more numerous than those of Gad, Joseph, or Benjamin. Simeon receives no blessing, probably on account of the crimes for which so many of that tribe were exterminated, (Num. 1:23 and 26:14. C.) and particularly Zambri, one of the chief princes. ib. C. 25. W.—But Grabe's Sept. applies to Simeon what the rest apply to Ruben. "And let Simeon be many in number." No solid reason can be given why he should be passed over entirely, as, notwithstanding the infidelity of some of his children, and his own cruelty in not endeavouring to rescue Joseph, &c. he was to form a tribe among his brethren. H.—Some, therefore, imagine that he was to share in the blessings of Ruben, or of Levi, (with whom he is joined by Jacob. Gen. 49:5,) or of Juda, near whom he had his allotment of the promised land. Part of the tribe of Simeon afterwards dwelt in the territories of Juda. Jos. 19:1. 1 Par. 4:42. Judg. 1:3. But (C.) it is more likely that the name has been omitted or changed in the original, by the mistake of some early transcriber, in like manner as the tribe of Manasses, included in that of Joseph, seems to have been placed for that of Dan, which otherwise would be omitted. Apoc. 7:6. 8. Some have recourse to a mystery in both these places. H.

Ver. 7. Of Juda, "when he goes to war, and bring him back in peace to his people." Onkelos.—The general made a solemn prayer on such occasions; and the Ps. 19 was composed, and is still used, to draw down God's blessing in times of war. Moses thus clearly insinuates that the tribe of Juda should obtain the sovereign authority, though it would not be without opposition, that Israel would submit to David. He begs that God would remove all obstacles. This tribe was always distinguished for its valour. It was directed by God to attack the Chanaanites, under Othniel. Judg. 1:2. But its chief glory appeared under the reigns of David and Solomon. The other tribes were scarcely a match for the single tribe of Juda. C.—And he, God. M.—If God be for us, who is against us? Rom. 8:31. H.

Ver. 8. Holy man. Aaron and his successors in the priesthood. Ch.—They were adorned with the Urim and Thummim, which are here rendered perfection and doctrine. C.—Sept. “give to Levi his insignia, (delous) and his truth, to the holy man, the same whom they tried at the temptation, they spoke ill of him at the waters,” &c. It was in consequence of the seditious conduct of the Israelites that the two brothers betrayed a want of confidence in God, and were excluded from the land of promise, as Moses often reminds them. C. 3:26. H.—Temptation. The place which goes by this name is at Raphidim, near Horeb. Ex. 17:6. But the word here probably includes all the other places, where the Hebrews tempted God, and particularly that, where so holy a man as Aaron was permitted to fall. C. Num. 20:12.—The priesthood is the peculiar blessing and honour of the tribe of Levi. M.

Ver. 9. Who hath said, &c. It is the duty of the priestly tribe to prefer God’s honour and service before all considerations of flesh and blood: in such manner as to behave as strangers to their nearest akin, when these would withdraw them from the business of their calling. Ch.—The Levites shew no mercy to such of their brethren as had adored the golden calf. Ex. 32:28. 29. The Chaldee, and many able interpreters, consider them here as judges, who must not be biased in passing sentence, by any natural affection. Vatab.—Others think they must not assist at the funerals of their relations. Lev. 21:10. C.—But the two former opinions seem much better. H.—Covenant. Priests ought to be more exemplary in their conduct than other men. W.—It is their duty also to instruct others, and to inculcate the observance of the law, as Heb. and Sept. more clearly specify. “They shall teach thy judgments to Jacob, and thy law to Israel.” H.—They were appointed judges (C. 17:8 and 19:17,) and monitors. Ose. 4:6, &c.

Ver. 10. Wrath. He seems to allude to the action of Aaron. Num. 16:46. C.—Heb. has, “incense before thee,” (H.) as it is explained by the Chal. Sept. &c.—Holocaust, of flour, &c. calil; that of beasts was styled aule. See C. 13:16. C.

Ver. 11. Rise. The martial prowess of the Machabees, who were of this tribe, was conspicuous. M.—As the Levites had no portion with the rest, but were to live by tithes, &c. Moses begs that God would bless their labours, (C.) and suffer none to defraud them of their right. H.

Ver. 12. Shall dwell, &c. This seems to allude to the temple being built in the confines of the tribe of Benjamin, (Ch.) on the northern part of Jerusalem. The southern division of the city was in the territory of Juda; and hence Jerusalem is attributed to both. Jos. 15:63 and Judg. 1:21. C.—He rest. The temple was situated on Mount Moria, which was higher than the rest of the city, as the head is above the shoulders. M.—Chal, “The majesty of the Lord shall dwell in his land.” This was the sure ground of confidence to Benjamin. As long as God continued with his people, they had nothing to fear, no more than in a bride-chamber, being under the protection of the most High. H.—As Benjamin had been the object of his father’s love, so God chose the first king out of his tribe; (M.) and by protecting his temple in a more particular manner, secured him. W.

Ver. 13. Fruits. Heb. “for the precious things of heaven, for the dew,” &c. so also it has precious, v. 14, &c.

Ver. 14. Moon; both those which are annual, as wheat, and those which come every month. Chal. The sun and moon greatly contribute to nourish (H.) and to bring fruit to maturity. Plin. ii. 100. C.—Both the tribes of Ephraim and of Manasses inhabited a fertile region. M.

Ver. 15. Everlasting hills. Chal. “which never fail” to produce an abundant crop. H.—The hills of the Israelites were very productive. But when they rebelled against their God, in very deed the hills were liars, and yielded little or nothing. Jer. 3:23.

Ver. 16. Thereof, whatever the earth can produce, particularly wheat, &c. The fruits of heaven, (v. 13,) may denote such as grew on trees. C.—Bush; God, who appeared to Moses. H.—Nazarite. See the note on Gen. 49:26. Ch.—Joseph was distinguished by God, by his father, and by the king of Egypt, in a particular manner. The high priest was the Nasir in the house of God, (Lev. 21:12,) as Joseph ws the chief officer, at the court of Pharao. The eastern kings still give this title to their prime minister. Chardin. Perse. T. ii. 5, p. 136.

Ver. 17. Bullock, or cow. Shor, denotes all the species. C. 15:19.—Firstling, is likewise often put for the most excellent. Thus “his beauty, like the finest bullock.” The Egyptians had a high esteem for bulls; and Elian (2:10,) informs us that Mnevis, one of their kings, ordered the people to adore the bull, as the most beautiful of animals. Moses points at the kingdom of Israel, which was chiefly governed by the tribe of Ephraim; or perhaps he alludes to Josue, (C.) who was to succeed him, and to conquer the nations on the other side of the Jordan, with so much resolution and ability. H.—Rhinoceros, as stronger and more penetrating. See Num. 32:22. C.—Horns, designate strength and beauty. Ps. 74. M.—Push, alluding to the manner in which bulls attack their opponents, and hurl them into the air, sparsa ad pugnam proludit arena. Georg. iii. C.—Some of the Fathers have explained this passage of Jesus Christ, the first-born of the creation, who is possessed of all the treasures of wisdom (H.) and beauty, whose strength drew all things to himself, after he had lifted up the nations on his cross, as it were with horns, and rescued them from the power of the devil. S. Aug. q. ult. C.—Manasses. To these two tribes, the blessings of their father, Joseph, belong; and their multitudes shall render them very formidable to the nations around them, as long as they obey their God. H.—The younger brother, Ephraim, is preferred before the elder. Gen. 48. W.

Ver. 18. Out to sea. C.—The territory of Zabulon had the Mediterranean sea on the west, and the lake of Tiberias, into which the Jordan flowed, on the east. H.—By the advantages of their situation, and by the example of the Tyrians, the people were induced to engage in commerce, and to study the art of navigation.—Tabernacles. Issachar preferred staying at home to cultivate his rich soil. Gen. 49:13. C.

Ver. 19. Mountain. Full of gratitude to God, who has bestowed such advantages upon them, these tribes shall go with zeal to the place which the Lord shall choose, (H.) and invite the people, on the road, to go along with them, to offer sacrifice. M.—Perhaps this may allude also to their conduct in the war against Jabin, in which they were particularly active, appointing the place of rendezvous at Mount Thabor, where, though the Scripture be silent, it is probable they would offer a sacrifice of thanks, as they had the prophetess, Debora, along with them, (C.) in like manner as Samuel immolated a calf at Bethlehem, (1 K. 16) and Elias a bullock on Mount Carmel, 3 K. 18. H. See 1 K. 13:12.—Sands. This blessing chiefly regarded Zabulon, who received the riches of the sea by commerce, bringing home the gold dust which is found among the sand of some rivers. The river Belus, near Ptolemais, was particularly famous for a sort of sand, of which glass was made. Josephus (Bel. ii. 17,) says, that near the tomb of Memnon, a bed of such sand is found, about 100 cubits long, which, though many vessels have been filled from it, has never been exhausted. See Plin. v. 19. Strabo, xvi.—The discovery of glass is supposed to have been the effect of chance; some merchants having placed a nitrous stone under their pot, as soon as it grew hot, and mixed with the sand, which is found near the shore of Tyre, a transparent substance was formed, which the Greeks called ualos, “glass,” perhaps in imitation of the Heb. eul, or “sand,” of which it was chiefly composed. C.—The Sept. render this verse, “They shall destroy the nations, and you shall call thither, and there you shall sacrifice, ...

because the riches of the sea shall suckle thee, and the merchandise of those who inhabit the sea shore." These tribes greatly contributed to overthrow the army of Sisara beside the torrent of Cisson, which divides their territories. Judg. 4 and 5. H.

Ver. 20. Breadth. The tribe of Gad, &c. slew or drove the Agarites from their neighbourhood, and seized their country, 1 Par. 5:18. 22. Heb. Sept. and Chal. "Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad," which was verified in Jephthe. Jos. 11:23. C.

Ver. 21. He saw, &c. The pre-eminence of the tribe of Gad, to which this alludes, was their having the lawgiver, Moses, buried in their borders; though the particular place was not known. Ch. Prot. "and he provided the first part for himself; because there, in a portion of the lawgiver, was he seated, and he came with the heads of the people," &c. Sept. "And he saw his first-fruits," (the first conquered country of Sehon and of Og,) because there the land of the princes was divided, the leaders of the people being assembled, or who were assembled with the leaders. H.—Gad and the two other tribes petitioned for that part of the country, and obtained their request of Moses. Num. 32:27. —Israel. This is generally understood of Moses; but it may be explained of the tribe of Gad, which complied with the conditions imposed on him, and on his brethren, by the Lord, when he allotted the land of Galaad to them. C. 3:18. C.—Heb. "he executed the justice of the Lord," &c. Sept. "the Lord did justice and his judgment with Israel," approving his choice. H.

Ver. 22. Basan. As the Jordan rushes with impetuosity (H.) from Lais, which was seized by some of this tribe; (Judg. 18) and as a lion falls on its prey from the mountains of Basan, so shall this tribe give birth to Samson, who was stronger than a lion, (C.) and terribly harassed the Philistines. Judg. 14:5. 14, &c. When the Danites found themselves straitened for room, they sent a colony, (H.) which took possession of Lais, and called it after their own name: one of the fountains of the Jordan was in this place, the other was called Jor, (M.) though the river may have a more distant and obscure source in the lake of Phiala, whence Josephus says (H.) it runs, by a subterraneous passage, to a fountain of Dan. As it then takes its course through the promised land, of which it is the principal river, Dan may thus be said to supply waters abundantly for the whole country. M.—But the Heb. and Sept. have, "he shall leap from Basan," which must be understood of the lion, since the territory of Dan was very remote from that mountain. H.

Ver. 23. The sea. The lake of Genesareth. Ch.—South. That lake forms the southern extremity of the tribe of Nephthali. H.—The Mediterranean, and the countries south of Palestine, are commonly understood in this manner, but they cannot be understood here. C.—By means of their neighbours of Tyre and Sidon, (M.) and of Zabulon, who lay on the west, (H.) they would be supplied with all the luxuries of the sea and of the south. M.

Ver. 24. Blessed. He alludes to the name of Aser, which has this signification. H.—This tribe had been upon the increase in the desert, (C.) and now comprised 53,000 warriors. H.—The province of Galilee, where Aser dwelt, was one of the most fertile of all Chanaan, and noted for abundance of oil, Gen. 49:20. Joseph. Bel. ii. 2. and ii. 22. C.—Oil. So Job (29:6,) says, When I washed my feet with butter. M.

Ver. 25. Iron and brass, to denote the warlike disposition of this tribe. Goliath, and the heroes before Troy, wore boots of brass, 1 K. 17:6. Homer.—The greatest part of the army of Antiochus had even golden nails in their shoe soles, (Val. Max.) while the Romans contented themselves with iron. Joseph. Bel. vii. 3.—But this custom was not peculiar to the soldiers. People of all descriptions did the like, either for ornament, or to make their sandals last longer. Empedocles wore brass at the bottom of his sandals; (Laert. viii.) and as one of them was thrown out from the top of Mount Etna, it was discovered that he had destroyed himself in that volcano, to make people suppose (C.) that he was a god, and had gone up to heaven. H.—S. Clement (Pœd. ii.) complains, that some wore such gaudy ornaments in his days. C.—This passage is interpreted in a figurative sense by some, as if Aser would trample under his feet and despise the instruments of war, (Jans.) and would turn those metals to the purposes of agriculture. Others render the Heb. “Thy bars shall be of iron and brass, and thy reputation (strength, repose, or sorrow) shall endure as long as thy life; or May they, “&c. in the form of a wish. Moses desires that Aser may be secure against his enemies, as if he had a mind to insinuate, that this tribe would be led captive among the first by Teglathphalasar, 4 K. 15:29. Many of the cities of this tribe were strongly fortified. Joseph.—If we adopt thy sorrow shall, &c. we must observe, that the neighbourhood of Phœnicians exposed the people to continual incursions, (C.) and the king of Assyria at last came to complete their ruin. H.

Ver. 26. Rightest, (rectissimi.) Hebrew yeshurun, “the beloved,” Israel. H.—Thither, as messengers. Heb. “The clouds are in his elevation,” like so many steps to his throne. Who makest the clouds thy chariot, (ascensum tuum) who walkest upon the wings of the winds. Ps. 103:3. C.—Sept. “He is the great ornament of the firmament.” None is like to him in power and majesty. H.

Ver. 27. Underneath are the everlasting arms. Though the dwelling of God be above in heaven, his arms are always stretched out to help us here below. Ch.—Heb. “The eternal God is thy refuge; or, From eternity is the abode of God, or in fine, the protection of the Lord is before, and his eternal arms underneath;” so that nothing can hurt you. C.

Ver. 28. Alone, without standing in need of the assistance of any other but God. See Num. 23:9. H.—Some of the ancient Germans would have no communication with any other nation; and they depopulated the country around, to keep all at a distance. C.—The Chinese seem to be at present nearly of the same disposition, as well as those who inhabit Japan, &c.—The eye of Jacob. His posterity, by whom he sees the transactions of the world. H.—Hebrew the fountain, is taken in the same sense. The country which his descendants enjoyed, was well watered with springs. Num. 24:7.—Dew, it will be so abundant. Chald. The heavens will drop down dew. C. 32:2.

Ver. 29. Deny thee. Break their word and most solemn treaties. Heb. “shall lie unto thee,” which will afford thee a just reason to seize their effects. H.—Some translate, “the efforts of thy enemies shall be frustrated.”—Necks. Thus Josue ordered the five kings to be treated, (Jos. 10:24) and Tamerlane used Bajazet as a footstool, when he had to mount his horse. C.—This fierce Tartarian conqueror, the enemy of the Christian name, humbled the pride of the Turkish emperor, by confining him in a cage of iron, A.D. 1403. H.

Ver. 1. Phasga was the highest part of Nebo, which was a summit of the Abarim mountains.—Dan. All the conquered countries east of the Jordan, as far as the source of that river. C. 33:22. Gen. 14:14. C.

Ver. 2. Nephtali, from Libanus to the lake of Genesareth. C.—The other three tribes occupied the greatest part of the country southward, as far as Idumea. H.—Sea. Heb. “the sea behind,” or to the west; as, in determining the situation of places, the Jews looked towards the east. Moses took a view of all the countries which the people should possess, as far as the Mediterranean.

Ver. 3. South part: the mountains of Judea. C.—Trees. Jericho, (H.) or Engaddi.—Segor was on the south of the Dead Sea. C.

Ver. 4. This land, which has been just described, is what God chiefly promised to the Patriarchs, comprising the countries on the east, as well as those on the western side of the Jordan. H.—To it. But thou shalt be translated to a better land, the land of the living. Moses was now perfectly resigned to the will of God. Salien.—He no longer cherished those ardent desires of introducing the people into Chanaan, which he had not long before expressed: as he found that God had decreed that he should be deprived of the honour. He received this refusal as a just punishment of his transgression, and calmly reposed in the Lord. There seems to be no reason why Moses might not have written the preceding verses at least, though the names of some of the tribes are mentioned, who obtained possession only after his death. As he knew the limits of the promised land, so, by the prophetic spirit, he might know that these tribes would be settled in the country; and he does not mark out their divisions with any degree of precision. In a word, there seems to be hardly a single passage in the Pentateuch which may not have Moses for its author. H.

Ver. 5. Died there. This last chapter of Deuteronomy, in which the death of Moses is related, was written by Josue, or by some of the prophets. Ch.—Josephus (iv. 9), Philo, and Origen (c. Cels. ii. p. 95,) believe, however, that Moses wrote the account of his own death. See pref. to Deut. H.—Moab, which had formerly belonged to that nation. M.—Commandment. Heb. lit. “the mouth.” The Rabbins say God kissed him, and thus released his soul. Some have nevertheless pretended that Moses was translated, like Elias, without dying. Chal. Catharin. &c. But his death and burial are too clearly mentioned in Scripture. S. Jerom (in Amos viii.) seems, at first view, to countenance the former opinion: but he only speaks of a spiritual translation, and not of the body. C.—Josephus thinks that it was to prevent this mistake, that Moses wrote this chapter.

Ver. 6. He buried him, viz. by the ministry of angels, and would have the place of his burial to be unknown, lest the Israelites, who were so prone to idolatry, might worship him with divine honours. Ch.—S. Michael therefore contended with satan about his body. Jude 9. Some have maintained that Josue and Eleazar performed these last rights to their deceased lawgiver. C.—But then some men would have known where he was buried. H.—Day. It is pretended that Jeremias discovered the place, 2 Mac. 2:4. 5: He found, indeed, a hollow cave ... and so stopped the door. Yet this does not prove that he found the sepulchre of Moses, (C.) who was buried in some valley over against Phogor, but it is not said in a cave. H.—Cajetan infers from the body of Moses not being buried in the mountain, that it was conveyed by angels to some vale, where his attendants could not see him.

Ver. 7. Eye. Heb. also, "colour." His sight and complexion were as good as in his youth, though he was 120 years old.—Moved. The rays "of glory never changed," but attended him to the grave. Chal. Heb. "his natural force (and vigour) never left him; or his cheeks did not fall in." C.—The Rom. Martyrology places the death of Moses on the 4th of September, though the Rabbins say he died in the 12th month. Salien.

Ver. 8. Days, as they had done for Mary and for Aaron: (Joseph.) the usual term was only seven days. C.—The Jews would probably have prolonged their mourning for Moses forty days, in honour of the years of his government, if they had not been ordered to cross the Jordan. Salien.

Ver. 9. Because. God was pleased to accompany this exterior sign with his blessing. H.

Ver. 10. Moses. No prophet ever appeared with greater dignity, in the old law, than Moses. He behaved in all respects as the envoy of God, who has been pleased to give his character and eulogium. Num. 12:6. Eccli. 45:1. His miracles were most astonishing, performed in the presence both of friends and of enemies, not for a short time, but for a continuance of many years. C.—But when we compare Moses with the Messias, his person and law must be regarded indeed as illustrious figures, but infinitely beneath the reality. Moses was liable to failings, which caused him to be debarred from entering the land of promise; and he wore a veil, to shew that his law was only a shadow of the better, and that it could bring nothing to perfection. He works miracles in the name of the Lord, and with a rod: Jesus performs all by the word of his own power, (Heb. 1:3) as the sovereign of the world. But though Moses must sink in a comparison with Christ, yet no other personage sustained a more exalted character, or shone with greater splendour, as lawgiver, priest, prophet, ruler of a great and ungovernable people, and a sacred writer of the highest antiquity. Hence the Jews almost adore him. The Mahometans place him next to Jesus and their false prophet. H.—The pagans have very probably ascribed many parts of his history to their idols, Bacchus, Mercury, and Typhon; and their greatest philosophers, Pythagoras, Plato, &c. have borrowed many things from his writings. "What, said Numenius, is Plato, but Moses in the Attic language?" See Ex. 34:29. Clem. Strom. 1. and 5. Joseph. c. Ap. i. Bochart, &c. C.—In a word, S. Gregory of Nyssa, S. Ambrose, (de Cain 2,) and Philo, represent Moses as the most perfect example of a great and pious leader and legislator.

THE BOOK OF JOSUE

INTRODUCTION

This book is called Josue, because it contains the history of what passed under him, and, according to the common opinion, was written by him. The Greeks call him Jesus; for Josue and Jesus, in the Hebrew, are the same name, and have the same signification, viz. A Saviour. And it was not without a mystery, that he who was to bring the people into the land of promise, should have his name changed from Osee (for so he was called before, Num. 13:17,) to Josue, or Jesus, to give us to understand, the Moses, by his law, could only bring the people within sight of the promised inheritance, but that our Saviour, Jesus, was to bring us into it. Ch.—The Hebrews who had been so rebellious under Moses, behaved with remarkable fidelity and respect towards his successor; who, by these means, more forcibly represented the Christian Church, (D.) which will be ever obedient to her divine head and observe his directions. Josue had been trained up a long time under the hand of Moses, and God had given him the commission to govern his people, in so public a manner, that no one offered to claim that high and arduous office. In effect, the whole conduct of Josue before and after his exaltation, shewed him to be most deserving of command. H.—Josue, says the Holy Ghost, (Eccli. 46:1,) was successor of Moses among the prophets, or, according to the Greek, “in prophecies.” Many explain this of the obligation incumbent on him, to continue the sacred history (C.) and revelations where Moses had left off. The last chapter of this book informs us that he did so. Perhaps some additions, by way of farther explication, have been made by subsequent inspired writers, though most of the passages which are adduced to prove this assertion, seem to be of little force. Respecting the death of Josue, we may make the same observations as on that of Moses. It may have been written by the author of the Book of Judges. Theodoret seems to have thought that the work before us, was compiled out of the public registers, which are quoted C. 10 under the name of the book of the Lord. See Num. 21:14. The Samaritans have a book or chronicle of Josue, which relates in 39 or 47 chapters, many facts of scriptural history, (H.) down to the reign of Adrian, intermingled with a variety of fables. It seems to be of modern date. Hottinger undertook to publish it in Latin, but was prevented by death. C.—The true history of Josue sets before us the passage of the Jordan, the conquest of Chanaan, and the distribution of the country. After the pious general had performed all that could be expected from him, after he had twice ratified the covenant between God and his people, and exhorted the latter, with his last breath, to observe an inviolable fidelity to the only Lord, he departed this life in peace, in the 110th year of his age, and was buried at Thamnath Sare, which he had built for the place of his abode. H.—As the five books of Moses contain the law, intermixed with history, so this first of the historical books exhibits a variety of useful precepts and predictions. The prophetic and sapiential books must be considered in the same light. W.—They all tend to promote true wisdom and the salvation of men, provided they be perused in the same spirit with which they were written. H.

Ver. 1. Now: lit. And. Thus the sacred history is connected, the last chapter of Deuteronomy being, in the opinion of many, a part of the work of Josue. H.—Moses died on the 1st of the 12th month, Adar, and as soon as that month of mourning had expired, and the spies had returned on the 4th of Nisan, God ordered the people to prepare for their departure.—Minister. This was by no means degrading. He was designed for the successor of Moses, as Eliseus was to succeed Elias. The heroes at Troy had servants of the same high character as themselves, attached to their persons by the ties of friendship. See Ex. 17:10.

Ver. 2. Jordan, a river well known, which rises in Antilibanus, not from Panion, but from the lake Phiala, as Herod the Tetrarch discovered by throwing some straw into the latter, which passed by a subterraneous passage into Panion. Thence it proceeds to the Semonite lake and to Daphne, where it begins to be called the Great Jordan. Joseph. Bel. iii. 33. Having traversed the land of Palestine in the southern direction, it loses itself in the lake of Sodom. C.—It is a very rapid river, and hence its appellation from irod, of jord, descendit, is very probably derived. H.—The Arabs call it Zacchar, “overflowing,” because the snows and rains cause it formerly to overflow about Easter. Univ. Hist.—When Maundrell travelled through this country, the stream was too rapid for a person to swim against it. Parkhurst.—Hence the miracle of the Hebrews passing through the Jordan on dry land, when its waters were the most copious and violent, would be the more observable.

Ver. 3. Moses. Thus the preceding permission, which the Jews extend, as if God had authorized them to conquer the whole world, is limited. H. See Deut. 11:24.—Their right to the land of Chanaan depends on this grant of God, who is the Lord of all things, and who thus took away all the privileges of the former inhabitants. But the warrant of destruction only regarded the people of Chanaan. Those who lived towards the Euphrates, were obliged only to pay tribute by David and Solomon, thought their country formed part of what had been promised to the Israelites. They might have possessed all that region, if they had proved faithful. The limits of the promised land vary, as they are considered under various lights. C.—The desert of Arabia Petrea and Antilibanus formed the boundaries on the south and on the north, the Euphrates and Mediterranean were on the east and west, when the territories of the Israelites were considered in their utmost extent. H.

Ver. 4. Hethites, the most formidable of the nations of Chanaan. Masius.

Ver. 5. Resist you. They shall at last be overcome, and their resistance will prove detrimental to themselves. C.

Ver. 6. Lot. Heb. “thou shalt give for an inheritance.” H.

Ver. 7. From it. Heb. him, Moses. But the Masorets order us to read it. H.—Understand, or “succeed.” Chal. Vat.

Ver. 10. Princes. Shoterim may denote both judges and heralds, such as those mentioned in Homer, the messengers of gods and men, whose persons were deemed sacred. They bore a wand or sceptre, as a mark of their authority.

Ver. 11. Victuals. The manna still supplied the army after they had passed the Jordan. C. 5:12. But Josue might fear lest the people might not have liberty to gather it in the midst of the enemy’s country, or he might perhaps suppose that this miraculous food would be withdrawn, as soon as they had entered Chanaan. He therefore takes all necessary precautions, and gets other sorts of provisions in the neighbourhood. C.—This might foreshew, that in the primitive Church the ceremonies and privileges of the old law would not be abrogated immediately, but they might be used for a time along with the rites of the gospel, till the old law should be buried with honour. W.—Third day, after their departure from Setim; or perhaps this order was only published when the Israelites were arrived on the banks of the Jordan. C.

Ver. 14. Armed before, in order of battle, at the head of the army, and not according to the disposition of the tribes, which were observed in the desert. Only 40,000 men were selected out of 110,580, the rest were very prudently left to guard the new conquered country. See Num. 32:17.—For them. Heb. “help them.”

Ver. 15. Beyond. The same expression is translated on this side, v. 14. Heb. beheber means also, “in the passage.” If we have regard to Josue, when he spoke this, he was beyond, that is on the east side of the river, though perhaps (H.) he might be on the other side when he wrote the history. Deut. 1:1. C.

Ver. 17. Moses. Thus they express their ardent wish, that God would extend his protection to Josue. M.—They do not mean to insinuate, that they will obey him only as long as he complies with God’s law. C.

Ver. 18. Die, as guilty of high treason. The person’s goods were confiscated, and became the property of the king. Thus David disposed of the effects of Saul, (2 K. 16:4) and Achab seized the vineyard of Naboth, 3 K. 21:15. C.

Ver 1. Sent, or as many translate, “had sent,” as if Josue had dismissed the spies immediately after the mourning of Moses was ended, (C.) on the 1st of Nisan. On the second day they examined the city, and were obliged to flee in the night. But they only returned to their brethren on the 6th. On the following day Josue gave orders to make all necessary preparations for their departure, and crossed the Jordan on the 10th of the month. Salien. B.C. 1469.—Setim was about eight or nine miles from the river, “or sixty stadia.” Joseph. v. 1.—Two men. Sept. intimate that they were young. See C. 6:23. H.—The Rabbins assert, without reason, that Caleb and Phinees were chosen, and that they pretended that they were deaf, (eross) a word which the Vulg. translates, secretly. C.—Jericho. Josue had himself examined the country some time before. But there might have been many changes, and he might not know the present disposition of the people of Jericho. H.—This city was built in a delightful plain, surrounded by mountains, (C.) except on the east side. C. 4:13. H.—Harlot. Heb. zona may also signify an “innkeeper,” as such places were under the direction of women, who were commonly of a very loose character. Hence the Greeks deemed it a dishonour to enter into a public house. Isocrates says, that “even an honest servant will not dare to enter into an ale-house, to eat or drink.” Athen. Dipn. 13.—Rahab might have been formerly addicted to pleasure, as the Scripture and the Fathers agree; (Heb. 11:31. Jam. 2:25. C.) though she might at this time be very discreet, being awakened by the account of the miracles which God had wrought in favour of his people, who, she knew, were approaching to take possession of the country. The spies might, therefore, take shelter in her house with the least suspicion, and without danger of injuring their character. H.—The woman was not very old, as she was afterwards married to Salmon. S. Mat. 1:5.—With her. they spent the first night in her house, entering the city in the dusk of the evening, so that they had not time to make any observations till the following day. Salien.—Others think that they were suspected by the people of the town almost immediately, and denounced to the king. Hence they were forced to flee that same night, without having accomplished their design, and were only informed by Rahab of the dismay which had seized the inhabitants, v. 11.

Ver. 2. By night. Heb. “this night.” C.

Ver. 3. House. She spoke to them through a window. The messengers did not enter into her house; whence Serarius infers, that Rahab was a person consecrated to some impure deity, and therefore held in some estimation among the people of Jericho, as this was a city of the moon, in whose honour such consecrations were generally made. But these arguments are not very convincing. C.

Ver. 4. Had, or “had hidden,” as (v. 6,) she had made the men retire before she spoke to the messengers, and probably before they came to demand them. As soon as she was informed of their design, she took all prudent precautions both for her own and their safety, as she could not have escaped death, if she had been discovered affording shelter to the enemies of her country. She felt herself authorized by God, on this occasion, to abandon those upon whom he had declared war, and who could have derived no benefit from the spies being betrayed to them. H.

Ver. 5. At the time, not precisely, as otherwise the men who shut the gates must have seen them, but about that time, (C.) Rahab pretends that the spies had left her house, and had directed their course towards the gate, so that she made no doubt but they might easily overtake them. H.—Notwithstanding this officious lie, which is a venial sin, S. Paul and S. James testify that she was justified by her faith in God, and by good works towards these men. See S. Aug. c. Mend. 17. and note on James 2:25. W.—Rahab might suppose that an officious lie was not a sin, (M.) as many great and learned men seemed to have maintained this doctrine. See Grotius Jur. iii. 1. 9. Orig. c. Cels. iv. p. 171. S. Chrys. hom. 53. Gen. She was so far from intending to do an injury to any one, that she consulted the welfare both of her guests and of her countrymen, who, if they had detected the spies and committed murder, would have thus brought greater destruction upon themselves, as they could not escape the wrath of God. C.

Ver. 6. There. The roofs were flat in that country, and consequently very proper to dry flax, or “cotton,” as Masius understands.

Ver. 7. Jordan, where they had probably come over, though perhaps in a boat, (M.) and where the messengers concluded they would have the best chance of finding them, as the Israelites were on the opposite side of the river. H.—As soon as they were gone out of the city, the guards shut the gate, that if the spies should still be lurking within, they might be hindered from making their escape. M.

Ver. 8. Asleep. It seems as if the spies had been ignorant of the danger to which they had been just exposed, and had gone to the roof of the house with a design to pass the night in greater security. Rahab perceives, however, that it would be extremely rash for them to continue with her any longer, and therefore she gives them the best advice, to secure their safety by fleeing in the dead of the night, and without further delay. H.

Ver. 9. Strength. Heb. “they faint or melt away,” deprived both of strength and counsel.

Ver. 11. Beneath. This is the confession of a true convert, (C.) inspired by God. H.—For S. Paul commends her faith. Heb. 11:31. M.—The pagans confined the power of their idols to certain districts; the power of the true God is infinite. C.

Ver. 12. True token, such a one as, when I shew it to the Israelites, they may preserve me and mine. She is not content with a verbal promise, she requires something permanent and sensible, as a mark of their mutual engagements, (C.) a token of their sincerity. They afterwards appointed a piece of scarlet to be hung out of the house, where those were to be collected who should be entitled to protection. Rahab was bound not to divulge their secret, nor to betray them. If she had instructed others of her fellow-citizens to hand out the same mark, she would have forfeited all her privileges, v. 20. H.

Ver. 14. Death. We are willing to die instead of you, if we do not fulfil our promises.—Truth, a real and effectual mercy.

Ver. 16. Days; the remainder of this night, and the day and night following. It is probable that they would travel only in the night time. C.—If they had gone by the high road, they might easily have been discovered by the messengers, who would be on their return. H.—But retiring to the mountains south of Jericho, till they had re-entered the city, the spies made their escape. C.

Ver. 18. By which window or cord. C.—The cord was left as a signal. M.

Ver. 24. Fear, as Rahab had testified. They might also have been witnesses of the people's consternation, which gave them the most assured hopes of victory, as the Lord had given this sign, among others, that he would be with them. Deut. 28:10. H.

JOSUE 3

Ver. 1. Days, in part, as they arrived on the 8th of Nisan, staid there the following day, and crossed the Jordan on the 10th, on Friday the 30th of our April. Thus Christ is said to have remained three days in the tomb, (C.) though he was there only a small part of Friday and of Sunday, and the whole of Saturday. Heb. "they lodged there before they passed over, (2) and it came to pass after three days that the," &c.

Ver. 2. Heralds. Shoterim. C. 1:10. Prot. "the officers went through the host." H.

Ver. 3. Levi. Sigonius thinks that the Caathites performed this office on this as on other occasions. But the Vulgate shews that the priests sometimes carried the ark, perhaps because it was uncovered. C. 6:6. 2 K. 15:25. At this period the number of priests was but small. Some of the sons of Eleazar and of Ithamar might be old enough to assist their parents: only two would be necessary at a time, though the Rabbins assign four, (which is not improbable. Theodoret) and pretend that the two who went first were obliged to go backwards, in order that their faces might be turned towards the ark, out of respect. The ark now marked the way for the people, as the cloud had disappeared on the death of Moses. S. Aug. q. 3. Masius. C.—It had been carried at the head of the army in the desert. H.

Ver. 4. Space of. Heb. adds, “about ... by measure.” It was not easy to observe the exact distance in the march. This was prescribed both to keep the people at a respectful distance, and also to enable them to see which way they were to proceed. When the priests stood in the bed of the river, the waters rose up like a firm wall on the north side, while those to the south flowed away into the lake of Sodom, leaving about 16 miles open for the army of Israel to pass on dry land. The soldiers did not approach within 600 paces of the ark.—Before. This insinuated that they would pass over in a miraculous manner; though perhaps Josue did not know by what means God would enable them to cross (C.) the overflowing waters. Josephus only seems to intimate that they abated suddenly, so that they might be forded, &c. He also greatly diminishes or destroys the miracle performed at the passage of the Red Sea. Yet here he acknowledges a sort of “prodigy in the waters being restrained,” and resuming their usual course as soon as the priests had left the channel of the river.—And take, &c. Heb. places these words at the beginning of the sentence, after cubits. H.

Ver. 5. Sanctified, as Moses had required at Mount Sinai, (Ex. 19:10. 15,) ordering the people to wash their garments, and to abstain from their wives, that by this exterior purity, they might be reminded not to neglect that of the soul, without which they would derive but small benefit or instruction from the greatest miracles.

Ver. 6. Commands. Josue was only the organ of God, (C.) whose orders he announces to the sacred ministers; (v. 8. M.) though as a civil magistrate, he was bound to hear and to obey them in matters of religion. C.—When he ordered circumcision to be administered, when he blessed the multitude, and ratified the covenant between God and the people, (C. 5 and 24. &c.) he did nothing but what a virtuous governor ought to do; yet he did not these things by virtue of his civil jurisdiction, or in opposition to the spiritual authority of Eleazar. Moses had been the supreme head, being both priest and king. But only part of his glory was communicated to Josue, while Eleazar was directed to consult the Lord for him, (Num. 27:21. Theod. q. 48. in Num.) Josue was to govern at his word, so that he was bound to consider the high priest as his superior. What he therefore did, was in subordination and conformity to the will of Eleazar and of God, and not designed to shew that the priestly authority belonged to himself, as English Protestants would hence infer. The best of princes, both in the Old and New Testament, have always looked upon it as a part of their duty to promote the true religion. W.—Isaias (49) foretold that kings and queens would esteem it their glory to guard and to advance the prosperity of the Church. H.—Hence they may enact laws for this purpose. S. Aug. c. Crescon. iii. 51. Constantine ratified the judgment passed already by the bishops in the cause of Cecilian, though he confessed at the same time that the determination did not belong to his tribunal; (W.) and he greatly disapproved of the conduct of the Donatists, who appealed to him, as the heathens might have done to an emperor, who was at the same time one of their high priests. H.—O rabida furoris audacia, said he, sicut in causis gentilium fieri solet, appellationem interposuerunt. 1 Optat. c. Parm. i. S. Aug. ep. 166. Other emperors and kings have acquired great fame, on account of their labours and zeal in defence of the Church. Thus the kings of Spain and of France have obtained the titles of Catholic and Most Christian, and our Henry VIII. was honoured by Pope Leo X. with the title of Defender of the Faith, in 1521, (W.) on account of the book which he presented to that pontiff, while he was yet an obedient son of the Catholic Church, and undertook to defend her faith on the sacraments, against the objections of Luther. In this the faith which the kings of England defend at present? Whatever the princes might do in the old law in spiritual matters, no inference can be drawn for the same right being now exercised by civil magistrates, how supreme soever in their own sphere. Those princes, Josue, &c. might be considered not only in the light of civil governors, but also in that of prophets, who had a great share in the administration of affairs under the Jewish theocracy. If God chose to make known his will by the mouth of a king, or by that of a shepherd, his mandates were to be put in execution with equal exactitude. But now the distinctive limits of the ecclesiastical and of the civil power are more clearly ascertained. Render therefore to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's. Mat. 22:21.) The kingdom of Christ is not of this world; neither did he appoint kings to be the pastors of his Church. H.

Ver. 7. Also. Grotius remarks that God made known his choice of the governors of his people by miracles, till the days of Saul. In effect, we hardly find any, before that time, whose public authority was not sanctioned by some prodigy. C.

Ver. 8. It. Heb. “when you shall have come to the brink (or extremity) of the water of the Jordan, you shall stand still in the Jordan,” (H.) which some explain by saying that they were to stop on the eastern bank, as soon as they had wet their feet, (Serarius) while others say they crossed quite over, and stood at the other side. Masius.—But it is more probable, that as soon as they had touched the waters, the priests halted till the bed of the river was presently dried up, and then they placed themselves in the middle of it, close to the raging billows, which, rising up like mountains, were stopped in their career, (H.) and forced to retire backwards to their source, v. 15. 17. C. 4:9. Bonfrere. A. Lap.—Some translate, “into the division,” instead of part, or extremity. C.

Ver. 9. Hither, probably to the door of the tabernacle, where the assemblies were held.

Ver. 10. Living God, in opposition to the idols of the Gentiles, who were dead men, or at least incapable of affording any assistance to their votaries. Josue gives the people two signs of the divine protection, the destruction of the devoted nations, and the miraculous division of the Jordan, or rather the latter prodigy would be an earnest of the former event; and all, both friends and enemies, might be convinced, that the Lord was with his people, and their present leader, as he had been with Moses. No miracle could have been more suitable for the occasion, none more convincing or useful. C.—It would naturally inspire the Israelites with confidence, at the revival of the miracles wrought 40 years before, when their fathers and some of themselves had passed the Red Sea, in a similar manner. At the same time, it would fill the Chanaanites with still greater dismay and teach them that all resistance would prove fruitless. Some have wondered that they did not oppose the passage of the Israelites on this occasion. But it is a greater matter of surprise that they should have ventured on the dangerous expedient of encountering them in war, after what they had seen and heard. It can be attributed to nothing but their infatuation, and that blindness with which God punished them, that they might draw on a more speedy and merited destruction for their crimes. H.—Destroy. Heb. “dispossess, or drive out before you the Chanaanite,” &c. These seven nations comprised the ten which are mentioned, Gen. 15:19. The Chanaanite occupied the countries chiefly about Tyre, while the Hethite dwelt in the southern part of Palestine. The Hevite possessed Mount Hermon, Garizim, &c. The Pherezite were not perhaps a separate people, but employed in cultivating the country. The Gergesite were fixed to the east of the lake of Genesareth, the Jebusite at Jerusalem, and the Amorrhite about the Dead Sea. C.—But they were often mixed with one another, so that their limits cannot be ascertained with any degree of precision. H.

Ver. 12. Prepare. Heb. “take.” But they must have been selected from the tribes, either to carry twelve stones out of the bed of the Jordan, and to place twelve others in their stead, as monuments of this stupendous miracle; (C.) or to accompany the priests and the ark, out of respect. Cajetan. M.

Ver. 13. Heap. Heb. “the waters of the Jordan shall be cut off: the waters that come down from above, even they shall stand as upon a heap,” like mountains of ice. The Vulg. informs us what became of the waters (H.) below this division. Where it took place we do not find recorded, so that we cannot know exactly how large a space would be left dry. Calmet allows, “near six leagues.” v. 4 and 16. But here, supposing that the Jordan was divided over-against Jericho, he says, that “the waters running off into the Dead Sea, would, in all probability, leave not less than two or three thousand paces of the channel dry.”

*Interruptus aquis fluxit prior amnis in æquor;
Ad molem stetit unda fluens.* Lucan, Phar. ii.

Ver. 15. Water. Thus they manifested the strength of their faith. C.—Immediately the obedient waters divided, and the gravel or sand was left dry. v. 17. H.—Channel. The barley harvest was ready about the 30th of April. Lev. 23:10. On other occasions this overflowing of the Jordan is noticed, 1 Par. 12:15. Eccli. 24:36. Doubdan says that when he visited these parts, at the same season of the year, the Jordan was quite full, on account of the melted snow, and ready to leave its banks. It was about a stone throw across, and very rapid. See C. 1:2. The rains which fall in spring, serve to increase the inundation, (Deut, 11:14,) as well as the snow which melts at that time on Libanus, though a great part resists the violent heats. Mirum dictu, says Tacitus v. tantos inter ardores opacum fidumque nivibus. Jer. 18:14 and 49:19.

Ver. 16. Mountain. Heb. “heap or bottle.” The billows were forced to roll back almost as far as the lake of Genesareth, where Sarthan stands, about twenty leagues above Jericho.—Sarthan. Heb. “rose up on a heap, very far from (or to) the city of Adom, that is beside Sarthan.” The situation of Adom can only be ascertained by that of Sarthan, which was near Bethsan, or Scythopolis, (3 K. 4:12,) in the vale of Jezrahel, on the Jordan. Many copies of the Sept. read Cariathiarim, though it was six or seven leagues up the country, west of Jericho. C.—The swelling billows might perhaps be seen from this place. H.—But it could not properly determine how far the waters rolled back. C.—Failed. Heb. “and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, (or of Araba, which means a desert, fit only for pasturage) the salt sea, failed were cut off” from the waters above Jericho. The Jordan after running three miles in the lake of Sodom, without mixing its waters, becomes at last reluctantly confounded with it. Velut invitus ... postremo ebibitur, aquasque laudatas perdit, pestilentibus mixtus. Plin. v. 15.

Ver. 17. Jericho, at Bethabara, which was five or six leagues from the Dead Sea, all which space was left dry. Jericho was three leagues from the Jordan. C.—Girded. Sept. “ready,” preparing the way for all the army. Heb. “firm,” and undaunted. H.—A great part of the day must have been spent in crossing the river, and erecting the two monuments. M.

Ver. 1. Over. Heb. and Sept. “clean, or entirely;” perhaps two million people, with all their possessions, had crossed the river on that day, the 10th of Nisan, leaving many of their brethren to cultivate and defend the eastern parts of the Jordan. H.

Ver. 2. Choose. Heb. “take,” as C. 3:12. Those twelve men were ordered to attend the ark, and to observe the miracle with care: these are chosen to carry the stones for the monuments. Salien.—Calmet supposes that they are the same people, and that the former verse might be translated, “the Lord had said.” But this does not agree with the context. Heb. “and it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over the Jordan, that the Lord spake.” The former injunction was given before they entered the river. Heb. “the ark passeth ... Now therefore take,” &c. H.—One was selected from the tribe of Levi, and one from that of Joseph, so that all the twelve tribes were represented. M.

Ver. 3. Hard. The Heb. term is referred by some to the priests, “from the station of the priests, prepared, or standing firm,” (C. 3:17,) by others to the stones, which were to be prepared, hard, or exactly twelve. C.—The Sept. have take it in the latter sense, “twelve stones ready,” or such as they might easily find, in the place where the priests had stood. They were of a flinty nature, (H.) that they might perpetuate the memory of this event. M.

Ver. 5. Of Israel, who had twelve sons. The same expression occurs Deut. 32:8, and must be explained of the immediate sons of Jacob, without including those grandchildren who might be born before his death. H.

Ver. 9. Day. Some hence infer that Josue did not write this book. But surely if he wrote it towards the end of his life, he might well use this expression, (M.) as S. Matthew does to denote a shorter term. The twelve stones at Galgal, and in the bed of the Jordan, at Bethabara, (H.) were probably each placed apart. See Ex. 24:4. M.—They were still to be seen in the days of S. Jerom. Such monuments were formerly very common, and very useful, to make a lasting impression upon the minds of a gross people. See Gen. 28:18. Lev. 26:1.

Ver. 10. To him. Moses had been dead forty days. But it seems this miraculous division of the Jordan had been revealed to him, and he had cautioned Josue to let slip no opportunity of attaching the people to God's service, by erecting monuments of religion, as he did on this occasion. C.—Haste. Though they were assured by the divine promise, they experienced a certain fear. Salien.—Even the most constant are liable to such impressions. Mat. 14:30.

Ver. 11. People, who passed over 2000 cubits lower down, and always kept the same distance, till they arrived at Galgal. C.

Ver. 12. Them. C. 1:14. Num. 32:28. Forty thousand were only chosen. H.

Ver. 13. Bands. Heb. “prepared for war passed over, before the Lord, unto battle, to the plains of Jericho.” H.—These formed the van-guard. —Plains. Hebrew harboth, which is translated desert. Jer. 52:8. A large plain, fit for pasturage, extended from the city to the Jordan, on the east side. C.

Ver. 14. In, &c. Josue recapitulates how this miracle established his authority, and how he was ordered to command the priests to come up from the midst of the Jordan, after the people had all got to the other side, and the stones were fixed, to denote where the ark had stood, like a wall, to hinder the waters from rushing down. H.

Ver. 19. Month of the ecclesiastical year. They had left Egypt on the 15th of Nisan, so that they had spent forty years, within five days, on their journey. C.

Ver. 20. Galgal. It received its name afterwards, C. 5:9. It lay in a direct line from Jericho to the Jordan eastwards, being ten stadia from the former, and fifty from the latter place. Josue had his camp here while he subdued the kings of Chanaan, (C.) as it had plenty of water and wood in its environs; (M.) though perhaps at this time, there were no houses. Saul was here recognized king of all Israel, 1 K. 11:14. Tertullian (c. Marc. iv.) supposes that the twelve stones were placed on the ark, in arcam, which is not at all probable. C.—But they might be erected in its vicinity, and that may perhaps be the meaning of the author. H.—R. Levi says the stones were placed near the ark, that all Israel might see them thrice a year. Josephus believes that an altar was formed of them.

Ver. 25. Earth, particularly of Chanaan. This miracle tends to inspire the enemy with fear and consternation, and to confirm the faith and hope of the Israelites. The obstinacy of the former was thus rendered more inexcusable. C.

Ver. 1. Chanaan. These occupied the countries situated on the Mediterranean sea, as far as Egypt: the Amorrhites dwelt nearer to the lake of Sodom. The whole country is divided between these two nations, including that territory which the Philistines had seized, and which belonged also to Israel. Almost every city had its respective king, according to the ancient custom in the east, intra suam cuique patriam regna finiebantur. Justin. i. Strabo (xvi.) says this was particularly verified in the cities of Phœnicia. C.—Till they. Heb. “we ... their heart melted, neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.” They fainted as it were through fear, and could not take their breath, or according to the Sept. adopt any thing rational; “they had no prudence,” phronesis. H.

Ver. 2. Time. While the enemy was rendered incapable of attacking the Israelites by excessive fear (C.) and consternation, Josue was commanded to renew the sign of the covenant, by which they were to take possession of the land, and it is supposed that he complied the day after he arrived at Galgal; (H.) so that the wound would be healing, when the feast of the Passover commenced four days later. On the third day it is most painful. Gen. 34:25.—Of stone. Heb. tsurim, which some translate, “sharp;” but the Sept. and the best interpreters agree, that the word indicates a stone. Such a knife was used by Sephora. Ex. 4:25. It was supposed that sharp stones would cause less inflammation or danger. Samia testa ... amputabant, nec aliter citra perniciem. Plin. xxv. 12. Herodotus (ii. 86,) observes, that the Egyptian embalmers opened the body of the deceased with a “sharp Ethiopian stone.” The people of Africa, and of America, have frequently used stone to cut wood, &c. Some of the Fathers assert, that Christ was circumcised with a knife of stone. But any other sharp instrument might be used for the purpose. Any person might perform the operation. Izates, king of the Adiabeniens, received circumcision from the hand of a surgeon. Joseph. xx. 2. C.—Time. Not that such as had been circumcised before were to be circumcised again: but that they were not to renew, and take up again the practice of circumcision; which had been omitted during their 40 years' sojourning in the wilderness; by reason of their being always uncertain whey they should be obliged to march. Ch.—S. Augustine (q. 6,) seems to think that the Israelites despised this ceremony in the desert. Theodoret (q. 2,) supposes it was disused because it was not then necessary, to distinguish the Israelites from other nations. Masius is of opinion that God would not allow them to employ it, after their revolt at Cadesbarne, when they would not take possession of the land of Chanaan; and hence they could not resume that privilege, till God had authorized them again, ver 7. Num. 14:33. The covenant with God, of which circumcision was the seal, had been, in the mean time, suspended. But as the Israelites are no where blamed, in Scripture, on account of this omission, it seems that God dispensed with them during the 38 years after they left Sinai, that the children might not be exposed to the evident danger of perishing, as the people knew not how soon the cloud would give notice for an immediate departure. C.—Since they were now in te midst of the nations of Chanaan, this distinctive mark (M.) was to be henceforth diligently observed. H.

Ver. 3. Hill, at Galgal. Josue took care to have this ceremony performed. C.—Perhaps he circumcised some himself, as Abraham did those of his own house. Gen. 17:23. M.

Ver. 4. Second. Heb. “this is the thing, (the cause why) Josue gave circumcision.”

Ver. 5. Desert. After the departure from Sinai, where the Passover was celebrated, and where, of course, the people must have been circumcised. C.

Ver. 6. Forty. Some copies of the Sept. add, “two,” as if the 40 years' wandering in the desert, were to be dated from the time that the spies discouraged the people, in the second year of their departure from Egypt. But the Heb. and the best chronologers allow only 40 years in the whole. C.—Heb. “For the children of Israel walked 40 years in the wilderness, till all the men fit for war, who came out of Egypt, were consumed, because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord, unto whom the Lord swore that he would not shew them the land, which the Lord swore unto their fathers that he would give us, a land flowing with milk and honey; (7) and their children he raised up in their stead, them Josue circumcised.” H.—The Sept. is also rather fuller than the Vulg. but gives the same sense. These children who receive, what their rebellious fathers had been refused, are a sensible figure of the Christian Church; as that second circumcision under Josue, represents the spiritual cleansing of the heart, which Jesus Christ has enjoined. Rom. 2:28. 1 Cor. 7:19.

Ver. 8. Healed. The Passover lasted eight days: after which they proceeded to attack Jericho. Yet the people, unfit for war, remained at Galgal; where the camp continued a long time afterwards.

Ver. 9. Egypt. The people of that country adopted circumcision only after this period, (C.) and it never became general among them. They were therefore held in abhorrence, like the rest of the uncircumcised nations, among the Jews. Gen. 34:14. 1 K. 14:6. Theodoret (q. 4,) looks upon circumcision as a symbol of the liberation from the servitude of Egypt, where, he says, history informs us, that many of the Hebrews had neglected this rite.—Galgal is interpreted liberty, by Josephus; but moderns render it “a rolling away,” (C.) or revolution. Heb. “I have rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you.” H.—Those Israelites who remained at the other side of the river, were ordered to be circumcised at the same time with their brethren. But they could not partake in the solemnity of the Passover, as they were at a distance from the ark. Salien.

Ver. 10. Phase. This was the third. The first was celebrated in Egypt. Ex. 12. The second at Sinai. Num. 9. M.—Afterwards it was disused till the Israelites took possession of Chanaan, as it was chiefly designed for that country. Ex. 12:25.

Ver. 11. Corn. Some pretend that the Heb. means “old corn.” But the ancient interpreters take no notice of this restriction. The offering of corn was probably omitted on this occasion, as the Israelites had not cultivated the land.—Frumenty. Sept. “new corn.” Heb. “parched, on that same day.” These last words are taken by the Sept. as a part of the next sentence.

Ver. 12. Land. The Sept. intimate on the 15th. The Heb. seems to say the 16th, Nisan, “on the morrow after they had eaten of the (old) corn.” C.—Grabe’s Septuagint agrees with the Vulgate and Heb. and specifies that the Israelites “eat of the corn of the country on the day after the Passover, unleavened and new. On that day, the morrow, manna ceased.” All depends on the determination of the first day of the festival. If we date from the eating of the paschal lamb on the 14th, or from the solemn day, which was the 15th, manna must have been withdrawn either on the 15th or 16th of the month; though Salien thinks that it ceased as soon as the Israelites had begun to eat of the fruit of the country, on the eastern side of the Jordan. This miraculous food was withholden as soon as the Israelites entered the land of promise; and so the blessed Eucharist, of which it was a figure, and all the sacraments, will cease, when the Christian people shall have taken possession of their heavenly country. H.

Ver. 13. Adversaries? Dost thou bear arms for or against us? C.

Ver. 14. Prince of the host of the Lord, &c. S. Michael, who is called prince of the people of Israel. Daniel 10:21. Ch.—Some of the Fathers explain it of the son of God. Orig. hom. 6. But S. Aug. C. D. xi. 13. S. Jerom in Gal. iii. and interpreters in general agree, that the person who here appeared to Josue, was the archangel Michael. He came, in the name of God, to assure Josue of success, as the angel had appeared to Moses in the burning bush, as if to denote the distress of the Hebrews, and to encourage Moses to undertake their liberation. C.—Chal. “I am the angel sent by God.” In that character he is called the Lord. H.

Ver. 15. Worshipping. Not with divine honour, but with a religious veneration of an inferior kind, suitable to the dignity of his person. Ch.—He styles the angel Adonai, which is a title frequently given to men; and hence he does not seem to have designed to give him supreme worship. C.—If he did, (H.) it was referred to God. C. See Ex. 20.

Ver. 16. Loose. The angel did not only accept of the honour done to him, but also required more, shewing that the field near Jericho was rendered holy, by his presence. W.—Hence he ordered Josue to put off his shoes, as Moses had done at the bush. Ex. 3:5. The Turks leave their shoes at the doors of their mosques, and do not dare to tread on the bare floor. Formerly the pagans would not spit in their temples. Arrian. “If, says Porphyrius, in the sacrifices instituted by men, in honour of the gods, people be careful to have their shoes clean, with how much greater attention ought we to preserve our bodies, which are, as it were, the garments of the soul, free from every impurity and corruption!” Abstin. 2. C.

Ver. 2. The Lord, in the person of the angel, who appeared to Josue, as he was praying in silent meditation, or reconnoitring the city of Jericho. C. 5:13. H.—Men. People of the different nations had come to defend the city. C. 24:11.

Ver. 3. Men. These went first. Afterwards the priests bore the ark, which was followed by all the people. C.—The procession began on a Sunday. Rabbins.

Ver. 4. Jubilee. Num. 10:2. The number seven, is often used to express an indefinite number. But here a particular stress is laid upon it. See Masius. As, on the 7th year the Hebrews regained the possessions which they had sold: so now they assert their rights to the land of Chanaan. The sound of the trumpets announced joyful tidings to them. M.

Ver. 5. Tune, with certain modulations, continued for a long time. Num. 10:5. H.—Ground. The Rabbins say they sink in, so that the ruins might not impede the march of the army. Some think only a large breach was made, opposite to the Israelites, as the house of Rahab upon the walls was preserved. C.

Ver. 7. He said. Some MSS. and Heb. editions have, “they said,” though the points shew it must be singular, whatever Michaelis may object in favour of the Masora. Leusen foolishly admits here a double literal sense. Ken. H.

Ver. 11. There. This singular procession served to exercise the obedience of the people, and to teach them to despise the enemy, who durst not come out to attack them, though many were unarmed. C.

Ver. 15. Seventh day. The Jews say it was the sabbath; but of this there is no proof. Marcion hence took occasion to accuse God of inconsistency, as he forbad all working, and yet ordered the people to go round Jericho on a sabbath day. But Tertullian (iv. 12,) answers very well, that servile work is forbidden, and not the works of God or of religion, and God may change the ceremonial law as he thinks proper. C.—Sabbato opera humana prohibentur non divina. D.

Ver. 16. Said, or “had said,” when he gave the people the sound of the trumpet for a sign (H.) when they were to shout, v. 5. He probably gave the regulations respecting the plunder of the city, before the army left the camp. C.

Ver. 17. An anathema. That is, a thing accursed and devoted to utter destruction. Ch.—Only the metal that was found, was consecrated to the Lord, (v. 19,) and the family of Rahab saved. In devoting things, the person who laid on the curse, might extend its operation as he pleased. On some occasions, all was to be destroyed; on others, some things were preserved. Deut. 2:34. Lev. 27:21. C.—This first city, which the Israelites attacked, was treated with peculiar severity, to terrify the rest.

Ver. 18. Forbidden, transgression, sin. Heb. has always anathema. H.

Ver. 19. Treasures, probably in the tabernacle. See Num. 31:48. God claims the first-fruits of the booty, as an acknowledgment that he granted the victory, (C.) and all the riches of the country, to his people. H.

Ver. 23. Men. Heb. “boys;” a name given to people advanced in years. —Camp. A respect for the majesty of God, would not permit the Israelites to introduce unbelievers into the camp. They were first instructed, and then the men were circumcised, and the women received baptism. C.

Ver. 25. Day. Rahab prefigured the wild olive tree, which S. Paul says was engrafted on the good olive tree, (Rom. 11:24,) and which will remain till the end of the world. Theod. q. 8. She married Salmon, of the tribe of Juda, and became the ancestor of David and of the Messias. C.

Ver. 26. Cursed, &c. Jericho, in the mystical sense, signifies iniquity; the sounding of the trumpets by the priests, signifies the preaching of the word of God; by which the walls of Jericho are thrown down, when sinners are converted; and a dreadful curse will light on them who build them up again. Ch.—Gates. Some copies of the Sept. insert here that the curse fell upon Azan (Hiel) of Bethel, 3 K. 16:34. Before his time, there was a city of palm-trees, or Jericho, built in the neighbourhood. Joseph. Bel. v. 4. Though Hiel was so severely punished, no one made any scruple to live there. Elias and Jesus Christ himself honoured the place with their presence. The city is now almost in ruins, and the territory uncultivated. Ancient history mentions similar imprecations against obnoxious cities. Thus the Romans cursed the rebuilders of Carthage, and Agamemnon followed “the ancient custom,” says Strabo, (xiii.) laying a curse upon those who should rebuild the city of Troy. The Ionians and Greeks forbid those temples to be re-established, which the Persians had destroyed, that they might remain eternal monuments of the impiety of the latter, and of the hatred which subsisted between the two nations. Pausanias in Phoc. C.

Ver. 1. Children. Achan was guilty of theft: some of the rest might have connived at his fault. He had taken what was reserved for the Lord. The offender was discovered, to inspire all with a horror for his conduct. Some of his brethren were punished, (v. 5,) but they suffered for their own secret transgressions, or death might be no real punishment to them; while the Israelites were awakened to a sense of their own inability to conquer without the divine protection, and were forced to humble themselves. H.—Chastisements are the marks of God's displeasure, though they frequently proceed also from his clemency.—Achan is called Achar, 1 Par. 2:7. These five persons occupy the space of 265 years; so that they must have been 50 or 55 years old, when they had children.

Ver. 2. Against Hai, to see the situation and strength of that city, which was about 10 miles west, or rather north, of Jericho. It was afterwards rebuilt, 1 Esd. 2:28.—Bethaven and Bethel are the same place; (S. Jerom. C.) though many distinguish them, with Cellarius. The former name means “the house of iniquity,” because Jeroboam there set up a golden calf. Bethel was its former appellation, in consequence of the vision of Jacob. Gen. 28.

Ver. 3. Few. It appears, however, that the city contained 12,000 fighting men; so that these spies must have formed a false notion of its strength. C. 8:25.

Ver. 5. Sabarim, which means people “broken and defeated.” Sept. “they pursued them from the gate, till they had entirely broken them,” destroying 36, and putting the rest to flight. C.—This small disaster filled the whole camp with dismay, as the Lord generally caused the victories of his people to be complete, and without any loss, as long as they continued in his favour. None were found wanting of those who attacked and destroyed so many of the Madianites. Num. 31:49. H.

Ver. 6. Heads. These marks of grief were very common. Achilles covered his head with ashes, tore his garments and face, when he received news of the death of his friend, Patroclus. Homer and Virgil, (xii.) speaking of Latinus, the king, says, It scissa veste Latinus—Canitiem immundo perfusam pulvere turpans.

Ver. 7. Began. Some had established themselves in the land of Galaad. M.—Heb. “would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side of the Jordan.” Josue speaks in this animated manner, through zeal for the glory of God, (C.) more than for any personal inconvenience. He was grieved that any one should have merited God's displeasure. He was afraid that the Chanaanites would blaspheme the great name of the Lord, v. 9.

Ver. 11. Lied. Each one, on delivering up what he had taken, made profession, at least by his behaviour, (H.) that he retained nothing. Achan did like the rest, but he kept back of the plunder. C.—He lied, and did not comply with the promise made by all Israel, which he was bound to observe, as much as if he had made it with his own mouth.

Ver. 13. Sanctified. Prepared by washing, &c. to appear before the tabernacle, and see the event. Sept. “purify the people.” Chal. “call an assembly.”

Ver. 14. Find. Heb. “it shall be the tribe which the Lord taketh.” H.—This was done by lots, as on similar occasions, 1 K. 10:20 and 14:41. When God authorized this method, there could be no danger in it. But to have recourse to lots without such authority, would be often tempting God. The apostles chose an apostle by lot: but they had first taken every precaution (C.) to select two persons, both fit for the important charge. H.—To commit the choice of sacred ministers to chance would be extremely improper. “We forbid the use of lots in the elections,” said Honorius. C.

Ver. 18. Juda. The dignity of this tribe enhanced the fault of Achan. M.

Ver. 19. My son. Clemency is the virtue of great souls.—Give glory. Confess candidly. Jo. 9:24.

Ver. 21. Garment. Heb. “a robe of Sannaar, or of Babylon.” This city was famous for embroidered, or painted robes, such as were worn by kings. Jonas 3:6. Plin. viii. 48.—Rule, or linget. No coin was yet used. C.

Ver. 24. His sons, &c. Probably conscious to, or accomplices of the crime of their father, (Ch). as he could hardly have concealed these things in the midst of his tent without their knowledge. M.—But granting, with S. Aug. (q. 8,) that they were innocent of this crime, God, who is the sovereign arbiter of life and death, might order them out of the world, on this occasion, without injustice.

Ver. 25. Day. Hence some have drawn a very weak argument, to prove the repentance of Achan, as if he had only to undergo a temporary punishment. It is probable, however, that his sincere confession, proceeding from a penitent heart, might influence God to shew him mercy.—Fire. Children, as well as his other effects; though some have supposed that the former were spared, as they are not here specified. Heb. seems to include them; “and burnt them with fire after they had stoned them with stones.” Chaldee says they were stoned first. C.

Ver. 26. Achor. That is, trouble; (Ch). in allusion to the name of Achar, as he is called in the Sept. invariably, and in the Heb. and Vulg. in the Book of Chronicles. H.—This heap of stones was thrown upon the ashes of the deceased, or perhaps at his person, while he was burning at the stake, as it is the custom still among the Turks. Roger. ii. 7. The king of Hai was treated in this manner. C. 8:29. See 2 K. 18:17. The vale of Achor was on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho, where a small castle, at Adommim, was built to protect travellers from the insults of robbers, who infested that part. Lu. 10:30. C. 15:7.

Ver. 1. Men. Masius and Salien (H.) suppose that Josue selected out of them 30,000; 5000 of whom were to be placed in ambush, and the rest were to pretend that they were terrified at the approach of the king of Hai, and to flee with Josue. But the text seems to assert that all accompanied their general, (C.) excepting such as were left to guard the camp.

Ver. 2. King. There was this difference, that the king of Hai was to be gibbeted, and his corpse stoned, while the city was to be plundered by the Israelites.—It. This mode of warfare is equally just, as if the enemy was attacked in the open field. Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirat? Virg.—God was pleased to authorize it on this occasion, that his people might be less exposed, being under some apprehensions on account of the former defeat. Some nations have preferred to encounter the enemy openly. Grot. Jur. iii. 1. 20. But their example is no law for others. “When the war is just, it matters not whether a person gain the victory by open fighting or by stratagem.” S. Aug. q. 10. “It is often prudent to conceal the truth.” c. Mend. x. People engaged in warfare, allow each other to take such advantages. God could easily have routed these few men by means of the army of Israel, or by a miracle, as he did at Jericho. H.—But he is at liberty to act as he thinks proper. The ambush was laid on the south-west side of Hai, so that those of Bethel might not perceive it, as they came out to the assistance of their countrymen, v. 17. Five thousand were placed in one place, and 25,000 in another, while the main body of the army, under Josue, took a circuit by the east, and came to attack the city on the north side. C.

Ver. 4. Ready to enter the city, when its soldiers are all in pursuit of us. H.

Ver. 5. And turn, &c. Josue had not fled before. C.—Heb. “against us, as at the first, we will flee before them.”

Ver. 8. Fire. They were to set some houses on fire for a signal, but the whole city was not to be destroyed (C.) till the Israelites had collected the plunder. H.

Ver. 10. Ancients, who had a command in the army, and assisted Josue with their counsel. They gave him an account of the state and numbers of the army. C.

Ver. 12. Five thousand. These were part of the 30,000 mentioned above, v. 3. Ch.—Josue had given orders to have them placed in ambush apart; (C.) unless, perhaps, he places these himself in some secret place. H.

Ver. 13. Night. He spent the forepart of it at Galgal, to prevent any suspicion, v. 9. But setting out very early, (v. 10,) he arrived at Hai before sun-rise.

Ver. 14. Desert of Bethel, fit only for pasturage. C. 18:12.

Ver. 15. Afraid. Heb. “made as if they were beaten before them, and fled.” Thus they drew on the king of Hai, so as to leave the ambush in his rear. C.

Ver. 17. Not one fit to bear arms. W.—Bethel. As soon as the people of this city perceived the Israelites fleeing, they rushed out to assist the king of Hai in the pursuit. But when they saw the former rally, before they had joined their friends, (C.) they very prudently retired, and left the unhappy citizens of Hai to their fate. H.—Hence all who were slain belonged to the latter city, v. 25.

Ver. 18. Shield, as Moses lifted up his hands. Ex. 17:11. Some translate, “dart, spear,” or “sword.” Sept. and Eccli. 16:3. C.—The buckler might be suspended on a spear, (M.) that it might be seen afar off (W.) by some appointed to keep watch on purpose. H.

Ver. 23. Josue. This king was reserved for greater torments and ignominy. It was the ancient custom to present kings and chief commanders to the victorious general, who rewarded those who brought them. Grotius.

Ver. 28. For ever, or for a long time. It was rebuilt before the captivity. 2 Esd. 7:31.

Ver. 29. Gibbet. Sept. “a cross.” Some say that the king was first killed; but that assertion is destitute of proof. The corpse was taken down before night. Deut. 21:22.

Ver. 30. Hebal. The Sam. Chronicle says on Mount Garizim. No doubt Josue complied with the injunctions of Moses: but we have seen that there are reasons to doubt which mountain he pitched upon. Deut. 27:4. H.—It seems more probable that the altar would be upon Garizim, where the blessings were proclaimed, if the texts of Moses and of Josue did not formally assert the contrary. C.—But if they have been interpolated, nothing certain can be deduced from those passages. Josephus (iv. 8,) says that the altar was between the two mountains, not far from Sichem, which was built at the foot of Garizim; and it is not probable that this historian, the mortal enemy of the Samaritans, would have hesitated to assert that the altar was upon Hebal, if the texts had been so positive, in his time. It is undeniable that the tribes of Levi, and of Ephraim, were upon Garizim; and consequently Josue and the priests must have been there; and who would then officiate at the altar on Hebal? See Kennicott, who ably refutes the insinuations of the infidel, Collins, against the character of the Samaritans. When this altar was erected the learned are not agreed. H.—Some say, immediately after the passage of the Jordan, and that the 12 stones taken from the bed of the river, were used for that purpose. Josephus says five years elapsed, and R. Ismael supposes that the altar was not built during the 14 years after the passage of the Jordan. But it is most probable that Josue complied with the command of God as soon as he had procured a sort of peace, (H.) by the conquest of these two cities, and was thus enabled to penetrate into the heart of the country, where Garizim was situated, not in the plain of Jericho, as Eusebius imagined, but near Sichem, (C.) about 30 or 40 miles to the north-west of Jericho. H.

Ver. 31. Iron. Spencer complains that the Prot. have not translated barzel, “iron tool,” as Deut. 27:5. This translation is found in their more ancient editions of 1537–49, &c. Ken.—But the difference is very unimportant. The reason of this prohibition is given, Ex. 20:25.—He offered; so we read that he wrote, blessed and cursed, &c. because these things were done at least by his authority. It is not necessary to suppose that he engraved the words of the law with his own hands, or that he passed from Garizim, where he had been pronouncing the blessings, to Hebal, in order to denounce the curses. H.—He probably commissioned some of the princes on Hebal to perform the office of cursing, after he had repeated the blessings himself from Garizim; and the select company of Levites before the ark, having answered or repeated the words, the whole multitude stationed at the foot of Hebal, giving their consent that the transgressors should be cursed. Ken.—Hence Josue must have sacrificed by the hands of the priests. H.—Various instances are produced to show that princes and prophets have, on extraordinary occasions, performed this office themselves, 1 K. 6:15 and 7:9. 3 K. 18:32. C.—But these must have either received a dispensation from God, or they must have employed the ministry of the legal priests; or, in fine, their actions, like that of Saul, (1 K. 13:9,) of Absalom, (ib. 1:9,) Herod, &c. may have been deserving of blame. H.—The Jews assert that in the desert no one was permitted to sacrifice, except in the tabernacle; but that this prohibition ceased at Galgal, as the ark had no fixed abode, and thus Josue might offer sacrifice himself. Afterwards the law was enforced, while the ark was at Silo. But upon its being removed to Nobe, Maspha, and Gabaon, people resumed their former liberty; and hence there was nothing to hinder Samuel, Saul, and David from offering sacrifice, till the temple was erected. Outram de Sac. i. 2. Grot. in Deut. xii. 8. This sacred office was formerly exercised by kings, particularly at Athens, where, after the people became more numerous, Theseus appointed the king of sacrifices to keep up the memory of the ancient practice. Demost. c. Neream. C. The like was done at Rome under the republic. H.

Ver. 32. Stones, of which the altar was formed, (C.) or on a separate monument, (Masius) consisting of two stones of black marble, so as to leave the letters prominent, and to fill up the vacuities with white plaster, that they might be seen more plainly, and might, at the same time, be more durable than if they had been only written on the cement, whatever some may have said of the tenacity of the ancient plaster.—Deuteronomy, &c. or copy of the Decalogue which, by way of eminence, is called the law. Act. 7:53. It is distinguished from the blessings and the curses; (v. 34,) and Moses referred to it, as already existing, (Deut. 27:3. 8,) though the Book of Deuteronomy was not finished till afterwards. He might point to the very tables contained in the ark. “This law, consisting of only 16 verses, might easily be engraved on this solemn day; whereas to engrave the 80 verses of blessings and cursings, would be improbable; and engraving the Pentateuch, or indeed the Book of Deuteronomy, had been impossible.” That the Decalogue was to be thus solemnly proclaimed is evident, from the Sam. text. Ex. 20:18. Kennicott.—This was the covenant which God had made with his people, (Deut. 4:13,) and which Moses cautions the Israelites to observe; as upon their fidelity, their present and future happiness entirely depended. It was on this title alone that they could hold the land of Chanaan; and therefore Josue takes care thus publicly to admonish them of their duty. H.—The Rabbins say that the whole Pentateuch was written on this occasion in 70 languages, that no nation might plead ignorance. But we can hardly believe that even the Book of Deuteronomy could be written, and read, and explained to the people, as that would require many days. C.

Ver. 33. Hebal. “Gerizim and Ebal, says Maundrell, p. 59, are separated by a narrow valley, not above a furlong broad; and Naplosa, (the ancient Sychem) consisting chiefly of two streets lying parallel, is built at the foot of, and under Gerizim.” The princes, representing the different tribes, were stationed on these mountains, and the crowd at the foot of them, while a select company of Levites attended the ark in the midst, and repeated what the princes proclaimed, that the multitude might answer Amen, as they turned successively to them; (Kennicott) or the princes might answer Amen, from the top of the two hills. C.—And first. Prot. “as Moses ... had commanded before, that they should bless the people of Israel.” But if Josue blessed them himself, (H.) all superiors might do so, as parents bless their children. W.

Ver. 34. Words. Heb. “words of the law, the blessings,” &c. H.

Ver. 35. Repeated. Coverdale’s Bible has “Josua caused it to be proclaimed.” “It is very common in Scripture to represent a person as doing that which is done by another, in his name and by his authority.” Kennicott.—Josue might be in the midst to preside, (C.) or rather he would be along with the princes of the six tribes on Mount Garizim, v. 30. H.—Thus the covenant entered into between God and the Israelites, was solemnly ratified when the latter first entered the promised land. The greatest part of those who had been present at Horeb had perished in the wilderness. C.

JOSUE 9

Ver. 1. These things. The solemn covenant by which the Israelites took possession of Chanaan, (H.) and the destruction of two cities of Jericho and Hai. C.—The kings on that side of the Jordan, and in all the neighbourhood, perceiving that, if the Israelites were suffered to attack them singly, in this manner, they would all presently lose their dominions and their lives. They resolved, therefore, to form a general league, offensive and defensive. H.—Beyond. Heb. “on the side of.”—Mountains, on the south of Judea.—Sea. All the nations of Phoenicia, and the country of the Philistines, (C.) who had seized a part of the country, which belonged to the Israelites. Josue divided their territory among the people, though he did not live to make the conquest of it.

H.—Libanus. Heb. “and in all the coasts of the great sea, over-against Libanus,” as if the Phoenicians were alone meant. C.

Ver. 4. Provisions. By the alteration of a single letter, Heb. means, “they feigned themselves to be ambassadors.” But the Chal. Syr. and Sept. agree with the Vulgate. C.—The Gabaonites were Hevites, though they are called by the more general name of Amhorrites, 2 K. 21:2. S. Jerom says that their city stood in the tribe of Benjamin; according to Josephus, 40 or 50 stadia north of Jerusalem. M.—They alone had the prudence to submit, (C.) being terrified and converted by the miracles of God. H.—Again. In the East, goat skins with the hair inwards, are used to carry wine.

Ver. 5. Patches. Heb. “spotted,” or of different colours, like shoes worn out and spoiled with dirt.—Pieces. Heb. is translated, “dry, burnt, eaten, mouldy,” &c. But it means fine thin bread, or wafers, (3 K. 14:3,) full of holes. The Israelites partook of this bread, which they would hardly have done if it had been mouldy. C.

Ver. 7. You. The Gabaonites addressed themselves to the first whom they met in the camp; and these made this remark to them before they were brought into the presence of Josue. The Israelites could make no league with the Chanaanites, as with equals, but only on condition that the latter should embrace the true religion, and acknowledge the dominion of the former. Grot. Ex. 23:32. Deut. 7:2.

Ver. 8. Servants. They did not mean to submit to servitude, but to make a league; otherwise they would not have needed to have recourse to such artifices. C.—But finding that no other terms could be procured, they were willing, at any rate, to save their lives. H.

Ver. 9. God. So the queen Saba came to Solomon, 3 K. 10. The people of Gabaon being convinced that the God of Israel was the only true God, came to join themselves to his people, and to worship him. Serarius.

Ver. 10. Astaroth. They take care not to mention what had happened so recently at Jericho, lest they might be detected. C.

Ver. 13. And almost. This is added by way of farther explanation of the Heb. “are become old.” H.

Ver. 14. Victuals, to examine whether they were as old as they pretended; or they eat of them in sign of friendship. M.—Thus we find a feast generally accompanied the making of a league. Gen. 26:30 and 31:54. To betray a guest was deemed a heinous injury. Ps. 54:15. Euripides.—Lord. By the high priest, clothed with the Urim and Thummim. C.—This remark shews that the Israelites had been guilty of some negligence. H.—Hence they were so easily deceived, being perhaps overjoyed that their friendship should be courted by so distant a nation. M.—The high priest was ordered to consult the Lord for Josue, at the door of the tabernacle. Ex. 29:42. Num. 27:21. W.

Ver. 15. Them. Were they bound to keep this promise? Some maintain the negative, as it was obtained by fraud, and therefore the Gabaonites leave themselves to the mercy of Josue, (v. 25,) who condemns them to perpetual servitude in the house of the Lord. He could not, however, have taken away their lives after what had passed. The error was not essential, but the people might have obtained the same conditions, if they had frankly told the truth. If we make a contract with a person who pretends to be of a nation to which he does not belong, the contract will hold good. The deceit of the Gabaonites was punished as it deserved. But God required that the conditions which were granted to them, should be diligently observed; and the family of Saul was severely punished, because he had slain some of them. 3 K. 21. If the rest of the Chanaanites had changed their religion, and submitted to the Israelites, they might have been preserved, as Rahab, and so many others were, with whom the pious kings scrupled not to form alliances. C. 11:19. Deut. 20:10, &c. Masius. Bonfrere. C.—They were, however, obliged to yield possession of the land to the Israelites, and to renounce idolatry. The Gabaonites were willing to accede to these conditions, and therefore Josue might justly make a peace with them. M.

Ver. 16. Now. The five kings coming to attack the Gabaonites, these were forced to confess the truth, and to implore the assistance of the Israelites; (C.) or perhaps Rahab had given information who they really were. M.—Josue flew to their assistance in the night, and arrived the day following. C. 10:9.

Ver. 18. Israel. This is one reason why their lives were spared. But we have seen that they could not, with justice, have treated them as enemies, on their submitting to the conditions required, even if they had not engaged themselves by oath. The Gabaonites knew with what respect oaths were then kept by the Hebrews, even when they might have some specious pretext for dispensing themselves from their obligation. "People had not yet begun to neglect God, as they do in the present age; nor did they allow themselves the liberty of interpreting an oath, and accommodating the laws to their own humour, but they rather regulated their morals by their prescription." Nondum hæc quæ nunc tenet sæculum, negligentia Dei venerat, &c. Livy iii.

Ver. 21. Multitude. The common people, only considering their own private advantage, murmured at the conduct of their leaders, as they supposed that they were thus deprived of the plunder (C.) of many cities, and engaged in a dangerous war, with the five confederate kings. But this war was in no degree detrimental to them, as they knew they had to subdue the whole country; and as for the Gabaonites, they eased the people of Israel of a great burden, by doing the drudgery of the tabernacle, which otherwise must have fallen upon them. H.—These people were dispersed through the country, particularly in the cities of the priests and Levites, whose servants they were forced to be. Gabaon was allotted to the priests. In latter ages, many of these poor people being slain by Saul, &c. David was obliged to select some others, called Nathineans, or “people given,” to supply their place, (C.) unless these were all the remnants of the Gabaonites. M.—Josephus (Bel. ii. 17,) speaks of the feast of Xylophoria, or “wood carrying,” for the uses of the temple; and we read, (2 Esd. 10:34,) that lots were cast among the priests and the Levites, and the people, for the offering of wood, &c. which seems to insinuate that the ancient institution was then altered. Many authors speak of a fountain which furnished the temple with water, after the captivity, so that the service of the Gabaonites was not much wanted. We find no mention of them after that time.

Ver. 23. Curse. Heb. “you are cursed, and there shall be none of you freed from being bondmen;” (H.) you are a part of those nations which are under an anathema, and you deserve to be severely punished. C.—But we shall fulfil our engagements with you, only in punishment for your craftiness: (H.) you must submit to change your religion, (C.) which will be your greatest blessing, (H.) and to perform the meanest offices, which may be considered as a sort of curse. It is thought that some recompense was allowed the Gabaonites for their labour. Serarius, q. 17.—This sentence was probably pronounced at Galgal, (C.) though we might as well conclude that Josue would wait till he came to Gabaon, before he arraigned the people, as no doubt they would make the best of their way out of the camp, as soon as they had obtained their request. H.—Water. Slaves of the meanest condition were employed in these offices. Deut. 29:11. Athen. x. 22.

Ver. 24. Thereof. It seems they know not that any conditions would be admitted; and many interpreters have supposed, that none could be offered by the Israelites. See Deut. 20:15.

Ver. 25. Thee. They acknowledge not only that Josue is too strong for them, but also that he has a right to punish them for their deceit. They accept, therefore, of whatever terms he is pleased to allow them. C.

Ver. 27. Chosen in the tabernacle and temple. M.—In these Gabaonites, of the race of Chanaan, the prediction of Noe, that he should serve Sem, was fulfilled. Gen. 9. W.

JOSUE 10

Ver. 1. Adonisedec means, “Lord of justice,” as Melchisedec denotes “the king of justice;” perhaps Salem was originally styled Zedec. Masius.—This king had probably some control over the neighbouring cities. M.—He was also in the greatest danger; and not daring to attack the Israelites, he resolves to fall upon the Gabaonites unawares, that other cities might be deterred from following their example.—Confederates. Heb. “and were among them,” which may signify either that the Israelites were to dwell in the towns belonging to the Gabaonites, or that the latter should live along with them, as one and the same people, following the same religion, and bound together by the same interests.

Ver. 2. Cities. Yet we read not of its king. C. 9:11. C.—Sept. “It was like a royal metropolis.” H.—Valiant. Prudence therefore, and not fear, had influenced them to take this step.

Ver. 3. Hebron was about 24 miles south of Jerusalem, and Jerimoth 16. Lachis was a very famous city, (4 K. 14 and 18:14,) about nine miles south of Eleutheropolis, which was itself situated about 20,000 paces towards the south of Jerusalem; (Itin. Anton.) though some assert it was 22 or 32 miles distant. Eusebius and S. Jerom generally fix the situation of places by this city. Eglon was twelve miles to the eastward of it. The Sept. read Odollam, (C.) which was either the same city, (Euseb.) or one probably near it. C. 12:12. 5 and v. 35. 9.

Ver. 5. Amorrhites is a generical term, as well as Chanaanite, to denote the people of the country. The other kings did not come to the assistance (C.) of these five, v. 40. H.—Yet the people of Gabaon might suspect the worst, or exaggerate, in order to make Josue come with greater expedition. He was then at Galgal, above twenty miles distant, and set off the next night, coming unexpectedly upon the confederate kings early in the morning, v. 9.

Ver. 10. Troubled them. Sept. “filled them with consternation;” so that they knew not what to do. Ex. 23:17.—Bethoron. There were two cities of this name in the tribe of Ephraim, rebuilt by Sara. 1 Par. 7:24. The lower was twelve miles from Jerusalem. Maceda was eight from Eleutheropolis to the east, as Azeca was about the same distance west of Jerusalem, and not far from Soco. 1 K. 17:1. Thus Josue proceeded westward to Gabaon and Bethoron, where he defeated the confederates, and pursued them, as they fled to their respective cities in the south, on the road between Jerusalem and the country of the Philistines, as far as Maceda. H.

Ver. 11. Azeca, for the space of twelve miles.—Hailstones, of an uncommon size, accompanied with thunder and lightning. Hab. 3:11. Joseph. v. 1. C. Eccli. 46:6.—Of the same nature was the seventh plague of Egypt. Ex. 9:23. M.—Real stones may very probably have been hurled against the enemy, by means of some hurricane or vulcano, which God directed against the Chanaanites. Several instances of showers of stones are recorded in history. C. Dissert.—Even quantities of stone and earth, sufficient to form new islands, have been thus thrown up. Montfaucon.—The isle of Santorin, in the Archipelago, appeared in 1707.

Ver. 12. Them. This may be considered as a canticle of victory, containing a fervent prayer, which was presently followed with the desired effect.—Aialon. Heb. “Sun, in Gabaon, be silent; (moved not) and thou, moon, in the valley of Aialon,” or “of the wood,” which was probably not far from Gabaon. Josue had pursued the enemy at mid-day, to the west of that city, when turning round, he addressed this wonderful command to the sun. It is supposed that the moon appeared at the same time. But the meaning may only be, that the sun and the course of the stars should be interrupted for a time. C.—The sun and the moon stood still in their habitation. Heb. 3:11. M.—Many have called in question this miracle, with Maimonides, or have devised various means to explain it away, by having recourse to a parhelion or reflection of the sun by a cloud, or to a light which was reverberated by the mountains, after the sun was set, &c. Prædam iv. 6. Spinosæ, Grotius, Le Clerc.—But if these authors believe the Scriptures, they may spare themselves the trouble of devising such improbable explanations, as this fact is constantly represented as a most striking miracle. If S. Paul (Heb. 11:30,) make no mention of it, he did not engage to specify every miracle that had occurred. He does not so much as mention Josue, nor the passage of the Jordan, &c. so that it is a matter of surprise that Grotius should adduce this negative argument, to disprove the reality of the miracle. C.—The pretended impossibility of it, or the inconvenience arising to the fatigued soldiers from the long continuance of the day, will make but small impression upon those who consider, that God was the chief agent; and that he who made all out of nothing, might easily stop the whole machinery of the world for a time, and afterwards put it in motion again, without causing any derangement in the different parts. C.—It is not material whether the sun turn round the earth, or the contrary. H.—The Hebrews generally supposed that the earth was immovable; and on this idea Josue addresses the sun. Philosophers have devised various intricate systems: but the Scripture is expressed in words suitable to the conceptions of the people. The exterior effect would be the same, whether the sun or the earth stood still. Pagan authors have not mentioned this miracle, because none of the works of that age have come down to us. We find, however, that they acknowledged a power in magic capable of effecting such a change.

*Cessavere vices rerum dilataque longa,
Hæsit nocte dies: legi non paruit æther,
Torpuit & præceps audito carmine mundus.*

Lucan, Phars. vi. See Odys. xii. 382. and xxiii. 242.

This miracle would not render Josue superior to Moses, as some have argued. For all miracles are equally impossible to man, and equally easy to God: the greatness of a miracle is not a proof of greater sanctity. C.—Aialon lay to the south-west of Gabaon. H.—Josue ordered the moon to stop, as a necessary consequence of the sun's standing still. God condescended to grant his request. W.

Ver. 13. The book of the just. In Heb. Sepher hayashar; an ancient book long since lost. Ch.—It was probably of the same nature with that of the wars of the Lord, (Num. 21:4,) containing an account of the most memorable occurrences which concerned the people of Israel, the just, or Ischuron. Deut. 33:5. Josephus (v. 2,) says, such “records were kept in the archives of the temple.” They were drawn up by people of character. The quotations inserted are in a poetical style, as the book might contain various canticles, though the rest was written in prose. See 2 K. 1:18. It might appear unnecessary for Josue to appeal to this work, as the fact in question was known to all. C.—But too great precaution could not be taken to prevent the danger of people calling in question the reality of the miracle. If the book of the just was a more detailed history of facts, out of which this work of Josue has been compiled, as Theodoret supposes, the author might very well remit the more inquisitive reader to that authentic source. H.—Midst. It was then almost noon. C.—Josue was nevertheless afraid lest the day should not allow them time to destroy their fleeing enemies completely. H.—If the evening had been at hand, he would have said, return sun towards Gabaon, as it would have been on the west of his army. The battle had begun early in the morning, and the pursuit had lasted perhaps four or five hours. C.—Day. Heb. “about a whole day.” Many think that a day here comprises 24 hours; and as the sun had been above the horizon six hours, and continued other six, it must have been visible for the space of 36 hours, as the Jews believe, and as it is specified in S. Justin. Dial. The author of Eccli. 46:5, says, Was not the sun stopped in his anger, and one day made as two? that is, 24 hour long, allowing 12 unequal ones to form a day, according to the reckoning of those times. Others suppose that the day of Josue might consist of 18 (C.) or of 48 hours. But how would the soldiers be able to support such a fatigue? They had been marching all the preceding night from Galgal. H.—If they had stopped to take refreshment, their enemies would have escaped. Hence some of the Fathers imagine, that God enabled his people to pursue them without taking any food. S. Jer. c. Jov. ii. They might, however, take some along with them, as it was then customary; and eat as they pursued, whenever they could find an opportunity. Josue had given no prohibition; and Jonathan observed that his father, Saul, had troubled Israel, by following a different plan. 1 K. 14:24. C.

Ver. 14. Long. This word is not found in Heb. “and there was no day like that, before it, or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto,” &c. But God had often wrought miracles before, at the prayer of his servants. The difference between this day and all others, must be therefore in the length, or in the stopping of the heavenly bodies. H.—The long day which the prayer of Ezechias procured, (4 K. 20 and Isai. 38) consisted of 32 hours; or, supposing that the retrograde motion of the sun was instantaneous on the dial, it might only be 22 hours in length. C.—But if the day of Ezechias had been even longer, the words of this text may be verified, that neither in times past, nor while the author lived, had any such day been known. See Amama, p. 383. H.—Obeys. God is ready to grant the requests of his servants. Isai. 58:9. “We remark something still stronger, in the power which he has given to priests, to consecrate the body and blood of Jesus Christ in the sacrament of the eucharist.” C.

Ver. 15. Galgal. Masius supposes, that here the quotation from the book of the just terminates. The Roman and Alex. Sept. place this verse at the end of the chapter. C.—Grabe has it in both places with a star, to shew that it is taken from Theodotion. H.—In effect, Josue did not return to his camp till he had completed the business of the day, by destroying the five kings. After which, he proceeded to conquer that part of the country. He might have designed to return, (C.) and even have begun his march, (D.) when he was diverted from proceeding, by the news that the kings had been discovered. So we often say, that a person does what he is on the point of doing. See

Ver. 17. City, or territory. C.—The kings had sought their own safety in flight, leaving their people to make their escape as well as they could. But their cowardly behaviour only brought upon them a more dishonourable death. Josue and some of the forces stopped in the environs of Maceda, while the rest pursued after the fugitives, and slew all that had not strength to enter the fenced cities. H.—Then all the army assembled round their leader, took Maceda, and completed the victory of that most memorable day, by the ignominious death of the five kings. C.—God permitted some to escape, lest the land should be overrun with wild beasts; (Ex. 23:29,) and to instruct us that his children must suffer tribulation, to prevent the growth of vice. W.

Ver. 21. No man, (nullus.) some supply canis, “dog,” alluding to the proverbial expression. Ex. 11:7. Masius, &c.—Sept. “not one of the Israelites moved his tongue.” C.—All was profound silence, in expectation of what would be determined respecting the unfortunate kings. H.

Ver. 24. Feet, as Moses had foretold. Deut. 33:29. The conduct of Josue would appear cruel, if we did not reflect that he was only the executioner of the divine justice, which was pleased thus to punish these proud and impious princes, that others might not imitate their example.

Ver. 27. Down. Deut. 21. The victorious army had returned some time before the evening, and had time to take the city of Maceda; though some, without reason, believe that this took place the day following.

Ver. 28. Remains of inhabitants. C.—The king was gibbeted and stoned. H.

Ver. 30. Lebna, not far from Eleutheropolis. From before this city Sennacherib dispatched his menacing order to Ezechias, 4 K. 19:8. C.

Ver. 32. Lachis was still farther south. Josue took it the second day of the siege.

Ver. 33. Gazer, near Azotus, in the country of the Philistines. It is not said that Josue took this city. It was given long after to Solomon by the king of Egypt, 3 K. 9:15. Josue 16:10. C.

Ver. 37. The king, viz. the new king, who succeeded him that was slain, v. 26. Ch.—Caleb afterwards took Hebron, which, it seems, the Chanaanites had seized again and fortified, while Josue was conquering other parts of the country. He could not leave garrisons in all the cities which he took, and hence he set many of them on fire. After the strength of the country was broken, he knew that the Israelites might easily subdue the few isolated cities which he was forced to leave behind. But they proved so negligent, that many places were left in the possession of the Chanaanites, which proved a stumbling block to God's people.

Ver. 38. Dabir, which was formerly called Cariath sepher, "the city of the book," (C. 15:15,) or of Senna, (ib. 45,) near Hebron. It was taken again by Othniel and Caleb.

Ver. 40. Hills of Judea.—South of the promised land.—Plain. Heb. Sephela, a flat country near Eleutheropolis. S. Jer. in Abd. i. 19. 1 Mac. xii. 38.—Asedoth, "of the springs."—Remains. God ordered these people to be utterly destroyed, in punishment of their manifold abominations; and that they might not draw the Israelites into the like sins. Ch.

Ver. 41. Gaza. These cities were on the southern limits of the land of Chanaan, and of the Philistines.—Gosen, or Gessen, where the Hebrews had formerly dwelt. It was then very fertile. C. 13:3. The territory of Juda extended as far as the Nile; (C.) or this country may have resembled the country of Gessen. Gen. 46. M.—It seems indeed rather wonderful, that if this was a part of the promised land, God should order his people to leave it, as it were, to the Egyptians; and father they had occupied another part of the country, should seize it again. But he might have secret reasons for this order. H.

Ver. 1. Jabin, “the intelligent,” was perhaps the common name of the kings of Asor, the most powerful city in the northern parts of the country, (v. 10. C.) not far from the Cæsarea, (M.) which was built by Philip, where Lais stood before. H.—Josue burnt Asor to the ground; but it was rebuilt by the Chanaanites, and a powerful king reigned here, and subjugated the Israelites about 130 years after the death of Josue. Judg. 4:1. C.—Being the most interested in this warfare, Jabin assembled all the petty kings of the country as far as Dor, to resist the common enemy. H.—He was the generalissimo, (Grot.) and went to stop the progress of Josue, who had conquered the southern parts, and was making ready to march against the north.

Ver. 2. Ceneroth, or having the lake Genesareth on the south. They city of Cineroth, or of Tiberias, was situated on the southern borders of the lake. S. Jerom.—Side. Dor lay on the Mediterranean, the last of the cities of Phœnicia. All below was in a manner subdued. The Philistines did not enter into this league, nor were they invited, as they bore a certain antipathy to the people of Chanaan.

Ver. 3. Chanaanite. Some lived near the Jordan, others upon the Mediterranean.—Maspha. Probably where Laban and Jacob had met. Gen. 31:48. Hermon lay to the east of Libanus. C.—There was another Hermon near the torrent of Cisson. M.

Ver. 4. Shore. The Scripture sometimes uses an hyperbole, as well as the other figures of speech. S. Aug. C. D. xvi. 21. Josephus says they had 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 20,000 chariots. These were frequently armed with scythes. The ancient heroes often fought on chariots of a different kind. C.

Ver. 5. Merom, or the lake of Semechon, according to most interpreters; though it is more probable, that the confederates would advance to meet Josue near the lake of Cisson, to the important pass 12 miles north of Samaria, in the canton of Meron, or Merone. Judg. 4:10 and 5:18. This place was famous for the victory of Barac, and for the defeat of king Josias.

Ver. 6. Hamstring their horses, &c. God so ordained, that his people might not trust in chariots and horses, but in him. Ch.—He mentions the very time, when the victory will be obtained, to inspire the Israelites with greater confidence. Josue had proceeded from Galgal to Meron, about 90 miles; or if he had to go to the Semonite lake, 120 miles. Josephus says he had marched five days.

Ver. 8. Thereof. Josue divided his forces, and sent some to pursue the fugitives to Sidon and Sarepta, and others he dispatched to the east side of the Jordan.—Sihon was famous for its commerce, and for its glass works. Plin. v. 19.

Ver. 10. King. Jabin had thrown himself into the city, or perhaps a new king had been appointed, according to the custom of Persia, &c. when the former went to battle. Hence we find so many kings of Israel were chosen very young and while their fathers were living.

Ver. 12. Him. Deut. 7:22 all the Chanaanites in arms, are ordered to be slain. C.—Josue took the greatest part of the strong cities, and indeed all which he attacked. M.

Ver. 13. Fire. Several towns built on eminences, were reserved to keep the country in subjection. But it was thought proper to destroy Asor. Heb. may be, “He burnt not the towns which remained standing, with their fortifications,” &c. or such as had opened their gates to the Israelites. Chal. Sept. &c.)

Ver. 14. Spoil, excepting what was found on the idols, which was burnt. Deut. 7:25. C.

Ver. 15. Moses. It is not to be doubted but that the lawgiver would communicate many instructions, by word of mouth, to his successor. He would also tell him, in general, to observe whatever laws had been given to regulate the conduct of the leaders, (C.) as they were given not only to Moses, but to all who should afterwards occupy his post. H.

Ver. 16. So. Here follows a recapitulation of the victories of Josue.—Israel, or of Ephraim, which was the chief tribe of the kingdom of Israel: after the commencement of which, this seems to have been inserted; (C.) or having designated the southern parts by the name of Juda, (v. 21,) the more northern countries are called the mountain of Israel, which refers particularly to Samaria, or Bethel, which might receive the appellation of Israel, among his descendants, from the vision of the ladder, with which that patriarch was favoured. H.

Ver. 17. And part. Heb. “from Mount Halak, (H. or the bald mountain, destitute of wood) going up to Seir, (which is very shady; that is, from the southern parts of Chanaan, by Seir) as far as Baalgad,” on the east side of the Jordan, perhaps unto Coelosyria. C.

Ver. 18. A long time. Seven years, as appears from C. 14:10. (Ch.) where Caleb informs us that he was 85 years old. He was 40 when he went to explore the country, and 38 years were spent in the wilderness. God was pleased to allow the Chanaanites time to repent, and he would not render the country desolate all at once, lest wild beasts should overrun it. Ex. 23:19. Wisd. 12:10. C.

Ver. 20. Hardened. This hardening of their hearts, was their having no thought of yielding or submitting: which was a sentence or judgment of God upon them, in punishment of their enormous crimes. Ch.—God might indeed by his all-powerful grace have changed their hearts, but their crimes caused him to withhold that grace; and thus they were suffered to shut their eyes to their true interest. C.—They alone therefore were the cause of their own obduracy, which God only did not prevent. Ex. 7. W.

Ver. 21. Time. Among his other conquests, after the victory of Gabaon, Josue defeated the Enacim at Hebron, &c. Many of them fled into the country of the Philistines, and afterwards seized an opportunity of re-establishing themselves, so that Caleb had to drive them out afresh. C. 15:14.—Cities, or inhabitants. We have seen that he did not demolish all the cities, which were built on a commanding situation, v. 13.—Enacim. Goliath is supposed to have been of this family, being six cubits and a span high, 1 K. 17:4. C.—The Phœnicians probably took their name from Enak, bene anak, “sons of Enak;” whence Phoenix might easily be formed. Bochart.—Carthage was founded by them, and styled Chadre-Anak, “the dwelling of Anak,” (Plautus) as they chose to pass for descendants of that giant, though they were not in reality. Anak means “a chain;” and some have asserted that he wore one, as the kings of the Madianites did when they were vanquished by Gedeon, and the Torquati at Rome, as a mark of honour. But this is uncertain. C.

Ver. 22. Gaza, the most southern city of the Philistines, was afterwards taken by the tribe of Juda, but lost again in a short time. It was particularly addicted to the worship of Jupiter, Marnas, or “the Lord.”—Geth was probably taken by David, who found a refuge with its king, 1 K. 21. After the reign of Solomon, it returned to its former masters.—Azotus, or as the Heb. writes, Asdod, on the Mediterranean, was noted for the temple of Dagon, (1 K. 5:1,) which Jonathas destroyed. Joseph. xxii. 8. C.—Wars, of a general nature. The different tribes had only to take some cities. C. 15:1. W.

Ver. 1. Wilderness. Heb. “all the plain country (Arabia) on the east.”

Ver. 2. Galaad. Sehon occupied from the middle of the torrent Arnon, as far as half of the mountains of Galaad, and the torrent Jaboc. C.—Og possessed the other half of the mountains northward, while the Ammonites had the eastern parts. H.

Ver. 3. Bethsimoth is ten miles from Jericho, (Eus.) near the Dead Sea, in the plains of Moab. C.—Phasga. Asedoth lay at the foot of this mountain, being well supplied with water. Subjacet Acedoth usque Phasga, the southern limits of Sehon’s dominions had “abundance of springs, as far as Phasga.” H.

Ver. 4. Og. See Num. 21:33. Deut. 3:11.

Ver. 7. Seir. The same expression occurs, C. 11:17. Heb. “from Baalgad, in the vale of Libanus, even unto Mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir.” H.—Halak means, “bald or naked.” It is not known what mountain it denotes. Josue, (C.) or the Israelites, (H.) conquered “all the country beyond the Jordan, on the north from Baalgad, at the foot of Libanus, and from Hermon, where these mountains meet, as far as the mountains of separation,” which divide the country of Chanaan from that of Seir, on the south of Judea. C.—Balgad was situated on the north western borders of this territory, not of the Jordan. H.

Ver. 8. Asedoth, or “in the springs,” or valleys, v. 3.

Ver. 14. Herma, “a curse,” where the Israelites defeated king Arad. Num. 14:45 and 21:3.

Ver. 15. Odullam, ten miles east of Eleutheropolis, and famous for the retreat of David. C.

Ver. 16. Bethel. Josue perhaps slew the king, but did not take the city. Judg. 1:22. M.

Ver. 18. Aphec. A place of this name was in the tribe of Aser, another in that of Juda.—Saron. Heb. “Lasharon;” probably Sarona, (Acts 9:35,) or a canton near Joppe. Euseb.

Ver. 19. Madon, or Maron, Sept. C. 11:1. This place is joined with Semeron, in Heb. (v. 20,) improperly. Perhaps it may be the Meros, (Judg. 5:23,) or Maronia, a city of Phœnicia.

Ver. 21. Thenac, a city of the Levites, but seized afterwards by the Chanaanites. Judg. 1:27. It was near the town of Legion, built by the Romans.—Mageddo, where Josias was overcome, 2 Par. 35:22. C.

Ver. 22. Jachanan was near Mount Carmel. Sometimes Josue specifies both the city and the canton, where it was situated; at other times he only mentions the latter, as in the following verse.

Ver. 23. Galgol, not where the Israelites had encamped, but that part which was afterwards called the Galilee of the Gentiles, in some corner of which the king in question had fixed his residence. For we cannot suppose that he ruled over all that country, extending from Tyre to beyond the Jordan. His people might probably be a mixed multitude of various nations, as Strabo (xvi.) observes, that many parts of Palestine were peopled by men of this description.

Ver. 24. Thersa. Here the kings of Israel kept their court, till Amri built Samaria, (C.) about nine miles more to the north. Brocard.—One. The two kings slain by Moses (W.) are not included. M.

Ver. 1. Age. Josue was now 100 years old. He lived ten more, (C.) having governed the people in all 17. H.—During the first seven years, he had performed all that could be expected from an able general, and he probably designed to conquer the whole country before he divided it. But God, who chose to leave some of the ancient inhabitants in the country, to try the fidelity of his people, &c. ordered him to proceed to the distribution, that the different tribes might take care to exterminate those idolaters, who might be found in their territory.—Lot. Heb. “to be possessed.” Only the country east of the Jordan was yet divided.

Ver. 2. Galilee. As Josue had been making such conquests in that part lately, some would translate Geliloth, “the confines” of the Philistines, in which sense it seems to be taken. C. 18:18, and 22:10. C.—Bonfrere suspects that S. Jerom wrote Galila.—Gessuri, either near Mount Hermon, (M.) or bordering upon Arabia. 1 K. 15 and 27:10.

Ver. 3. Egypt. Heb. “from the Shicor, (or Sichor) which is on the face, (or over-against) Egypt.” Jeremias (2:18,) informs us that this river was in Egypt which is not true of the torrent of Rhinocorure; which the Sept. and many commentators, understand in this place to be the boundary fixed for the promised land. Strabo, &c. attribute that torrent to Phœnicia; which they extend as far as Pelusium. S. Jerom (in Amos vi.) seems dubious whether the branch of the Nile passes by that city, or the aforesaid torrent be meant. David collected all his forces from the Sichor, or the torrent of Egypt, to the entrance of Emath, 1 Par. 13:5. Epiphanes constituted Lysanias governor of all the countries between the Euphrates and the river of Egypt, (2 Mac. 3:32,) and he undoubtedly had extended his conquests as far as the Nile. Though the country beyond Gaza be now mostly barren, and therefore little inhabited or noticed, yet the Israelites were entitled to assert their right to it, as they seem to have done by taking possession of Gosen. C. 10:41. Some parts were formerly well peopled, 1 K. 27:8. It is not unusual for the Nile, and other great rivers, to be styled torrents. The Heb. nel, is often applied to rivers. Eccle. 1:7. The troubled state in which the waters of the Nile generally appear, is very remarkable, as their taste is most excellent. The natives have discovered a method of rendering them clear, by the mixture of almond powder. The names of this river bear some relation to the Heb. term which is here used. It was formerly called Sirius. The Ethiopians style it Schichri. Another name was Melas, or Egyptus, denoting “blackness.” The people of the country idolized this river, because it supplied the want of rain. Tibul. i. 8. C.—Accaron, the most northern city of the Philistian principalities, (H.) attributed to Juda or Dan, though neither held it for any length of time. Beelzebub was chiefly adored here, 4 K. 1:2.—Lords, who seem to have been independent. They are styled Sornim, as the next in dignity to the king of Persia was a Surena. Marcellin. 24. The Philistines took this country from the Chanaanites, or Eveans, (C.) who are a different people from the Hevites. Bochart.

Ver. 4. Chanaan. From the south to Sidon was yet undivided, and thence eastward, (H.) to Apheca of Syria, where was the capital of the kings of that country, and a famous temple of Venus, 3 K. 20:26. Sozom. i. 58.—Amorrhite, or perhaps Aramean, (C.) though we may understand that all the country of the Amorrhite on the south, as well as the northern parts of Chanaan, were to be divided, (H.) as far as Emesa.—Will, &c. provided the Israelites observe their part of the covenant. C.

Ver. 8. With whom. That is, with the other half of that same tribe.

Ver. 9. Aroer, and part of the town of Dibon, belonged to Gad. Num. 32:34.

Ver. 13. Day. The Israelites were satisfied with what they had already conquered. M.—But herein they deserved blame, as they were ordered to reduce them entirely, and never suffer them to continue their idolatrous practices in the country which God had chosen for his people. H.

Ver. 14. Victims. Heb. “the sacrifices of the Lord made by fire.”

Ver. 18. Mephaath, near the desert, where the Romans afterwards kept a garrison. It was given to the Levites, but was seized by the Moabites after the reign of David. C.

Ver. 21. The princes of Madian. It appears from hence that these were subjects of king Sehon: they are said to have been slain with him, that is, about the same time, but not in the same battle. Ch.—After the death of their sovereign, they looked upon themselves as independent. They had reigned before as viceroys of Sehon, being natives of the country, and not come from some other part, like the Amorrites. C.

Ver. 22. Slain. Sept. “they slew Balaam ... with the sword in the moment.” Num. 22:5 and 31:8. H.

Ver. 25. Rabba, “the great,” being a title of Ar, the capital of the Moabites. The Israelites thought themselves justified in keeping what had been taken from the children of Ammon, by Sehon, (Judg. 11:13. C.) and the Amorrites. W.

Ver. 27. Betharan, which was enlarged by Herod, and called Livias, or Julias, as the Greeks called Livia, the wife of Augustus, Julia. Joseph. —Saphon, or “the northern part of,” &c.

Ver. 30. Towns, which were conquered by Jair, of the tribe of Juda; though he belonged, in some degree, to that of Manasses, by his grandmother. Num. 32:41.

JOSUE 14

Ver. 1. Princes, whose names are given. Num. 34:17. There were 12, including Josue and Eleazar. The tribes of Ruben and Gad sent none of their princes, as they were not concerned in this distribution.

Ver. 2. Tribe. God regulated the lots, as he had authorized Jacob and Moses to foretell how the country should be divided. By this method, he precluded every pretence of discontent among the tribes. Each of them drew a ticket, on which a certain portion of land was described; or perhaps in one urn the names of the tribes, and in another the lands were specified, (C.) and the tickets were drawn by two persons of irreproachable character, probably by Eleazar and Josue. H. Num. 26:54.—Only the tribes of Juda and of Joseph received their portions at Galgal. C. 18.

Ver. 4. Suburbs. A certain quantity of ground, which the Levites were not allowed to till or plant with vines. Grot. Num. 35:4.—The tribe of Manasses, which was divided, fell heir to the portion which would have been allotted to Levi, who was also scattered among his brethren. H.—Thus Joseph obtained the birth-right of Ruben. C.—Twelve portions were made, as Jacob had adopted Ephraim and Manasses. Gen. 48. W.

Ver. 5. Land: or they were making all necessary preparations for the work, when Caleb came to remind Josue of what had been promised to him. No doubt land-measurers would be sent through the country.

Ver. 6. Jephone was the father of Caleb. Esron and Cenez probably some of his ancestors, 1 Par. 2:18. Num. 33:12. What Caleb here asserts, must have been delivered by word of mouth, in the hearing of the people. Deut. 1:36. Moses declared not that Caleb was to have the whole country but that he should enter into it, and possess the environs of Hebron. C.

Ver. 11. March. Heb. “to enter and to go out.” Sept. add, “to war.”

Ver. 12. Me. He trusts not in his own strength, but in the assistance of God, which he modestly acknowledges is not due to him. C.—God’s promises are indeed sure on his part; but being conditional, and the will of man being free, he adds perhaps. W.

Ver. 13. Blessed him, wishing him all success.—Gave him. Some think that Josue himself attacked the giants of that country with all the forces, as it is mentioned by anticipation. C. 10:28. But there seems to be no need of this, as Caleb might attack them a second time with his own family and the assistance of the tribe of Juda, after they had seized those places again, while Josue was in the north. Hebron was granted to him without drawing lots. When he was besieging Cariath Sepher, he promised his daughter to the person who should first enter; and Othoniel, his brother, or nephew, obtained her in marriage. C. 15:17. Judg. 1:10. It seems, therefore, that this family carried on this war, as the Fabii did at Rome, without the interference of the commonwealth, though Grotius asserts the contrary. C.

Ver. 14. Hebron belonged, &c. All the country thereabouts, depending on Hebron, was given to Caleb; but the city itself, with the suburbs, was one of those that were given to the priests to dwell in. Ch.—Caleb might also dwell, (C.) and be lord of the city, (Salien) though the profits (H.) or the town belonged to the priests. C. 21:11. W.

Ver. 15. Cariath Arbe, “the city of Arbe,” and ancient giant; or “of four,” which the Jews explain of four great patriarchs, who were buried there.—Adam, &c. S. Jerom seems to favour the opinion that Adam was one of these, whose tomb ennobled Hebron, though many of the Fathers think he was buried on Mount Calvary. Others think that his body, or skull at least, was translated thither. But we cannot depend on any of these traditions. Most commentators explain the Heb. “The ancient name of Hebron with Cariath Arbe; (C.) he was a man great among the Enacim.” H.—Adam is often put for a man in general, 2 K. 7:19. Ose. 11:4. C. Amama.—Sept. “the city of Arbo. This was the metropolis of the Enacim.” H.—Wars, for a time, particularly from such wars as engaged the attention of all Israel. The different tribes had to encounter and drive out the Chanaanites who might be left in their respective districts. C.

Ver. 1. Sin, or Sina, (v. 3,) bordering upon Idumea, where the city of Cades-barne was situated. Num. 13:22. It is now impossible to ascertain the precise situation of all the place mentioned in Scripture, as the land of Chanaan has been subject to so many changes. But this inconvenience attends all ancient geography. If those who attempt to unravel such labyrinths in profane authors, deserve praise, much more do those who do their utmost to explain the difficulties of sacred history. It was once very necessary to have the limits of the tribes marked out with precision, that, at the return from captivity, they might occupy their own. Now we may be satisfied if we can point out some of the places of the greatest importance. The limits of the tribe of Juda are specified with particular care, on account of the dignity and power of that tribe, which was to give kings to all the land, and a Messias to the world, as well as to preserve the true religion. The greatest part of the southern regions of Chanaan fell to their share, from the Dead Sea, by Idumea, to the Nile, and as far north as Jerusalem and the torrent of Cedron. C.

Ver. 2. Bay, (lingua,) tongue. Chal. “a promontory,” or rather a gulph. C.

Ver. 3. Scorpion. A mountain infested with those creatures, by which people travelled from Idumea into Chanaan, leaving Sina on the left.

Ver. 4. Asemona, which lies nearest to the river of Egypt of all the cities of Juda. Num. 34:4. C. 13:3.

Ver. 5. Jordan, where it discharges itself into the Dead Sea, or mixes its waters with the latter; which, as we observe, (C. 5:16,) does not take place for three miles. H.—the north-western part of this sea belonged to Benjamin.

Ver. 6. Stone. It is not certain that this was a city.

Ver. 7. Galgol. Heb. Gilgal, may designate “the limits.” The valley of Achor lay south of Galgal.—Sun. Heb. “Hen-Shemesh.” It was not “a city.”—Rogel, “of the fuller.” This fountain was in the king’s gardens, running eastward from Sion into the torrent of Cedron. Joseph. vii. 11. It was used to wash linen. Rogel, signifies “to trample on,” as they formerly washed their linen with their feet. Nausicrae is represented in Homer doing so, in holes or basins, prepared for the purpose. Odys. Σ.

Ver. 8. Ennom. Hebrew, Ge-ben-Hinnom, or simply Ge-enom, whence Gehanan has probably been formed. In this vale, children were immolated to Moloc: the beating of drums, to hinder their lamentations from being heard, caused it perhaps to be called Tophet. It was to the east of Jerusalem, (C.) inclining to the south. H.—Northward. The valley extends south to Bethlehem. Joseph. vii. 10. Her David gained a great victory, 2 K. 5:23. C.—Woods. This explanation is added by S. Jerom. H.—The ark remained at this city for some time, 1 K. 15:6. It was 10 miles north of Jerusalem.

Ver. 10. Bethsames, “the house of the sun,” was at the same distance, westward. Here the sight of the ark proved so fatal to 50,070 of the inhabitants, 1 K. 6:19. C.

Ver. 13. Arbe, who was the father, and the greatest man of the race of Enac. C. 14:15. H.

Ver. 14. Enac. These three giants were at Hebron when the spies came thither. Num. 13.

Ver. 15. Letters, as the Sept. render it. S. Jerom adds this interpretation. H.—It means literally “the city of the book.” Senna, may also mean “instruction,” v. 49. Here probably a famous school was kept, before the arrival of the Israelites; or the archive of the nation might be deposited among these giants, as the Chal. Kiriat-arche, “the city of the library, or archives,” insinuates. Bochart.

Ver. 16. Wife. Parents had full authority to do this. Saul promised his daughter to the person who should overcome Goliah. Something was required by way of dowry for the lady. Grot. 1 K. 17:25.

Ver. 17. Brother. It is not clear in the original whether this relates to Cenez or to Othoniel, (H.) as younger is not found in Heb. but it is in the Syr. Sept. and Judg. 1:13. Many think that Cenez was the brother of Caleb. If Othoniel had been brother of the latter, they say he could not have legally married his niece. C.—But though Moses forbids a nephew to marry his aunt, it does not follow that uncles could not take their nieces to wife, as they would be still the head; (W.) whereas there would be a sort of indecency for a nephew to command his aunt. The Jews allow these marriages, while the Samaritans condemn them. Lev. 18:14. In confirmation of the Vulg. we may remark, that Cenez is never (C.) clearly (H.) represented as the brother of Caleb; and there is no inconvenience in asserting that Othoniel was the brother of the latter, whether we take this word to denote a near relation, or strictly. In the former supposition, Othoniel might marry his cousin, Axa, the daughter of Caleb, while he himself was descended from Cenez, the brother of Jephone. C.—But if we take the word strictly, as the remark of his being younger brother, both here and Judg. 1:13 may seem to imply, we must then allow that Othoniel followed the custom of his nation, (H.) in marrying his niece. M.—Sept. here make him “the younger son of Cenez, who was brother of Caleb;” and in the Book of Judges, they say, “Gothoniell, the son of Cenez, (and) the younger brother of Caleb, first made himself master of it, under him;” as if Othoniel and Caleb had been born of the same mother, but of a different father, unless we suppose that they were only nearly related, and the former much less advanced in years; so that he might will marry the daughter of Caleb and afterwards become a judge and deliverer of Israel. Judg. 3:9. See Masius. Bonfrere. H.

Ver. 18. Was moved; as the Syr. Arab. Junius, &c. represent the matter. Others render the Heb. in a different sense: “she moved him to ask of her father a field, and she lighted off her ass, and Caleb said unto her,” &c. which seems very abrupt, as she herself is represented as soliciting for the favour in the next verse, instead of her husband. The Chaldee supposes that she was restrained by natural modesty, from preferring the petition; but when Othoniel refused to do it, or was denied what he requested, she took courage and asked herself. The sense of the Vulgate seems more natural, (C.) as the husband might easily suppose that she would have greater influence with her father. H.—Sighed. The original term is found only in this history, and in that of the death of Sisara. Judg. 4:21. Sept. "she cried out." Others translate, "she remained fixed," (M.) or "she waited sitting on the ass," till she had obtained her request.

Ver. 19. Blessing, or "favour, present," &c. 1 K. 25:27. C.—And dry. This is a farther explanation of southern; as the lands in that situation being exposed to the sun-beams, in Palestine, are often destitute of sufficient moisture, which is the cause of the sterility of Mount Hebal, &c.—Watery ground. Heb. "springs of water, and he gave her the upper springs and the lower springs." Aquila leaves springs untranslated. H.—Golgot. Sept. "Golathmaim, and the upper Golath," &c. Sym. translates "possession on the high places." Judg. 1. C.—Caleb had probably given his daughter a part of the mountain. He now grants her also some field that lay lower down, and was better supplied with water on all sides (H.) by springs above, and cisterns below.

Ver. 25. New Asor, to distinguish it from the capital of Jabin, in the north. This was dependent on Ascalon. Euseb.—Heb. "and Hazor, Hadatta, and (or) Kerioth ("the towns") of Hezron, which is Hazor." The Sept. only specify the same town of Asor by different names. There was one towards Arabia. Num. 11:34.

Ver. 28. Bersabee, noted for the residence of Abraham, &c. It is attributed to Simeon, (C. 19:2,) with some other of these towns, as the two tribes lived intermixed, and some changes might be made in the first regulation, to bring things to a greater equality, and as circumstances might require.

Ver. 31. Siceleg. The Philistines kept possession of it till king Achis gave it to David; and it continued afterwards the property of the kings of Juda.

Ver. 32. Villages. Twenty-nine of the former cities were of greater note; the six, or taking in the three belonging to Caleb, the nine others which are mentioned, (C.) were only villages. M.—Others think that these nine towns are not numbered here, because they were allotted to the tribe of Simeon. C. 19:2, &c.

Ver. 33. Plains. Heb. Schephela, near Eleutheropolis. Chap. 10:40.—Estaol was afterwards given to Dan. Samson was buried near it and Sarea. Judg. 16.

Ver. 36. Fourteen. One of those mentioned above, may have been a village. M.—Others think that Enaim may be the name of a fountain, near which perhaps Juda met Thamar. Gen. 38:14.

Ver. 44. Ceila, which David took from the Philistines, and were he was nearly betrayed into the hands of Saul, 1 K. 28. Habacuc was buried here, on the road between Eleutheropolis and Hebron.

Ver. 55. Carmel. Not where Elias dwelt, but a city and mountain 10 miles east of Eleutheropolis. Nabal rendered it famous by his imprudence, (1 K. 25) and Saul by a triumphal arch, 1 K. 15:12.

Ver. 58. Bessur. About 20 miles from Jerusalem, fortified by Simon, 1 Mac. 14:33. It is there said to be only five stadia distant from that city. But the Alexandrian copy reads five schoenus, or cords, each of which consisted of at least 30 stadia. Cellarius.

Ver. 59. Eltecon: given afterwards to the tribe of Dan, (C. 19:44,) and then to the Levites. C. 21:13. The Alex. Sept. here add many cities, which are omitted in Heb. C.—“Theco and Ephrata, (this is Bethlehem) and Phagor, and Artam, and Koulon, and Tatami, and Sores, and Karem, and Gallim, and Baither, and Mancho, eleven cities and their villages.” H. See S. Jer. in Mic. v. 1. C. Deut. 27:4.—Dr. Wall says, “these cities were doubtless in the Heb. copy of the Sept.” and “they are of such a nature, that it is scarcely possible to think them an interpolation.” The former critic thinks “the omission in the Heb. was occasioned by the word villages occurring immediately before, and at the end of the words thus omitted; and indeed the same word occurring in different places, has been the cause of many and great omission in the Heb. MSS. He thinks it less likely that the Jews should have designedly omitted Bethlehem here, because that place is mentioned as belonging to Juda, in several other parts of Scripture.” But is Ephrata ever joined with it, except in this passage, and in the text of Micheas? “And, therefore, though this remarkable omission was probably owing, at first, to some transcriber’s mistake, its not being reinserted might be owing to the reason specified by S. Jerom, out of malice to Christianity.” Kennicott, 2 Diss. 56.—Reland is astonished to find a place which was to be rendered so famous by the birth of the Messias, not enumerated in this place among the cities of Juda. But he observes that it is found in the Alexandrian version, p. 643. Palest.—S. Jerom will not decide absolutely whether the Jews have erased these cities, or the Sept. have inserted them. As he undertook to translate the Hebrew as he found it, he has not admitted these cities into his translation, though there seems to be abundant reason for supposing that they are genuine. H.

Ver. 62. Salt. Bonfrere supposes it is Segor, which was preserved for Lot’s sake.—Engaddi, which was famous for its balm and palm-trees, in the desert of Jericho. Solin. xxxv.—We may here remark that in the preceding catalogues, many towns are repeated like Zanoe, (v. 34 and 56,) and others are left out. Some are also afterwards attributed to other tribes. Hence some have inferred that alterations have been made in the original copies. But we may rather believe that the reason of these variations is, because the cities were parceled out among the 10 families of Juda, (1 Par. 2:3,) as was the case in the distribution of land to Manasses; (C. 17:2,) and hence the same cities were sometimes given to two different families. They are also attributed to different tribes, because many families of the respective tribes dwelt in them. The priests, for example, lived along with their brethren of other tribes. C.

Ver. 63. Jerusalem. The Benjamites claimed the northern part of this city; (H.) and they did not drive out the Jebusites, but lived with them, Judges 1:21. The tribe of Juda had burnt a part of the city. Judg. 1:8. But it seems the Jebusites kept their hold, (C.) at least in the citadel, (H.) and frequently in the lower town, till they were entirely banished by David, 2 K. 5:7. See Judg. 19:11. In latter times, the Jews considered this place as the common city of all the nation, to which none of the tribes had an exclusive right; and hence, in the last siege, there was no head, and all the Jews were admitted without examination. Josephus. Bel. iv. 5, &c. C.—Day, and even till the reign of David. The author of this observation must have lived before that period. Josue might have made this and may other similar remarks, when he finished this work, towards the end of his life. H.

Ver. 1. Joseph. The double portion is given to him, as Ruben forfeited his birth-right. Chal. W.—Waters; or the celebrated fountain, which renders the territory so fruitful, and which was made sweet, by Eliseus casting salt into it, 4 K. 2:19.—Wilderness of Bethaven. C. 18:12 and 8:14. C.—Which, is not to be referred to wilderness, but to the word Lot. Masius. M.

Ver. 2. To Luza. The Vulg. reads Bethel Luza, which may be supposed to be two names, (C. 18:13. H.) for the same city. M. Gen. 28:19.—Bethel was probably the country, (C.) or mountain, (H.) to the east of Luza, on the frontiers of Benjamin and of Ephraim; for which reason it is sometimes attributed to both.—To Atharoth. This city, and Archi, are supposed by some to be the same city. Archi seems, however, to have been a distinct place, where Chusai ws born, 2 K. 15:32. Atharoth is styled Addar, “the illustrious,” v. 5. It was 15 miles from Jericho.

Ver. 3. Nether. See C. 10:11. The upper Bethoron was of much less note, near the Jordan.—Gazer was in the vicinity of Azotus, 1 Mac. 14:34. C. 10:33. C.

Ver. 4. Possessed it, or divided the country between them. The territories of Ephraim are henceforward described, to the end of the chapter. M.

Ver. 6. Looketh to the north, &c. The meaning is, that the border went towards the north, by Machmethath; and then turned eastward to Thanathselo. Ch.—Borders. It should be terminus. “The border turneth eastward.” Sept. Bonfrere.—Janoe, twelve miles east of Sichem. Euseb. 4 K. 15:29.

Ver. 8. Reeds. Sept. “of Cana.” The vale belonged to Manasses, but the cities were ceded to Ephraim, v. 9. C. 17:16. The limits of these two tribes are very confused. C.—Most salt. This is the title generally applied to the lake of Sodom. But here the Mediterranean is meant, which, compared with many of the seas of Palestine, is certainly most salt. M.—The epithet is not, however, found in Heb. or Sept. (C.) and Serarius thinks it has crept in here by mistake. M.

Ver. 10. Gazer. It is not certain when the Ephraimites rendered this city tributary, or when it threw off the yoke. The king of Egypt afterwards conquered it, and gave it with his daughter to Solomon. C. 10:33. C. See Judg. 1:29.—The negligence of Ephraim was contrary to God’s order. Ex. 20. M.—The Alex. Sept. here inserts after day, “till Pharaο, king of Egypt, went up and took the city, and burnt it with fire, and the Chanaanites and Pherezites, and the inhabitants of Gazer, he slew; and Pharaο gave it as a dowry to his daughter.” Grabe adds what seems deficient, “and they became tributary slaves.” H.

Ver. 1. Born. Machir was the only son of Manasses. But the Scripture uses the word first-born for such, as it does for our Saviour. Mat. 1. M.—If Machir was living when Moses assigned the territory to the half tribe of Manasses, he must have been 180 years old. C.—But he probably received the inheritance only in his posterity. H.—Galaad did not give his name to the country, as it was called so in the days of Jacob. Perhaps he took his name from the land, as many noblemen do, though he is styled Galaad before the war against Sehon commenced. Num. 26:29. By giving Ephraim the preference before his elder brother, Jacob did not deprive the latter of his birth-right. C.—In effect, Manasses was partly (H.) provided for before Ephraim received any portion. C.—This, however, was a privilege, and not a right. He had also two allotments, because his numbers required so much land. H.

Ver. 2. Children here comprises grandchildren, &c. These who are specified sprang from Galaad or from Jair, as they all dwelt on the east side of the Jordan, 1 Par. 5:23 and 7:14. C.

Ver. 4. Father, adjoining to Ephraim. See Num. 27 and 36.

Ver. 5. Jordan. Some of the families, which had possessions there already, were permitted to have a share on the west side also. Here Manasses had ten portions, schænus, or cords, which Herodotus (2:6,) reckons to contain each 60 stadia; so that he would have 600 stadia, (C.) or at least half of that quantity. C. 15:58. (Herodotus ii.) H.—There were six sons and five daughters to be provided for. But the portion of Hephher, the father of Salphaad, being given to his granddaughters, his is not counted. Masius.—The Jews say the five daughters had only four portions, two for their grandfather, who, they say, was the eldest of the family; one for their father, and another for their uncle, who died without children. Selden.—But of this no proof is adduced. C.—The five daughters would only have the one portion, which would have been enjoyed by the father. M. See 1 Par. 5:23.

Ver. 7. Aser was contiguous to Machmethath, 15 miles from Sichem, towards Scythopolis. S. Jerom. C.—The limits of Manasses are described from the south, where he joins Ephraim. C. 16:6. C.

Ver. 8. Taphua; which city, though situated in the territory of Manasses, belonged to Ephraim, (W.) as the Heb. intimates.

Ver. 10. East. These two tribes are contiguous to the tribe of Joseph, taken all together, v. 14. M.—Aser extended as far as Mount Carmel, which was not far from Dor, a city of Manasses, v. 11. C. 19:26. The tribes of Issachar and of Zabulon seem, indeed, to come between Manasses and Aser; so that we might say, that the tribe of Joseph finding itself too much straitened, was forced to seek for more room in the cities of the other tribes, which we find it really inhabited, v. 11. We might avoid all difficulties, by translating “they invaded (or made an irruption into) the tribe of Aser,” &c. as the Heb. will allow. Thus Dan conquered Lais, which lies at so great a distance from his own portion, and the tribes of Juda and Simeon were frequently intermixed. C.—Aser and Manasses may, however, have been really united on the north-west, or Mediterranean point. M.

Ver. 11. In Aser. The following towns were upon the frontiers of these two tribes, (M.) or they properly belonged to them respectively. But the children of Manasses took possession of them, after conquering by degrees, the former inhabitants, who were suffered to live among them, as the Jebusites were for some time, at Jerusalem. C. 15:63. H.—Bethsan, or Scythopolis, as it was called by the Greeks, after the Scythians had invaded those countries, (Herod. l. 105,) A.M. 3391, almost 100 years from the destruction of the kingdom of Israel. Unless these Scythians may rather be the Cutheans, who were sent to people the kingdom of Samaria, most of whom embraced the Jewish religion, while those of Bethsan adhered to their ancient idolatry, and therefore retained their name. Even in the days of Josephus, most of the inhabitants were heathens: the kings of Juda were not able to subdue them entirely. Bethsan was situated to the south of the sea of Tiberias, 600 stadia from Jerusalem; (2 Mac. 12:29,) that is, about 37 leagues, (C.) or 111 miles. H.—Dor, nine miles north of Cæsarea.—Endor, “the fountain of Dor,” four miles south of Mount Tabor. Euseb.—Here Saul consulted the witch, 1 K. 28:7.—Thenac, near Legion, and the torrent of Cisson, where Barac gained a victory. Judg. 5.—Nopheth, means “a canton,” and thus Manasses may have had three portions of land round the three aforesaid cities, in which sense it is translated. C. 11:2. C. Masius.—But Serarius takes Nopheth to mean a city, (M.) agreeably to the Sept. “the third part of Naphetha, and its villages.” H.—The other two parts of the city might be occupied by Zabulon. Bonfrere.—No mention is made of Nopheth. Judg. 1:27. H.

Ver. 12. Could, because they would not. Judg. 1:27. The children of Manasses took these cities; but not putting the inhabitants to death, the latter got possession again, as was the case with respect to many other cities taken (C.) and destroyed (H.) by Josue. Heb. “the Chanaanites consented to dwell,” &c. The Israelites spared their lives on their paying tribute; and this prevarication was the cause of their being afterwards reduced to submit to the yoke of these nations. C. Judg. 2:20. Deut. 20:16. M.—The Chanaaites dwelt with Manasses for a time; (W.) perhaps they were never wholly expelled. H.

Ver. 14. Spoke. Sept. “contradicted Josue.” In effect, they spoke with a good deal of emotion.—Portion. Heb. “cord.” C.—They addressed themselves to the general, before their territory was divided. Masius.—Or they insinuate that the portion allotted to them both, would scarcely suffice for one tribe, and there was but little room for them to enlarge their dominion by subduing the Chanaanites, as the rest might do. Manasses was most concerned, as his numbers had increased 20,500 since he left Egypt, while his brother had diminished. Num. 26:34. C.—But then he had an extensive country on the other side of the Jordan. H.

Ver. 16. Thee. Destroy the Pherezite, &c. (M.) take their cities, and destroy the inhabitants, like so many trees, or cut down the wood to build houses, and in order to cultivate the land for the production of corn and grass.

Ver. 17. Iron, armed with scythes, who will obstruct our passage to the mountains, as we dare not encounter them in the open field. H. 4 K. 19:23.—Heb. “the hill is not enough for us, (or it will not be found, or be attacked by us) and all the Chanaanites,” &c. C.—Sept. “the mountain of Ephraim will not contain us; all the Chanaanites who dwell in the land of Emek, (of of the valley) in Bethsan, and its villages, and in the vale of Jezrael, have chosen cavalry and iron.” H.—They are invincible. C.—The slothful man saith there is a lion without. Prov. 22:13. Josue over-rules the cowardly objection, and argues, from their own boasting, that they were numerous enough to overcome all their opponents. He was himself of the tribe of Ephraim. H.—Valley, extending about 10,000 paces from Bethsan to Legion. Jezrael ws in the middle of it, and is attributed to Issachar. C. 19:18. But it was probably on the frontiers of Manasses, who seems to have spoken as if it would belong to the first who had driven out the Chanaanites. The kings of Israel had a palace at Jezrael, and the vineyard of Naboth being contiguous to it, gave occasion to the sin of Jazabel, and to the destruction of Achab’s family, 3 K. 21:1. In this vale, Gedeon routed the Madianites. Judg. 6:33.

Ver. 18. Mountain, probably of Gelboe, as that of Ephraim was not sufficient, v. 15. Gelboe extended almost as far as Bethsan, and it would afford a fine opportunity of attacking the nations below. Josue persists in his first resolution; and though of the same tribe, he is so little actuated by partiality towards his brethren, that they alone seem to have been dissatisfied with their portion. C.

Ver. 1. Silo was delightfully situated, about the midst of the country, 12 miles south of Sichem. Hither the Israelites removed the ark from Galgal after having had their camp in the latter place seven years at least; the Jews say 14. But Josue might reproach the Israelites for their indolence, (v. 3,) without waiting seven years after the country was divided.—Tabernacle. The Jews pretend that this was not the same as that set up by Moses; and others say that a house was built for the Lord at Silo, 1 K. 1:23. But there seems to be no reason for these assertions. David informs us that the ark of the Lord was covered with skins, 2 K. 7:2. If any repairs were found necessary for the tabernacle erected by Moses, they might be made. The ark was certainly in it till the Israelites unfortunately sent it into the camp, where it was taken by the Philistines. When they sent back the ark, it was deposited at Gabaa, and not in the tabernacle, which was at Silo. Then it was sent to Nobe. We find the tabernacle was at Gabaon some time after the ark was translated to Jerusalem. C.—Them. They might, therefore, removed the ark into the interior, and measure the country without danger. M.—The greatest part of the country had submitted to Josue. C.

Ver. 3. Slack. These seven tribes had been accustomed to live in indolence, having their food provided for them in a miraculous manner. They were perhaps afraid lest, if the army of Israel should be divided, the different tribes would be too weak to make head against the enemy. C.—Josue had, however, made all things easy, and they might at their leisure conquer the few towns which yet remained in the hands of the Chanaanites, if they had not cherished this indolent disposition, which was so displeasing to God, and brought upon them so many evils. H.

Ver. 4. Tribe: it is not clear whether any but these seven were concerned.—Out. Josephus says, that people well skilled in geometry accompanied them. C.—They had to mark out seven portions of land, which might suffice for these remaining tribes, (H.) who would receive them by lot, to take away all cause of discontent. They still received according to their numbers. Num. 26:54. W.

Ver. 5. North, with respect to Silo. Juda had taken possession of his territory, as well as the tribes of Joseph.

Ver. 6. The land in the midst, between these mark ye out into seven parts: that is to say the rest of the land, which is not already assigned to Juda or Joseph. Ch.—For we must not suppose that Joseph occupied the most northern parts of the country, so as, with Juda on the south, to enclose all the other tribes. H.—Heb. “As for you, you shall describe the land into seven parts.” C.—Only the tribe of Benjamin was between these two tribes, (v. 11,) so that Serarius thinks that mediam had been substituted for aliam, “the other.” M.—Lots. The deputies divided the country into seven portions, equal in goodness, though not in extent. After the lots were drawn, some alterations might be made by common consent, and those tribes which were too much straitened for room, received what was requisite among those who had too large a territory. Hence we find Joseph occupying the cities of Issachar, &c. C. 17:10. It was equally inconvenient to have too much or too little.

Ver. 7. Priesthood, and the rights attached to it, tithes, &c. C.—It was therefore necessary to make eight portions. M.

Ver. 9. Book. Heb. “described it, according to the cities, into seven parts, in a volume,” (H.) or table, resembling a map. The ancients commonly wrote on boards covered with wax, and engraved on stone, lead, &c.

Ver. 11. First. A person might proclaim that the tribe, whose name was drawn first out of the urn, should have the territory which was described in the book by the land surveyors; or the names of the seven tribes might be in one urn, and seven parcels of land in another. C.

Ver. 12. Bethaven, or Bethel. Josephus says, (Ant. v. 3,) that the territory of Benjamin extended as far as the Mediterranean: but it only went to Ataroth, v. 13. M.

Ver. 15. Sea, on the west. H.—The northern limits of Juda form the southern ones of Benjamin, only here Josue proceeds in a contrary direction, from west to east. M. See C. 15:5, 8.

Ver. 16. Part. Heb. “end, or summit.” C.—That is, &c. and explication added by S. Jerom. Some say this dreadful vale (H.) was on the south of Jerusalem. Button.

Ver. 18. Hills. Heb. Geliloth, “the limits,” (C.) or Galgal, on the road to Jerusalem from Jericho, and different from that where the Israelites encamped, C. 15:7.—Adommim is a narrow pass in the vicinity, much infested with robbers.—Abenboen. The explication is alone given. C. 15:6.—Plain. Sept. “and it shall pass by Betharaba, on the south from the north, and it shall descend.” Grabe supplies “to Araba;” or the plain desert country. H.—Betharaba is, in effect, mentioned as one of the cities of Benjamin, (v. 22,) as it had before been assigned to Juda, (C.) being inhabited by both tribes. H.

Ver. 19. Towards, (contra linguam) “the bay on the north,” &c. H.—There is another on the south. C. 15:2.

Ver. 21. Vale of Casis, “incision,” so called, as some pretend, on account of the balm, which was extracted by cutting the bark with a stone, or with glass. But this etymology seems too far fetched, and there is no proof that balm was cultivated there in the days of Josue. C.—Some of the cities of Benjamin have been here omitted, as two others are mentioned, C. 21:18. M.

Ver. 24. Ophni, the Gophna so celebrated in latter times, fifteen miles from Gabaa. S. Jerom attributes it to Ephraim, as perhaps it was chiefly inhabited by people of that tribe.—Gabee. The wickedness of its citizens almost involved the whole tribe in destruction. Judg. 19. It was twenty mile north of Jerusalem. Joseph. v. 2.

Ver. 26. Mesphe, where Samuel assembled the people, 1 K. 7:5. It was regarded as a place of devotion, while the temple was in the hands of the profane, 1 Mac. 3:46.

Ver. 28. Jebus. The city was called Salem in the days of Abraham. Gen. 14:18. Ps. 75:3. S. Jerom supposes that Melchisedec resided near Scythopolis, at Salem. Gen. 33:17 ep. ad Evag. Usher thinks he lived at Salim. Jo. 3:23.—Gabaath. There seems to have been two cities of this name; one famous for the tomb of Habacuc, (S. Jer.) and the other in the tribe of Ephraim. C. 24:33. C.

JOSUE 19

Ver. 2. Juda. Thus was verified the prediction of Jacob, that Simeon and Levi, who had been too much united for the destruction of Sichem, should be scattered among their brethren. Gen. 34 and 49:6. The tribe of Simeon was not very numerous. Num. 26:14. Yet all his cities are not here enumerated, but only such as served to point out the limits. The Jews suppose that this tribe occupied the cities of Juda only as long as the latter pleased, and that it was driven out of them in the days of David, (1 Par. 4:31. Rabbins ap. Mas.) or at least under the reign of Ezechias, when it was forced to seek fresh settlements in Gador and Seir, ib. v. 39. It was, however, led into captivity by Salmanasar along with the other nine tribes, in the sixth year of Ezechias, 4 K. 17:6. The lot of Simeon was not in the centre of Juda, but only within his limits, (C.) either on the south, (Cellarius) or on the west side, (C.) or on both. H.—And Sabee. This is the same town with the preceding, otherwise there would be 14 instead of 13, v. 6. M.—If this be not the case, we may give the same solution as C. 15:62.

Ver. 4. Bethul. We shall see elsewhere whether this be the Bethulia of Judith. Some place a town of this name in Galilee, near Tiberias, (Brocard) of which, however, there is no proof. Cellar. iii. 31.

Ver. 9. Great. The land measurers, it seems, had been under a mistake, (M.) which was corrected by the ancients. Distributive justice was to be observed.

Ver. 11. From the sea. Heb. “towards the sea.” Bonfrere asserts that Zabulon did not extend quite to the shore of the Mediterranean. C. 17:10. C.—Torrent, near Sidon, which some call the river Belus or Papis. Plin. v. 19.

Ver. 13. Geth-hepher, the birth-place of Jonas, 4 K. 14:25. See C. 12:17.

Ver. 15. Bethlehem, very different from that of Juda.—Twelve. Nineteen are mentioned, but some of them belong to other tribes, (C.) or were not properly cities. M.—All the towns of Zabulon are not specified. C.

Ver. 17. Issachar. The reason why he has been placed after his younger brother, Zabulon, both here and in the blessing of Jacob, is not known.

Ver. 18. Jezrael. This was a city of the first note, (M.) situated in the vale between Mount Hermon and Gelboe, having Bethsan on the east.—Sunem, where Eliseus raised the child to life, five miles south of Thabor. S. Jerom.—Here the Philistines were encamped the day before the battle, in which Saul was slain and Israel dispersed, 1 K. 28:4. C.

Ver. 20. Rabbath. These four cities formed the western boundary, though Serarius observes, this tribe extended as far as the Mediterranean, being in possession of Carmel, which lay close to the shore. M.

Ver. 21. Engannim, called Enam, 1 Par. 6:73.—Enhadda. There was another town of this name, 10 miles from Eleutheropolis. C.—This and the four following towns lay on the north of Issachar. M.—Bethsames, “the house of the sun.” Juda and Nephthali had also a Bethsames.

Ver. 26. Carmel, so famous for the miracles of Elias, 3 K. 18:20. Josephus (Bel. ii. 17,) places it 120 stadia south of Ptolemais. This range of mountains extended northward through the tribes of Issachar and of Zabulon. Pliny (v. 17,) speaks of a promontory and of a town of this name. Here also the god Carmel was adored, having an altar, but no temple or image, as the ancients had decreed. Nec simulacrum Deo aut templum, (sic tradidere majores) ara tantum et reverentia. Tacit. Hist. ii. 78.—Vespasian consulted the priest Basilides. Carmel means “the vineyard of the Lord,” or the excellent vineyard, &c. It was so rich and beautiful as to become proverbial. The spouse compares the head of his beloved to Carmel. C. 7:5. Isaias (32:15,) foretels that the deserts shall be equal to Carmel. It was covered with wood and fruit. S. Jerom in Isai. x. 18. Jer. iv. 26. The city, which was built upon this mountain, and which Pliny calls by the same name, was formerly styled Ecbatana. The oracle had denounced to Cambyses that he should die at Ecbatana, and he concluded that the city of Media was meant; but it was “that of Syria,” says Herodotus, (iii. 64,) where he died.—Labanath. Heb. leaves out the conjunction.—Sihor means a “troubled” river, (C. 13:3,) or brook, which probably ran near the white promontory mentioned by Pliny, (v. 19,) near Tyre. Labanath signifies “white.”

Ver. 27. Bethdagon. “The temple of Dagon, or of the fish,” different from the town of Juda. C. 15:41.—Zabulon, a city which took its name from the tribe, and separated Ptolemais from Judea. Joseph. Bel. ii. 37.—Left; that is, the north side of Cabul, which means either the canton where the 20 cities of Hiram were situated, or a village which Josephus (Vita) calls Chabolo, which lies near the sea, and Ptolemais.

Ver. 28. Rohob, on the northern extremity of the land. Num. 13:22. It was assigned to the Levites. But the tribe of Aser never drove out the Chanaanites. Judg. 1:31.—Cana, where Christ wrought his first miracle, about 23 miles west of Tiberias, as we may gather from Josephus. (Vita) Cellarius.—Some would admit another Cana nearer Sidon.

Ver. 29. Horma. Heb. Sept. &c. Rama, “a height.”—Of Tyre. When this city was founded, is wrapped up in obscurity. The Tyrian priests claim a very high antiquity; whereas Josephus (Ant. viii. 2,) allows that the city was founded only 200 years after Josue, on which supposition this name must have been added by a subsequent writer. The matter, however, is so uncertain, that nothing can be concluded. It was a colony of Sidon. Isai. 23:12. Old Tyre was on the continent; the new city was built in an island, where the temple of Jupiter Olympius formerly stood. Alexander made a road between the two cities, when he besieged New Tyre: which, on that account, may be considered either as an island, or as part of the continent. He used for this purpose the ruins of the old city, which he threw into the sea. Hiram had formed a similar road to the temple of Jupiter. Dios. ap. Joseph. c. p. 1. Whether Nebuchodonosor besieged the Old or the New Tyre, soon after he had taken Jerusalem, authors are not agreed. S. Jerom (in Ezech. xxviii. Amos i. &c.) seems to think that he attacked the new city; whereas Marsham believes that it was built only after the other had fallen a prey to the arms of the Chaldees. It was only five or 700 paces from the continent. Tyrus quondam insula præalto mari septingentis passibus divisa, nunc vero Alexandri oppugnantis operibus continens. Plin. v. 19.—Portion. Heb. “from the coast of Achzib,” which is the same town as Ecdippe, south of Tyre, and nine miles from Ptolemais. C.

Ver. 30. Amma; perhaps on mount Amana, a part of Libanus. Cant. 4:8. For though the Israelites had possession of these parts only a short time, they had a right to them, and to the countries as far as the Euphrates and Pelusium. Sept. read, "Akom or Archob," (C.) in some copies, though the Alexandrian agrees with the Vul. H.—Perhaps Acco, the ancient name of Ptolemais, may be meant, as it is hardly probable that so famous a city should be omitted.—Aphec, beyond Antilibanus, from which city the Israelites could not drive the Chanaanites. Judg. 1:31. Here the kings of Syria assembled their forces to attack the people of God, 1 K. 20:26. Profane authors speak of the temple of Venus Aphachitis, who appeared in the eyes of the superstitious to shed tears. The city lay between Biblus and Heliopolis. Zozimus, i. 58. Euseb. (laud. Const.) Macrobius i. 21.—Twenty-two. More are mentioned above, but some might belong to other tribes.

Ver. 33. Heleph seems to have been on the north-eastern limits of Nephthali. The cities on the Jordan southwards, as far as Genesareth, are specified. H.

Ver. 34. Juda was in possession of the southern parts of the Jordan, as Nephthali had the northern, so that by means of navigation they might enjoy the riches (C.) of each other, and of the other tribes. H. Deut. 33:23.—Sept. do not read Juda, which forms all the difficulty, as five tribes lay between these two. They have "and the Jordan is towards the rising sun." C.—Grabe inserts, with a star, "to Juda, the Jordan," &c. intimating that to Juda, was not a part of the Sept. version.

Ver. 35. Ser. The Sept. seem to have read rather differently. "And the fortified, or walled cities of the Tyrians, Tyre and Emath, (and) Bekkath," &c. H.—Assedim may be the name of a people. The situation of Ser is also unknown.—Emath is the famous Emesa. Num. 13:22. C.—Tyre, &c. belong to Aser, and not to Nephthali, as the Sept. might insinuate. But Emesa would be within the borders of the latter. H.—Cenereth, the lake of that name, as S. Jerom says that the city of Cenereth was Tiberias, on the southern extremity of the lake whereas Nephthali possessed only the northern part. C.—Bonfrere supposes that Caphernaum, or some adjacent city, is meant; and indeed the first words of the verse indicate that a list is given of the strong cities, unless that should be restricted to those of the Assedim, which are not specified. H.

Ver. 36. Arama. Heb. "Rama."—Asor, the capital of Jabin. C. 11:1.

Ver. 37. Enhasor, “the fountain of Asor,” or Daphne, a delightful spot resembling the famous suburbs of Antioch. Josep. Bel. iv. init.

Ver. 38. Bethanath, “the house of poverty,” is Betanea, 15 miles from Cæsarea. Eus.—Nineteen. Twenty-three places are mentioned. But some might only be villages, &c. C. 15:62.

Ver. 41. Sun. Some suppose that it is the same with Bethsames of Juda, which was ceded to the Levites. C.—Dan lay on the west of Juda. H.—Selebin, where the Amorrhites maintained themselves. Judg. 1:35.

Ver. 43. Themna; the Thamna of the tribe of Juda. C. 15:10.—Acron, or Accaron.

Ver. 44. Elthece, or Elthecon of Juda, given to the Levites. All the three tribes might dwell in it.

Ver. 45. Barach. Heb. “Bene-barac,” or “Jud, of the sons of Barac.”

Ver. 46. Mejarcon, “the waters of Jarcon” and Arecon, were near Joppe. C.

Ver. 47. There. Heb. “and the limits of Dan went out from them. They were not able to keep the cities in subjection; so that, finding themselves too much confined, they sought for fresh settlements at Lessem; or, their borders were known by these cities, through which they passed, (C.) though most of them had been already assigned to the tribe of Juda. M.—Dan. This city was not Peneas, or Cæsarea, but the utmost boundary of Palestine on the north, as Bersabee was on the south. This history is given more at large. Judg. 18:1. The Sept. vary from the Heb. in the 46. 7 and 8 verses, (C.) and add that “the children of Dan did not destroy the Amorrhites, who afflicted them in the mountains, and would not suffer them to descend into the plain ... But the land of Ephraim lay heavy upon them, and they became tributary to them. (See C. 17:13.) 49. And they went to take possession of their limits, and the children of Israel,” &c. H.

Ver. 50. Lord, by the mouth of Eleazar. Josue was content with one of the most barren parts of the country. He waits till all are provided for, shewing throughout his life a pattern of moderation and disinterestedness, which render him worthy to be considered as a figure of Jesus Christ, who reduced himself to the lowest state of abjection for our sakes. C. See C. 14:6. M.—Ephraim. It was before called Gaas; and the city, which Josue enlarged, lay on the north side of it. C. 24:30. Judg. 2:9.

Ver. 3. Of blood, and authorized to kill the manslayer, (M.) if he find him out of one of these cities. See Num. 35:6. Deut. 19:4. Revenge was never lawful: but to prosecute offenders in the courts of justice, (C.) or agreeably to the law of God, can never deserve blame. H.—If some of the saints of the old law seem to have taken delight in revenge, their expressions must be explained in a favourable sense. David, who is accused of this crime, (C.) repels the charge with horror. Ps. 7:5. The evils which he denounces to his adversaries, were predictions of what they had reason to expect. Ps. 57:11. Jer. 11:20. H.—If some of the Jews looked upon vengeance as lawful, it cannot be a matter of surprise, when we reflect that even some, who have been taught the mild law of the gospel, think themselves bound, in some cases, to revenge an affront. C.—So far have the maxims of the world supplanted Christianity in their breasts! How severely does Jacob rebuke his children for what they had done to the Sichemites, though they falsely thought that the affront offered to their sister, would justify them! Gen. 34. H.

Ver. 4. Gate, where justice was administered. M.—Here the ancients heard what the manslayer had to say in his own defence; and if they thought his account plausible, they gave him a retreat till he might be safely brought to answer the charges of the avenger, who might endeavour to prove that the murder was wilful.

Ver. 5. Before. This is generally taken literally. But if sufficient proof could be brought that the contending parties were at variance, or reconciled some time before the accident happened, the person who had taken refuge, would be judged accordingly. It might lawfully be presumed that they were enemies, if, after being at variance, they had given no signs of reconciliation. C.

Ver. 6. Fact. Sept. “before the synagogue for judgment.” H.—Whether this took place in the same city, or where the murder was committed, (see Num. 35:12 and v. 25) the reasons are given why the manslayer was released at the death of the high priest. C.—By the death of Christ, the greatest criminals are redeemed. M.

Ver. 7. Cedes and Gaulon lay on the north, Sichem and Ramoth in the middle, Hebron and Bosor on the south of the country. H.

Ver. 9. Strangers. The limitations of the Jews in favour of their own nation are rejected. The civil and criminal law should affect all alike, except, God order it otherwise.—Stand. This was the posture of the people accused, while the judges sat. Drusius. C.

Ver. 1. The priest, who seems to have presided, as he is always placed first. A select number of the tribe of Levi came to represent the priests, and those of an inferior order; and to obtain what God had promised them. Num. 35:2. There was one family of priests who sprang from Aaron, the son of Caath. The rest of Caath's family, with the children of Gerson and Merari, were simply Levites, constituting three other families. God was pleased that they should be dispersed through Israel, that they might instruct the people both by word and by example, 1 Par. 26:29. C.—Josue would not have neglected them. M.—But they were naturally solicitous to know where they were to live, as the tribes had now all received their portions. H.

Ver. 3. Gave, by lot, v. 4, &c. M.—Whether any changes were afterwards made, to grant more or less, in proportion to the numbers of the four families, (as seems to have been done with regard to the other tribes) or the cities were specified in four parcels, and the priests received the first lot, the text does not explain. C.—It is also uncertain what right the Levites had to these 48 cities. Some say that they had only the use of them, while others maintain that the cities were their property entirely, so that no other could live there without their consent. They could sell the houses, which returned to them in the year of the jubilee, if not redeemed before; but the suburbs were a common property of all the Levites, and could not be sold by any. Lev. 25. The cities, therefore, belonged to God, and he abandoned the property to his ministers. Other people might live among them, as they were not debarred from choosing their habitation in places which were not originally allotted to them. Thus we find that Gabaa was chiefly people by the tribe of Benjamin, when the outrage was offered to the Levite's wife, and no blame attached to the latter. Judg. 19. Saul and his family were of the same town, though it belonged to the Levites, and David kept his court at Hebron, a sacerdotal city, for the first seven years of his reign. C.—Here also Caleb had probably resided. C. 14:14. The priests and Levites were not indeed at this time sufficiently numerous to people all these cities; and Calmet supposes that they only received as many houses as they might occupy, being supplied with more by the magistrates as their numbers increased. But might not they let the houses, which they did not want to occupy, and receive the profits, so as to take possession of them when they had occasion? Were these 48 cities, which were the only part of the land to which the Levites had any claim, too many or too rich to compensate the labours of this most deserving tribe? It seems, therefore, unnecessary to call in the aid or interference of the magistrate, except any person were so bold as to refuse to give up what the law had so positively assigned to the Levites. Their rights were as well defined as those of any of the other tribes. H.—The land beyond the suburbs, was cultivated by the proprietors, who might either live in the town or country. Many of the priests and Levites chose to reside near the tabernacle, as Moses had encouraged them to do. Deut. 18:6. Thus Nobe became a sacerdotal city; (1 K. 21:1,) and after the temple was built, Jerusalem and its environs were the places of abode for most of the priests. C.

Ver. 4. Thirteen. These three tribes give more cities than any of the others, because their territories were the largest. Num. 35:8. Juda in particular, had a most extensive portion allotted to him at first; so that a part was afterwards taken away to accommodate Simeon and Dan, and now so many cities are appointed for the priests, (C.) who would thus have their residence near the temple, when it should be built. H. —God ordered the lots according to the designs of his providence; and gave the priests, though so few in number, more than what fell to the share of all the rest of the family of Caath. C.—This family had in all twenty-three cities, lying south of Dor and Bethsan, and leaving the tribe of Issachar on the north. Gerson had thirteen cities among the three other northern tribes, and that of Manasses on the east side of the Jordan; while Merari had twelve, more southward on the same side, in the tribes of Gad and of Ruben, and on the west of the Jordan, in the tribe of Zabulon. Thus these two families were more intermixed. H.

Ver. 12. Possession. Only the houses which the priests occupied, were taken from him. C.—Caleb enjoyed all the dependencies of Hebron, and took the city, as he would not have been secure while the Chanaanites dwelt there. Magalian.—Serarius thinks that he abandoned the city to the priests, in which he follows Tostat, who supposes that they had to pay tribute to the tribes among whom they lived; and that mines, &c. belonged to the latter. M.

Ver. 16. Ain and Jeta. Sept. of Grabe agrees with the Vulg. But the Vatican copy (H.) has, “Asa ... and Tanu.” In 1 Par. 6:59, only Asan and Bethsemes are mentioned. Several other variations may also be observed, which may be attributed either to the changes which were afterwards made when the Chanaanites kept their hold, (Rabbins) or to the different places having two names, or to the mistakes of transcribers, &c. See C. 15:62. Only eleven cities are specified in the Book of Paralipomenon, though it observes that there were thirteen. C.—As hath, &c. words added by S. Jerom, or rather expressing more fully the Heb. “those” two tribes. H.

Ver. 21. One of, (urbes confugii Sichem ... and Gazer.) Lit. “cities of refuge, Sichem, ... Gazer,” &c. as if all the Levitical cities had enjoyed this privilege, which we have seen (Num. 35:6,) is the opinion of some. But the Heb. Sept. and Chal. read in the singular, “Sichem, a city of refuge;” and interpreters generally allow only six cities of this description. C.—Without extending this privilege to all the rest, we may observe that all the cities of refuge were given to the Levites, v. 11. 21–7–32–6–7. Prot. “For they give them Shechem, with here suburbs in Mount Ephraim, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Gazer,” &c. By inserting to be, they seem to countenance the opinion that all the subsequent towns were of the same nature as Sichem. The text would be clearer without the addition, to prove the contrary sentiment. H.—See Bonfrere how the Vulg. may be vindicated. M.

Ver. 22. Beth-horon. Grabe’s Sept. adds, “the upper,” which is the received opinion. C.

Ver. 23. And of, &c. This verse is omitted in Paralipomenon, (H.) whence we find Helon and Gethremmon (probably the same as Aialon and Beth-remmon, v. 24, assigned to Ephraim.—Eltheco. See C. 15:59 and 19:44.—Gabathon continued a long time in the hands of the Philistines. 3 K. 15:27.

Ver. 25. Cities. Instead of these, Aner and Balaam are mentioned in Paralipomenon. C.

Ver. 26. Degree, who were not priests. Caath is placed before his eldest brother Gerson, on account of the honour of the priesthood and of Moses. M.

Ver. 27. Refuge. Lit. “the cities of refuge, Gaulon ... and Bosra.” See v. 21. H.—The latter gives place to Asteroth, in Paral.

Ver. 29. Cities. These are called Cedes and Daboreth, Ramoth and Amen, in Paralipomenon.

Ver. 35. Suburbs. Paralipomenon only mentions two, Remmono and Thabor.

Ver. 36. Four cities. There are no more, though there be five names: for Misor is the same city as Bosor, which is to be observed in some other places, where the number of names exceeds the number of cities. Ch.—With regard to the 36th and 37th verses, there seems to have been great confusion in the Hebrew MSS. both ancient and modern. In some they have been totally omitted, in others only a part. H.—The famous MS. of Hillel, and the Masorets, reject them, (C.) because they had reckoned only 656 verses in Josue, and these two verses would destroy their authority. Hence they erased them wherever they might be found; and Kimchi assures us, that he never could meet with them “in any MS. (thus) corrected.” Yet the Paralipomena universally acknowledge them, (Ken.) as the context of Josue must also do, otherwise there will be only eight cities instead of twelve, and four will be wanting to complete the number of forty-eight. The Prot. version therefore is forced to admit them, (H.) as they are found in the Eng. Polyglot, on the authority of some ancient MSS. They do not, however, express them so fully as the Sept. have done. Ken.—These read, “And beyond the Jordan, over-against Jericho, out of the tribe of Ruben, the city of refuge for the slayer Bosor, in the wilderness, (Misor) and her suburbs, and Jazer and her suburbs, (37) and Gedson and her suburbs, and Mapha (Alex. copy reads Maspha) and her suburbs, four cities.” Grabe.—Prot. only admit, “And out of the tribe of Ruben, Bezer with her suburbs, and Jahazah ... Kedemoth ... and Mephaath with her suburbs, four cities.” Kennicott finds in some Heb. MSS. “the city of refuge for the slayer, Bosor;” one MS. has, “in the wilderness,” &c. H.—These verses were not in the Heb. text of the Hexapla, as they are obelized in the Sept. and in the Syriac MS. of Masius; and yet, as they are found in the old Greek and Syriac versions, and in the Chal. paraphrase, they were probably omitted between the year 100 and 200. They are left out in several printed editions of the Heb. Bible, and even in that of Jablonski, (1699) though in opposition to his better judgment and all the MSS. which he had consulted: legunt omnia nostra MSS. Michaelis (1720) reprinted this text, with some few emendations, particularly with these two verse very laudably inserted. Kennicott, 2 Diss.—In the Bened. Edit. of S. Jerom, Martianay observes, that the Heb. MSS. of S. Jerom seem to have been mutilated, for if they had admitted this 36th verse, S. Jerom would have translated it, and it would have been found in the more ancient MSS. of the Latin edition, where it is wanting. Hence this editor leaves it out. He also remarks that other Heb. MSS. omit “a city of refuge for the slayer, in the desert.” The last word, he says, occurs in several copies of the best not; and Houbigant inserts it on the authority of the oratorian MS. 54. H.—In some editions of the Vulg. this verse is transposed, and placed after the cities of Gad. Louvain, R. Steph. &c.—It is therefore, probably that S. Jerom found it not in Heb. but, if he inserted it, he borrowed it from the Sept. The Syriac version places these verses before the 34th and 35th. All this shews that the Heb. MSS. have not been kept with great care in this place. Some have surmised that the Sept. have inserted this necessary supplement from Paral. But they do not entirely agree with that book, so that it seems that they found these verses in their Heb. copies. C.—We have already given the Hebrew and Sept. as it is found in the common editions. In Paral. (6:78,) it is thus expressed: Beyond the Jordan also, over-against Jericho, on the east side of the Jordan, out of the tribe of Ruben, Bosor in the wilderness, with its suburbs, and Jassa ... 79. Cademoth also ... and Mephaath with its suburbs. The word Misor, which Grabe's Sept. and the Vulg. leave untranslated, is the Heb. word which denotes a plain, (H.) as Aquila and Sym. agree, and as appears C. 20:8. Deut. 4:43, where Bosor is said to have been upon the plain of the wilderness. This city was the famous Bosra, in the desert Arabia, between Philadelphia and Jazer, towards the east. C.—We might translate, “the cities of refuge, Bosor in the wilderness, which is also the plain” of Moab, v. 21. H.—Jaser, or Jassa, (C. 13:18,) different from that v. 37, which lay on the river of the same name in the tribe of Gad. C.

Ver. 40. Families, the four great ones, which parcelled out the cities among the several branches. H.—The Levites were only 23,000, (Num. 26:62,) yet they receive more cities than what are specified for any other tribe. It must be observed, however, that all the cities of the different tribes are not mentioned, and the Israelites might live along with those of the tribe of Levi, v. 3. Moreover, these had only the cities, with 2000 cubits of land round them. The Sept. here insert that Josue divided the land, and received the city of Thamnasachar; (Grabe substitutes Thamnasarach) where he deposited the knives of stone with which he had circumcised those who were born in the desert. H.—They farther remark, that they were buried in his tomb. C. 24:30.

Ver. 43. Pass. How then did the Chanaanites keep possession of so many places? S. Augustine (q. 21,) answers, that they were suffered to do it for the “utility and trial” of the Israelites. For the latter were not sufficiently numerous at first to cultivate all the land. God had therefore promised that the nations should not be driven out all at once, lest the country should fall a prey to wild beasts. Ex. 23:29. Masius.—During the life-time of Josue, none of them durst make head against him; and if many of the tribes did not take possession of all their cities, it was owing to their own negligence. After this hero was no more, the natives took courage, and greatly harassed the Israelites; but it is plain that the latter were not straitened for room, while Josue lived, since they invited the other tribes east of the Jordan to come and reside with them on the west, if they thought proper. C. 17:16. C.

Ver. 1. Time; before the assembly broke up. The 40,000 had continued to fight along with their brethren, (C.) as long as there was occasion. Now peace being obtained, they are permitted to return to their families. H.

Ver. 4. And peace. This is a farther explication of rest, (H.) which alone occurs in Hebrew. It may denote a fixed and permanent abode. Deut. 3:20. Ruth 1:9.

Ver. 6. Blessed them, like a good magistrate, having given them a solemn admonition not to forget God, the source of all blessings. H.—This expression may also intimate that he loaded them with praises and with presents, and wished them all prosperity.—Dwellings. Lit. “tents,” in which they had been accustomed to live, in the desert. Hence they gave the name to houses, temples, &c.

Ver. 8. Riches. Heb. Sept. &c. “cattle.”—Brethren. Grotius pretends that they were to keep what they had gotten. But his proofs rather shew that they were to follow the ancient custom and law, which prescribed that those who had remained at home to guard the country, should share the booty with those who had gone to battle, 1 K. 30:24. Num. 31:27. Some suppose that the booty was divided into equal parts, and the 40,000 would retain as much as all the rest of their brethren, who had been less exposed. The Israelites, however, made all alike, as other nations seem to have been. Ex. 15:9. &c.

Ver. 9. Galaad here denotes all that country, (C.) as Chanaan does that on the west of the Jordan (H.) and Ephraim, the ten tribes. C.

Ver. 10. Banks. Heb. Goliluth, which is (C. 13:2, &c.) rendered Galilee, Galgal, “limits,” &c. H.—Chanaan, consequently on the western banks. Vatable, however, says that the eastern country went sometimes by this name, on account of the Amorrites having dwelt in it. Josephus (v. 1.) and the Jews affirm, that the altar was built on that side; and it seems natural that these tribes would erect it in their own territories, for the benefit of their children. C.—The effect would nevertheless have been equal, on which side soever it appeared, as the Jordan was not so broad but they might see over. H.—Immensely. Heb. “a great altar to be seen,” like those heaps which Bacchus and Alexander raised to perpetuate the memory of their victories. Plin. vi. 16.

Ver. 12. In Silo, without being called, as they were all fired with a holy zeal, (M.) to prevent the growth of idolatry among their brethren. H.—They knew that one altar was to be allowed M. in the place which the Lord should appoint. Lev. 17:8. Deut. 12:5. &c. H.—God had ordered such cities as embraced idolatry among them, to be exterminated. Deut. 13:12. C.

Ver. 14. Tribe. Another of the tribe of Levi, and deputies from the other nine tribes, accompanied Phinees on this important occasion. The Levites were most of all concerned, as their rights seemed to be particularly invaded. H.—The princes of the tribes did not (C.) perhaps (H.) go, but only men of high rank. Kimchi says, men set over a thousand. Heb. “ten princes with him of each chief house, a prince of all the tribes of Israel.” C.—These were commissioned by Eleazar, Josue, and all the congregation, to endeavour to bring back their brethren to a sense of their duty, if they had so soon forgotten God, (H.) or if they should persist in their rebellion, to denounce an eternal war against them. M.

Ver. 16. Lord. Thus Phinees shews that he speaks in the name of those who still continued faithful to the Lord. He imputes the crime of apostacy to Ruben, &c. that they may declare more openly for what reason they had built this altar. M.

Ver. 17. Beelphegor. As they lived in the country, where this idol had been adored, Phinees was afraid lest they might have built the altar in his honour. He reminds them what destruction that worship had brought upon all Israel. He had been particularly zealous in appeasing the wrath of God, and therefore speaks with more authority. Heb. “is not the crime of Phegor enough for us, that we should not wish to expiate it until this day?” (C.) or Prot. “is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed until this day? (although there was a plague in the congregation of the Lord).” The stain of this impiety still remained upon Israel. They ought, therefore, to endeavour by sincere repentance, to obliterate it entirely, and not, by fresh provocations, enkindle the dreadful wrath of God. H.—There was reason to fear lest the Lord should punish this sin still more, as he is accustomed to do, when people relapse. C.—All must therefore shew their zeal to prevent such crimes, as the multitude sometimes suffers for the offence of one, when they do not take all possible care to prevent it, v. 20. H.

Ver. 19. Unclean, as being destitute of the ark, &c. The Israelites had the greatest veneration for the land which God had chosen for their habitation. Naaman loaded two mules with some of the earth. We cannot help admiring the zeal and the disinterestedness of Phinees. He proposes to abandon some of the possessions on the other side of the Jordan, rather than that his brethren should forsake God, or offend him.

Ver. 20. Wickedness. Heb. “he did not expire in his sin,” (C.) but repented; (H.) or, Did he not? &c. The Sept. “he did not alone die in his sin.” Chal. “but this man alone did not die in his transgression.” C.—All Israel was in consternation, and 36 were slain. If this secret offence was so severely punished, what judgments will not the public apostacy of so many thousands draw upon our heads!

Ver. 21. Israel. Sept. “answered the Chiliarchs of Israel,” who had spoken by the mouth of their president. They repel the charge with earnestness. H.

Ver. 22. God. In Heb. there are three terms, (C.) El, Elohim, Yehova, “the strong, the judge, the self-existent Being.” To him they make their appeal. Him they acknowledge in the first place, as the only true God, as they had been accused of departing from him, v. 19. H.—They are willing to undergo any punishment, if they had any evil intention. M.

Ver. 23. Sacrifice. Heb. intimates particularly “of flour or libations.” C.

Ver. 24. To-morrow. At any future period. H.—Israel. The same idea is expressed, v. 27. You have no part in the Lord. You are not his peculiar people. Of this title the Israelites were always very jealous, even when they neglected the worship and covenant of the Lord. C.—Hence these tribes take these precautions, that they may not be excluded from the society and privileges of their brethren on the other side of the Jordan. They profess openly that they do not esteem it lawful to offer sacrifice in any other place, besides that which God had chosen. H.

Ver. 31. Lord, who would not have failed to punish Israel for such a crime. C.—They rejoice, therefore, not only at the fidelity of their brethren, but also on their own account, because they may now confidently look up for protection to God, instead of being in continual apprehensions of feeling his avenging arm. H.

Ver. 32. Into, &c. (finium Chanaan) “of the confines of Chanaan,” which is ambiguous. H.—But the Heb. removes the difficulty in this manner.

Ver. 34. God. Heb. seems rather defective; (C.) “called the altar, (Syriac supplies the altar of witness) for it shall be a witness between us, that the Lord he is the God. Ed, “witness,” is placed in the margin of Plantin’s edit. (Kennic.) and the Prot. have inserted it in the text, though in a different character, (H.) as “it is confirmed by the Syr. Arab. and Vulg. versions.” Kimchi quotes the Chal. paraphrase, as having the word seid, “witness,” twice, which if read in two places formerly, has been lately omitted in one, as many other alterations have perhaps been made in it, in conformity to the later copies of the Hebrew text. It is still found in one Chal. MS. and in that of Masius. Between the two last words of this verse, some Heb. MSS. read eva, “He.” “The Lord, He is the God;” which not only gives an emphasis, but is expressly confirmed by the Chal.; and indeed this seems to have been a common form of confessing the belief in the one true God, 3 K. 18:39. Kennic. Diss. i.—Masius would translate, “They made an inscription upon the altar, declaring that it should be an eternal witness of their attachment to the Lord.” Cora, in effect, sometimes means to write, as Alcoran, in the Arabic tongue, signifies “the scripture” (C.) of the Mahometans, which they hold in the utmost veneration, as containing the life and doctrine of their great prophet. The Sept. (Grabe) insinuate that Josue approved of what had been done, “and Jesus gave a name to the altar, ... and said, it is a witness in the midst of them, that the Lord God is their God.” Thus, instead of war and destruction, which seemed to threaten Israel on all sides, all ended in peace and harmony. If Christians would imitate the conduct of the Israelites, they would not so rashly condemn their neighbours on every idle report; and, if our adversaries would condescend to examine seriously into the grounds of charging idolatry upon us, and on that account waging an eternal war against us, it is to be hoped they would pronounce our doctrine innocent, and reform their own iniquitous proceedings. H.

Ver. 1. Long time. Josue governed only ten years after the distribution of the land. Towards the close of his life, perceiving that the Israelites were too indolent in subduing the people of the country, and fearing lest they should by degrees begin to imitate their corrupt manners, he called a general assembly either at his own city, or at Silo, or more probably at Sichem, (as it is mentioned C. 24:1, which seems to give farther particulars of this assembly) and laid before his people, in the strongest terms, the dangers to which they would be exposed, by entertaining a friendship for the enemies of God, and by abandoning him. C.—He called together all the heads of the people. M.

Ver. 3. For you. God fought for his people three ways: 1. By destroying their enemies himself in a miraculous manner, as he did the Egyptians; 2. By assisting their endeavours, as at Jericho, and in the victory of Gabaon, when he caused the walls of the former town to fall down, and hurled stones upon the fleeing enemy near the latter; (C. 10) 3. By giving courage and strength to Israel, while he filled their opponents with dismay, and this was most frequently the case. He continues to assist his servants in their spiritual warfare against the world, the flesh, and the devil, in all these different ways. W.

Ver. 4. And now. Heb. “Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations, which remain to be subdued, to be an inheritance for your tribes from the Jordan, (these two words are transposed, and should come after, C.) with all the nations that I have cut off—even unto the great sea westward.” He mildly expostulates with them for not following up his victories, by reducing the few scattered nations whom he had abandoned to them as a prey. H.—They ought to be considered not only as the enemies of God, but also as unjust detainers of another’s right, and Josue promises that nothing will be wanting on the part of God to render their reduction easy, if they will but do their duty to Him and to themselves. H.

Ver. 7. Come in, an expression which may denote any familiarity, or marriage. M.—Heb. is in the form of a prohibition, “Come not among (have no connections with) these nations ... Neither mention their gods, nor swear (or cause to swear by them.)” The psalmist (15:4,) says, speaking either of idols, (H.) or of sinners, Nor will I be mindful of their names by my lips. Osee (2:16,) says, She shall call me no more Baali, (“my lord,” a term applied by wives to their husbands) on account of its reminding one of the idol Baal. Hence David calls Jerobaal, or Gedeon, Jeroboschot, 2 K. 11:21. S. Paul would not have Christians so much as to name the sins of impurity. Ephes. 5:3. The more religious Jews will not even mention an idol, or an unclean animal; and they beg pardon before they speak of a heretic. Drusius.—Some understand that the worship of idols is meant by naming them, as those who invoke the name of Jesus Christ, were his disciples. Acts 9:14. 1 Tim. 2:15. Ex. 20:24. To swear by idols is always sinful, (Ex. 23:13,) while it is an act of religion to swear on proper occasions, by the name of God. Theophrastus (ap. Joseph. c. Ap. i.) observes, that the laws of the Tyrians prohibit the using of foreign oaths, such as that of the Corban, which was peculiar to the Jews. C.

Ver. 8. Day. Those who had formerly given way to idolatry were all cut off, and all Israel had lately given a proof of their attachment unto the Lord. H.

Ver. 10. Thousand. This Moses had repeatedly foretold. Lev. 26:13. Deut. 28:7.

Ver. 13. Side. Heb. “snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your side.” Children and slaves were formerly beaten on this part, Eccli. 30:12 and 42:5. Horace (epod. iv.) says, Ibericis peruste funibus latus. The first word S. Jerom seems to have read with th at the end, as peth, means a hole, (C.) by which means it was customary to take wild beasts, and to annoy the enemy. H.—Sept. render side, “they shall be nails in your heels.”

Ver. 14. This day: shortly I must die. C.—Metam properamus ad unam. (Hor.) “We hasten to one common goal.” H.—The pagans called death, or the grave, the common place; and Plautus says, in the same sense, Quin prius me ad plures penetravi. (C.) “Before I penetrate the receptacle of the many.” H.—Mind. Heb. “you know in your hearts, and in all your souls;” you are convinced, you cannot be ignorant that God has fulfilled his engagements. C.—The Sept. read, “you shall know,” &c. The experience of future ages will only establish this truth more fully. H.

Ver. 16. And speedily. This word is added to express the force of the Heb. term. M.—“Punishment is seldom lame in overtaking the wicked. H.—This. He emphatically sets before them what labours they had sustained in making the acquisition, and what ingratitude they will be guilty of, if they ever forfeit so great a blessing. M.—The treat or prediction was verified during the captivity, and still more after the destruction of Jerusalem. C.

Ver. 1. Of Israel. There seems no reason for restricting this to the ancients, &c. On this solemn occasion, when all Israel was probably assembled at one of the great festivals, Josue concluded his exhortation, by renewing the covenant (C.) in the place where he had formerly complied with the injunction of Moses. C. 8:31. H.—In Sichem, in the field which Jacob had purchased, and where a great oak (v. 26,) was growing, that had been honoured, it is thought, with the presence of the patriarchs. It was near the two famous mountains of Garizim and Hebal. C.—Sichem was at the foot of the former mountain of blessings; and Josephus informs us, the altar was erected in its vicinity. No fitter place could therefore have been selected by the aged chief, to conclude the actions of his life, and to attach the people to the religion which they had once received, in the most signal manner. The Vat. and Alex. copies (H.) of the Sept. followed by S. Aug. (q. 30,) read Silo, where the tabernacle was fixed: but all the rest agree with the original, and with the ancient versions, in retaining Sichem, to which place the ark was removed on this occasion, (C.) the distance of ten (S. Jer.) or twelve miles. Eus.—It is not probable that an oak would be growing in the sanctuary, near the altar, contrary to the express prohibition of the Lord, v. 26. Deut. 16:21. C.—Many interpreters suppose that the assembly might be held at Silo, in the territory of Sichem. T. M. Serarius.—But the distance seems too great; and Bonfrere rather thinks that the copies of the Sept. have been altered. H.—Salien remarks, that they might go in solemn procession from Sichem to Silo. A. 2600.

Ver. 2. Of the river. The Euphrates. Ch.—Gods. Some think that Abraham himself was in his youth engaged in the worship of idols, (though this is denied by S. Aug. C. D. xvi. 13. Theod. q. 18, &c. W.) as well as his father, &c. v. 14. Gen. 11:31. Thare was the father of both Abraham and Nachor, (Gen. 11:26,) unless (H.) the grandfather (M.) of Abraham was meant, who was also called Nachor, (H.) as well as Rebecca's grandfather. Gen. 24. W.

Ver. 3. From the. Heb. and Sept. “other side of the flood or river,” where Mesopotamia commences. H.

Ver. 4. Isaac, the promised seed and heir of the blessings, (C.) after Ismael was born. H.

Ver. 6. You. Many still survived, and had seen these wonders, as God had only exterminated those who had murmured.

Ver. 9. Fought, not perhaps with the sword, but by endeavouring to get Israel cursed, that so he might be unable to make any resistance. He had the will to fight, and in this sense princes are said to be at war, though they never come to an engagement. 3 K. 14:28. C.—Balac shut his gates against Israel. S. Aug. q. 26.

Ver. 11. Men. Heb. “the masters of Jericho,” which may denote either the king or the inhabitants. It is thought that people of the different nations were come to defend the city, or the text may signify that not only Jericho, but these different people, (C.) fought successively against the people of God, but all in vain. H.—The fighting of the inhabitants of Jericho was only intentional; a miracle rendered all their efforts abortive. Yet this is called fighting in scripture (v. 9,) as well as in other authors. “We judge of actions by the intention, says S. Isidore: (Pelus. ii. ep. 289,) the person who intended to murder is punished, though he only inflicted a wound; and on the other hand, he who kills undesignedly receives a pardon.” So Orion was said to have violated Diana, because he wished to do it; and Virgin, (viii.) speaking of some who already thought they were in possession of the capital, says, Galli per dumos aderant, arcemque tenebant, “they seized the citadel,” though they never entered it. C.—Yet it is probable that the inhabitants of Jericho would defend themselves. M.

Ver. 12. Hornets. S. Aug. explains this of the rumours, or devils, which terrified the people of the country. But it is generally understood literally. Wisd. 12:8. M. Ex. 23:28. C.—The two, &c. not only the nations on the west, but also those on the east side of the Jordan, who fell, not so much by the valour of the Israelites, as by the terror and judgments of God. H.—The resistance which they made was hardly worth mentioning.

Ver. 14. The gods. Some still retained in their hearts an affection for these idols, though privately; (C.) so that Josue could not convict them, or bring them to condign punishment; as no doubt he, and Moses before him, would have done, if they had been apprized of any overt act of idolatry. Amos (5:26,) says, You carried a tabernacle of your Moloch and the image of your idols, &c. which is confirmed by Ezechiel 23:3. 8 and Acts 7:42. For these acts many of the people were punished, (Num. 25:3. 9,) and the rest were either sincerely converted, or took care to hide their impiety till after the death of Josue. Yet the secret inclination of many was still corrupt; and these no sooner found a proper opportunity than they relapsed repeatedly into the worship of idols, for which reason the prophets represent their disposition as criminal from their youth. H.—S. Augustine (q. 29,) cannot think that the people, who are so often praised for their fidelity during the administration of Josue and of the ancients, (C. 22:2 and 23:3. 8 and 24:31,) and who had testified such zeal against every appearance of idolatry in Ruben, (C. 22) should be themselves infected with this deadly poison. He therefore supposes that Josue exhorts them to repent, if any of them should have retained a predilection for the worship of their ancestors in Mesopotamia, and in Egypt, (C.) which, by the prophetic light he say, was secretly the case. W.—Yet, though the great majority was clear of this crime, it seems many concealed from their leaders their secret attachment to it, v. 23; (C.) or if they were sincere, for a time, their former bad habits soon gained the ascendancy, and involved them in perdition. H.—Fathers. He does not exempt Abraham, and the Jews acknowledge that he was once an idolater, which is the opinion of S. Ephrem, of the author of the Recognitions, B. i., and of many moderns; some of whom think that S. Paul gives him the epithet of impious, or ungodly, on that account. Rom. 4:5. The idolatry of the Hebrews in Egypt, is no less certain than that of their ancestors in Mesopotamia. Ezec. 23:2. 8. 27. C.

Ver. 15. Choice. Josue was persuaded that no restraint could bind the will; (H.) and that, if the Israelites did not freely adhere to the Lord, they would not serve him long, nor would their adoration have any merit. C.—Hence he endeavours by all means to draw from them a free and candid acknowledgment of his divinity; and he leads the way, by declaring that all his house will adhere to the true and only God. They answer his fullest expectations, and profess in the most cordial manner, that every tie of gratitude must bind them for ever to the service of the same Lord. H.—Elias makes a similar proposition; (3 K. 18:21. See Eccli. 15:18. M.) not that it can be ever lawful to choose evil and to reject the sovereign good. But by this method the minds and hearts of the audience are stimulated to make the free and decided election of what alone can ensure their eternal happiness. H.—Thus we often set before the people hell or heaven for their choice. M.

Ver. 19. You will not be able to serve the Lord, &c. This was not said by way of discouraging them; but rather to make them more earnest and resolute, by setting before them the greatness of the undertaking, and the courage and constancy necessary to go through with it. Ch.—Josue knew the fickle temper of his subjects. He insinuates, therefore, that if they do not lay that aside, they will not stand to their engagements, (C.) and will irritate God the more, if they enter into a covenant with him, and afterwards prove inconsistent. Heb. La thuclu, “you cannot,” may perhaps have the first u redundant; (Ken.) as that is a letter which is often inserted or omitted at the transcriber’s pleasure. Aben

Ezra Simon.—Hallet suggests that we ought to read lo thucelu, “you shall not cease,” which would obviate the apparent difficulty of Josue’s attempting, as it were, to cool the fervour of the people, by insinuating that they will not be able to stick to their resolutions, and that at a time when he is exerting every nerve to make them sensible of their duty, and to engage them to swear an inviolable fidelity to the Lord. “Cease not to serve the Lord, for he is a holy God, he is a jealous God, he will not forgive your rebellion, (Copssaco. Job 34:27,) nor your sins; if you forsake the Lord, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and consume you.” Ken. Dis. 2.—If we were to read with an interrogation, “Will you not be able? &c. it might answer the same end. Josue may be considered as starting an objection, which is but too common in the mouth of the slothful, and of many of the pretended reformers, Luther, &c. who endeavour to persuade the world that they are not able to comply with the rigour of God’s law, and even make his severity an encouragement for their despair. Josue replies that these pretexts are groundless, and that God, who has already done so much for them, (v. 20,) will not abandon them in their wants, if they cry unto him; and that, instead of being dejected by the thought of his judgments, they ought to strive, with the utmost fervour, to comply with his divine will. H.—A general sometimes withholds the ardour of his soldiers, telling them that they are not a match for the enemy, in order to inflame their courage the more. M.—A torrent which has been long repressed, rushes forward with greater fury when the dam is broken down. H.

Ver. 20. Turn, and alter his conduct in your regard, instead of being your protector, he will destroy you.

Ver. 21. Lord. We shall not experience the chastisements with which thou hast threatened us, because we will adhere inviolably to the Lord. C.

Ver. 25. Covenant. He renewed the one that had been formerly made, stipulating, on the part of God, that the people should serve Him alone, v. 23. After which he probably read some of the most striking passages of Deuteronomy, (C.) particularly the Decalogue, or ten commandments, with the blessings and curses which enforced the observance of them. C. 5 and 27 and 28 and 29 and 30. H.—Then the people swore that they would observe the law, the customary sacrifices were offered, and a record of the whole was subjoined by Josue to that of Moses, in order that it might be deposited in or near the ark. Deut. 31:26. C.—This renewal of the covenant prefigured the law of grace. S. Aug. q. 30. W.

Ver. 26. Lord, particularly what related to the ratification of the covenant, which was the last public act of this great man. He placed it in its proper order in the continuation of the sacred history, which Moses had commenced. H.—Stone unpolished, except where there was an inscription, relating what had taken place. M.—This monument of religion was not forbidden. Deut. 16:22. C.—Oak. Heb. alla, is translated a turpentine tree, Gen. 35:4. (H.) and by the Sept. here. But most people translate the oak. Chal. Aquila, &c. Under it Jacob buried the idols of Laban, and Abimelech was chosen king; (Judg. 9:6,) as Abraham had entertained the angels under the same tree, Gen. 18:1, (C.) and had sat under it when he first came into Sichem. Gen. 12:6. On which supposition it must have subsisted about 500 years. M.—It was even shewn some ages after Christ. But it is hardly credible that the same tree should have continued for such a length of time.—Sanctuary, or tent, where the ark was placed on this occasion under the oak. C. Bonfrere.—Some think it was at Silo. M. v. 1.—Kennicott denies that the ark was present, and supposes that they offered sacrifices upon the very altar which Josue had erected on Garizim, between 20 and 30 years before; and that this mountain is here called the sanctuary or “holy place.” Upon it the oak might very well grow, and Josue might “with great propriety take some large stone, and set it up for a witness, making at the same time this striking remark, that this stone had heard all the words of the Lord, or had been present when his law was inscribed and read to the people at their former solemn convention.” Hence he infers against Collins, “that the Jews had thoughts of worshipping, and did worship at Gerizim long before the separation of Israel from Juda;” and it was probably for fear of the Israelites returning to a sense of their duty, by the sight of these monuments of the old religion, that Jeroboam refrained from setting up his golden calves in the vicinity. Diss. ii. p. 119. H.

Ver. 27. It hath heard. This is a figure of speech, by which sensation is attributed to inanimate things; and they are called upon, as it were, to bear witness in favour of the great Creator, whom they on their part constantly obey, (Ch). which is the best manner of hearing. They rise up to our confusion. Theod. q. 19. W.—The oriental writers delight in these strong figurative expressions, which are not confined to poetry. Jesus Christ says, that if the children were silent, the stones would cry out. Luc. 19:40. See Num. 13:33. Gen. 4:10. C.—Lest. Heb. “it shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest you deny your God;” or literally, “lie unto your Elohim.” H.—The expression often means to revolt and prove faithless. Deut. 33:29. &c.

Ver. 29. And after, &c. If Josue wrote this book, as is commonly believed, these last verses were added by Samuel, or some other prophet. Ch.—Scholastic History. W.—Josue had governed Israel 17 years with the greatest prudence and fidelity. C.—Some extend his administration to a longer period. H.—He paid the debt of nature probably not long after the ratification of the covenant. It does not appear that he was ever married. S. Jerom, c. Jov. 1. St Chrys.—The Scripture does not mention that the people mourned for him, as they had done for Moses, &c. Yet we cannot doubt but they would shew this mark of respect to his memory, on account of the many benefits which they had received from him. The Holy Ghost has vouchsafed to be his panegyrist. Num. 27:12. Eccli. 46:1. &c. Josephus (v. 1,) represents him as a most universal character, equally perfect in everything that he took in hand. His greatest honour is to have been so striking a figure of Jesus, whose name he bore, (C.) and whose sacred office in administering a second circumcision after he had caused the people to cross the Jordan, he so well described. Like him he introduces the faithful into the land of promise, overthrows their enemies, and establishes them in peace, taking care both at the beginning and at the end of his administration, to set before their eyes the will of the heavenly Father, the God who is both holy and jealous, v. 19. Under Josue the Israelites are invincible, only as long as they continue faithful. C. 7. But Jesus secures his Church both from infidelity and from the attacks of all her enemies, by his all-powerful grace. H.—The Jews have attributed to Josue ten regulations, which are too trifling to have been made by him. Seld. Jur. vi. 2.—The Samaritan chronicle embellishes the account of this great man with many surprising and puerile fictions, as if the true history were not sufficient to excite our attention. See Basnage and Serarius. C.—The Jews say Josue died on the 26th of Nisan, unmarried. The Roman martyrology honours his memory on the 1st of Sept. Salien, A.C. 1453. It is probable that the Egyptian or Tyrean Hercules, who encountered so many giants and difficulties, was no other than Josue, whose history the pagans have obscured with fables. Vossius. H.

Ver. 30. Thamnath sare. Judg. 2:9. The last word is written hares (eros) the first and last letters being transposed in one of these places. It may probably be in this verse, as we read of Mount Hares, Jud. 1:35. Kennicott rather thinks that Sare is the proper reading, as it is found in the Syr. Arab. and Vulg. versions of the Book of Judges. He observes, that if we were to read in an English historian that the renowned Marlborough was buried at Blenheim, near Woodstock, and a few pages after that his remains were interred “at Blenmein, &c. we should naturally conclude that two letters had exchanged their places. And may we not allow the same in this part of the sacred history, as it is universally printed” in Hebrew? Dis. i. Some, however, maintain that Thamnath hares was so called, on account of “the image of the sun" being placed in the tomb of Josue, along with the knives of stone used by him in circumcision, which last the Sept. and S. Aug. (q. 30,) admit. But these must be reckoned among the Jewish or Oriental fables, (C.) though it is not improbable but the circumcising knives might be thus preserved, as a monument of the covenant made with the Israelites. H.—Gaas. This was another name for Mount Sare, or Hares, a part of Mount Ephraim; where S. Jerom tells us S. Paula visited the tomb of Josue. It was shewn near Thamna in the days of Eusebius. C.—No mention is made of mourning, as for Moses, &c. to insinuate that under the law the saints descended into limbo, but are admitted into paradise under the gospel. S. Jer. mans. 34. W.

Ver. 31. Long time; perhaps fifteen years. These ancients kept the people in order by their authority (C.) and good example, so great an influence have the manners of superiors upon those of the subjects. M.—Regis ad exemplar totus componitur orbis. See 2 Par. 24:2. 16. After the death of these virtuous rulers, who had been formed in the school of Moses and of Josue, and had beheld the wonders of God, (H.) the people began to embrace the worship of Baalim. Judg. 2:11.

Ver. 32. Sichem. Joseph had charged his brethren to take his bones with them. Gen. 50:24. Ex. 13:19. Masius supposes that they were solemnly interred after the altar was erected near Sichem, and the covenant ratified, when all the people were together. Others think that they deferred doing this till the country was conquered and divided. Josue would lose no time unnecessarily in performing these last rites to the revered patriarch.—Field. Jacob had given this field to his son. He had first purchased it; (Gen. 33:19,) and when the Amorrhite had taken possession again, after the unhappy affair at Sichem, he recovered it by the sword. Gen. 48:22.—Ewes. Heb. Kesita may denote also some species of money, though not perhaps marked with any figure of a lamb, &c. C.—Prot. "pieces of silver." H.—The mausoleum of Joseph at Sichem, was to be seen in S. Jerom's time. q. Heb. in Gen. W.

Ver. 33. Eleazar, the second high priest, was succeeded by his son Phinees. They were both of a very unexceptionable character. The Holy Ghost says, (Eccli. 45:28,) Phinees, the son of Eleazar, is the third in glory, by imitating him (his father or grandfather) in the fear of the Lord, &c. The Jews seem to have adopted the doctrine of Pythagoras, with respect to Phinees, (H.) as they say that he was the man of God, (3 K. 2:27,) who appeared to Heli, (Trad. Heb. in Reg.) and that he was consulted by Jephthe, and gave him advice to fulfil his vow; that he was the same person with Elias, and with one Phinees, who returned from the captivity with Esdras. 1 Par. 9:20. They will even have him to be an incarnate angel. Ap. Munster, &c. But without dwelling any longer on these fabulous accounts, (C.) he was surely a man of the greatest zeal and piety. H.—In consideration of his extraordinary merit, the city of Gabaath was given to him, though it was not properly a sacerdotal city, and priests could not regularly possess any land as their inheritance. Grotius supposes that he obtained this city along with his wife, as she was an heiress of the tribe of Ephraim. But if that had been the case, must she not have married some of the same tribe? Num. 36:8. C.—Sept. (Grabe) add, “In that day the children of Israel taking the ark of the covenant of God, carried it about among themselves, and Phinees was priest instead of his father, till he died, and he was buried in Gabaath, his own city. But the Israelites went each to his own place and city; and the children of Israel worshipped Astarte and Asteroth, and the gods of the surrounding nations, and the Lord delivered them into the hands of Eglon, the king of Moab, and he held them in subjection 18 years. See Judg. 3:12. 14. Why this is recorded in this place does not appear, unless it be to insinuate that the servitude under Eglon did not commence till after the death of Phinees, who had been high priest 40 years. Abisue, his son, entered upon the pontificate in the first year of the administration of Aod. 1 Par. 6:4. 50. Salien, A.M. 2641, A.C. 1412. Josue and Eleazar had reigned nearly during the same period of time, and finished their course together. They had assisted each other in keeping the people of God under due restraint. Their successors in office acted with the like zeal and concord, though they were not quite so successful. It is probable that Phinees would have the chief sway in “the aristocracy” of the ancients, which Josephus says took place between Josue and Othoniel. Their government is acknowledged by most authors, though Salien supposes that their authority, as distinct from the Sanhedrim, consisted in giving good example. Many assert that Phinees ruled the people twenty-three years. H.

JUDGES

THE BOOK OF JUDGES

INTRODUCTION

This Book is called Judges, because it contains the history of what passed under the government of the judges, who ruled Israel before they had kings. The writer of it, according to the more general opinion, was the prophet Samuel. Ch.—Some are of opinion, that the judges might have each left records of their respective administration, (M.) which might be put in order by Samuel. The author of this book seems to have lived under the reign of Saul, before David had expelled the Jebusites. C. 18:31. D.—The captivity, which is mentioned v. 30, must be understood of that when the ark of God, as well as the idol Micha, and many of the people were taken by the Philistines. Huet.—Many passages of the Psalms, &c. are taken from this book, which shew its antiquity. Ps. 67:8. 2 K. 11:21. The divine Providence is here displayed in a very striking manner. D.—The theocracy still subsisted and God generally chose these judges to be his ministers, and to deliver the people, on their repentance, from some dreadful calamity. H.—They exercised a supreme power, yet without bearing the insignia of regal authority, or imposing taxes, or making any alteration in the established laws. The Suffetes, who were Carthaginian magistrates, seem to have taken their name from these Ssuptim. D.—When God did not raise up judges, in an extraordinary manner, a kind of anarchy prevailed. H.—Each of the tribes regarded only their own affairs, and the republic was dissolved. Grotius.—Prosperous and unfortunate days succeeded each other, in proportion as the people gave themselves up to repentance or to dissolution. Sicut se habebant peccata populi & misericordia Dei, alternaverunt prospera & adversa bellorum. S. Aug. C. D. xviii. 23. S. Jerom (ep. ad Eust. & ad Paulin.) exhorts us to penetrate the spiritual sense of the historical books, and he regards “the judges as so many figures” of the apostles, who established the church of Christ. Though some of them had been noted for their misconduct, they were reclaimed by the grace of God. Then all the judges, every one by name, whose heart was not corrupted, who turned not away from the Lord, that their memory might be blessed, &c. Eccli. 46:13. 14. W.—S. Paul mentions four of them, though the conduct of Jephthe and of Samson might have been regarded as more exceptionable than that of Othniel, who is said to have been filled with the spirit of the Lord. C. 3:10. Serarius doubts not but they are all in heaven. Salien (A. 2640,) supposes that the transactions recorded in the five last chapters, took place before this 40th year from the death of Josue, which was the last of Othniel. With respect to the chronology of these times, there are many opinions. Houbigant endeavours to shew that the system of Usher is inadmissible, as well as that of Petau. Marsham maintains that many of the captivities, and of the Judges, related only to some tribes, so that the different years which are specified, must be referred to the same period of time. Thus while Jephthe ruled over those on the east side of the Jordan, and fought against the Ammonites, other judges endeavoured to repel the armies of the Philistines on the west. See 3 K. 6:1. Judg. 11:16. By this expedient, he finds no difficulty in shewing that 480 years elapsed from the departure out of Egypt till the building of the temple, and that the Israelites had occupied the country of the Ammonites during the space of 300 years. H.—

Houbigant seems to adopt this system in some respects, and he thinks that errors have crept into some of the numbers, so that Aod procured a peace of only 20 instead of 80 years, &c. He observes that the name of judge here designates, 1. A warrior, like Samson; 2. a person who passes sentence according to the law, which was the office of Heli; 3. one divinely commissioned to exercise the sovereign authority, as Samuel did, even after Saul had been elected king. Proleg. Chronol.

Others have compared the power of these judges with that of the Roman Dictators, or the Archontes of Athens. Serarius.—They were properly God's lieutenants. Their revenue seems to have been very precarious, and their exterior deportment modest and unassuming. They were guided by the declarations of the high priests, when arrayed with the Urim and Thummim; and their business was to promote the observance of the true religion, and to defend the people of God. This book concludes with the history of Samson, describing the transactions of 317 years, (C.) according to the calculation of Usher, which has met with the approbation of many of the learned, and is therefore chiefly inserted in this edition, as it was in that which was published in 1791, at Dublin, by the care of the Rev. B. Mac Mahon, who seems to have made some alterations. It is not indeed free from many serious difficulties. But we have not leisure to examine them at present. See C. 3:11. 30. We shall only subjoin the chronological table of Houbigant, which is not very common, that the reader may perceive where they are chiefly at variance. Moses governed 40 years, Josue 20, the Ancients 20, king of Mesopotamia 8, Othoniel 40, Moabites 18, Aod 20, Samgar 0, the Chanaanites 20, Debora and Barac 40, Madianites 7, Gedeon 40, Abimelech 3, Thola 23, Ammonites 0, Jair 22, Jephthe 6, Abesan 7, Ahialon 10, Abdon 8, Philistines 0, Samson 20, and with Heli 20, Heli and Samuel 25, Samuel and Saul 20, David 40, Solomon 3. In the 4th year of his reign the temple was begun, 480 years after the liberation from Egypt. Those to whom no years are assigned, lived at the same time with others whose years enter into the calculation. Thus Samgar gained a victory over the Philistines, while the Chanaanites held the Israelites in subjection. C. 3:31. For other particulars we must refer to the author. Chron. sacra. H.

Ver. 1. After. Heb. “And after,” as if this consultation had taken place immediately after the decease of their late victorious general, who had not pointed out his successor. But it is probable that the ancients who governed in their respective tribes, (C.) were only roused to this act of vigour some time after, on seeing the preparations of the Chanaanites, particularly of Adonibezec, whose power became very alarming. H.—Indeed it is wonderful how he had escaped the vigilance of Josue, if he had been king during the lifetime (C.) of that enterprising leader. It is therefore more likely that he took advantage of the lethargy of the Israelites after his death, and rose to a degree of eminence, which made the people of God consult the high priest, how they were to resist his efforts, (H.) who was to be their generalissimo, (C.) or which of the tribes was to make head against him. M.—God only gave answer to the last question, and it does not appear that all Israel was engaged in this war. After the defeat of the king, the different tribes might easily have subdued the enemies who held possession of part of their territory, if they had been vigorous.

Ver. 2. Said, by the mouth of Phinees, (Josephus v. 2,) who had succeeded Eleazar in the pontificate. The latter survived Josue some time, so that this must have happened some time later. Le Clerc offers violence to the text, when he asserts that the war against Adonibezec took place under the government of Josue.—Juda. Some suppose that this is the name of the leader: but most people conclude from the sequel, that it designated the tribe. C.—This first judge was of this tribe, but not all of them. The manner of consulting the Lord was by the high priest praying before the tabernacle. Ex. 29. W.

Ver. 3. Brother. They had the same mother, Lia, and were intermixed in the same country. The two tribes unite both for the public and their own private advantage. The king whom they attacked first, did not dwell in the territory of Juda, as the others did, whom they defeated in this chapter.

Ver. 4. Pherezite. This name denotes “a countryman,” as the former does “a merchant.” None of the children of Chanaan were of this appellation. Gen. 10:15. The people of the country assembled therefore at Bezec, where Saul called a rendezvous when he was going to attack Jabes, and which seems to have been near the Jordan, 17 miles from Sichem. Eus. S. Jer.—It signifies “lightning.” A place of this name lies to the west of Bethlehem. M.

Ver. 5. Adonibezec, “Lord of Bezec.” The cruelty of this tyrant, and the oppression which he probably made some of the Israelites suffer, roused their attention, and they treated him as he had treated others. He had perhaps recourse to such a cruel expedient, to disable his enemies from ever entering the lists against him afterwards, as the Athenians, who cut off the fingers of the inhabitants of Egina, that these islanders might not dispute with them the empire of the sea. Cic. Offic. 3. Some have thus maimed themselves that they might be exempted from going to war, a practice not unusual among the Romans; and the Italian word poltron, signifies one whose fingers are cut off, as it was supposed, out of cowardice. David ordered the hands and the feet of the murderers of Isboseth to be cut off, and this sort of punishment is common in the eastern countries. Eight hundred Greeks who had been treated in this manner by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander, at Persepolis, to implore his protection. Curt. &c.

Ver. 7. Table, at different times. H.—These were probably princes of some cities of Chanaan, who had been conquered by the tyrant. He obliged them to feed, like dogs, of what he threw down from his splendid table. Thus Sesostris made the kings whom he had overcome, drag his chariot. Sapor forced the Emperor Valerian to serve as a footstool, when he got on horseback. Tamberlane fed Bajazet in a cage, like a wild beast. Jovius, &c. C.—Me. So true is that Wisdom (11:17,) by what things a man sinneth, by the same also he is tormented. M.

Ver. 8. Jerusalem. This city was divided into two; one part was called Jebus, the other Salem; the one was in the tribe of Juda, the other in the tribe of Benjamin. After it was taken and burnt by the men of Juda, it was quickly rebuilt again by the Jebusites, as we may gather from v. 21, and continued in their possession till it was taken by king David. Ch.—Fire. They treated it with such severity, because it seems to have revolted, (Serarius) though the text of Josue (10:25,) only says that the king was slain. But (C. 15:63 and here) v. 21 it is said, that the children of Juda and of Benjamin dwelt along with the Jebusites.

Ver. 9. Plains, towards the west, which were very fruitful. They did not expel all the inhabitants from this part, as they had done from the mountains, which lay on the south of the promised land, v. 19. C.

Ver. 10. Hebron. This expedition against Hebron, &c. is the same as is related Jos. 15:24. It is here repeated, to give the reader at once a short sketch of all the achievements of the tribe of Juda against the Chanaanites. Ch.—Josue had taken Hebron before; (Jos. 10:37,) and Caleb retakes it. C.

Ver. 11. The city of letters. Perhaps so called, from some famous school or library kept there. Ch.—The explanation, that is, &c. is added by the Vulg. H.—Madrid, in Arabic, means “the mother of sciences.” M.

Ver. 13. Brother, or near relation, but much younger. See Jos. 15:17. C.

Ver. 16. The Cinite. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was called Cinæus, or the Cinite: and his children, who came along with the children of Israel, settled themselves among them in the land of Chanaan, embracing their worship and religion. From these the Rechabites sprang, of whom see Jerem. 35.—The city of palms. Jericho, so called from the abundance of palm-trees, (Ch). or rather Engaddi, which is sometimes called Hazazon-Thamar, on that account. It lies nearer to the Dead Sea. Jericho was not rebuilt till the reign of Achab. See Jos. 6:26.—Arad was one of the most southern towns of Juda, near the country of the Amalecites. Saul ordered the descendants of Jethro to depart from among them. 1 K. 15:6. The Israelites had defeated the king of Arad long before. Num. 21:1. C.—With him. Heb. “the people” of Israel, (M.) or of Arad. C.

Ver. 17. Sephaath, near Maresa, where Asa defeated the king of Arabia. 2 Par. 14:9. It was also called Sephata, and afterwards Horma. C.—Sept. “they anathematized it, and utterly destroyed it, and they called the city Exolethreusis, “utter ruin.” H.—Whether they had engaged themselves by vow to do so, or they treated the city in this manner in thanksgiving for the victory, is uncertain. M.

Ver. 18. Gaza, &c. These were three of the principal cities of the Philistines, famous both in sacred and profane history. They were taken at this time by the Israelites; but as they took no care to put garrisons in them, the Philistines soon recovered them again, (Ch). or perhaps the villages and territory were only seized by Juda; the cities being too well defended. Josue had not attacked them. Jos. 12:3. Josephus says that only Ascalon and Azotus, in the plain, fell into the hands of the Israelites; and the Roman Sept. reads with a negation, (C.) which is inserted by Grabe in his edition as an interpolation, or as a peculiarity of the Alex. MSS. “and Juda did (not) possess Gaza with its dependencies, and Ascalon ... and Accaron ... and Azotus, with its fields around.” H.—The situation of Gaza, Ascalon and Accaron in the plain, would seem to secure them from being captured, v. 19. S. Aug. and Procopius admit the negation. But the original and all the versions reject it, so that the children of Juda must have had possession of these cities at least for a short time. C. See C. 15 and 16. 1 K. 6:17. M.

Ver. 19. Was not able, &c. Through a cowardly fear of their chariots armed with hooks and scythes, and for want of confidence in God. Ch.

—Heb. does not say expressly that Juda could not: quia non ad expellendum, &c. He had not the courage or the will. With God's assistance, what had he to fear? Were these Philistines with their chariots, more terrible than the giants in their fortresses?—Scythes. Heb. receb barzel, "chariots of iron." C.—The Rom. and Alex. Sept. have "Rechab was opposed to them." H.—The edit. of Basil adds, "and they had chariots of iron," as S. Aug. (q. 5,) reads. A double translation is thus given. C.—These chariots were calculated to cut down all that came in contact with them. Curt. iv. W.

Ver. 20. Enac, mentioned v. 10. Sept. add, that "he took the three cities ... and destroyed," &c. See Jos. 15:14. H.

Ver. 21. Day, before the reign of David. See Jos. 15:63. The Jebusites occupied the citadel, &c. C.

Ver. 22. Of Joseph, on the west side of the Jordan, attacked Bethel, which it does not appear that Josue molested. H.—Instead of house, some Heb. MSS. and the Arab. and Sept. read, "the sons," which seems to be the better reading. Kennicott.

Ver. 23. Besieging. Heb. "sent to descry," or they came upon it like spies.

Ver. 24. Mercy. The city belonged of right to them, so that they might use this means, as they were not bound to enquire by what motives the man was actuated thus to betray his country. He might be convinced, like Rahab, that God had granted it to the Israelites, and these might justly requite his good dispositions and suffer him to depart in peace. Bonf. Grot. C.

Ver. 26. Hetthim. The Hethite lived towards the south of Chanaan. The man probably retired into the stony Arabia, where we find the city of Lusa or Elysa. Ptolemy v. 16.—He gave it this name in memory of his native city, (C.) which was called Luza, or "of nuts." M.

Ver. 27. Bethsan, &c. See Jos. 17:11.—Began. Heb. "would dwell." H.—The Israelites sinfully acquiesced, partly through slothfulness and the dislike of war, and partly that they might receive tribute from the Chanaanites. M.

Ver. 28. Them. We shall see the punishment of their prevarication during the greatest part of this book. C.

Ver. 31. Accho. Heb. haco. The Greeks not knowing the derivation of this word, supposed that the city was so called from ake, "a remedy," as they pretend that Hercules was cured in this place. It was also called Ptolemais, after the king of Egypt. The little river Belus, and the famous bed of sand so proper for making glass, were in the neighbourhood. Plin. v. 19.—Ahalab. The situation is unknown, unless it be Aleppo. They say it is the famous city of Berea. C.

Ver. 35. He dwelt. That is, the Amorrrhite. Ch.—Heb. “But the Amorrrhites would dwell in Mount Hares, in Aialon, and in Salebim.” Some copies of the Sept. seem to give the meaning of these proper names, though inaccurately. H.—Solomon had one of his twelve officers at Salebim, in the tribe of Dan. 3 K. 4:9.

Ver. 36. Rock, Petra, the capital of Arabia, which Josephus (iii. 2,) assigns to Amalec. The Amorrrhites dwelt in many parts of the land of promise, (C.) particularly in the higher places about the Dead Sea. H.

JUDGES 2

Ver. 1. An angel. Taking the shape of a man, (Ch). such as had appeared to Josue, (C. 5:13. M.) the guardian angel of Israel. H.—The Jews commonly suppose that it was Phinees, the high priest. Mal. 2:8. Drusius. But he might be dead with the rest of the ancients when this took place, as the Israelites seem to have experienced many difficulties in consequence of their repeated prevarications, before this messenger was sent to them. He might very probably be some prophet, who speaks in the name of God, (Agg. 1:13,) as he is said to come not from heaven, but from Galgal to the place of weepers. Heb. at Habbocim, “the mulberry trees.” Sept. Klauthmon. This place, the valley of tears, (Ps. 83:7,) perhaps received his name afterwards, from what happened, v. 4. Some suppose it designates Silo, where the people might be assembled on some great festival, and where sacrifice was offered, v. 5. Bonfrere collects from the Sept. and Josephus, (vii. 4,) that it lay beyond the vale of the Raphaim, on the south side of Jerusalem, (M.) where this messenger might summon the people together, and authorize them to offer sacrifice, as was frequently done (C.) by dispensation (H.) at a distance from the tabernacle. C. 6:20 and 13:19.—I made. If he was an angel, his authority could not be called in question; and if he was the high priest, or a prophet known to the people, they would hear him with attention and respect. C.—He appeared at least in human form, and spoke in the name of God. W. Jos. 5.

Ver. 2. League. None of a public nature had been perhaps made by the whole nation, to sanction the idolatry of the Chanaanites. But so many individuals had entered into marriages with them and imitated their perverse manners, so many tribes had spared the cities, &c. that the Israelites in general merited the reprimand. Whether these leagues, made in contradiction to God's command, were to be observed or broken, in a matter of dispute. We may steer a middle course, and assert that such agreements as stipulated the protection of the idolatrous worship and altars, were null, and never to be observed; whereas those which secured to the inhabitants their lives and property, could not be lawfully broken, though the contractors did wrong in making such leagues. See 1 Esd. 9. C.

Ver. 3. Ruin. Sept. "stumbling block," the occasion of ruin. M.—Thus by a false compassion (C.) and negligence, the Israelites brought upon themselves the most serious difficulties, while those whom they had spared, turned against them by a just judgment of God, and proved the ruin both of their souls and bodies, by drawing them into idolatry and then putting them to the sword. H.

Ver. 5. Lord: holocausts to acknowledge his dominion, and sacrifices of expiation for the transgressions of the people. Only the tabernacle and temple were appointed for such sacrifices, though they might be offered elsewhere by dispensation. S. Aug. q. 36. W.

Ver. 6. And Josue, &c. This is here inserted out of Josue, (24) by way of recapitulation of what had happened before, and by way of an introduction to that which follows. Ch.—The sacred penman gives a short description of the general conduct of the Israelites, shewing how they abandoned their former fidelity, after Josue and the elders were no more, and in consequence were severely punished. Upon their repentance, God shewed them mercy again and again, as will be explained more at large (H.) in the subsequent chapters. Salien and some others have hence inferred, that Josue was living when the angel made this reproach. C.—But that is contradicted by many passages in the Book of Josue, where the fidelity of the people is commended, as well as here, v. 7; and C. 1 we read of the death of Josue, so that S. Aug. (q. 14,) says, "there can be no doubt but this is a recapitulation." M.—As little had been said before, to enable us to see the grounds of the accusation, these few remarks are subjoined to justify the words of the angel, who appeared while the people was groaning under the afflictions which their sins deserved. C.

Ver. 10. Fathers. These expressions prove the immortality of the soul. Job 34:4. &c. Knew not, or did not approve or cordially serve the Lord. His tabernacle was still at Silo. But many joined the worship of idols with that of the true God, (C.) and light and darkness can never agree. H.

Ver. 12. They followed strange gods. What is here said of the children of Israel, as to their falling so often into idolatry, is to be understood of a great part of them; but not so universally, as if the true worship of God was ever quite abolished among them: for the succession of the true church and religion was kept up all this time by the priest and Levites, at least in the house of God in Silo. Ch.—At different times God raised up deliverers, who were taken from among his people, and no doubt abhorred the impiety of the multitude.

Ver. 13. Baal, “Lord,” a title given to many of the idols, (H.) both male and female. M.—They are often distinguished by some additional name, as Beelzebub, “fly,” and berith, “covenant,” gods adored at Accaron and Sichem. Under this name the pagans adored heaven or the sun, (C.) as Astaroth denoted some female deity, the moon, Venus, &c. M.

Ver. 14. Who took. Heb. “that spoiled them, and he sold” or abandoned them, &c. C.

Ver. 16. Them, for any long time. Their inconstancy was astonishing. H.—These judges raised up by God, or chose by the people under his direction, often rescued Israel from servitude; and during the remainder of their lives, watched to see the laws put in execution, being assisted by the counsels of the senators (M.) and magistrates of the nation. H.—They were commissioned to rescue the penitent and suffering Israelites. W.

Ver. 17. Quickly. They had persevered in virtue under the government of Josue and of the elders, for the space of forty years, according to Marsham and Houbigant. The former places the first state of anarchy and of idolatry 34 years after Josue, allowing 15 years for the administration of the surviving ancients, and the remainder to bring the nation to such a pitch of wickedness as to force God to abandon it to the dominion of Chusan, for eight years.—Walked. Heb. and Sept. “walked, obeying the commands of the Lord: they did not so.”

Ver. 18. Moved, &c. Heb. and Sept. “and the Lord was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge, (for it repented the Lord (Sept. he was moved to compassion) on account of their groans, &c.) H.—The repentance of God denotes a change of conduct in our regard. C.—Delivered. Hence the judges have the title of Saviour. C. 3:9. 2 Esd. 9:27. M.

Ver. 19. And did. Heb. “and corrupted themselves.” Sept. “were more depraved than," &c.—By which, &c. is put instead of the Heb. "their stubborn (or hard) (H.) Chal. 'corrupt' way." This hard and rough path denotes the labours which the wicked have to encounter, in the pursuit of pleasure, as they themselves confess. We wearied ourselves in the way of iniquity ... and have walked through hard ways. Wisd. 5:7. C.—Though the life of the libertine seem delightful, it draws on the most serious evils and provokes the anger of God. M.

Ver. 21. Nations. Heb. "any." Sept. "a man of those nations," which must be understood, unless the Israelites return to a proper sense of their duty. For then he destroyed not only individuals, but whole armies, by the hand of the judges. Yet we do not find that such havoc was made among the infidels afterwards, as had been made in the days of Josue. They frequently rose up and harassed the Israelites; and God suffered them to do so, that the latter might learn to know themselves, and might perceive how dreadful a thing it is not to comply, at first, with his injunctions. H.

Ver. 22. Or not. The secrets of hearts cannot be hidden from the omniscience of God. C.—But he would have an experimental knowledge of the fidelity of his people, by leaving these nations in the midst of them. It was partly on this account that he withdrew the sword of Josue, who would otherwise have easily followed up his victories, and exterminated all the inhabitants. The cowardice and secret indispositions of the people was another obstacle. H.—God acted like a person who distrusted the fidelity of his servant, and left something in his way to see if we would steal it. C.

Ver. 1. Instruct. The original is translated try, v. 4, and C. 2:22.—And all. Heb. "as many of Israel as had not," &c. H.—Those who had served under Josue, were so strongly impressed with a sense of the divine power and severity, that they never forgot them: but there was a danger lest their children should grow careless, if they were suffered to enjoy a constant state of prosperity. Virtue or power is made perfect in infirmity. 2 Cor. 12:9. C.—He that hath been experienced in many things, multiplieth prudence. Eccli. 34:10.

Ver. 2. And be. Heb. "at least, such as before knew nothing thereof." Though war be in itself an evil, the passions of men render it necessary, and God makes use of it as a scourge, to punish the wicked, and at the same time to keep all under due restraint. H.—Too long a peace has proved sometimes fatal to states and to the virtue of individuals. In adversity we call upon God, and adhere to him with greater fervour and constancy. The Jews were so prone to evil, that, if they were permitted to enjoy tranquility for a few years, they presently forgot themselves and the author of all their good, and even turned their backs upon the only true God. Their enemies forced them to have recourse to Him. C.

Ver. 3. Princes, (satrapas) a Persian word. M.—These heads of the five great cities of the Philistines, are called Seranim, (H.) but never kings, whether they were governors of so many petty states, united in the same form of republican or aristocratical government, or independent of each other. See Jos. 13. Three of these cities are said to have been taken by Juda, (C. 1:18,) unless the Sept. be more accurate, as this passage would seem to insinuate. C.—They might have thrown off the yoke in a short time, as we before observed. These five cities were Gaza, Geth, Ascalon, Azotus, and Accaron. H.—All but Geth were on the Mediterranean sea. C.—All the Chanaanites, &c. who dwelt in Libanus, with some others, who were dispersed through the country, v. 5. H.—These chiefly inhabited the environs of Sidon.—Baal Hermon. The idol of Baal might probably be adored on this mountain. M.—We find Baal-gad in the same neighbourhood, and both may mean the same city. C.

Ver. 4. Not. Various reasons are assigned, on the part of God, for not exterminating these nations at once. But their being spared so long, must be imputed to the disobedience of the Israelites, otherwise they would surely never have been tolerated with their idol-worship in the land of promise, to contaminate, by their wicked example, the manners of God's people. If they would have redeemed their lives, they must at least have given up the land and their idols. As the Israelites proved so little zealous in destroying the latter, they were justly punished by God, in being deprived of what would have contributed to make them richer and more comfortable in this world. H.

Ver. 6. Gods. This was the fatal consequence which God had foretold. Deut. 7:4. H.

Ver. 7. Astaroth. Heb. Asheroth, Sept. “the groves,” (M.) of which Astaroth was the goddess, (C.) like Diana. C. 2:11. Various trees were sacred to idols. M.

Ver. 8. Chusan. This name leads us to conclude that this prince was of Scythian extraction, a descendant of Chus: (C.) it signifies “black,” or an Ethiopian.” M.—Rasathaim was perhaps the place of his nativity. As it means “of two sorts of malice,” Arias thinks that the Syrian kings took this title to shew that they would punish or repress all crimes against the civil or criminal law, (M.) those which affected the property as well as the lives of their subjects. H.—Mesopotamia. In Hebrew Aram naharayim. Syria of the two rivers; so called because it lies between the Euphrates and the Tigris. It is absolutely called Syria, v. 10. Ch.—Eight years, by manual labour and presents, testifying their submission to their oppressor, who might not perhaps live among them. C.—Moir’s edition, by mistake, reads eighty years. The Hebrews were equally fallible. C. 3:30. H.

Ver. 9. Saviour. “We must remark, that the man by whom God grants us safety, is styled a saviour,” (S. Aug. q. 18,) though Christ is the proper and principal Saviour. W.—Caleb. Sept. “the younger son of Cenez, who was the brother of Caleb.” H.—Othoniel was one of the ancients. If he could not prevent the people from falling into idolatry, he rescued them from it. C.

Ver. 10. In him, to instruct and enable him both to rout the enemy, and to govern the people with prudence. H.—Chal. “the spirit of prophecy.” The oracle excited him to attack Chusan. Joseph. v. 3. He was entrusted with an extraordinary authority, in a wonderful manner, and God gave him all those virtues which were requisite for his exalted station. C.—Him. Heb. “his hand was strong upon Chusan Rasathaim.” He gained a complete victory over him, (H.) the particulars of which are not mentioned, though they must have been very interesting and extraordinary, as the power of Chusan was so extensive. C.

Ver. 11. Died, “forty years after Josue, according to the chronology of Usher, which we follow,” (C.) or rather Usher translates the land began to rest “in the fortieth year” from the peace of Josue. He places the death to that leader A. 2570, and the end of Chusan’s dominion 2599; so that, if we deduct 40 years from this last date, we shall come to the year 2559, the sixth of Josue’s administration, when he began to divide the conquered lands. He supposes that the peace of Othoniel lasted about 62 years, when Eglon disturbed it for eighteen years. “Aod delivered Israel. After him Samgar appeared, and the land rested till the 80th year from the peace of Othoniel.” Houbigant censures this indiscriminate use of cardinal and of ordinal numbers, and the blending times of servitude with those of peace; (H.) and “surely this method of reckoning is very harsh, and contrary to the usual acceptation of words.” C.—Yet it is adopted by many. W.—It may suit to form a system, but can have no solid foundation. H.—The epoch from which Usher dates is no where so distinctly specified, as that we should suppose that the author of the Book of Judges had it in view. Moreover, by this method, we are left to guess how long each of the judges reigned, or how long the peace which they had procured, subsisted. Usher admits that they years of servitude are specified; and, why not also the years of peace, since they are expressed exactly in the same manner? If the ordinal numbers 40th, 80th, &c. were intended, b would be prefixed, as Deut. 1:3.; and this grammatical observation along, suffices to overturn the calculation of Usher. Houbig. Proleg.—Salien dates from the death of Josue in 2600, and allows that 40 years elapsed from that period till the decease of Othoniel; including the years which some attribute to the ancients, and to the anarchy; (C. 17. &c. to the end,) and also the eight years of servitude; so that instead of a rest of 40 years, we shall find that all was in confusion the greatest part of the time. The idolatry of Israel, which shortly brought on the servitude under Eglon, commenced immediately after the conclusion of these 40 years, when Salien begins to enumerate the years of Aod's government. Thus he does from one judge to another. This system does not indeed make the text bend to uphold it, but it supposes that the sacred writer includes anarchy and servitude under the name of rest. In these matters much is to be supplied by conjecture, and hence the chronological difficulties which infidels propose, to invalidate the authority of the Scripture, can have but little weight, till the learned shall have discovered the exact disposition of former times. The first judge of Israel was of the tribe of Juda. The second was chosen from the almost ruined tribe of Benjamin, as the learned commonly place the dreadful catastrophe which befel that tribe during the anarchy which ensued, and the death of Josue and of the ancients. Aod had no share in the crime. H.

Ver. 12. Eglon, signifies “a calf.” C.—God made use of this prince to scourge his people, with the assistance of the neighbouring nations. He took Engaddi, in the plains of Jericho, and was thus enabled to keep an eye both upon his own subjects and the conquered Israelites. C.—Here he probably met with his untimely end. H.

Ver. 15. Aod, signifies “praise,” whence perhaps Josephus calls him Judes which has the same import. M.—He was a descendant of Jemini or Benjamin, by his son Gera. Gen. 46:1.—Right. Sept. and many interpreters agree, that Aod was “Ambidexter,” a quality which Plato exhorted those who were designed for war, to strive to acquire. Several of the heroes before Troy are praised on this account; and the Scripture takes particular notice of 700 citizens of Gabaa, who could use both hands alike, and could hit even a hair with a stone. C. 20:16. The Jews explain itter, very absurdly; Aod “had his right hand maimed or tied;" (C.) and Prot. render "a man left-handed." H.—This would be a very awkward recommendation for a warrior, though it is pretended that such are more resolute, and more difficult to encounter than others. The number of the men at Gabaa who are praised for their skill, as well as the brave men of David, (1 Par. 12:2,) shews sufficiently that the term does not mean left-handed. But the Scripture here takes notice that Aod could use his left hand so well, because he placed his dagger, contrary to custom, on his right side, and the motions of his left hand would not be so narrowly watched. Rufin does not agree with the present text of Josephus, which indeed seems very confused saying, "that all the strength of Aod lay in his left hand." Gelenius also translates, utraque manu ex æquo promptus; (Ant. v. 5,) so that perhaps the Greek of Josephus may have been altered.—Presents; that is, tribute; an odious expression, instead of which the Scripture often puts presents, 1 K. 10:27. 1 Par. 18:2. No tribute was imposed in Persia till the reign of Darius Hystaspes; the subject had to make presents to the king. Herod. iii. 89. C.

Ver. 16. He made, or procured, though it was formerly honourable for a person to do such things himself. C.—Hand. Heb. gomed, is translated by the Prot. "of a cubit length," (H.) though the term is never used elsewhere for that measure. Sept. have spithamé, measure of 12 fingers.—Garment. The sagum, as well as the Sept. mandua, from the Heb. mad, denote a military garment. But such a dress might have rendered Aod suspected, (C.) unless an uniform might then be deemed a suitable dress for an ambassador. H.—Thigh. The Jews wore the sword there; (Ps. 44:4,) and it would be more convenient on the left thigh, as the nations of Gaul and Germany had it, while the Roman cavalry wore the sword on the right; and the infantry had two swords, the long one on the left, and a shorter, about an hand's length, on the right. Joseph. Bel. iii. 3. Lipsius.

Ver. 17. Fat. The ancient version used by S. Aug. had, "lean," which he justly took in an ironical sense. Sept. asteios, signifies "beautiful and genteel." C.—Serarius explains it in the same sense as the Vulgate. M.

Ver. 18. Him; or according to the Heb. Sept. and Chal. "he sent away the men who had brought the presents." C.—But it seems he followed after them as far as Galgal, (H.) whence he returned, as if he had been consulting the oracle, and had orders to communicate something of importance to the king, unless we translate, "He dismissed, &c. (19) and as he was returned from the idols at Galgal, he said," &c. at the same interview. C.—He would not expose his companions to danger. M.

Ver. 19. Idols. Heb. pesilim. Some take these to be only heaps of stones. Prot. "quarries." H.—But the Sept. &c. represent them as "carved" idols. The same expression is used Ex. 20:4, &c. The Moabites had probably placed idols here, to profane that sacred place, which was resorted to out of devotion by the Israelites. Osee 4:14. Amos 4:5. Here also the prophets inform us that the ten tribes adored and consulted idols; resembling perhaps that of Michas, C. 17:4.—Silence to Aod, (C.) that none of the people might be able to divulge the secret. Heb. "be thou silent." M.

Ver. 20. Alone. Heb. "Aod approached unto him, and he was sitting in a summer parlour, which he had for himself, alone." It seems to have been a private closet, to which he retired for greater secrecy, as his officers concluded that he was there only to ease nature. H.—It might be rendered, "a hall of audience." C.—But the place where Aod presented the tribute, was more probably of this description, and Eglon retired thence into a back parlour, and was followed by Aod, alone, v. 24. H.—A word. What Aod, who was judge and chief magistrate of Israel, did on this occasion, was by a special inspiration of God: but such things are not to be imitated by private men. Ch. S. Aug. q. 20. Num. 25. W.—Heb. "a thing (message, &c.) from God, (Aleim) or the gods." Probably the king would imagine that he was speaking of the idols at Galgal, and being full of awe for them, would be off his guard, and rise up out of respect. See Num. 23:18. Ex. 3:5. C.—But as the word Elohim was only abusively applied to idols and to great men, Aod might say with truth, that he had a word or an errand from Elohim to the king, without minding in what sense Eglon would take the expression. See S. Aug. q. 20. Orig. hom. 4. Though God permitted this king to attack his people, and to scourge them for a time, he did not approve of his injustice, and now authorized the chief magistrate of Israel to revenge their wrongs. H.—God is the arbiter of our lives, and may order whatsoever he pleases to put us to death. But the doctrine of J. Huss, who preached, "It is lawful for every subject to kill any tyrant," was condemned in the C. of Constance. David severely punished the man who pretended that he had slain Saul. The first Christians never entered into any revolt against those cruel and impious emperors who oppressed them, and whose title to the throne was evidently unjust. See Rom. 13:1. Under what government are all satisfied, or of the same religion with the sovereign? Even if any should pretend that they have an order from God to kill a tyrant, they must give proof of their commission to the lawful superiors, or they must expect to be treated as fanatical impostors. C.—Throne; or Heb. "seat." The throne of state would not probably be placed in a retired chamber. H.—The king rose up out of respect to the deity; (M.) and at the same moment, Aod plunged the dagger into his bowels. H.

Ver. 22. With, &c. Heb. Prot. "And the haft also went in after the blade, and the fat closed upon the blade, so that he could not draw the dagger out of his belly, and the dirt came out." By the word belly, the Jews mean all the vital parts. C.—The wound was so deep, that Aod did not think proper to strive long to extract his sword; and indeed, being all bloody, it would have only tended to excite suspicion. H.—The Chal. agrees with the Vulg. in rendering parshedona "excrements," though it seem to be rather irregularly in construction with a masc. [], &c. If we should read peristana, "a porch," the difficulty would be avoided. C.—Sept. "(23) and Aod went out into the porch, (prostada) and he shut the doors of the upper chamber ... (24) and he himself went out." H.

Ver. 24. Door. Lyranus would prefer porticum, "the porch," as the Chal. explains the Heb. by exedra, a portico highly ornamented with pillars and seats, where the princes formerly used to administer justice. Homer give a grand description of the portico of Alcinous. Odys. H.—See that of Solomon described, 3 K. 7:6. C.—The Rom. Sept. adds after prostada, what may perhaps be a second version, "and he went through those who were drawn up," of the guards. He shewed no signs of fear. H.—It was not necessary for him to take the key with him, as a common one was used for several chambers, and was necessary only to unloose some bands, with which the doors were fastened. The keys in the East are very large, and of a very different construction from ours. C.—Nature. Heb. "he covereth his feet." The ancients did not wear breeches: they covered themselves with great care. C. See Deut. 23:13. H.—Parlour. Heb. "chamber." Sept. "bed-chamber."

Ver. 25. Ashamed, perceiving that their hopes had been vain, (C.) and not knowing what to do, (M.) they began to fear the worst. H.

Ver. 26. Confusion. Heb. "tarrying," as they waited a long time before they ventured to open the door.

Ver. 27. Seirath seems to have been on the road from Galgal to Mount Ephraim. Some conjecture that Josephus speaks of it under the name of Syriad, (C.) where he saw the inscriptions, which he asserts were left by the children of Seth before the deluge. H.—They might perhaps be the idols which are mentioned here.

Ver. 28. Fords. That none, from the other side, might come to the assistance of the Moabites, (M.) who were at their prince's court, in the territory of Jericho, and that none of these might make their escape. H.

Ver. 29. Strong. Heb. lit. “the fatness,” denoting what is most excellent. Ps. 21:30 and 77:31. C.—Eglon would have his chief nobility and most valiant soldiers round his person. H.

Ver. 30. Eighty. The Hebrews use the letter p to express this number; and, as it is very like their c, which stands for 20, Houbigant suspects that he first number is a mistake of the transcribers. Usher confesses that it is “extremely improbable” that Aod should have governed so long, after he had slain Eglon, as he must have been at that time, about 40 years old; and the Israelites were not often so constant for such a length of time. Houbig. Proleg.—But this difficulty does not affect Usher, as he brings Aod forward only in the 80th year from the peace of Othniel; and instead of allowing him 80 years of peaceful sway, he says Samgar appeared after him; but, it seems, both together did not reign a year, since in that 80th year, he commences the servitude, which Jabin brought upon Israel, from A. 2679 till 2699, and peace was not restored by Barac for about 20 years! H.

Ver. 31. Samgar. His reign seems to have been short, and only perhaps extended over the tribes of Juda, Simeon, and Dan, while Debbora governed in another part. Some exclude him from the list of judges. But Josephus, Origen, &c. allow his title, with most of the moderns. C.—The Alex. Chronicle gives his reign of 24 years, which Salien would understand, as if he had acted under the orders of Aod, when the latter was grown too old, if the author had not said that “after the death of Aod, Samgar, his son, judged Israel 24 years,” which he subtracts from the 80 years allotted to Aod. He makes Bocci succeed Abisue in the pontificate, at the same time, which Salien admits, A. 2696.—Hundred. Sept. “as far as 600,” which might be at different times, when the Philistines were dispersed through the country in order to plunder.—Plough-share. Sept. aratropodi. H.—Some translate the Heb. “an ox-goad.” Maundrell describes those, which are used in Palestine, as eight feet long; and, at the thick end, 10 inches round, with a kind of spade, to clean the plough, while the other end is very sharp. Samgar might probably use such an instrument. From its being mentioned, we may gather that he did not engage the enemy in a pitched battle, (C.) but as he could find an opportunity. Thus Samson slew 1000 of the same nation with the jaw-bone of an ass. C. 15. H.—Defended. Heb. and Sept. “saved,” which shews that he was a proper judge. M.—It is true, he did not rescue the Israelites entirely, but he stood up in their defence. C.—The duration of his government is not specified, nor is it said that the land rested, because he ruled for a short time only: Josephus says not quite a year; and the roads were continually infested with the incursions of the Philistines on the south, and of the Chanaanites on the North. C. 5:6. Samgar seems to have been a ploughman, and he seized the first weapon that came to hand. The Hungarians and Spaniards formerly defended themselves against the attacks of the Turks and Moors with their plough-shares, in memory of which the Spaniards long after went armed to plough. The most valiant Roman generals, Camillus, Curius, Cincinnatus, and Fabricius, were called from the plough to the Dictatorship; and Pliny (xviii.) observes, that “countrymen make the best soldiers.”

Ver. 1. Aod. Samgar is passed over, either because he was only a private man, who performed a feat of valour like Jahel, (C. 5:6. Salien) or because his government was so short and limited. Hence we need not wonder that he could not put a stop to the ravages of the Chanaanites, nor to the disorders of the people.

Ver. 2. Asor. Josue defeated the king of this country. Jos. 11:8. But some of his successors had contrived to raise themselves again to power. His dominion probably extended only over the tribes of Nephthali, Zabulon, and Issachar, while Debbora judged in Mount Ephraim, and Samgar in Juda.—He dwelt. It is not clear whether Jabin or Sisara dwelt in Haroseth, but most probably it was the latter, v. 13. This city was on the northern banks of the Semechonite lake, (C.) surrounded with “woods,” as the Heb. word signifies; (Vatab.) though Bonfrere explains it “a shop, foundry, or arsenal,” as if the arms and chariots were made and kept here. A mixture of different idolatrous nations dwelt in it.

Ver. 3. Scythes. Heb. “chariots of iron.” C.

Ver. 4. Lapidoth, signifies “lamps,” and Barac, “thunder;” which has given rise to various conjectures, as if they were the same person. S. Ambrose thinks that Debbora was a widow at this time, and the mother of Barac. But S. Jerom says there is no proof of either. Others suppose that the excellence of the gift of prophecy would not permit her to cohabit with her husband. It is not unusual for women to possess this gift. Mary, the sister of Moses, Holda, the blessed Virgin, the daughter of S. Philip, &c. were prophetesses. The devil most commonly chose women to explain his oracles.—Judged. Many deny that this word is taken in the same latitude here, as when it is applied to men. The Jews exclude women from government, and Athalia was only a tyrant. The Roman laws will not admit women to exercise the right of judicature. But the text, as it is explained by the Fathers in general, will not permit us to refuse the prerogatives of a judge to Debbora. Her authority was not merely voluntary, in consequence of the people's high opinion of her, as many would believe, with Salien, (W.) &c. (H.) but she gave decisions which were binding on the Israelites; and she seems to have continued in the exercise of her functions along with Barac, after the victory which they gained over Sisara. The government of the latter was perhaps limited to the tribes which he had rescued from slavery. C.—He is guided by her counsel, as Christian princes ought to be by their spiritual superiors. Orig. W.

Ver. 5. Name. Heb. “she dwelt (or sat to judge) under the palm-tree of Debbora.” “The oak of weeping,” allon Bachuth, under which Debbora, the nurse of Rebecca, was interred, was also near Bethel. Gen. 35:8. H.—This city was on the confines of the tribes of Ephraim and of Benjamin, over which Debbora chiefly exercised her authority; and here she was consulted by the people. C.

Ver. 6. Cedes. There was another city of this name in Juda. H.—Barac was of the tribe of Nephthali. C.—The Lord, &c. Prot. translate, “hath not the Lord?” &c. as if the will of God had been notified to him before. We find that he make some demur, v. 8. H.—Thabor. A city of this name was also built at the foot or on the top of the mountain, and belonged to Zabulon. In it attributed to the Levites, 1 Par. 6:77. The mountain rises in the midst of a vast plain, to the height of 30 stadia, (Joseph. Bel. iv. 2. S. Jer. in Ose. v. 1,) or above 3000 paces, “which make a league, or an hour's walk.” It is inaccessible on the northern side. There was a platform two-thirds as broad, at the top, where Polybius says a fortified city stood. Antiochus took possession of this strong-place, and Josephus repaired the fortifications, to keep the country in subjection. It is commonly supposed the Jesus Christ was transfigured on this once delightful mountain, which is now a desert. During the crusades, there was an episcopal city and a Benedictine monastery here. C.

Ver. 7. Hand. Cison flows through a luxuriant vale or champaign country, on the south of Mount Thabor, whence Barac came rushing down the rocks and precipices upon the army of Sisara. C. 5:15. C.—This general was delivered into the hand of Barac, to be routed, though he was afterwards slain by the hand of Jahel, v. 9 and 21. H.

Ver. 8. Not go. Sept. and S. Aug. (q. 26,) add, “because I know not when the Lord will send his angel to grant me success.” S. Paul (Heb. 11:32,) praises the faith of Barac, so that he spoke thus out of prudence, that the people, seeing (C.) their revered prophetess in his company, (H.) might not condemn the undertaking as too rash and perilous. He therefore entreats her, in this earnest manner, to come with him, and point out the time when he must attack the enemy.

Ver. 9. Thee. Prot. “the journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisara,” &c. It is certain, however, that Barac acquired great commendations on this occasion: but if he had not been accompanied by Debbora, he would not have shared the glory of the victory with her and another woman. H.—Some suppose that Debbora speaks of herself; others explain her words of Jahel. They may both be right. M.—Cedes. Here the Israelites took the generous resolution to throw off the yoke, and marched to seize the fort of Thabor. This motion gave the alarm to Jabin, who sent his general to besiege them, and to occupy the passages of the Cison. C. 5:18.

Ver. 11. Valley. Heb. elon, may denote also, (Sept.) “a wood of oaks,” (C.) or a plain. H.—Haber probably left the first settlement of the Cinites near Engaddi, when his brethren went (C.) into the southern parts of the tribe of Juda. C. 1:16. This is mentioned, that we might know how his wife came to be in those parts, v. 17, &c. Whether he had given information to Jabin of these movements, as he was at peace with him, we cannot assert; but his being mentioned in this place, might seem to insinuate as much. Heb. v. 12, “they told or shewed Sisara,” &c. His wife, at least, did not prove unfaithful to Israel. H.

Ver. 13. Cison. Part of this torrent falls into the Mediterranean, and part into the sea of Tiberias. It rises from Mount Thabor, (which is about two hour’s walk, south-west of Nazareth) and from Gelboa, &c. M.—Here Sisara displayed his immense army, if we may credit Josephus, Jonathan, &c. But the Scripture only specifies 900 chariots of iron. C.—Whence, however, we may conclude that his horse and foot would be very formidable. Yet all were presently routed by the small company of Barac, who had God for his leader, v. 14. H.

Ver. 15. Terror. The most dreadful storms of thunder, lightning, &c. (C. 5:20,) discomfited the enemy, while the sword of Barac (C.) dealt death around, so that Sisara and all his army presently turned their backs, (H.) and the general himself being stricken with a panic, leapt from his chariot, as if he thought his horses did not run fast enough. Thus Homer represents two Trojans abandoning their chariots, to escape the fury of Diomed and of Achilles. Iliad v. and xx.

Ver. 16. Multitude. Josephus allots Sisara the same number of horse and foot as he did to Jabin, whom Josue defeated and slew. C. 11:4. But instead of 20,000 chariots, he only gives Sisara 3000, which number appears to be far too great, and unauthorized by the Scripture. H.

Ver. 17. Tent. The women had separate tents from their husbands. Haber, it seems, was from home, and was not molested by the Chanaanites. He continued neuter during this war. What then must we think of the conduct of his wife? Commentators generally justify her, as the Scripture gives her great commendations, and as the family of the Cinites enjoyed the religion and privileges of the Israelites. Hence this portion of it could not make a league with the enemy of God's people, to the detriment of the latter; and if they did, they were bound to break it as soon, at least, as God manifested his will, that the enemy should be destroyed. Jahel might however deserve the praise of fortitude, which the Scripture gives her, and yet mingle some human imperfection in her manner of acting. She seems to speak with fraud, and to betray the sacred rights of hospitality; and it is doubtful whether Haber himself could renounce the alliance with Jabin, (particularly if they had taken mutual oaths to observe it, as was then customary) without informing him of his resolution. Fides, quando promittitur, etiam hosti servanda est. S. Aug. ep. i. ad Bonif. See Grot. Jur. iii. 19. C.—Yet, if she told a lie, it was only an officious one, (M.) such as Sisara desired should be told for his safety, v. 20. H.—It is lawful to use stratagems against an enemy. Salien, A. 2741. See Jos. 2 and 8:4. Debbora pronounces the name of Jahel to be most blessed, (C. 5:24,) which shews that she was inspired by God to kill Sisara. If we consider her action in any other light, it will certainly appear very shocking, as Rahab could not escape the accusation of treason towards her country by any other means. Aod, Judith, &c. who washed their hands in the blood of sinners, (Ps. 57:11,) would undoubtedly have been condemned at any merely human tribunal, which would not admit the plea of inspiration. H.—Besides this secret impulse, Jahel might be acquainted with the prediction of Debbora, (v. 9,) and with the miraculous victory which encouraged her to destroy the common enemy, (Abulensis, Josephus, &c. T.) the only remnant of an immense army. H.—The peace which subsisted between her family and the Chanaanites, was a forced one, (T.) and perhaps consisted only in the former being allowed to live quietly (D.) in the midst of these idolaters, whose manners they abhorred; (H.) while the Israelites, though at a greater distance, were so severely treated even when they were so weak as to adore the idols (T.) of their oppressors. Thus the divine Providence was pleased to reward virtue, and to punish infidelity. H.—The Fathers consider Debbora as a figure of the Synagogue, which begins the attack against the empire of the devil, while the victory is reserved for the Christian Church, represented by Jahel, a woman living among the Israelites, though of a different nation, and engrafted, as it were, like the wild olive on the good olive tree. She gains strength in the midst of persecutions, and, armed with the cross of Christ, destroys the captain of the worldly empire. Orig. hom v. S. Aug. c. Faust. xii. 31, &c. C.—Jahel was also a figure of the blessed Virgin, who crushed the serpent's head. W.

Ver. 18. Cloak, or rough hairy bed coverlet. Heb. Semica, occurs nowhere else. C.

Ver. 19. Milk, out of a shew of greater civility. The Rabbins say the milk was sour, which is conformable to the manners of the oriental nations. Valle remarks, that the Arabs still give the preference to it. The bottle in which it was kept was made of leather, (utrem) and the milk was like cream. C. 5:25. Some think that wine was not then used in this family, as the Rechabites, descendants of the Cinites, always refrained from it. Jer. 25. But it is not certain that they did at this time, nor that they sprang from this branch of the family.

Ver. 21. Tent. Such nails were used to fasten down the skins, of which the tent was composed. C.—This resembled a stake, though Josephus says it was made of iron. M.—And died. Thus he met a more ignoble fate, which would be more hateful to a warrior. Abimelech ordered his armour-bearer to kill him, that it might not be said that he had fallen by the hand of a woman. C. 9:54. Extreme fatigue, and the will of Providence, caused Sisara to fall asleep so soon. How many, like him, like down in health, and rise no more! H.

Ver. 23. Humbled Jabin, though he was not present in this battle. The Israelites followed up the victory, and presently brought their late oppressor to ruin, that all might confess, none could resist their power, when God was propitious to them; as, on the other hand, the most feeble state was able to reduce them to servitude, when they proved rebellious. H.

Ver. 1. Debbora probably composed this most flowery and animated canticle, v. 3, 7. C.

Ver. 2. Lord. Heb. may have different senses: “bless the Lord for having avenged Israel, the people willingly exposing themselves, or shewing their concurrence.” Roman Sept. “What was hidden has been disclosed in Israel, when the people shewed their good will, bless the Lord." Pora, which the Vulg. has not expressed, commonly means to disclose, liberate, &c.; ethondob signifies to give freely, to expose one's self, &c. Sept. and Theodotion together, (C.) and the Alex. copy have, "bless the Lord, for that leaders have risen up in Israel, and the people have shewn their good will." These two things were to be greatly desired, as a general can do but little without an obedient army, and the latter is, in a manner, useless, without a head. Both had been wanting in Israel for some time, and even still, some of the tribes seem to be blamed for not co-operating with zeal, v. 15, &c. This verse is repeated as a kind of chorus, v. 9. The zeal and concord of the little troop, which had met the formidable army of Sisara, deserved the highest applause. H.—Men bless God when they give him thanks; superiors bless by imparting some spiritual benefit. W.

Ver. 3. Kings. She invites all who have authority, whether in or out of Israel, to attend unto the dispensations of Providence. God alternatively cherishes and corrects his people. David makes a similar appeal to all kings and judges, Ps. 2:10.—It is I. She dwells with a degree of rapture on the thought that God had shewn his power so wonderfully, and had effected his gracious purpose by the hand of a woman! H.—She directed Barac. W.

Ver. 4. Edom. Sinai, where God gave his law amid thunder and lightning, was situated in Idumea. C.—God displayed his glory on this mountain, and also on Mount Seir. Deut. 33:2. Some believe that Debhora compares the wonders which attended the late victory, with those which God wrought when he led his victorious bands through the desert, and conquered the countries of Sehon, &c. H.—He provided for the wants of his people, even in the most desolate regions, giving them water out of the hard (C.) rock of Horeb or Sinai, (H.) and causing all nature to change her appearance at his approach. Ps. 67:8. Ex. 19:18. C.

Ver. 6. The paths rested. The ways to the sanctuary of God were unfrequented; and men walked in the bye-ways of error and sin. Ch.—Though Samgar and Jehel were so remarkable for their valour, as they had manifested on a late occasion, yet they did not prevent the incursions of the enemy both on the south and north. H.—The merchants durst not travel, as usual, through the country. Drusius.—God had threatened the faithless Israel with this punishment, Lev. 26:22. Lament. 1:4. Isai. 23:8. C.—They that went by them formerly without apprehension, are now forced to seek out bye-ways. H.—Thus was justly punished the negligence of those who observed not the festivals of the Lord, nor frequented his tabernacle. M.

Ver. 7. Valiant. Heb. is also translated, “the villages ceased,” as no one thought himself in safety out of the strong cities.—Until. Heb. “until I, Debbora, arose, that I arose, a mother,” &c. The Holy Ghost obliges her to declare her own praises. She deserved the glorious title of “mother of her country.”—Mother denotes an authority, mixed with sweetness: such had been exercised by Debbora, in deciding the controversies of the people, (C.) and in directing them to follow the right path. H.

Ver. 8. Israel. What could be more astonishing and new, than this method of warfare, in which a few unarmed Israelites gain the victory over an immense army, and oblige the general, to leap from his chariot, that he may escape observation? A woman calls to battle. Heb. is rather different, “They chose new gods:” some copies of the Sept. have “vain gods, (C.) as barley bread.” Others agree with the Heb. “Then war was in the gates.” Jabin would not allow any arms in the country, and hence Samgar was forced to use the implements of husbandry. So the Philistines afterwards would not suffer the Hebrews to have a smith among them, lest they should make arms, 1 K. 13:19. 22.

Ver. 9. Princes. Heb. “legislators,” governors, judges. I cannot refuse them due praise, and I invite them earnestly to bless the Lord, v. 2.

Ver. 10. Fair asses. Heb. “shining, white, or of divers colours, particularly red and white, with which the people were accustomed to paint their asses. Bochart.—The rich Arabians paint the back part red. Tavernier iii. 5.—The Persians also give a yellowish hue to their horses as well as to themselves, with henna. Chardin.—Asses and mules were formerly much more in use than horses. Num. 22:21. Mat. 11:25. 3 K. 1:33. C.—Way. You who can now proceed on your journey without molestation, join the judges of the land in sounding forth God’s praises, v. 6. H.—Those who bring the flesh into subjection to the spirit, ride upon fair asses, (Orig. hom. vi. W.) and they may preach to others with more authority. H.

Ver. 11. Choaked in the waters of the Cison, and of Mageddo, v. 19. 21. Heb. is very obscure: “from the noise of archers, in the places of drawing water, there shall they relate the justices of the Lord, the righteous acts of his villages, (or brave men) then shall the people of the Lord go down to the gates,” where the courts of judicature are held. The peaceful inhabitants shall be no more disturbed with the shouts of archers, but rehearsing what obligations they are under to the Lord, the warriors of Barac, they shall pursue their usual employments without fear. H.—Sept. You shall make your voices heard, playing on instruments, C. (anacrouomenon, pulsantium.)—Among those who rejoice, there shall they give righteous deeds to the Lord: they have wrought justice in Israel, &c. H.—If we neglect the points, we may render the Heb. more agreeably to the Vulgate. “At the voice of those who are pierced with arrows in the midst of those who draw water (or are drowned) there they shall publish,” &c. C.—And obtained. This is not in Hebrew expressly; but it is added to shew that the people could now act as a free nation, having cleared their country of its enemies. H.

Ver. 12. Captives. Heb. “Take thy captivity prisoner.” Hold those in subjection who so lately domineered over you. C.

Ver. 13. Remnants. Many of the Israelites had been slain by Jabin, but the Lord enabled the valiant Barac to requite him. Heb. “Then he made him that remaineth have dominion over the nobles among the people. The Lord made me rule over the mighty.” Barac and Debbora were raised from an humble state to govern Israel; while the nobles were passed over. H.—The people of God, which was reduced to such abjection and misery, is now become formidable to the greatest princes, who look upon themselves as something great, and are called beneficent. Luc. 22:25. Sept. “Then his (Barac’s) force was magnified: Lord, humble before me those who exceed me in strength.” Chal. “Then one of the army of Israel (Barac) crushed the power of these mighty nations,” &c. C.

Ver. 14. Out of Ephraim, &c. The enemies struggling in their flight, were destroyed, as they were running through the land of Ephraim, and of Benjamin, which lies after, that is, beyond Ephraim; and so on the very confines of Amalec. Or, it alludes to former victories of the people of God, particularly that which was freshest in memory, when the men of Ephraim and Benjamin, with Aod at their head, overthrew their enemies, the Moabites, with the Amalecites their allies. See C. 3. Ch.—Fight. Debbora insinuates that the late victory had rendered Nephthali and Issachar as famous as these tribes, which had formerly sent forth the greatest generals; Josue, who conquered Amalec, (Ex. 17:10,) and Aod, of the tribe of Benjamin, (C.) who had so greatly signalized himself, and sounded the alarm in Mount Ephraim with success. C. 3:13. 27. H.—Heb. “out of Ephraim he has torn them (Prot. was there a root of them against, or) into Amalec, and after thee Benjamin among thy people.” There was a mountain called Amalec, in the tribe of Ephraim, (C. 12:15,) where some victory may have been obtained, though we know not the particulars of it. C.—They and the neighbouring tribes might have encountered Amalec, coming to assist Jabin. D.—It is hardly probable that the army of Sisara would flee in that direction, as they would have had to encounter all the multitudes of Israel, and could have no prospect of saving themselves. Benjamin, who was farther off Debhora than Ephraim, is praised for expelling the king of Moab out of their city of Engaddi; (H.) or else the victories which this tribe obtained over the joint forces of the people of Israel are meant, (C.) as they shewed the valour of this tribe, though in so bad a cause. H.—It is thought that the Moabites fell upon their territory only after most of the inhabitants were cut off. C. 19 and 20. The Sept. and Theodotion take no notice of Amalec, as they have read, Amok, a valley: “the people of Ephraim chastised them in the valley, and thy brother Benjamin, in his people.” The Chaldee understands the whole verse, of the wars against Amalec, who had been routed by Josue, and would fall a prey to the arms of Saul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin. Many commentators follow this explanation. It does not appear that Barac received any aid from these tribes, nor from Machir, or any of those who lived at a distance. C.—As for Zabulon, the Vulgate intimates that great generals were found among them but the Hebrew rather gives them the praise of learning: “They that handle the pen of the writer.” H.—Yet sopher is applied not only to writers, and to those who are learned in the law, as the scribes, Esdras, Baruch, &c. were, but also to commissaries, secretaries of state, and officers who were employed both in peace and war. 2 Par. 26:11. Hence the Sept. translate, “out of Zabulon, the powerful in the sceptre of learning;” (C.) (Grabe) “of instruction.” H.—Some, without any proof, attribute the institution of these officers to Moses, others to David. We read of many who possessed this title under his reign; and ever after, the kings of Juda had scribes, as some great men had also. The kings of Persia kept secretaries to write their edicts, and some they sent, with greater authority, into the provinces. See 1 Esd. 4:8. Eccli. (10:5,) says, upon the person of the scribe God shall lay his honour. The scribes, or sopherim, seem therefore to have enjoyed an extensive authority, and the tribe of Zabulon used it on this occasion for the common good, (v. 18. C.) while many of the other tribes seem to be accused of backwardness in the cause of God.

Ver. 15. Exposed. Heb. “he was sent on foot into the vale,” to contend with the 900 chariots of Sisara. Issachar boldly followed him in battle. They came down with such fury and speed, as if they were falling headlong down a precipice. H.—Sisara presently turned his back, being affrighted with the apparition of angels, who probably fought at the head of Barac’s troop. Salien.—Only three tribes exposed themselves to danger, while the rest were either engaged in civil broils, or in their usual employments. C.—Divided. By this it seems that the valiant men of the tribe of Ruben were divided in their sentiments, with relation to this war; which division kept them at home within their own borders, to hear the bleating of their flocks. Ch.—Heb. may have different explanations, “In the divisions (families) of Ruben, there are princes of a great heart,” renowned for their prudence and valour: or “Ruben dwelt in his division, (or territory) there are chiefs,” &c. C.—Prot. “for the divisions of Ruben, there were great thoughts of heart.” Bonfrere supposes that these disputes excited the surprise and observations of all. H.

Ver. 16. Borders, trusting in the strength of thy situation. Ruben was protected on all sides by the rivers Jordan, Arnon, and Jaboc.

Ver. 17. Galaad was inhabited by the tribes of Gad and Manasses; and took no part in this war. C.—Dan. Heb. “Why did not Dan remain in ships?” Debbora now rebukes those who lived on the west side of the Jordan, as well as those on the east. Dan might think himself remote enough from the kingdom of Jabin. But Aser dwelt very near, yet durst not make any attempt to throw off the yoke.—Havens. Heb. “Breaches.” He had, perhaps, suffered much already, (H.) and preferred to remain quiet, even in his half-ruined cities, before engaging in the perilous attempt of his brethren. C.—He was too much taken up with commerce, to pay any attention to the oracles of the Lord. Grabe’s Sept. “Aser ... pitched his tents upon his cavities, or the broken ground of it,” the sea shore, which is commonly intersected with a variety of rivulets amid the cliffs. H.

Ver. 18. Merone. Heb. “In the heights of the field, or of Merome.” Some take this place to be the lake Semechon, but we have endeavoured to shew that it was in the vicinity of Thanac, Jos. 11:5. C.—Thabor was in the midst of a great field or plain. D.—Barac seems to have been at the head of 10,000 men, of the tribe of Issachar, attacking Sisara, at the foot of Thabor, while 40,000 of the tribes of Nephthali and Zabulon, almost without arms, fell upon the kings of Chanaan, who had posted themselves near the waters of Mageddo, to intercept any recruits that might be sent from the southern tribes, v. 8. 15. 19. C.

Ver. 19. Spoils. So far from it, they even lost their lives. M.—Heb. “they took no piece (or gain) of money.” If we understand this of the Israelites, we may say that they stopped not to plunder the slain, nor would they suffer any to redeem their life by the promise of a great ransom. Whatever riches they found afterwards, they consecrated to the Lord, in testimony of their gratitude. C. Num. 31:54.

Ver. 20. Stars, or angels, who are compared to the stars, and often fought for Israel. 2 Mac. 10:29. Vales, Philos. c. xxxi. C.—The favourable and malignant influences of the stars, which the Rabbins talk of, would here be nugatory, (H.) unless they might contribute to bring on rain. Cajet.—Josephus (v. 6.) informs us that a furious tempest of hail, &c. met the enemy in the face, and rendered all their efforts useless. C.—A similar instance of the divine protection was obtained by the prayers of the thundering legion, in the army of M. Aurelius; (Tert. Euseb. Hist. v. 5.) and again, when Theodosius attacked the tyrant Eugenius, of which Claudian speaks, (in 3 Cons. Honor.) “Te propter gelidis Aquilo de monte procellis—Obruit adversas acies, revolutaque tela—Vertit in Auctores et trubine repulit hastas—O nimium dilecte Deo, cui fundit ab antris—Æolus armatas hiemes, cui militat æther—Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti.” H. —Courses. This miracle was of a different kind from that which proved so fatal to the enemies of Josue. Lyran.—Sept. Alex. “They fought with (meta) Israel,” for which Grabe puts, against Sisara. H.

Ver. 21. Dragged. Prot. “swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon.”—Cadumim, which the Prot. translate ancient, (H.) means also eastern. The former epithet seems very insignificant. Some assert, that the Cison divided its streams about Mount Thabor, and one part ran towards the east into the lake of Genesareth, which is here designated, while the other empties itself above Carmel into the great sea. But there is no proof of this assertion in the Scripture, nor in Josephus. We read (Judith 7:3,) of a place, which the Syriac properly calls Cadmon, and the Vulg. Chelmon, in this neighbourhood. Instead of Kedumin, Sym. and Theodotion read Kodssim, which the former translates, “the holy vale.” Many of the army (C.) of the kings, and perhaps of Sisara also, (H.) endeavouring to make their escape, were drowned in the Cison. C.

Ver 22. Broken (ceciderunt) “fell off,” the hoofs being fractured by the hard road, while the riders galloped full speed. H.—Some translate the Heb. “the hoofs of the horses made a sound like that of a hammer beating an anvil, on account of the hurry of the strong ones who push them forward.” Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum, as Virgil attempts to imitate the sound in verse. Others, “the hoof ... was broken by the precipitation (C.) (Prot. prancings, the prancings of the mighty ones. H.) of those who fled.” Formerly, Xenophon observes, the horses were not usually shod with iron. The feet of Bucephalus were consequently much worn. Yet some took the precaution to defend the feet of their horses with brass, (Homer) or iron, in the shape of crescents. Eustathius.—Nero shod his mules with silver; (Sueton.) and Popea, his wife, had shoes of gold for her more delicate beasts. Soleas ex auro quoque induere solebat. Plin. xxxiii. 11.—Yet many excellent horses in Arabia and Tartary are never shod. Tavern. T. i. B. ii. 5.

Ver. 23. Meroz. Where this land of Meroz was, which is here laid under a curse, we cannot find: nor is there mention of it any where else in holy writ. In the spiritual sense, they are cursed who refuse to assist the people of God in their warfare against their spiritual enemies. Ch.—Eusebius seems to have thought that Merom, a body of water, and the village of Meroz (H.) were the same place, 12 miles from Sebaste. The inhabitants were surely under an obligation of assisting their brethren; and these, it appears, lived in the vicinity, and neglected their duty. Sept. Alex. reads Mazor. Some stars are styled Mazzaroth. Job 38:32.—Angel, Michael; or the high priest, or Barac, Debbora, &c. See C. 2:1. C.—Prot. “Curse ye Meroz, (said the angel of the Lord) curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof.”—To help. Prot. “to the help of the Lord against the mighty.” Sept. “our helper is the Lord in the mighty warriors.” He assists their endeavours, which would otherwise prove unsuccessful. H.—The Jews thin that Barac cursed Meroz, the star or the angel of the Chanaanites, who protected Sisara. Chal. See Serar. q. 15. Others say that he was an ally of the general, who was excommunicated by Barac, at the sound of 400 trumpets. But these opinions only deserve contempt. C.

Ver. 24. Among. Heb. “above.” After cursing those who befriended the enemy, Debbora pronounces a blessing upon Jahel. H.—The blessed Virgin is surely still more entitled to praise. W.—Tent. It was esteemed a mark of virtue for a woman to keep at home. Drusius.

Ver. 25. Dish. Heb. sephel; whence the symplue of the Lydians, Tuscans, and Romans, was probably derived, denoting a bowl or jug with a handle, designed for libations. They were formerly made of potter’s ware, fictilibus prolibatur sympuciis, or sympulis. Plin. xxxv. 13. “Aut quis—Sympuvium ridere Numæ, nigrumve catinum—Aut vaticanas fragiles de monte patellas—Ausus erat.” Juv. Sat. vi. C.

Ver. 26. Sisara. Hebrew says with the hammer; (Prot.) “she smote off his head, when she had pierced and stricken (the nail) through his temples.” But we may rather translate, (H.) “she pierced his head, she struck it, and pierced through this temples.” C.—For we cannot suppose that she severed his head from his body with the hammer; but she fastened it to the ground with the nail. C. 4:21.

Ver. 27. Wretched. Heb. “he expired where he fell down.” H.—Debbora represents Jahel as ready to tread the unhappy Sisara under her feet, if he should offer to stir. She thrice repeats his death.

Ver. 28. His mother, &c. This poetical imagination is very natural.—Room. Heb. “through the lattices,” eshnab, of which the windows then consisted. Prov. 7:6. C.—Horses. Prot. “why tarry the wheels of his chariots?" H.

Ver. 29. Wives. This is not expressed in Heb. "his wise ladies answered her," or joined in her lamentations. Then the mother comforted herself with the hope that they might possibly be employed in dividing the spoils. C.—Heb. "yea she answered herself, Have they not gained the victory? have they divided the prey? to every man a damsel, yea two? to Sisara a booty of divers colours," &c. H.—Perhaps instead of damsel, lit. "a belly or two," which occurs no where else, the Heb. should be, "to the general a most beautiful embroidery work." C.

Ver. 30. Necks. Heb. "the spoils of various colours, the embroidery of divers colours, on both sides, for the necks (of the captors) of the spoil." H.—Or more simply, "for the neck (general) of the army;" (Vatab.) or "the necks of the soldiers," who will be laden with the abundance of spoils. C.—The ladies dwell with great delight on the thought of possessing rich embroidery or needle work. How dreadfully would their hopes be blasted, when a few hours after they saw Barac at their gates, and their city in flames! H.

Ver. 31. Rising. Heb. "when he goeth forth in his might." Let the just advance in virtue, and glory, as the sun becomes more beautiful and hot as he leaves the horizon, on a clear summer day. This comparison is often applied to the servants of God. Eccli. 16:16. 2 K. 23:5. Mat. 13:45. C.

Ver. 32. Forty. Usher says only 20 from the victory of Barac. Potau and other able chronologers allow the full term of 40 years, after that event. See C. 3:11. H.—Barac was buried at Cedes, where Benjamin (Itin.) saw his tomb. C.—Ozi, the high priest for the last 40 years, was succeeded by Zariaas, A. 2760, who reigned an equal length of time, and died with Gedeon. Maraioth took his place, A. 2801, at the commencement of Abimelech's usurpation, and died A. 2841. Salien.

Ver. 1. Madian. This nation had formerly been almost extirpated by Moses. Num. 31:7, &c. H.—But they had re-established themselves, and dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Moabites, whom they had assisted. They new made a league with Amalec, and other eastern nations, (C.) in order to revenge themselves upon the Israelites. H.—Madian was a descendant of Abraham by Cetura. Gen. 25:2. The shortness of the servitude, which the Israelites had to suffer from them, was compensated by its severity. M.

Ver. 2. Resist is not expressed in Heb. neither did Israel dare to encounter the enemy. They retreated into the strongest holds, to rescue their goods and persons from the depredations of the Madianites. H.

Ver. 3. Amalec was formerly widely dispersed through Arabia. Some dwelt to the south of the promised land. Ex. 17. Num. 13:3. 1 K. 15:6 and 31:1. But these inhabited the eastern countries, concerning whom Balaam spoke, Num. 24:20. The Amalecites were scattered from Hevila upon the Euphrates, as far as the Red Sea and Sur, which is near Egypt. 1 K. 15:7 and 27:8. The other eastern nations denote those who inhabited the desert Arabia, the Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, Cedareanians, &c. Isai. 11:14. Jer. 49:28. Ezec. 8:7.

Ver. 4. Blade. Heb. “the increase of the earth.” They waited till the corn was almost ripe, and what they could not carry off they destroyed. C.—It seems they had allowed Gedeon time to gather in some corn, (v. 11) and other Israelites would seize their opportunity, and perhaps cut the corn before it was perfectly ripe, which the Vulg. may insinuate by mentioning the blade.—Gaza. They ravaged the whole country from east to west. H.—This method of warfare is, in effect, more cruel than any other.—Asses. They left no cattle, nor animals that they could take, wherewith the Israelites might cultivate the earth. C.—In the extremity of famine, the flesh of asses would have been used to sustain life, as the text insinuates. H.

Ver. 5. Locusts. This comparison shews the rapacity and devastation of the enemy. Locusts in those countries often obscure the air with their numbers, and presently eat up every green thing. They proceed in regular order like a great battalion, and it is reported that they send some before to explore the country. S. Jer. Joel ii. Bochart. C. Gen. 10:4.

Ver. 8. A prophet. The people no sooner repent, than God shews them mercy. H.—The name of this prophet is unknown. The Jews say it was Phinees; others think it was an angel in human shape: but he might be one divinely commissioned on this occasion, to make an exhortation to the people, assembled on some of the great festivals, (see C. 2:1. C.) though he might continue to exercise his authority afterwards. M.—S. Aug. (q. 31,) thinks that the angel (v. 11,) is here called a prophet, because he appeared in human form. W.

Ver. 10. Fear not. Idols can do you no hurt, if you continue faithful to me. H.—Shew them no respect or worship. The fear of Isaac means the God (C.) whom Isaac worshipped, Gen. 31:42. Idolatry owed its rise to a groundless fear: primos in orbe deos fecit timor. Lucret. The pagans offered sacrifice to Paventia, to fear and paleness, &c. that they might be secure from them. Lactan. H.

Ver. 11. Angel; Michael. M.—Some think it was the prophet who had addressed the people, or Phinees, according to the Rabbins. See S. Aug. q. 31. Others believe it was the Son of God, who takes the name of Jehovah. Broughton and other Protest.—But the most natural opinion is, that a real angel was sent, in the name of God, like that which appeared to Moses, and assumed the incommunicable name, as the ambassador of God. Gedeon took him for a man, and presented him a noble feast, without designing to offer sacrifice to him. Maimonides and Grotius seem to suppose that all this passed in a dream; but the sequel refutes this opinion.—Ephra, a city of the half tribe of Manasses, on the west side of the Jordan, of which Joas was the richest citizen. He was of the family of Ezri, and a descendant of Abiezer. 1 Par. 8:18. Heb. might be rendered, “Joas, the Abiezerite.” C. 8:32 and 13:2.—Madian. Not having the convenience of cleansing the wheat in the open field, Gedeon was doing it privately, with a design to carry it off, at the approach of the enemy, and to support himself and family in some cavern. Heb. takes no notice of cleaning: “Gedeon threshed wheat, by the wine press, to hide it, or to flee,” &c. He probably used a flail, or some smaller sticks, such as were employed to beat out olives. Isai. 28:27. Ruth 2:17. C.—The wheat harvest was about Pentecost, that of barley was at Easter. It seems the Madianites had been later than usual this year, in making their incursions, v. 33. H.

Ver. 12. Is. We should naturally translate, be with thee, if the answer of Gedeon did not shew (C.) that it is to be taken as an assertion, that the Lord was already reconciled to Israel, and had made choice of this valiant man to rescue his people from slavery, though he was not of the first nobility, v. 15.

Ver. 13. My lord. This he says out of respect, supposing that he was addressing a prophet, (H.) or some virtuous person, of whom he desires to know what reasons could be given for the assurance of divine favour, which he held out. He speaks not out of distrust. M.

Ver. 14. Lord, Jehova. H.—The Chal. and Sept. have, “the angel of the Lord,” as the best interpreters understand it. C.—Upon him, with benevolence and an air of authority, that he might know that he was speaking to some one more than man. H.—Strength, with which I have endured thee. M.—Though Gedeon was naturally brave, he was no more disposed to attack the Madianites than the rest of his dispirited countrymen; and, even after he was strengthened from above, he was so conscious of his own inability to effect so great a deliverance, that he stood in need of the most convincing miracles, to make him act as the judge of Israel. H.

Ver. 15. The meanest in Manasses, &c. Mark how the Lord chooses the humble (who are mean and little in their own eyes) for the greatest enterprises. Ch.—Heb. and Sept. lit. “My millenary is poor, or lowly,” &c. This term means a great family, from which many others spring, or a city inhabited by such. Bethlehem was of this description in Juda. Mic. 5:2. Ephra and the family of Abiezer were not the first in Manasses. Grotius observes, that Gedeon and Cincinnatus were called to the highest offices, when they least expected it.

Ver. 17. Thou, the Lord, or his angel, capable of fulfilling these great promises; or be pleased, by some sign, to manifest thyself to me. C.—He began to perceive that he was talking with some person of authority: (H.) yet still he did not suspect that it was a spirit, otherwise he would not have offered food, nor would he have been so much surprised and afraid, only when the angel disappeared so suddenly, v. 22.

Ver. 18. A sacrifice, or some provisions to present unto thee. Heb. mincha, is taken for a present, particularly of flour and wine. It is used to denote those presents which were made by Jacob to Esau, and Joseph, and by Aod to the king of Moab. C. 3:15. Gen. 43:14. C.—To sacrifice, often means to kill things for a feast, Mat. 22:4. What Gedeon brought, was afterwards turned into a sacrifice by the angel, v. 21. M.—Gedeon was not a priest, nor was there any altar prepared for a sacrifice. If Gedeon had intended to offer one, he would not have boiled nor baked the food, which he presented before his guest. C.

Ver. 19. Measure. Heb. “epha,” containing ten gomors, each of which was sufficient for the daily maintenance of a man; so that Gedeon brought as much as would have sufficed for ten men. Abraham presented no more before the three angels, Gen. 19:6. The magnificence of the ancients consisted rather in producing great abundance, than in multiplying dishes.—Broth. Syr. and Arab. translate, “a good (old) wine.”

Ver. 20. Thereon. Thus he would shew Gedeon that he had no need of food. He would exercise his obedience, and manifest a greater miracle, as the flesh and bread would be less apt to take fire, when the angel touched them, even though some might imagine that he caused a spark to come from the rock. For the like purpose, Elias ordered thrice four buckets of water to be poured on the bullock, which fire from heaven would miraculously consume. 3 K. 18:34. H.—This broth might serve to anoint the altar, (Ex. 40:10. M.) or answer instead of the usual libations. A. Montan.

Ver. 22. Alas. He makes this exclamation, concluding that he should soon die. Ex. 33:20. Callimachus says that “it was a law of Saturn, that the man who saw an immortal, unless the god himself chose to shew him that favour, should pay dearly for it.” Grot.—This opinion was groundless; and it is wonderful that it should prevail among the Israelites, (H.) since so many had seen angels without receiving any harm. M.

Ver. 23. Said to him, as he was ascending into heaven, (M.) or the following night. C.—It seems that Gedeon heard the angel’s proclamation of peace, and shewed his gratitude by forming the rock, or stone, into a kind of rough altar, which he entitled Yehova shalom, “God’s peace,” (H.) for doing which he received an order, v. 26. M.—Others erect altars, in various places; but they must be authorized by God. C.—Ezri. Prot. “unto this day it is yet in Ophra, of the Abiezrites.” Sept. is ambiguous. “He, or it, being yet in Ephra,” &c. H.

Ver. 25. And another, or “the second.” Only one seems to have been sacrificed; (v. 28. Cajetan) though others think that the second bullock was designed for a peace-offering. Bonfrere. Some infer that it had been fattened for Baal. Sept. observe, that the first bullock or “calf was fattened:” but it does not appear for what purpose. C.—Seven years, in memory of the duration of the slavery. M.—Before that age, bulls were not deemed so fit for yoking. Hesiod would have them to be nine years old.—Altar. We may render the Heb. “Cut down the idol which is upon the altar; or, Break in pieces the ashera,” &c. This is the title of the idol of the grove, Astore or Asteroth. Syr. and Arab. The Sept. is favourable to this explanation. C.—But the groves themselves were to be cut down, where an altar of God was to be erected. It seems this altar and the grove belonged to Joas, who is hence supposed to have joined in the worship of Baal. If he did formerly, his eyes were now opened, and he boldly approved of the conduct of his son, (v. 31. H.) who had probably never been infected. M.

Ver. 26. Top. Heb. “on the top of this fortress, (Mawz. Dan. 11:38. Sept.) on the platform, (C.) or place appointed.” H.—Offer. Though Gedeon was not a priest, he was authorized to offer sacrifice. M.—God can dispense with his own laws. H.

Ver. 27. House, his relations and fellow-citizens, (C.) who were addicted to idolatry. Prudence dictated that he should do this privately, lest he might be prevented by them. They would soon perceive the weakness of their idols. Yet some of the servants, or others who had been on the watch, disclosed to the idolaters that Gedeon had done the daring deed, unless perhaps they accused him on suspicion, as his enmity to that worship could not be concealed. H.

Ver. 30. Bring. Parents took cognizance of the evil actions done in their family. The citizens require Joas to punish his son, or to deliver him up to them. On the same principle, the Israelites insisted that the tribes of Benjamin should not neglect to punish the citizens of Gabaa; and the Philistines demand Samson. C. 15:12 and 20:13. Cato advised that Cæsar should be given up to the Germans, whom he had unjustly invaded; and the Gauls would not be satisfied, unless the Fabii should be abandoned unto them. Grot. Jur. ii. 21. 4. H.

Ver. 31. His, Baal's, or rather my son's adversary; (C.) let him die before this morning be spent, as the Heb. insinuates. Joas represents to the men of the city, who looked upon him with a degree of respect, (H.) as the first in power and riches among them, (C.) how ill it became the Israelites to vindicate an idol. If Baal were truly so powerful, as they seemed to imagine, (H.) and so eager to revenge himself, he could never be restrained from bringing his adversary to condign punishment. "Let the gods punish those who injure them," said Tacitus, Ann. i. "They would take care that their sacred things were not abused." Livy x. This argumentation would suit the idolaters, who supposed that their gods were animated with the same sentiments and eagerness for revenge as themselves. But the true God, who can feel no such impressions, bears for a long time with the impiety of men, though he requires that those who are in power should punish notorious offenders. The magistrate is the instrument of God's justice, and must stop, as much as possible, the growth of vice and irreligion. C.—It seems the citizens of Ephra acquiesced to the reason or authority of Joas, and even enlisted under the banners of Gedeon. H.

Ver. 32. Altar. Prot. "Therefore on that day he called him Jerubbaal, saying, let Baal plead against him, because he hath thrown down his altar." Sept. Alex. says that he then styled it (auto, the altar,) "the judgment-seat of Baal," Dikasterion Baal. But the Vat. copy leaves Terobaal; and this title rather belonged to Gedeon. H.—David, out of horror for the name of Baal, calls him Jeruboseph, 2 K. 11:21. "Let confusion plead," &c. For the same reason, Esbaal and Meribaal are called Isboseth and Miphiboseth in Scripture. We read that Sanconiathon consulted "Jerombaal, priest of the god Jao," concerning the antiquities of Phœnicia, which has led some to conclude that he had seen Jerobaal. The work, however, of that author is generally supposed to be a fabrication of Porphyrius, and was unknown to Josephus. It contains a multitude of fabulous accounts, intermixed with some truths, which might be taken from the Bible. Gedeon was no priest, and we may suppose little concerned about the Phœnician affairs or antiquities. C.

Ver. 33. Jezrael. The crossed the Jordan, probably at Bethsan, expecting to find rich booty in this most fertile vale, where it is reported that grass, or the plants, grow to such a size, that a man on horseback can scarcely be seen! They met with a defeat near Endor and Mount Thabor. C. 8:18. Ps. 82:11. C.

Ver. 34. Him. He first calls his relations, and then the neighbouring tribes, to march against the enemy. He had before declared God's orders, and was recognized as judge and deliverer of Israel; so that no one objects to his exercising this act of sovereignty.

Ver. 35. Him. Heb. "them." M.—The people readily obey the summons, though many of them had not got the better of their fears. C. 7:3. H.

Ver. 38. So. Gedeon besought the Lord to confirm his mission, in order to raise the drooping spirits of his soldiers. If he had not believed that he was chosen for the purpose of rescuing Israel, he would never have exposed himself, by destroying the idol and grove of Baal, and by calling the people to arms. Yet he might fear at present, lest he might be destitute of some of the necessary qualifications, and might entertain some apprehensions, lest the promises of God might be only conditional. The readiness with which God grants his requests, shews that he was inspired to act as he did, and his faith is greatly commended, Hebrews 11:32. Other great saints have asked for a miraculous confirmation of what was promised. Ex. 4:1. Jos. 5:13. Luc. 1:34. C.—Vessels. Heb. sephel, Sept. lecane, "a dish." Syr. "a basin." The dew in Chanaan is very copious, resembling a shower of rain, insomuch that the roads are rendered extremely slippery. Roger. i. 2. C.

Ver. 40. Ground. In these two miracles the Fathers observe, that the fleece represented the Jewish nation, favoured with so many graces, while the rest of the world was dry and barren; and that, when the latter was watered with dew from heaven, by the coming of Jesus Christ, the Synagogue was deprived of those favours. Orig. hom. viii. Theod. q. 14. S. Jer. ad Paulin. S. Aug. &c.—In the first miracle we may also contemplate, the incarnation of our Saviour in the womb of the most pure Virgin. Ps. 71:6. S. Bern. serm. S. Jer. epist. Paul. C.

Ver. 1. Fountain. The same also called Areth, as the copies of the Sept. and of S. Jerom vary. Bonf.—Harad, or “of trouble,” either because the Madianites were filled with terror at the approach of Gedeon, or because so many of his soldiers returned home through fear. M.—Perhaps it may be the same which is called the fountain of Jezrael, near which Saul encamped, 1 K. 29:1. C.—Adrichomius places it on the south of Gelboe, which is called the high hill. M.—Heb. “on the north side of them, by the hill of More, in the vale.” H.—Jezrael was between Gelboe to the south, and Hermon to the north. C.

Ver. 2. Lest Israel, &c. by this we see that God will not choose for his instruments in great achievements, which depend purely on his grace, such as, through pride and self-conceit, will take the glory to themselves. Ch.—Yet Gedeon had only 32,000 to encounter 135,000 fighting men; so that if all had remained with him, they would each had to engage above four men, v. 3. C. 8:10. M.

Ver. 3. Return, agreeably to the law of Moses. Deut. 20:8. If God had not enforced this order, it would perhaps have been neglected in the hurry, particularly as all seemed to have joined the army with such alacrity. M.—Scipio going to destroy Carthage, was informed that some Sicilian knights went on this expedition with extreme reluctance and fear; whereupon he gave 300 leave to depart. Livy xxix.—Galaad perhaps may have been substituted for Gelboe, as there seems to have been none from the Galaad, on the other side of the Jordan, in the army of Gedeon. C.—Abulensis thinks that some little mountain of this name might be in the vicinity of Jezrael.—Home. They were terrified at the sight of the enemy’s camp. M.

Ver. 5. Tongues. Some Latin copies add, “and hand,” as it is expressed in Heb. &c. in the following verse. They resembled dogs more in the hurry than in the method of taking water. An old proverb says, “the dog drinks and flees away,” (C.) alluding to the dogs of Egypt, who, through fear of the crocodiles which infest the banks of the Nile, lap the water with all expedition, “like a dog from the Nile.” Erasmus. H. Macrob. ii. 2.—Hence we might infer, that these 300 men were the most cowardly in the army, as Joseph. (v. 8,) Theod. (q. 15,) have done; (C.) and thus the glory of the victory would belong more incontrovertibly to God. H.—But as these 300, on this supposition, ought to have been disbanded, as well as the rest, we may rather conclude that they shewed greater courage and temperance by their posture, and were therefore retained (C.) to accompany their heroic leader in his perilous expedition. We must, nevertheless remark, that only those who preferred to acknowledge their fear, were disbanded according to the law; and as, among those who were not quite so cowardly, (H.) there would be some less courageous than others, (Amama) these might be selected by God, that no flesh should glory in his sight, 1 Cor. 1:29. H.

Ver. 7. That lapped water. These were preferred that took the water up in their hands, and so lapped it, before them who laid themselves quite down to the waters to drink; which argued a more eager and sensual disposition. Ch.—It is thought that the former would be more capable of supporting the fatigues of war. M.—The Jews suppose that those who knelt, had been accustomed to do so in honour of Baal. Lyranus concludes that they were extremely fatigued and thirsty, while the 300 underwent the labours of war with less inconvenience. Josephus observes that this experiment was made in the heat of the day; yet, if Providence had not interfered, it seems very improbable that 10,000 men should all be so eager for water. H.

Ver. 8. Victuals. It appears that they did not take sufficient, (C.) not expecting that they would have to pursue the enemy so far. C. 8:5. 8.

Ver. 11. Servant. Thus he confessed that he was not entirely free from fear himself, v. 5. 10. H.—The most courageous feel less alarm, when they have a companion, (M.) as Diomedes observed, when he desired that one or two might accompany him in the attempt to explore the enemy's camp. Iliad x.—Arms. The greatest part of this immense crowd of people, who came to plunder, neglected the laws of war; as the Israelites had not dared, for a long time, to oppose them. A select number of 135,000 men in arms was destined to keep them in order, and to protect them. Among these Gedeon insinuated himself, to know how they were encamped, and what sentiments they entertained. C.

Ver. 13. A dream. Observation of dreams is commonly superstitious, and as such is condemned by the word of God; but in some extraordinary cases, as we here see, God is pleased by dreams to foretel what he is about to do. Ch.—See Gen. 40. Lev. 19:26. Deut. 18:10. W.—The small company of Gedeon stood in need of every sort of encouragement. H.

Ver. 14. Sword and loaf are both derived from the same Heb. word, which signifies “to make war.” See Num. 14:9. But if there had been no connection or reason in the discourse of the soldier, (which was not the case, as Providence put it into his mouth,) the end would be equally obtained, which was to encourage Gedeon, and to inform him that the enemy was not without some apprehensions. C.—Gedeon was not of the richest family, but came with great expedition, as the rolling of the barley-loaf might designate. M.—He was also encamped upon an eminence, and presently threw the affairs of Madian into confusion. H.—He understands the language of the Madianites, as it was not very different from the Hebrew.

Ver. 15. Interpretation. Heb. “the breaking,” in allusion to a loaf or nut which must be broken. C.—Adored God, in thanksgiving. M.

Ver. 16. Lamps, or flambeaux, (C.) made of wood, full of turpentine. H.—The soldiers held one end in their hand, and when they had thrown down their pitchers, the sudden light, the sound of trumpets and of men on three sides of the camp, threw the various nations into the utmost consternation, as they very naturally supposed that they were surrounded with a great army. God also sent among them the spirit of confusion, so that they knew not one another. An ancient author, under the name of Tertullian, asserts that the 300 men were on horseback, and conquered by virtue of the cross, as the letter T, in Greek, stands for 300; (C.) and S. Aug. (q. 37,) follows up this idea, saying that, as the Greeks are put by the apostle for all the Gentiles, this letter was to insinuate, that the Gentiles chiefly would believe in Christ. Some of the Fathers have given a like mysterious explanation of the 318 servants of Abraham, as the two first letter of the name of Jesus denote 18. Eucher. Gen. 14:14. S. Amb. de Abr. i. 3.—We can never conquer our spiritual enemies, without a lively faith in our crucified Saviour. If Amama, and other enemies of the cross of Christ, ridicule these pious meditations of the Fathers, we need not wonder. See Apoc. 13:18. H.

Ver. 17. Camp. The three divisions stopt at the entrance, v. 21. C.

Ver. 18. Camp, and shout together to the Lord and to Gedeon: or rather “the sword of, &c. v. 20. The war is the Lord’s, victory to or by the hand of Gedeon.” Chald. He is the minister of God’s justice to punish Madian. M.—It is not derogation to God (C.) that honour is given to his servants. W.—Prot. supply the word which seems to be wanting. The sword of the Lord, &c. H.

Ver. 19. Watch. This was the second of the three watches known to the ancient Hebrews: in the New Testament, they followed the Roman discipline, and admitted four. Mat. 14:25. C.—Menochius thinks they did the same at this time. H.—Alarmed. They were not asleep. M.—We read of similar stratagems in the Roman history. The Falisci threw the Romans into consternation, by appearing among them in mourning weeds; (C.) others read in priestly attire, (H.) with flambeaux and serpents; as those of Veii did by means of burning torches. Grot.

Frontin. Strat. ii. 4, &c. C.—Trumpets. In a mystical sense, the preachers of the gospel, in order, to spiritual conquests, must not only sound with the trumpet of the word of God, but must also break the earthen pitchers, by the mortification of the flesh and its passions, and carry lamps in their hands by the light of their virtues. Ch.—These lamps denote the virtues and miracles of the martyrs. V. Bede, c. 5. The things which would seem ridiculous, fill the enemy with terror and dismay. ibid. W.

Ver. 21. Camp. Hence the Madianites made no doubt but a great army was in the midst of the camp, and began to cut in pieces all whom they met. C.

Ver. 23. Bethsetta. These cities seem to have been near Bethsan.—And the border. Heb. “in Zererath,” (H.) which Junius takes to be Sarthan.—Abelmehula gave birth to Eliseus, and was 12 miles from Scythopolis. S. Jer.—Tebbath occurs no where else. But we read of Thebes, three miles from the last mentioned city, famous for the death of Abimelech. C. 9:50.—Men. Probably those who had been sent home the preceding night. Upon hearing of the success which attended Gedeon, all the tribes began to be in motion.

Ver. 24. Bethbera, “the house of corn.” Serarius.—Many take it to be Bethabera, “the house of passage,” or the ford of the Jordan. The river was fordable on camels at any time. But in summer, people might cross the Jordan in many places on foot. C.

Ver. 25. Two men. That is, two of their chiefs. Ch.—Press. Heb. yekeb, denotes a cistern fit to contain wine. Isai. 5:2. Prov. 3:10.—Zeb had concealed himself in it.—Jordan. They afterwards took occasion from this exploit to extol their own valour, and to quarrel with Gedeon. C.

JUDGES 8

Ver. 1. Ephraim. The valour and insolence of these men are placed together. Afterwards we have an account of the transactions of Gedeon in the pursuit, v. 4. H.—The tribe of Ephraim seems to have had some grounds for being displeased at not being summoned at first, as well as the tribes of Aser, &c. which were farther off; particularly as they sprang from Joseph, no less than Manasses, and had their portion in common. The general answers them with great respect, as otherwise their displeasure might have had very pernicious consequences. C.

Ver. 2. What could I, &c. A meek and humble answer appeased them; who otherwise might have come to extremities. So great is the power of humility both with God and man. Ch. Prov. 15:1.—Could. Heb. and Sept. “What have I yet done like you? M.—Is not the gleaning?” &c. I only commenced the war; you have brought it to a happy termination, by killing the princes of the enemy. Debrío adag. 157. At the first siege of Troy, Telamon having entered the city before Hercules, the latter was on the point of killing him, when Telamon, collecting a heap of stones, which he said he intended for an altar in honour of “the victorious Hercules,” the hero’s fury was appeased. Apol. Bib. ii. 6.

Ver. 4. Jordan. Notwithstanding the precautions of Gedeon, some had got over the river, whom he resolves to follow at Bethsan. This city was about 15 miles from Mount Thabor. His men had been in motion a great part of the night, and had not taken provisions (C.) for so long a journey; so that he was obliged to apply for some when he had crossed the Jordan.

Ver. 5. Socchoth. “The tents,” where Jacob had encamped. Gen. 33. It belonged to the tribe of Dan. M.—The people of this town, as well as the ancients of Phanuel, returned an insolent reply to the just request of Gedeon. In cases of such extremity, all are bound to assist the defenders of their country; and the refusal is punished as a sort of rebellion, 2 K. 24:10. C.

Ver. 6. Hand. Perhaps thou makest sure of taking these kings. H.—We apprehend that they will return with greater forces, and punish our compliance. M.

Ver. 7. Desert. An usual mode of punishment, (2 K. 12. 1 Par. 20:3. C.) which the cruel irrision of Gedeon and his army, who were fighting in the cause of God and of the nation, richly called for.

Ver. 9. Tower; on the strength of which they ventured to treat him with insolence. Phanuel, “the face of God,” (Gen. 33:10,) was near the Jaboc. M.

Ver. 10. Resting, as the Heb. word Korkor, signifies. Bochart.—Prot. have, in Karor,” as if it were the name of a place. H.

Ver. 11. Tents. The Scenitæ, (M.) who inhabited part of the desert Arabia. C.—Hurt. They had probably been mounted on camels, &c. (H.) and did not suspect that Gedeon would be so soon after them across the Jordan. M.

Ver. 13. Sun-rising. It would seem as if all these exploits had been performed between midnight and sun-rising, in the month of May, which is quite incredible; and hence many translate, “the sun being up.” Sept. and Theodotion, “from the height or ascent of Hares,” (the situation of which we know not,) or “of the mountains,” (Aquila) or “woods,” (Symmachus) or perhaps “from the eastward.” C.—The Scripture does not, however, specify that all this took place in the space of six or seven hours, or of one night, but only that Gedeon came to Soccoth so early, as to take the magistrates unawares, being informed by a young man where they lived. This might probably happen on the second morning, after he had surprised the camp of the Madianites, at Jezrael. Prot. and Chal. agree with the Vulg. “before the sun was up.” The other translations explain chares, as if it denoted the place or situation from which Gedeon was returning. H.—Described. The text may signify either that the boy marked them out, or that Gedeon took down a memorandum of their names. C.—He would not punish the innocent with the guilty. M.

Ver. 16. Tore. Heb. seems to be corrupted in this place. “And he shewed (instructed or chastised) with these thorns.” The Sept. and Vulg. read the same word as v. 7. He crushed the people with such instruments as are used to beat out corn. It is probable that he only treated the magistrates of Soccoth and of Phanuel in this manner. C.

Ver. 18. Thabor. Some of the relations or brothers of Gedeon had retired thither, as to a place of safety; and the latter wished to know what was become of them, that he might redeem them, if alive. C.—King. They answer with flattery, insinuating that Gedeon had the air of a king. M.

Ver. 19. Kill you. They were not included in the number of the seven devoted nations, (W.) and the precept for destroying the Madianites no longer subsisted. Num. 31:17. M.—The laws of war permitted the Hebrews to kill their prisoners, if they thought proper. No public executioner was necessary. Samuel killed Agag, 1 K. 15:32. See 3 K. 2:25. 2 K. 1:15. C.—Gedeon had a mind to make his son partake in the victory, and punish these kings for an unjust murder of his relations. He would also inure him to fight against the enemies of God, &c. M.

Ver. 21. Age. They beg that they may die in a more speedy and noble manner. Tacitus (Hist. iv.) observes, “it was reported that Civilis exposed some of the Roman captives to his little son, in order that he might fix his arrows and javelins in their bodies.”—Ornaments. Most interpreters understand “crescents.” The veneration of the Arabs for the moon, the celestial Venus, or Alilat, is well known. The Turks still make use of this sign, as Christians employ the cross on their standards, temples, &c. Men and women anciently wore on their necks or forehead ornaments of the same nature, as these camels did. Isai. 3:18. Latinus adorned his horses in the most splendid manner. Virg. Æn. vii: Aurea pectoribus demissa monilia pendent. Caligula decorated with extravagance his famous horse Incitatus, on which he designed to confer the consulate. Sueton.—In Egypt the camels are sometimes painted yellow, and hung with a variety of little bells. Vaneb.

Ver. 22. Israel, who were in his army, and of whom he receives the earlets for his share of the spoil. C.—But as those who staid at home received a share of the booty, and no doubt would come to congratulate Gedeon on his victory, it seems equally probable that this offer of the regal dignity was made to him in a full assembly of the people, (H.) which is greatly to the honour of this valiant man. M.—Rule them. They wished to confer upon him a dignity which he did not now possess, and which he absolutely refused, being, as he thought, incompatible with the theocracy. This shews that it was not the dignity of judge, which he retained till his death, but that of king, which was so displeasing to God, when the Israelites resolved to establish it among them. 1 K. 8:7. M. T. Grot. C.—Josephus (v. 8.) thinks that Gedeon wished to resign the former dignity, but was forced to retain it forty years. The judges were chosen by God, and acted as his lieutenants, so that the people having no part in their election, the Lord alone was considered as the king of Israel. Some are of opinion that the people wished, on this occasion, to make the dignity hereditary. C.—Serarius thinks that they made an offer of the regal power to Gedeon, to his son, and grandson, only. But it seems rather that they meant to make the sovereign authority over entirely to his family, (M.) so great a sense had they of his courage, moderation, and just severity, of which he had given such striking proofs. H.

Ver. 24. Request. It was not then thought dishonourable to ask nor to receive presents. The most precious part of the booty had been already presented to the general, according to the custom of the heroic times. But, as the people wished to make Gedeon king, he consents to receive the earlets, as a memorial of their affection.—Earlets. Heb. and Sept. (M.) may also signify, “each an earlet,” as if he would only accept one from each soldier. The original signifies also, the rings which women put under their noses; but, as men never did, it has not that meaning here, (C.) though there might be women in the camp of the Madianites. H.—Ismaelites. By this title various nations are designated. It seems almost as general as the word Arab among us. These nations were no more distinguished by these ornaments than the Hebrews themselves. Ex. 32:2 and 35:12. The Persians, Africans, Lybians, &c. wore ear-rings. C.

Ver. 26. And jewels. Some translate, “crescents (Sept. “little moons,”) and boxes” (netiphoth, M.) of perfumes, such as Alexander found among the spoils of Darius, and reserved to put his Homer in. These ornaments were also used by women. Isai. 3:18. C.—The eastern nations delight in perfumes. M.—The ear-rings alone would amount to 3102*l.* 10*s.* sterling. H.

Ver. 27. An ephod. A priestly garment; which Gedeon made with a good design: but the Israelites, after his death, abused it by making it an instrument of their idolatrous worship, (Ch.) and perhaps consulting their idols with it. No law forbade the making of such a garment. M.—It was not peculiar to the high priest, since we find that Samuel and David occasionally wore the ephod, (2 K. 6:14,) and probably Gedeon would, on public occasions, do the like with this most costly one, which would serve to remind the people of the victory which they had gained over Madian. The chief judge in Egypt wore a great golden chain and collar, adorned with curious figures, as a mark of his dignity. Diod. ii. 3. This monument of the victory, and of the dignity of Gedeon, became, after his death, an occasion of superstition to the people, who foolishly imagined that they might consult the Lord, wherever an ephod was found. See C. 17:5. Ex. 25:7. They began to neglect the tabernacle, and to form a religion of their own choice. Many think that Gedeon was guilty of indiscretion in making it. S. Aug. q. xli. Lyran. E.—But the thing was in itself indifferent. He did not intend to arrogate to himself the privileges of the Levitical tribe. The Scripture nowhere condemns him, but speaks of his faith and of his death with honour, v. 32. Heb. 11:3.—With it.

Heb. “after it or him,” which may either signify that this superstition took place after the death of Gedeon, (Sept. Pagnin. M.) or in consequence of the making of the ephod. Jonath. Drus. Prot. &c. versions. C.—And to. This explains how it affected Gedeon, who was probably dead. He suffered in the ruin of his family, (H.) as it is explained in the following chapter. M.

Ver. 31. His concubine. She was his servant, but not his harlot; and is called his concubine, as wives of an inferior degree are commonly called in the Old Testament, though otherwise lawfully married. Ch.—They had not all the privileges of wives; (Gen. 25:6,) and their children could not claim the inheritance. C.—Abimelech means, “my (H.) father king;” alluding to the dignity of Gedeon; or perhaps the mother imposed this name, hoping that her son would obtain the highest honours. Josephus calls her Druma. She dwelt at Sichem, to which place the judge of Israel often resorted, though his usual residence was at Ephra. This son of theirs is included among the 70.

Ver. 32. Good. He left an excellent reputation, and died in God’s friendship. M.

Ver. 33. After. This is the most solid proof of Gedeon’s piety, since he kept the people in awe, and faithful to the Lord during his life.—God. Heb. “and appointed Baal Berith their god,” or goddess; for Berith, “of the covenant,” is feminine. In the temple of this idol, the citizens of Sichem kept money. C. 9:4. The pagans had many gods who presided over treaties; and the parties were, it seems, at liberty to choose whom they thought proper. They commonly pitched upon Jupiter, who is, therefore, styled Zeus orkios, or Dius fidius, or Fistius Jupiter. Laert. in Pythag. Halicar. iv. A statue “of Jupiter for oaths,” was seen at Olympus, holding the thunderbolts in his hands, ready to hurl against those who proved faithless. Pausan. Eliac. Philo of Byblos speaks of the Phœnician god Eliun, “the High,” and (C.) of the goddess “Beruth,” which last has a visible connection with Berith. The former title is sometimes given to the true God in Scripture. The city of Berytus was so called, probably in honour of the latter. Nonnus seems to have styled her Beroe. Bochart. Chanaan ii. 17.—Pliny (xxxi. 1.) mentions the god Briaze, at the foot of whose temple runs the river Olachas, the waters of which are said to burn those who are guilty of perjury. The Chaldee reads, “they chose Beel-kiam for their error.” Amos (5:26) speaks of the images of Chiun. May he not be the same as Berith or Kiam? Spencer says, that Chiun was Saturn: but Vossius thinks it was the moon. Idol. ii. 23. C.

Ver. 35. Mercy is here put for many virtues: gratitude, justice, kindness, &c. M.—The Israelites did not take care to provide for (C.) the family of one who had rendered them such essential services. H.

JUDGES 9

Ver. 1. Abimelech was encouraged to contend with his brethren as he saw the indifference which the people shewed for them, and as he was of a bold enterprising temper. C.

Ver. 2. Men, particularly to those who have the greatest influence. Heb. Bahalim. M.—The argumentation of Abimelech tended to prove that monarchy was the most perfect and eligible form of government, and that it would be hard upon the people, and greatly weaken the state, if seventy princes were to be supported in al the dignity of kings. But it was easy to discern the fallacy of his reasons. The dignity of judge was not hereditary, and it does not appear that the sons of Gedeon claimed it. If it had belonged to his family, the eldest would have been entitled to it, or any of the children, in preference to this son of the servant, v. 18. He was, indeed, born at Sichem; but the others were by no means strangers: (C.) and what right had the men of this town to give a ruler to Israel? H.—Flesh, an usual expression in Scripture to denote kindred. v. 3. Gen. 2:23. 2 K. 19:13. C.

Ver. 4. Weight. Heb. Chal. and Sept. do not express what quantity of silver was given. M.—But sicle on such occasions is generally supplied. C.—Hence this sum would amount to little more than 8*l*. sterling. H.—As this appears too insignificant a sum to maintain an army, (C.) some would supply pounds, each consisting of 24 sicles, or talents, which were equivalent to 3000 sicles. M.—But this is without example, and the army of Abimelech was, probably, a company of banditti, or villains, who went with him to Ephra, to murder his brethren, and afterwards kept near his person. When he had got possession of his father's estate, and of the sovereign power, he found means to supply his wants. C.—Baalberith. That is, Baal of the covenant, so called from the covenant they had made with Baal, c. 8:33. Ch.—The custom of keeping money in temples was formerly very common. Almost all the cities of Greece sent money to the temple of Apollo, at Delphos, (Marsham, sæc. xvii.) where the people of Rome and of Marseilles had also some. The different cities had likewise holes cut in the rock of Olympia, in Elis, for the same purpose. The public treasury was, almost universally, some temple. That of Rome was the temple of Saturn.—Vagabonds. Heb. “empty and inconstant” (C.)

people who had nothing to lose, and who would not embrace any proper method of getting a livelihood. H.—Chal. “seekers.” Sept. “stupid.” Sym. “idle and of desperate fortunes, or frantic.” C.—Such people are generally at the head of every revolution, or, at least, are ready to follow the directions of some powerful and designing man; as but too many instances, both in ancient and modern times evince; which ought to be a caution for all to watch their motions. H.

Ver. 5. Stone where criminals were, perhaps, commonly executed, that he might seem to act with justice, (Tostat) or he might slaughter his brethren on the very altar, which had been erected to God by Gedeon, after he had thrown down that of Baal. By doing so, he would seem to vindicate the idol, and gratify the people of Sichem, who were zealous idolaters, v. 46. Joatham escaped his fury, yet he, also, uses a round number, 70, when he says you have killed 70 men, v. 18. C.—

Abimelech himself must also be deducted from the number. Thus we say the seventy interpreters, (M.) though the Greek interpreters of the Bible are supposed (H.) to have been 72. M.—The history of nations is full of similar instances of cruelty. Ochus, king of Persia, killed his uncle, and 80 or 100 of his sons. Phraartees, son of Herod, king of the Parthians, by a concubine, slew his father and his 30 children. Justin. x. and xlii.—The Turkish emperors have shewn equal barbarity on many occasions, and they still murder or confine all their brothers. Serar. q. 6.

Ver. 6. Mello. We know of no such city in the vicinity of Sichem. Heb. “all the house of Millo:” which some take to be the town-house of Sichem, full of the chief citizens, as Mello signifies “filled up;” (Vatable) or it might designate some part of the city which had been levelled, like the deep valley at Jerusalem, (3 K. 9:15. H.) and where some powerful family, probably the father of Abimelech’s mother, might dwell. C.—This family would interest itself the most in the advancement of the tyrant, v. 3. H.—Oak. Heb. “the plain, or oak of the statue,” (alluding to the monument which was left here by Josue, v. 37. Josue 24:26) or Sept. “of the station,” as those of Sichem might assemble here to deliberate on public affairs, (C.) in memory of the solemn covenant between God and the people. H.

Ver. 7. Stood on. As Abimelech was a figure of Antichrist, who will reign for a time, so Joatham denotes the pastors of the church, who shall stand up for the truth. W.—Garizim. At the foot of this mountain Sichem was built. Joatham addressed the people of the city, probably during the absence of Abimelech, (C.) when, Josephus (v. 9.) says, a great festival was celebrated.

Ver. 8. Us. By this parable, Joatham expostulates with the men of Sichem, who had so basely requited the labours of Gedeon, and had given the preference to the son of a servant, who was of the most savage temper. H.—In a spiritual sense, which the Fathers chiefly regard, heretics and schismatics act in this manner, and choose rather to be governed by those who will allow them to follow their passions, than by such governors as God has appointed, though the latter be endued with the grace of the Holy Ghost, and with all virtues, signified by the olive and other fruit trees. They prefer the bramble, or the worst dispositions, like Nemrod, Mahomet, Antichrist, &c. who, after persecuting the virtuous, and Catholics for a time, 2 Thess. 2) will, in the end, prove their ruin, though they themselves be involved in the common destruction. “Fire shall rise (says V. Bede, q. 6.) against this bramble, Antichrist, and shall devour him, and all his together.” W.—The use of parables has been very general. M.—Agrippa brought the Roman plebeians, who had retired to the sacred mount, to a sense of their duty, and to a love of mutual harmony with the nobles, by observing that the members once refused to supply the wants of the belly, because it did not labour like the rest. Livy 2.—In the application of these parables, Maimonides justly remarks, that we must consider their general scope, and not pretend to explain every circumstance; (More. Neboc.) a remark which Origen had already made. Many things are only added for the sake of ornament. H.—Thus we need not imagine that the people of Sichem offered the sovereign authority to many, who refused to accept of it, and at last only prevailed upon Abimelech. Gedeon had, indeed, rejected a similar offer, (C. 8:22) and his other sons not endeavouring to retain the authority of their father, the Sichemites acceded to the petition of Abimelech, to anoint him king. This expression does not always imply a material unction, though such was used among the Jews. It signifies the granting of all the power of a king; in which sense it is applied to foreign princes, (Isa. 65:1) and to Jesus Christ, (Dan. 9:24) who received the reality of that sovereign dominion, of which this unction was only a figure. C.

Ver. 9. Leave. But, would this advancement prove any disadvantage? The king is bound to give himself up wholly for the good of the public, so that he must frequently be full of anxiety and care. C.—Use of. The olive-tree is introduced, speaking in this manner, because oil was used, both in the worship of the true God, and in that of the false gods, whom the Sichemites served. Ch.—The pagans burnt lamps in honour of their idols, and anointed their statues: unguentoque lares humescere nigro. Prud. c. Sym. 1.—They also anointed their military standards at Rome. Plin. xiii. 3.—The same author observes, that “two sorts of liquor are very delightful to the bodies of men: wine to drink and oil for the outside: intus vini, foris olei. B. xiv. 22.—Men use oil to strengthen and foment their bodies, as well as to give them light. C.—It spiritually denotes the grace of God, which establishes the peace of the soul, as the fig-tree signifies the sweetness of God's law, producing good works, and the vine shews forth those noble actions, which are performed without the affection of outward show; and which are therefore, most agreeable both to God and to men. W.—Promoted. Some translate the Heb. "to put myself in motion for." Syr. &c. We might also render, "which honoureth the gods, (or the judges) and men to come to be promoted among (or disquieted on account of) the trees."

Ver. 11. Sweetness. The fig is the sweetest of fruits, and is regarded as the symbol of sweetness. Aristop. Bonfrere.

Ver. 13. Cheereth God and men. Wine is here represented as agreeable to God, because he had appointed it to be offered up with his sacrifices. But we are not obliged to take these words, spoken by the trees in Joatham's parable, according to the strict rigour of divinity; but only in a sense accommodated to the design of the parable expressed in the conclusion of it. Ch.—The same word, Elohim, which is translated God may also signify any powerful man, as in v. 9. H.—Yet wine may be said to cheer God, in the same figurative sense, as the odour of victims is sweet and delightful to him. C.—He is pleased with the devotion of men, and requires these things as a testimony of their love and fidelity. H.—Joatham might speak according to the notions of the idolaters, who thought that their gods really fed on ambrosia and nectar, and were pleased with the smell of victims and of perfumes. That wine cheereth the heart of man needs no proof. Ps. 103:15.—Tunc veniunt risus, tunc pauper cornua sumit.—Tunc dolor et curæ rugaque frontis abit. Ovid.

Ver. 14. Bramble. Sept. rhamnos, "the white, or hawthorn." Some suppose that atad means "a wild rose, (Vatab.) thistle," &c. C.—It is here put for any base and ambitious man. W.

Ver. 15. Shadow or protection, Ps. 16:8. Baruc. 1:12. C.—Joatham hints at the insolence of Abimelech, (H.) and foretels that he and his foolish subjects will soon be at variance, and destroy each other. Fire is often put for war. The people of Sichem began soon to despise their new king, and he made war upon them, and destroyed their city; though the people afterwards took ample revenge, v. 20. C.—Tyrants promise much, but their rage soon falls upon the more wealthy and powerful citizens, (H.) here signified by the cedars. M.

Ver. 18. You are. People are answerable for the injuries which they do not prevent, when they have it in their power. C.—Many of the citizens of Sichem had assisted Abimelech, v. 4.—Brother. The ties of kindred could not hide their ingratitude and cruelty. H.

Ver. 20. Town of. Heb. “the house of Mello,” v. 6. C.—the imprecation of Joatham was prophetic. He had not the smallest doubt but the people had done wrong; (H.) and the three different fruit-trees, which rejected the offer of promotion, represented all the virtuous Israelites, who knew that they could not lawfully assume the regal or judicial authority, without the divine call. Ezechiel (17:24,) attributes knowledge to trees by the same figure of speech, as Joatham does here. M.

Ver. 21. Bera. Heb. Bar or Beera, “the well.” There was a place of this name in the tribe of Ruben, where the Israelites encamped. Num. 21:16. Bersabee, in the tribe of Juda, was another famous well, and it is probable that Joatham would retire to some distant place. H.—S. Jerom mentions a Bera, eight miles north of Eleutheropolis; and Maundrell speaks of another, about 21 miles from Sichem, on the road to Jerusalem. The dominion of Abimelech did not extend far. C.

Ver. 23. Spirit. God permitted the spirit of discord to arise, like an executioner, (C.) to punish the sins both of the ruler and of his subjects. H.—S. Aug. (q. 45.) observes, that God caused the people to be sorry for what they had done: but they afterwards proceeded to acts of violence and enmity, at the instigation of the devil, to whose advice they gave ear, in consequence of their former transgression. W.—The common people began to open their eyes, and beheld the cruelty of Abimelech, and of some of the principal citizens, who had espoused his cause, with abhorrence. M.—They reflected on the justice of Joatham’s parable, which tended to rouse them not to suffer the tyrant to remain unpunished any longer. H.—Detest him. Heb. “revolted against (or dealt treacherously with) Abimelech, (24) that the crime (or punishment of the murder) of the, &c. might come, and their blood be laid upon,” &c. H.—God permitted that Abimelech should be punished by those very men who had been the occasion of his sin. To obtain the sceptre over them, he had committed the most horrible cruelty. C.

Ver. 25. Coming. Abimelech resided at Ephra, having appointed Zebul governor of Sichem, from whom he received information of what was doing. The malcontents began to plunder his adherents; (C.) and as it was the time of vintage, they gave way to all the sallies which fury, heated by wine, can suggest; particularly after Gaal, a powerful man of the neighbourhood, came to put himself at their head, v. 28. H.

Ver. 27. Cups. Such revellings were common in the days of vintage; (Isai. 16:10. Jer. 48:33,) and they generally accompanied the heathenish sacrifices. C. 16:24. They went to give thanks to their god, for having delivered them, (C.) as they thought, from the power of Abimelech. H.

Ver. 28. Sichem. Why should this ancient city be thus degraded? This son of Jerobaal deigns not to reside among us, but sets one of his servants over us! H.—He mentions Jerobaal instead of Gedeon, to remind the people of the indignity formerly offered to their great idol, by the father of their present ruler. M.—Heb. may have another sense. “Who is Abimelech?... Is he not the son of Jerobaal, and Zebul his officer? Serve the men of Hemor,” &c. It seems that Gaal was of the race of Chanaan, by the manner in which he speaks of Hemor, whose history is given, Gen. 34. Many of the same nations might still inhabit Sichem, (C.) which made the people so bold and zealous in the adoration of Baal. H.—The insidious Gaal hence takes occasion to propose to his countrymen, that they had better acknowledge the authority of their ancient magistrates, who occupied the place of Hemor. C.—But he immediately insinuates, that the most effectual method to expel the tyrant, would be to vest him with the sovereign authority. H. v. 29.—The party of Abimelech was now the weaker. C.

Ver. 31. Thee. Heb. “they besiege (C.) or fortify the city.” H.—The partizans of Gaal attacked those who were still favourable to Abimelech, and fortified themselves as much as possible, in those parts which they had already seized. Vat. Drusius.—Or as tsarim means “enemies,” we may as well translate, “lo, the enemies are in (or with) the city against thee.” C.

Ver. 34. Places. Heb. “companies, (H.) or heads.” He divided his army into four parts, over each of which he appointed a commander. C.

Ver. 36. To Zebul. It seems the latter had acted with such dissimulation, that Gaal supposed he had come over to his party. Zebul laughs at him, as if he were disturbed with groundless fears, (H.) in order that Abimelech may take him unawares. M.

Ver. 37. Midst. Heb. Tabur, here signifies “a little hill, or the navel,” which title is given to places which are elevated and in the centre of the country. Ezec. 38:12. Joseph. Bel. iii. 2. Varro mentions the lake of Cutilia, as the navel of Italy. The wood of Enna and Etolia are styled the navel of Sicily and of Greece, by Cicero and Livy. Bonfrere. C.—Oak, which is probably mentioned, v. 6. M.—Heb. “another company comes by the oak or plain of Mehonenim,” which may signify, “of the augurs.” Sept. “of those who make observations,” apoblepton. C.

Ver. 41. Ruma may be the same place as Arimathea, between Joppe and Lidda. S. Jer. M.—But this seems to be too remote from Sichem, (H. Bonfrere) in the neighbourhood of which Abimelech halted, to give the citizens time to enter into themselves, (C.) and to open their gates to him without farther resistance. Gaal entered the city after his defeat: but was forced the next day to leave it by Zebul. Whereupon he was met by two divisions of Abimelech's army, which routed him, and pursued the fugitives, while the king marched straight to the city; and though he had a party within the walls, headed by Zebul, (H.) unless he was slain, (C.) the rest of the inhabitants made such a stout resistance, that the tyrant resolved to demolish the city, when he took it, at night. H.

Ver. 45. Sowed salt. To make the ground barren, and fit for nothing; (Ch.) and to testify his eternal hatred towards the place, as salt is the symbol of duration. See Deut. 29:23. Sophon. 2:9. Jer. 17:6.—Salsa autem tellus & quæ perhibetur amara—Frugibus infelix. Virg. Geor. ii. Notwithstanding the fury of Abimelech, Sichem was afterwards rebuilt, and became as fertile as before. The city of Milan was destroyed and sowed with salt in 1162. Sigon.—The houses of traitors were formerly treated in this manner in France, (Brantome) as was that of the admiral ed Chatillon. C.—See on this custom Bochart, animal. 3:16.—Some think it denoted that the ground might henceforth be cultivated, and grow corn where houses had stood. Salt is the source of fertility, if there be not too much of it. H.

Ver. 46. Tower. Serarius thinks it was the house of Mello, out of the city, v. 6. M.—It was the citadel, large enough to contain 1000 soldiers. They durst not, however, stop here to encounter Abimelech, but retired to the temple, either because it was still stronger and higher, or in hopes that they would be secure, on account of the veneration (C.) to which the place was entitled among the idolaters. —Berith. Prot. “they entered into an hold of the house of the god Berith.” Sept. “of the covenant.” H.—Where, &c. is added by way of explanation, (C.) except the word strong, which the Sept. render ochuroma, “a fortress.” The tower and temple seem to have been contiguous, since Abimelech, by setting fire to the tower, destroyed these people at the same time, v. 49. H.

Ver. 48. Selmon. This mountain lay towards the Jordan, and was covered with trees and snow. Ps. 67:16. M.—Bough. Sept. “a burden or faggot of sticks.” Josephus observes that they were dry. C.

Ver. 49. And so. Heb. and Sept. “upon them, so that all the men of the tower of Sichem died also, about a thousand men and women.” The sanctity of the place where they had taken refuge, made no impression upon the tyrant's mind, who was equally devoid of religion as of humanity. H.

Ver. 50. Thebes, about 13 miles from Sichem, towards Scythopolis. Euseb.—Besieged. Heb. &c. “took,” as the sequel shews, (v. 52,) since Abimelech was killed, as he was attacking the tower or citadel, in the midst of the city. C.

Ver. 51. Battlements, or roof of the tower, which was flat. Hence the defendants hurled down stones, &c. upon the enemy.

Ver. 53. Above, or “of the upper millstone,” according to the Heb. and Sept. Pyrrhus met with a similar fate at Argos. Plutarch observes, (in Scylla) that the Lacedemonians did not like to attack walls, because the bravest men are there often slain by the greatest cowards. C.—Hence Joab puts this advice in the mouth of David, that it is imprudent to come too near the walls, 2 K. 11:21.—Skull, (cerebrum) “brain.” Yet the tyrant's understanding was not perhaps so much impaired, as to excuse him for commanding his armour-bearer to kill him. M.

Ver. 54. Slew him. The ancient heroes were always attended by their armour-bearers. C.—Marius ordered his servant to run him through, that he might not be exposed to the insults of his enemies; and V. Maximus (6:8,) greatly commends the servant for doing so. Nihil eorum pietati cedit, a quibus salus Dominorum protecta est. David was not of the same opinion, since he punished the Amalecite who pretended that he had rendered this service to Saul, 2 K. 1:16. The Christian religion condemns both those who engage others to take away their life, and those who comply with the impious request. Hercules was affected in the same manner as Abimelech, when he found that he was to die by the malice of a woman. O turpe fatum! femina Herculeæ necis—Auctor feratur. Seneca.—The Lacedemonians were not eager to besiege Argos, when they saw that the women were engaged in its defence. Pausan. ii. C.—Notwithstanding the wicked precaution of Abimelech, what he so much feared took place; for Joab said, Did not a woman cast a piece of a millstone upon him from the wall, and slay him in Thebes? 2 K. 11:21. His skull was so much fractured, that he had received a mortal wound: the sword only hastened his death. Thus was he justly punished with a stone, who had slaughtered 68 or 69 of his brethren upon one stone. H.—He can only be considered as an usurper or tyrant, since he was neither chosen by God nor by the Israelites in general. Hence he is only said to have reigned at Sichem. A. Lapide.—He was going to extend his conquests over other cities and tribes, when he was slain at Thebes. Josephus. H.

Ver. 1. Uncle of Abimelech, i.e. Half-brother to Gedeon, as being born of the same mother, but by a different father, and of a different tribe. Ch.—The wife of Joas might have been married to a person of the tribe of Issachar, by whom she had Phua, who was half-brother of Gedeon. H.—Thola was cousin-german of Abimelech. S. Aug. q. xlvii. &c. The Israelites elected Thola for their judge, (Abulensis) out of respect to Gedeon, (A. Lapide) that he might put an end to the commotions which had been excited by the tyrant. M.—Joatham might be passed over on account of his youth. The Sept. and Chal. have “Thola, the son of Phua, the son of his uncle by the father’s side,” which may be true, if the brother of Gedeon adopted him; or this uncle might refer to Abimelech. The uncertainty arises from the Heb. Dodo, which may be taken as a proper name. “Phua, the son of Dodo;” (Pagnin. Prot. &c. H.) or as denoting a relation, the paternal uncle of Abimelech, or of Thola, (Bonf. &c. C.) or simply “his kinsman.” The Heb. Sept. &c. assert that Thola “arose to defend or to save Israel.” He seems to have kept all quiet during the 23 years of his administration. —Samir. Sept. Alex. reads “Samaria;” but the city was not built till the reign of Amri. There was a city on a mountain, (H.) called Samir, in the tribe of Juda, (Jos. 15:48,) different from this. M.—People were at liberty to dwell where they pleased, out of their own tribe. C.—This judge was buried among the Ephraimites. H.—But we know not the exact place where Samir stood. C.—There seems, however, to be no inconvenience in allowing that there was a town in the vicinity of Sichem, long before Amri made Samaria the capital of his kingdom; (see 3 K. 13:22 and 16:24,) and here Thola might reside. He was probably the eldest, or of the second branch, of Issachar, (Num. 26:23,) of great nobility and virtue, and the 10th judge of Israel.

Ver. 2. Years. S. Severus says 22, making the reign of Jair of equal length. Cum æque viginti & duos annos principatum obtinuisset. But this is contrary to all the best chronologers. The fidelity of the Israelites seems to have been of no longer continuance at this period than usual, as we find that they relapsed into idolatry again, at least after the death of Jair, within 45 years after they had been scourged by the tyrant Abimelech, v. 6. H.

Ver. 4. Havoth Jair. This name was now confirmed to these towns, which they had formerly received from another Jair. Num. 32:41. Ch.—Sixty are there specified, and only 30 here, which might either be the same, or different from those villages to which the former Jair had left his name. Grotius thinks that judge Jair was the son of Segub, who left 23 cities to him. These, with seven belonging to his grandfather, Hesron, make up the number here specified. 1 Par. 2:22.—The Heb. does not say that these 30 cities were called after the judge: “they had 30 cities, which are called Havoth Jair,” &c. C.—Some copies of the Sept. add “two” to the number of sons, asses, and cities, as if there had been 32 of each. In other respects they agree with the original. It was formerly a mark of distinction to ride on fair asses. C. 5:10. H.—S. Jerom thinks that horses were prohibited, as they were in Egypt, without the king’s leave. But we nowhere find this law recorded, (C.) and it is not universally true that it existed. M. Hieropolit. iii. 15.—Some have inferred from Jair’s children having 30 cities, that he exercised a sovereign authority over Israel: but he might only give his children the authority of magistrates in them, as Samuel did. 1 K. 8. E.—We know not by what means Jair was raised to the chief command, nor what he did for the benefit of the people. He is supposed to be the same who is called Bedan. 1 K. 12:11. Serar. Usher, &c.; though others think that Bedan is a title of Samson. He was of the tribe of Manasses in Galaad. Having kept the people under due restraint during his administration, they burst forth, like a torrent, at his death, and, on all sides, abandoned themselves to a multiplicity of idols, so that God made some difficulty in restoring them again to favour. H.—A. Lapidé thinks that they had begun to relapse 18 years before the death of Jair, and were, consequently, chastised by the Ammonites. Serarius is of a contrary opinion, though Houbigant rather inclines to the former sentiment, as it is not said that Jair gave rest to the land, nor more than Samgar. H.

Ver. 5. Camon is placed in Galaad by Adrichomius, though S. Jerom mentions another, six miles from Legion, where he supposes that Jair was buried. It seems more natural to say that he was interred in his own country, on the east side of the Jordan. Bonfrere.—It is, probably the same city as Hamon (1 Par. 6:16,) and Hammothdor. Jos. 21:32. C.

Ver. 6. Gods. The sun and moon were principally adored among these nations, under different names.

Ver. 7. Ammon. While these infested the eastern parts, the Philistines made incursions into the territories of their neighbours. H.—This servitude resembled that of Madian. Jephthe attacked the Ammonites, and Abesan, with other judges, made head against the Philistines (C.)

in the west. H.

Ver. 8. Years by the Ammonites, whose dominion was suppressed by the victory of Jephthe. When the servitude commenced is uncertain, v. 4. Heb. “and that year they vexed,” &c. C.—Roman Sept. “at that time.” Grabe’s copy has “in that year,” and though the former expression appear to be more indefinite, yet it must refer to some period, (H.) either prior to the death of Jair, (Salien) or subsequent to that event. Euseb. Genebrard.—The text will not decide with certainty. How long the Philistines harassed Israel is specified, C. 13:1.

Ver. 9. Exceedingly. Not only those who lived in Galaad, but also three tribes on the west of the Jordan, were treated as the half tribe of Manasses had been, (C.) when Gedeon delivered them. H.

Ver. 11. Said by the mouth of an angel, or of some prophet. M.

Ver. 12. Chanaan. Heb. “Maon.” Sept. Rom. and Alex. “Madian.” The Maonites are styled Mineans by the Sept. (1 Par. 4:40,) and these inhabited Arabia, (Diod. iii. 42,) and might join themselves to Madian and Amalec, in their attacks upon the Israelites. As for Chanaan, which other editions of the Sept. retain, we know that they were domestic enemies, like thorns in the sides of Israel. Jos. 23:13. All the persecutions, which the Hebrews had to undergo, are not particularized in this book. C.—They were grievously tormented in Egypt, they had to contend with the Amorrhites at their first entrance into the land. H.—The Ammonites and Amalecites had assisted Eglon before, and the Philistines had attacked Samgar. The Sidonians, it seems, had also greatly molested those who lived near them, and probably were the auxiliaries of Jabin. C.—But the Chanaanites were ready to fall upon every weak spot, living in various parts of the country, (H.) and continually tempted the people of Israel to abandon the service of God. C.

Ver. 13. No more, so readily as I have done formerly. I will make you feel the rod of your oppressors. H.—Unless you change your conduct, I will never deliver you. C.

Ver. 14. Go. This is not a command, but an ironical expression, as Deut. 32:38.

Ver. 15. Time. They are willing to suffer from the hand of God, (2 K. 24:14,) if they prove inconstant any more. M.

Ver. 16. Touched. Lit. “grieved.” Heb. “his soul was straitened,” as in joy it is said to be enlarged. He speaks of God in a human manner. C. Gen. 6:6. M.

Ver. 17. Together, as people sure of victory.—Galaad, the capital of the country of the same name. It belonged to Gad.—Maspha, near the springs of the Jaboc. Jos. 11:3 and 13:26. C.—It signifies “a watch-tower.” M.

Ver. 18. Galaad. It seems none of them durst accept the offer, as the first onset was the most hazardous. Hence they invited Jephthe to take upon him the command. The Israelites consulted the Lord on a former occasion, who should begin the attack upon the Chanaanites. C. 1:1. In these wars much depended on one battle. The wars were seldom protracted to such a length as they have been since. C.

JUDGES 11

Ver. 1. Harlot. Heb. Zona. Jos. 2:1. It is uncertain whether she was properly a concubine, or a wife of inferior dignity. She lived with her son in the house of Galaad; (C.) at least the latter was in his father's house. H.—Hence Jephthe complains that he had been expelled, not that he was debarred from enjoying his father's inheritance, and consequently the law was not observed in his regard. Moses makes no provision for illegitimate children, but he excludes the son of a mamzer from the church of God. Deut. 23:2. Some think that the mother of Jephthe was of a nation with whom it was not lawful to marry. Josephus, v. 9. Said. Grot.—Serarius believes that his father was already married, when he had to do with this harlot. M.—But he might have first taken her to wife, without the usual formalities. Drus. A. Lapide.—It is equally uncertain whether Jephthe was of the tribe of Gad or of Manasses, as both occupied the country of Galaad. Interpreters generally conclude that he was of one of these tribes, and most probably of the latter; his father also was called Galaad. H.

Ver. 2. Sons. Grabe's Sept. determines the number to be “two.” H.—They caused the magistrates to declare that Jephthe should not partake in the inheritance, v. 7. M.

Ver. 3. Tob, to the north of Galaad, of which it is a part. Joseph.—It is called Tubim, 1 Mac. 5:13. See 2 K. 10:6.—And robbers. This is a farther explication of rekim, poor vain fellows. C. 9:4. They did not infest the Israelites, but made war on their enemies around; latro, in Latin, often signifies a soldier, particularly such as lived on plunder, as wer reat in Plautus. Mil. glorios. Latrocinatus annos decem, mercedem accipio. Some have imagined that Jephthe was at the head of some banditti, q. 43. inter. op. S. Aug.—But David's followers were of the same description (1 K. 22:2,) as those of Jephthe, men of determined resolution and valour. C.—Such a man as Jephthe, was therefore a valuable acquisition to the dispirited Israelites; and Providence had inured him to labour, and endued him with extraordinary prudence, notwithstanding his want of education, v. 12. Necessity has often supplied every deficiency, and produced the most consummate generals. Prince. Heb. and Sept. “and there were gathered unto Jephthe vain men, and they went out with him.” H.

Ver. 5. Hard. Heb. “and when the Ammonites made war.” As both armies were encamped near Maspha, they could hardly avoid having some skirmishes. But the Israelites durst not come to a pitched battle till they had Jephthe at their head. H.—The Ammonites infested them every year with similar incursions, v. 12. C.

Ver. 7. House. Perhaps he saw some of his brothers among them: though he might speak thus to the magistrates, because they had not prevented this injustice, (C.) as it was their duty to do. H.

Ver. 8. Cause to make some reparation for our offence, though we must acknowledge that our present distress caused us to think of doing so. H.—Heb. “therefore we turn again to thee,” &c. C.—Galaad. they only engage that the tribes of Gad and Manasses, who inhabited that country, should submit to his authority. M.—But as they were the most in danger, they first make head against the enemy, not doubting but their brethren in other parts would come to their assistance. C. 12:1. God ratified their choice, v. 11. 29; (H.) and he was acknowledged, after his victory, judge of all Israel. M.

Ver. 11. Prince. Heb. “head or captain,” (H.) to carry on the war, with a promise that he should be the judge of all the people, if he succeeded. C.—Words. Plans, explaining how he would first send a message to the king of Ammon, and if he would not accede to reasonable terms, he would collect all the forces of Galaad, and invites all their brethren on the other side of the river to make a joint attack upon him. H.—The Lord was considered as present in their public assemblies. Deut. 6 and 20. M.—He had also been taken by the people to witness their engagement; and Jephthe promises, in like manner, to perform his part with fidelity. H.—They promise on oath to be constant to each other. C.

Ver. 12. Land. Jephthe acts with a prudence and moderation which could not have been expected from one who had been brought up amid the noise of arms. C.—He gives notice that he has been recognized by the lawful proprietors of the land for their head; and therefore begs that that Ammonites would desist from their unjust warfare. If words prove ineffectual, he must then try the fortune of a battle. H.

Ver. 13. To me. The king falsely asserts, that all the country between the Arnon and the Jaboc belonged to him when Moses took it. The Ammonites had possession when the Israelites arrived, and it had formerly been occupied by Moab, and not by Ammon, Deut. 2:19 and 37; (M.) unless both might claim different parts. C.

Ver. 15. Moab. After the death of Eglon, the Ammonites had probably seized upon his dominion, (v. 25,) as we find no farther mention of the Moabites among the enemies of Israel, nor any king of that nation till the reign of David. Hence, as the king of Ammon laid claim to all the country, and had many of the Moabites in his army, Jephthe answers at once, that the land under dispute belonged to neither of these nations. C.—They had entirely lost it when Israel attacked Sehon, and took it from him, as was plain from the history of Moses and of the Amorrites. Num. 21:27. H.—Jephthe refers to facts universally known. C.

Ver. 16. Red Sea, as Asiongaber, many years after they left Egypt.

Ver. 17. Moab. This is not specified by Moses, but he sufficiently insinuates that he had done it. Deut. 2:8. 9. C.

Ver. 23. His land, which the Amorrite had first conquered, and which God took from him to give to Israel. It was clear that this country was not then considered as the property of the sons of Lot, since God expressly forbade his people to molest them. H.—Jephthe produces the right of conquest, the grant of God, and the possession of 300 years, to prove that the country belonged to the Israelites. All acknowledge that the right of conquest, in a just war, give a good title. Grot. Jur. iii. 6. 7.—The children of Lot had lost all hopes of recovering what Sehon had taken from them. C.—He could not be proved to be a thief or an usurper, but was in peaceable possession when the war with Israel commenced, in which he lost all his dominions. H.—By the same right, David kept what he had taken from the Amalecite plunderers, (1 K. 30:20,) and Abraham might have retained the spoils which had been carried off from Sodom. Gen. 14:21. The Roman and Grecian histories are full of such examples; and this right was admitted by all as the law of nations, Quæ ex hostibus, jure gentium, statim capientium fiunt. Caius. J.C.—The second argument of Jephthe is unanswerable, since God may undoubtedly transfer the property of one to another. But as the Ammonites might reply that they did not admit the God of Israel, he observes that the latter might at least have the same privilege as their Chamos, v. 24. Prescription of so long a time, with good faith, was the third argument, as the Amorrhites being destroyed, and the Moabites disheartened, could not pretend to reclaim the conquered country. There would never be an end of disputes among men, if the undisturbed possession of a country for such a length of time did not confirm their right to it. These principles establish the tranquillity of families and of states. C. Grot. Jur. ii. 4.

Ver. 24. Chamos. The idol of the Moabites and Ammonites. He argues from their opinion, who thought they had a just title to the countries which they imagined they had conquered by the help of their gods: how much more then had Israel an indisputable title to the countries which God, by visible miracles, had conquered for them. Ch.—Heb. “And shall not we possess those (counties occupied by the people whom) the Lord our God has driven out from before us?” H.—The Emim had been expelled by the people. Deut. 2:10. Chamos was the peculiar deity of Moab, (Num. 21:29. Jer. 48:46. &c. C.) and signifies “as taking away.” It is commonly supposed to be the sun. H.

Ver. 25. Him. Josue (24:9,) says that Balac fought against Israel. But it was not in a pitched battle, (C.) at least of which we have the particulars, (H.) nor to recover the territory which the Israelites had taken from Sehon, but only to defend his own dominions. He collected an army, and called the soothsayer to curse Israel. Num. 22:4, &c. C.

Ver. 26. He. Heb. “While Israel,” &c.—Years. He makes use of a round number. H.—Chronologists generally suppose that either more or fewer years had elapsed; (M.) and the Scripture only relates what Jephthe said. Sa.—The Jews reckon 394. Some date from the coming out of Egypt 305. C.—Petau has 365. But as Jephthe only speaks of the time during which the Israelites had occupied the land, the 40 years’ sojournment must be deducted, and still Petau will have 25 years too many; (H.) whereas “those who adduce the title of prescription, are accustomed rather to increase than to diminish the length of time.” Usher, p. 74.—Hence this author allows only 263 years. Houbigant comes rather nearer to the number of Jephthe, and reckons 281, which the ambassadors might represent, in a round number as 300. Proleg.—Salien almost agrees with Usher dating 306 years from the exit, and 266 from the victory over Sehon. He observes, with Eusebius, that Hercules instituted the Olympic games in the first year of Jephthe, A. 2849. But they were restored, and became a famous epoch only 400 years after. He place the first rape of Helen by Theseus at the same time, when she was about 12 years ole. In her 24th, she was stolen again by Paris, and gave occasion to the famous siege of Troy. H.

Ver. 27. And decide. Lit. “the arbiter of this day.” Jephthe is so well convinced of the justice of his cause, that he is willing to abide by God’s decision, (H.) to be manifested by the issue of the battle. M.—At the same time, he threatens the Ammonites with God’s judgments, if by their fault blood be shed unjustly, as he, like a good prince, had tried every means to prevent that misfortune, and to bring things to an amicable conclusion. C.

Ver. 29. Therefore. Heb. “then.” Sept. “and.” The refusal of the king of Ammon was not precisely the reason why God endued Jephthe with shuch wisdom and courage, though we may say that it was the occasion. H.—Jephthe summoned the troops in Galaad, and in the two tribes of Manasses, to attend his standard. He also invited Ephraim, (C. 12:2. C.) and we may reasonably suppose the other tribes also, who were near enough to be ready for the day of battle. Having collected what force he could in so short a time, he returned to Maspha, and thence proceeded to attack the enemy. H.

Ver. 30. He. Heb. and Sept. “And he vowed.” A new sentence commences; (Cajet.) so that it is not clear that Jephthe was moved to make this vow by the spirit of the Lord; else it could not be blamed. H.

Ver. 31. Whosoever, &c. Some are of opinion, that the meaning of this vow of Jephthe, was to consecrate to God whatsoever should first meet him, according to the condition of the thing; so as to offer it up as a holocaust, if it were such a thing as might be so offered by the law; or to devote it otherwise to God, if it were not such as the law allowed to be offered in sacrifice. And therefore they think the daughter of Jephthe was not slain by her father, but only consecrated to perpetual virginity. But the common opinion followed by the generality of the holy fathers and divines is, that she was offered as a holocaust, in consequence of her father’s vow: and that Jephthe did not sin, at least not mortally, neither in making nor in keeping his vow; since he is no ways blamed for it in scripture; and was even inspired by God himself to make the vow, (as appears from ver. 29, 30) in consequence of which he obtained the victory; and therefore he reasonably concluded that God, who is the master of life and death, was pleased, on this occasion, to dispense with his own law; and that it was the divine will he should fulfil his vow. Ch.—S. Thomas (2. 2. q. 88. a. 2.) acknowledges that Jephthe was inspired to make a vow, and his devotion herein is praised by the apostle. Heb. 11:32. But he afterwards followed his own spirit, in delivering himself, without mature deliberation, and in executing what he had so ill engaged himself, to perform. This decision seems to be the most agreeable to the Scripture, and to the holy fathers. S. Jerom (in Jer. 7.) says, non sacrificium placet, sed animus offerentis. “If Jephthe offered his virgin daughter, it was not the sacrifice, but the good will of the offerer which deserves applause.” Almost all the ancients seem to agree that the virgin was really burnt to death; and the versions have whosoever, which intimates that Jephthe intended to offer a human victim; particularly as he could not expect a beast fit for such a purpose, would come out of the doors of his house to meet him. C.—Yet many of the moderns, considering how much such things are forbidden by God, cannot persuade themselves that Jephthe should be so ignorant of the law, or that the priests and people of Israel should suffer him to transgress it. The original may be rendered as well, “whatsoever proceedeth ... shall surely be the Lord’s, and (Prot.) or I will offer it up for a holocaust.” Pagnin. &c.—The version of Houbigant is very favourable to this opinion. See Hook’s Principia.—It is supposed that the sacrifice of Iphigenia, which took place about this time, (Aulis. v. 26,) was only in imitation of this of Jephthe’s daughter. But the poets say, that Diana saved her life, and substituted a doe in her place; (Ovid Met. xii.) which, if true, would make the conformity more striking, if we admit that the sacrifice of Jephthe’s daughter was not carried into effect. Iphigenia was made a priestess of Dians, to whom human victims were immolated. The daughter of Jephthe, whom the false Philo calls Seila, was consecrated to the Lord, and shut up (H.) to lead a kind of monastic life; as the wives of David, (2 K. 20:3. Grotius) after they had been dishonoured, were obliged to live in a state of continency. Although (H.) forced chastity be not a virtue, (C.) yet Jephthe had no reason to believe that his daughter would not enter into the spirit of his vow, and embrace that state for God’s honour and service. We know that she gave her entire consent to whatever might be the nature of his vow; and surely she would be as ready to refrain from marriage, however desirable at that time, as to be burnt alive, which would effectually prevent her from becoming a mother, v. 37. To require this of her, was not, at least, more cruel in her father than to offer her in sacrifice. Then Chaldee paraphrast says, “Jephthe did not consult Phinees, the priest, or he might have redeemed her;” and Kimchi gives us a very mean idea, both of Jephthe and of the high priest, the great Phinees, whom the Rabbins foolishly suppose was still living, and of course above 300 years old, v. 26. —“Phinees said, He wants me, let him come to me. But Jephthe, the head of the princes of Israel, shall I go to him? During this contest the girl perished.” To such straits are those reduced who wish to account for the neglect of Jephthe in redeeming his daughter, as the Targum observes, was lawful for a sum of money. Lev. 27:2. 3. 28.—But H. his vow was of the nature of the cherom, which allowed of no redemption, and required death. C.—On this point, however, interpreters are not agreed, and this manner of devoting to death, probably, regarded only the enemies of God, or such things as were under a person's absolute dominion. H.—If a dog had first come out to meet Jephthe, could he have offered it up for a holocaust? Certainly not, (Grot.) because it was prohibited, (Deut. 23:18,) to offer even its price, (H.) and only oxen, sheep, goats, turtles and doves, were the proper victims. If, therefore, a person made a vow, of a man, he was to be consecrated to the Lord, (Grot.) like Samuel, and he might marry. But a woman could not, as she was already declared the servant of the Lord, and was not at liberty to follow her husband. Amama.—We need not herein labour to defend the conduct of Jephthe. The Scripture does not canonize him on this account. If he did wrong, his repentance, and other heroic acts of virtue, might justly entitle him to be ranked among the saints of the old law. S. Aug. q. 49.—“Shew me the man who has not fallen into sin ... Jephthe returned victorious from the enemy, but in the midst of his triumph, he was overcome by his own vow, so that he thought it proper to requite the piety of his daughter, who came out to meet him, by parricide. In the first place, what need was there of making a vow so hastily, to promise things uncertain, the event of which he knew not, instead of what was certain? Then why did he perform so sorrowful a vow to the Lord God, by shedding blood?” S. Amb. Apol. Dav. i. 4.—This saint adopts the common opinion that Jephthe really immolated his daughter. But he is far from thinking that he was influenced by the holy spirit to make the vow, otherwise he would never represent it in such odious colours. If God had required the life of Jephthe's daughter, as he did formerly command Abraham to sacrifice his son, the obedience and faith of the former would have been equally applauded, as the good will of the latter. But most of those who embrace the opinion that Jephthe sacrificed his daughter, are forced to excuse or to condemn the action. They suppose that he was permitted to fulfil his vow, that others might be deterred from making similar promises, without the divine authority. S. Chrys. hom. xiv. ad pop. Ant. S. Jer. c. Jov. i. “I shall never, says S. Amb. (Off. iii. 12,) be induced to believe that Jephthe, the prince, did not promise incautiously that he would immolate whatever should meet him “at the door of his own house;” whence he seems to take whosoever in the same latitude as we have given in the Hebrew. He concludes, “I cannot accuse the man who was obliged to fulfil his vow,” &c. We may imitate his moderation, (H.) rather than adopt the bold language of one who has written notes on the Prot. Bible, (1603) who says, without scruple, that by this rash vow and wicked performance, his victory was defaced; and again, that he was overcome with blind zeal, not considering whether the vow was lawful or not. W.—If Jephthe was under the immediate influence of the Holy Ghost in what he did, as Salien believes, and the context by no means disproves, we ought to admire the faith of this victorious judge, though he gave way to the feelings of human nature, v. 35. We should praise his fidelity either in sacrificing or in consecrating his daughter to God's service in perpetual virginity: but if he followed his own spirit, we cannot think that he was so ill-informed or so barbarous as to murder his daughter, nor that she would consent to an impiety which so often disgraced the pagan superstition, though she might very well agree to embrace that better part, which her father and God himself, by a glorious victory, seems to have marked out for her. Amid the variety of opinions which have divided the learned on this subject, infidels can derive no advantage or solid proof against the divine authority of the Scripture, and of our holy religion. The fact is simply recorded. People are at liberty to form what judgment of it they think most rational. If they decide that Jephthe was guilty of an oversight, or of a downright impiety, it will in the first place be difficult for them to prove it to the general satisfaction; and when they have done so, they will only evince that he was once a sinner, and under this idea the word of God gives him no praise. But if he did wrong in promising, as many of the Fathers believe, he might be justified in fulfilling his vow, as God might intimate to him both interiorly, and by granting him the victory, that he dispensed with his own law, and required this sort of victim in order to foreshew the bloody sacrifice of Jesus Christ for our sins, (Serarius and Salien, A. 2850) or the state of virginity which his blessed Mother and so many nuns and others in the Christian Church embrace with fervour.—Peace, with victory.—Same. Heb. "it shall be the Lord's, and (or) I will make it ascend a whole burnt offering." H.—The particle ve often signifies or as well as and, and it is explained in this sense here by the two Kimchis, by Junius, &c. See Ex. 21:17. Piscator says, the first part of the sentence determines that whatever the thing was it should be consecrated to the Lord, with the privilege of being redeemed, (Lev. 27:11,) and the second shews that it should be immolated, if it were a suitable victim. Amama.

Ver. 33. Aroer, upon the Arnon, belonged to the tribe of Gad. Menith was four miles from Hesebon, towards Rabbath.—Abel was noted for its vineyards, 12 miles east of Gadara, so that Jephthe pursued the enemy, as they fled towards the north for about 60 miles, and during the course of the war destroyed 20 of their cities, (C.) to punish them for their unjust revenges and usurpation of another's property. H.

Ver. 34. Daughter. It seems the vow had been kept secret, as no precautions were taken to prevent the affliction of the general; (C.) and indeed to have done so, would have been injurious to God's providence, and childish in Jephthe, as he meant to offer whatever should come to meet him. It would have been very mean, and contrary to the meaning of the vow, for him to procure something for which he had no great value, to present itself. H.—Dances, as it was customary on such occasions. 1 K. 18:6.

Ver. 35. Alas. These indications of grief are the effects of nature. Salien.—S. Amb. considerst them as the marks of repentance; (v. 31,) and we might hence infer that the vow was not dictated by the holy spirit, who would have endued Jephthe with fortitude, as he did Abraham, though all may not possess the virtue of that great father of believers. Gen. 22. H.—Deceived. We mutually expected comfort, from each other's presence: but we must both experience the reverse. Heb. may signify, "depressed, terrified," &c.—Thing. Heb. "I cannot recede." H.—It appears that he could not redeem what he had promised, (C.) as the condition had been fulfilled on the part of God. He might consider that he as no longer at liberty to use the privilege which the law allowed, when no condition had been specified. Lev. 27:4. H.

Ver. 37. Bewail my virginity. The bearing of children was much coveted under the Old Testament, when women might hope that from some child of theirs the Saviour of the world might one day spring. But under the New Testament virginity is preferred. 1 Cor. 7:35.

Ver. 38. Mountains. Such places were frequented in times of mourning. Jer. 31:15. Is. 15:2. C.—Jephthe allowed his daughter this short respite, without any offence, (Deut. 23:21,) before he immolated her, (M.) or before he debarred her from the society of men. Grot. &c.

Ver. 39. Father. Her fortitude is commended by S. Ambrose (Off. iii. 12,) as more worthy of admiration than that of the two Pythagorean friends, one of whom, being sentenced to die, procured the other to stand bond for his return; and, at the time appointed, came freely to deliver himself up; an instance of generosity which made the tyrant who had sentenced him to die, beg that they would admit him into the society of their friendship. H.—Whatever we may think of Jephthe, "we cannot sufficiently admire the dutiful behaviour, and amiable simplicity of the daughter, who voluntarily submitted to her parent's will, and exhorted him to do as he had vowed. To die to sin, to resign the pomps of a licentious world, to renounce those pleasures and incentives to vice, which are inconsistent with a clean heart, is a sacrifice truly meritorious, and acceptable to God; it is a sacrifice which was solemnly begun at the font of baptism." Reeves, A. 2817.—No man. It is remarked by those who believe that she was not slain, that this observation would be very unnecessary in the contrary opinion. No mention of death is made. The virgin only deploras, with pious resignation, that she cannot be the happy mother of the Messias.

Ver. 40. Lament. Heb. Lethanoth. On this term the solution of this question greatly depends. H.—Kimchi translates, “to talk with,” or “to comfort the daughter of Jephthe” as he supposes that the custom subsisted during her life, while she was shut up either near the tabernacle, or in her father’s house. C.—Montanus renders “to speak to.” Junius and the Tigurin version, “to discourse with.”—Thanan certainly is used for “he related,” &c. Judg. 5:11. yethannu narrentur, or rather narrent; and the construction here seems to require this sense. Amama.—If this be admitted, the bloody sacrifice is at an end, since the daughters of Israel could not meet to comfort the virgin every year, if she was immolated at the expiration of two months. But if we follow the translation of the Vulg. Sept. and Chal. as the Protestants have done, the lamentation might still be viewed in the same light, as tending to condole with the lady, rather than bewail her untimely death, (H.) as, for the latter purpose, it would not have been necessary for them to assemble together. Amama.—They might well enter into her sentiments, when she mourned her virginity, (v. 38,) and strive to yield her some comfort in her secluded state, by coming in such numbers, and with the permission of the priests of God, continuing with her four days. H.—Some translate “to publish,” or sound forth the praises (C.) of this heroic virgin, which may be true, whether she was slain, or only consecrated to the Lord. H.—S. Epiphanius (hær. 55. and 78,) informs us that “at Sichem an annual sacrifice was still offered up in the name of the virgin, and that she was revered as a goddess by the people in the vicinity.” The vow of Jephthe seems to have given rise to what we read in profane authors, of that which Idomeneus, king of Crete, made in the midst of a storm at sea: “He vowed that he would sacrifice to the gods whatever met him first. It happened that his son was the person, whom, when he had immolated, or, as others say, had wished to do it, and afterwards a pestilence had ensued, his subjects drove him from his kingdom.” Servius in Æn. iii. and xi. C.—Aldrovandus (in Asino) relates a similar vow of Alexander the Great. Even the more sober pagans could not, it seems, approve of the unwarranted vows of parents to destroy the lives of their children. But of people consecrated to the Lord, by their parents, without first requiring their consent, we have many examples, in Samuel. S. Bonaventure, July 14, &c.—If we explain the vow of Jephthe in the same sense, every difficulty will be removed, and infidels will not allege this example to prove that human victims are pleasing to God. H.

Ver. 1. Sedition. Heb. “the men of Ephraim shouted together” to arms.—North. Sept. “Sephena.” The Heb. may either signify north, or some city. Mont.—It is probable that Ephraim went to quarrel with Jepthe at Abel, before he had returned to Maspha. C.—House. Heb. and Sept. add, “with or upon thee.” M.

Ver. 2. Strife, to defend our property.—I called. Drusius doubts whether he sent an express invitation to Ephraim, otherwise how durst they assert that they had not been summoned? C.—But we may rather give credit to Jepthe. The condition of the nation was a sufficient invitation, as they knew that the greatest preparations were making for war on both sides, and it was their duty to come forward. H.

Ver. 3. Hands exposed to all sorts of danger. I resolved to defend myself to the utmost, 1 K. 19:6. Eccles. 10:2. C.

Ver. 4. Fugitive. Vile and timid, so that his brethren around him might destroy him at any time. M.—Galaad dwelt in the midst of the descendants of Joseph. H.—But Ephraim, in despite, had represented him as an outcast. Their envy deserved to be severely punished. C.—The same passion had nearly excited them to make war upon Gedeon. C. 8. M.

Ver. 6. Letter. Prot. “Say now Shibboleth, and he said Sibboleth, for he could not frame to pronounce it right.” The interpretation of the first word is added by S. Jerom, (H.) and denotes also “a running water;” (M.) whereas the Ephraimites pronounced a word which signifies “a burden,” not being able to utter properly sh, or schin, for which the substituted s, or samec, sobloth. H.—In the same nation, a variety of pronunciation frequently distinguishes the inhabitants of the different provinces. The Galileans were thus known from the rest of the Jews. Mat. 26:23.

Ver. 7. His city. Maspha, in the country of Galaad. C. 11:34. C.—Heb. “in the cities;” whence the Rabbins have idly conjectured, that parts of his body were interred in different cities out of respect, or that they rotted off, in punishment of the sacrifice of his daughter. Munster.—Grotius compares Jepthe with the renowned Viriatus. His character, both in peace and war, deserves the highest commendations; and in many respects, he was a striking figure of Jesus Christ. C.—The uncertainty of his birth, and the subsequent persecution which he endured from his brethren, foreshewed the deformity of the synagogues, and the conduct of the Jews (H.) towards their Messias, from whom alone they could expect salvation. Hence they are forced to have recourse to him, as the Israelites found themselves under a necessity of recalling Jephthe to lead them on to victory. Those who refused obedience to him, were deservedly exterminated, as the faithless Jews were by the arms of the Romans. Whether the daughter of Jephthe was immolated, or only consecrated to God, we may discover in her person a figure of the death and of the resurrection of our Saviour, who voluntarily made a sacrifice of his human nature to the justice of his father. See S. Aug. q. 49. Serar. q. 26. C.

Ver. 8. Bethlehem of Juda, where Booz also was born. C.—The Rabbins make him the same person with Abesan. Serar. q. 5.—Maldonat (in Mat. 2:1,) believes that this judge was of a city in Zabulon. Jos. 19:15. M.—In the 6th year of Abesan, the Philistines compelled the Israelites to pay tribute, (C. 13:1,) and Samson was born A. 2860. Salien.

Ver. 9. House, or family, though perhaps not under the same roof. M.

Ver. 11. Ahialon. Eusebius calls him Adon, and his successor Labdon. C.—Salien says that he entirely omits the 10 years of Ahialon's administration, though his name occurs in the body of the Chronicle, as being in the Heb. and not in the Sept. H.

Ver. 13. Illel. Josephus reads “the son or servant of Helon,” whom some have confounded with Ahialon, though contrary to the Hebrew. C.—The author supposes that Abdon reigned in peace. But it seems that he and the two others preceding him in the government of the people, were forced to purchase rest by paying tribute. Salien, A.C. Christ 1193.

Ver. 14. Forty sons. At this we need not be surprised, in a country where polygamy prevailed. Priam had 50 sons, and the Turks have often as many.—Colts. This was as great a distinction as to keep one's coach among us. C. 10:4. C.—This judge succeeded Ahialon, A. 2872, A.C. 1182, the year after Troy was taken, having endured a ten years' siege, by the treachery of Antenor, and of Æneas, Dictys, &c. Dares says the Greeks lost 886,000, and the Trojans 676,000, before the city was taken. Salien.

Ver. 15. Amalec. The situation of this mountain, as well as of the town of Pharathon, is unknown. Some have supposed that Amalec had formerly had possession of this country. C. 5:14. Sept. Alex. reads “Mount Lanak.” But this place occurs no where else, and other copies agree with the Vulgate. H.—Amarias, who entered upon the pontificate the same year that Heli was born, died after a reign of 39 years, A. 2879, and left the care of the people to Achitob and Samson for 20 years. Salien.

Ver. 1. Years. It is not clear whence this sixth and longest servitude is to be dated. If it terminated at the death of Samson, when the Philistines lost their chief nobility, &c. we must allow that the Israelites began to be obliged to pay tribute in the 6th year of Abesan. A.C. 1193. Salien. C. 12:8. H.—Marsham dates from the third month after the death of Jair, to the third year of Samuel, during which period Heli governed in one part, and Jephthe, Abesan, Ahialon, and Abdon in other provinces of Palestine. It is not very material which of these systems be adopted, as they do not contradict the text. All Israel was not reduced under the power of the Philistines; but the neighbouring tribes were infested with their incursions, and were obliged to pay tribute. Juda complains at their invading his territory, and they allege that it was because Samson had been the aggressor, which shews that the Israelites retained some little liberty. C. 15:9. C.—The servitude had scarcely commenced, when God provided Samson a deliverer for his people. Salien, A. 2860. H.

Ver. 2. Saraa, in the confines of Juda and of Dan, ten miles north of Eleutheropolis. Euseb.—Manue seems to have resided in the country, near this town, v. 25. M.

Ver. 3. Angel, in human form. Some Protestants pretend that he was “the Son of God,” and yet (v. 16) they say, “he sought not his own honour, but God’s, whose messenger he was,” (Bible, 1603) in which they plainly contradict themselves, or else teach Arianism, as if the Son were not true God, and equal to his Father. W.—The title of God, (Jehova) which is given to this angel, (v. 15, 21) is no proof that he was the Supreme Being. C. 6:11.

Ver. 4. Thing. Exhortations to observe the law are not unnecessary. S. Aug. q. 50. Besides the things which common people might take, such as wine, grapes, &c. were unclean for the Nazarites. The mother of Samson was required to abstain from every species of uncleanness as much as possible, at least while she bore and nursed her child. C.—Abulensis says, she was unquestionably under peculiar restrictions till her delivery. M.—This was a preparation for the child who should abstain from all unclean things, not only for a time, (Num. 6) but during his whole life, that he might be a more perfect figure of Christ.

W.—His dignity was not of choice, nor could he forfeit it by touching any thing unclean, nor by the violent cutting off his hair. As the deliverer of the people, he must often have been obliged to touch dead bodies. C.—Begin. The power of the Philistines was greatly broken by Samson. C. 16:13. M.—But Samuel, Saul, and David had still to contend with them. 1 K. 7:13. H.

Ver. 6. And when, &c. Heb. Chal. Syr. Arab. and the Vatican Sept. read a negation, “And I did not ask him whence he came; neither did he tell me his name.” The other copies of the Sept. S. Aug. (q. 51.) &c. agree with the Vulg. though S. Aug. suspected that the negation was wanting. C.

Ver. 8. Born. Josephus (v. 10.) insinuates that Manue was touched with a sort of jealousy, as his wife had mentioned the comeliness of the stranger. H.—But S. Ambrose (ep. 70) has undertaken his defence; and surely God would not have wrought a miracle to gratify his request, if it had not proceeded from a virtuous motive, desiring to enjoy the same happiness as his wife, and to know precisely how they were to educate their son. C.—Procopius thinks that the wife of Manue was of more eminent virtue than her husband, and was therefore honoured with the first vision. She had been more afflicted at her sterility, and had prayed more earnestly for the people’s safety. M.

Ver. 12. Himself. Heb. and Sept. “What shall be the judgment (education. C.) of the boy, and what his works? (or Prot.) how shall we do unto him?” H.

Ver. 13. Let her refrain, &c. By the Latin text, it is not clear whether this abstinence was prescribed to the mother or to the child; but the Heb. (in which the verbs relating thereto are of the feminine gender) determines it to the mother. But then the child also was to refrain from the like things, because he was to be from his infancy a Nazarite of God, (v. 5) that is, one set aside in a particular manner, and consecrated to God; now the Nazarites, by the law, were to abstain from all these things.

Ver. 15. Dress. Heb. and Sept. “let us make.” Vulg. faciamus, is used either for a common feast or for a sacrifice. Ex. 29:36. Virg. (eclog. iii.) Cras faciam vitula. Manue did not yet know who the angel was. He only designed to give him something to eat. A kid was then esteemed the most delicious food, and physicians esteem it very wholesome. The taste of people has since altered. Bochart, Anim. p. i. b. ii. 52. C.

Ver. 16. Bread is put for all sorts of food. Angels eat none. Toby Ver. 17. Honour thee with a suitable reward. 1 Tim. 5:17.

Ver. 18. Wonderful. Heb. Peli. Some have concluded that this was the proper name of the angel, as it is one of the titles of the Messias. Isai. 9:6. But it is more probable that the angel did not reveal his name. Chal. Others divide this sentence thus, “and he (the angel, or rather God) was wonderful.” He was the author of all miracles, to whom sacrifice was immediately offered. It is doubtful whether the angels have distinctive names. But we read of Michael, &c. and there is no reason why they should not have names denoting their peculiar dignity and offices. C.—Michael, the guardian of the church, perhaps appeared on this occasion. M.

Ver. 19. On. Manue was convinced that the person who had authorized him to offer sacrifice, had power to dispense with him. W.—The angel “did wonderful things,” as the Heb. may be explained, causing a flame to proceed from the rock and to consume the victim, as Josephus assures us, (C.) and as the angel who had appeared to Gedeon had done. C. 6:21. M.

Ver. 22. Seen God: not in his own person, but in the person of his messenger. The Israelites, in those days imagined they should die if they saw an angel, taking occasion perhaps from those words spoken by the Lord to Moses, (Ex. 33:20.) No man shall see me and live. But the event demonstrated that it was but a groundless imagination. Ch.—Elohim is applied to angels and men, as well as to God. C.

Ver. 23. Come. The wife of Manue allays his fears with great prudence, as she observes that God had just promised them a son. H.

Ver. 24. Samson signifies, “His sun, or joy;” or Syr. “service.” C.—“His, or a little sun.” M.—Blessed him with graces and strength, suitable for his office. C.

Ver. 25. To be. Sept. “to walk along.” Jonathan, “to sanctify.” Samson began to manifest an eager desire to deliver his brethren. C.—Dan, as it was called from those 600 men who encamped here, when they were going to take Lais. C. 18:12. H.—God inspired him to commence the liberation of his country, when he was about 17 years old, (Usher) or 20 according to Salien. Then he entered upon his judicial authority, and punished the wrongs which the Philistines did him in person, as well as his countrymen. The seven years wandering of Æneas had terminated in his death just before, at the river Numicus. Halicar. 1. Salien, A.C. 1176. H.

Ver. 1. Thamnatha, in the confines of the tribes of Juda and Gad, and of the Philistines, who often took it from the latter. It is called Thamna, Gen. 38:12, (Bonfrere) and lies near Lidda. Euseb.

Ver. 3. Eyes. He probably informed his parents (H.) that he was inspired by the Lord, v. 4. W.—The Jews say that he had first converted this woman; and interpreters generally excuse his conduct. But S. Ambrose thinks that he forfeited God's grace; (ep. 19) and Theodoret also supposes that he transgressed the law, (Ex. 34:12) and God only permitted him to fall in love with women, without approving his conduct, q. 21. The Scripture often says, that he does and wills what he only permits. Ex. 4:21. Jos. 11:20. C.—If the conversion of this woman were well attested, there would be no difficulty about his marrying her, as Salmon did Rahab. S. Mat. 1:5. We have only conjecture that the women whom these and other holy personages espoused, embraced the true faith. But these may suffice in a matter of this nature. We cannot condemn Samson on this occasion, without involving his parents in the same censure, as they were charged to keep him from any contamination. S. Ambrose justly observes that a woman was the occasion of his fall, but he might allude to Dalilia. C. 16:4. It seems hard to pass sentence on this judge of Israel, on his first appearance, without the most cogent reasons. See Lyran, A. Lapide, &c. H.—Heb. “She is right in my eyes.” His parents were at length convinced that he was directed by God. T.

Ver. 4. He sought. This may be understood either of the Lord, or rather of Samson. C.—Sept. “because he himself sought to retaliate upon the Philistines.” Heb. “that it was of the Lord that, or because he sought an occasion to take,” &c. H.

Ver. 5. Young lion, not quite so strong as an old one, but in its vigour. Rabbins. C.—Met him. Heb. “roared against him.” H.—His parents were at some distance. M.—S. Aug. (in Ps. lxxxviii.) shews the application of this history to Christ's establishing and adorning the church of the Gentiles with sweet and wholesome laws. D.

Ver. 6. Spirit, increasing his courage and strength. M.—This shews that the strength of Samson was miraculous, attached to the keeping of his hair, and the observance of the duties of the Nazarites. C. C. 16:19.—Mother. The modesty which he displays is more wonderful than the feat of valour. H.—Brave men are never boasters. M.—He kept what he had done secret, designing to propose a riddle. Salien.

Ver. 7. Spoke. Sept. “they spoke;” both Samson and his parents (M.) asked the young woman in marriage. Gen. 24:57. Cant. 8:8. C.—That had. Prot. “and she pleased Samson well,” as at first, v. 3. H.

Ver. 8. A honeycomb. There was a very remarkable providence in this particular of the history of Samson. From which also in the mystical sense we may learn what spiritual sweetness and nourishment our souls will acquire from slaying the lions of our passions and vices. Ch.—Samson waited some time before he went to celebrate his marriage. The Rabbins say a full year was the usual term after the espousals; (Est. 2:12,) and many have translated “after a year.” Chal. Arab. &c. During this space the flesh of the lion would be consumed, and bees might make honey in its skeleton. Herodotus (v. 114,) informs us that a swarm lodged in the skull of Onesylus, the tyrant of Cyprus, which had been suspended for a long time. They keep at a distance from carrion and every fetid smell. Some say that they were produced from the corrupted flesh of the lion, in the same manner as Virgil (iv.) describes the proceeding from a young ox beaten to death, and covered with boughs, in a place closely shut up. The bees might have laid their eggs upon these boughs, and the grass upon which an ox feeds, &c. But none of these precautions were taken with the lion which Samson tore in pieces. C.

Ver. 10. Father. Before the nuptial, the young man was not accustomed to go to the house of his future bride. Montanus.—Samson’s mother also accompanied him. Abul.—Do. Sept. “Samson made there a feast for seven days, because young men do so.” H.

Ver. 11. With him. Some imagine that these were placed to watch his motions. But he had surely invited them, v. 15. During the time that the nuptials were celebrated, these men (who are called the friends of the bridegroom, Mat. 9:15,) are said to have been exempted from all public charges. Mont. C.

Ver. 12. Riddle. Such obscure and ingenious questions were much liked in the East. 3 K. 10:1. The Egyptians concealed the mysteries of their religion, and Pythagoras his choicest maxims under them. S. Clem. strom. 5. The Greeks proposed these γρίφους at feasts, determining some reward or punishment to those who succeeded or failed to explain them. Athenæus (x. 22,) relates that Simonides proposed this to his companions, after he had seen a blacksmith asleep, with a skin of win and a craw-fish beside him. “The father of the kid, which eateth all sorts of herbs, and the miserable fish knocked their heads against each other, and he who has received upon his eyelids the son of the night, would not feed the minister, who kills the oxen of king Bacchus." He could not get his ax mended. The ancients kept their wine in skins of kids, &c. whence he alludes to the bottle of wine, near the miserable craw-fish or lobster.—Shirts. Heb. sedinim, "sindons," the garment which was worn next the skin. Mar. 14:51. It was used also by women, (Isai. 3:23,) and is probably the same which is called a tunic. C.—Coats. Heb. "change of garments." Some understand new and splendid garments. But Samson complied with his promise, by giving such as he found upon the 30 men, whom he slew, v. 19. H.—The custom of making presents of garments has long prevailed in the East. The Turkish emperor still receives and makes such presents to ambassadors. C.—Their long robes may easily be made to fit any person. H.

Ver. 14. Sweetness. The explication of the ancient riddles frequently depended on the knowledge of something that had taken place. Our riddle-makers follow other rules. In a spiritual sense, the Philistines might be considered as those strong ones who had domineered over Israel, but would shortly afford them the spoils of a glorious victory. Jesus rises triumphant from the grave, and, after he has been persecuted and torn in pieces, becomes the food of Christians. S. Aug. &c. C.

Ver. 15. Seventh day of the week, (Salien) which was the fourth of the feast; and the Syr. Arab. and some editions of the Sept. read, "the fourth." The young men tried their skill for three days; when, despairing of success, they solicited Samson's wife to draw the secret from him. She tried; but the seventh day being come, or at hand, (M.) the men began to threaten her, so that she became more importunate, and obtained her request. She had been weeping during a great part of the seven days, (v. 17. C.) or perhaps she had begun to tease him from the beginning. M.—Strip us. Sept. "to impoverish us." Homer (Odys. Z.) insinuates, that it was customary for the bride to furnish her attendants with white linen garments. These companions of Samson fear that they are going to be losers, by the honour which they do him. C.—The compel his wife by threats to betray his secret, and still destroy her afterwards: thus persecutors frequently treat those who comply with they demands, and deny the faith. W.

Ver. 18. Down, at which time the day ended among the Jews.—Heifer. This proverbial expression means, that another's property had been used against himself; (Delrio adag. 162) or it may intimate, that improper liberties had been taken with Samson's wife, (C.) as her so readily taking one of them for her husband, (v. 20) might lead us to suspect. H.—The Greek and Latin authors speak of a faithless wife in similar terms. Theognis. lviii. &c.

Ver. 19. Riddle. Samson must no longer be considered as a private man. He was authorized by the Spirit of the Lord, thus to punish the oppressors of Israel. C.—Though these 30 men had done him no injury in person, (H.) they had sinned against God, and deserved to die. Salien.—He slew them publicly in the city (M.) though others believe that he did it in the neighbouring country, as it does not appear that the people knew of their death. C.

Ver. 20. Companions, the chief friends of the bridegroom, (Jo. 3:29,) the paronymph. S. Amb. C.—Prot. “But Samson’s wife was given to his companion, whom he had used as his friend.” It seems her father had supposed, from Samson’s keeping away for a long time, that he had abandoned her. H.—But, though he offered some sort of recompense, (M.) he justly fell a victim to the people’s rage, who abhorred adultery, (C.) and were irritated at the persecution which he had brought upon them. C. 15:2. 6. H.

Ver. 1. After. The same term is used in the original as C. 14:8, which may be rendered “a year after,” as it is not probable that the wife of Samson should be married to another, nor that he should lay aside his resentment much sooner. C.

Ver. 2. Sister. Jacob married two sisters, and such marriages were not uncommon among the eastern nations. C.—Samson does not accept the offer, as it was now contrary to the law. Lev. 18:18. M.

Ver. 3. Evils. This is a declaration of war, made by Samson in person, against a whole nation. H.—He does not wish to engage his countrymen in the quarrel, that they may not be more oppressed. God chose that he should weaken the Philistines by degrees. They had been apprised of the injustice done to Samson, and did not strive to hinder it, so that they all deserved to suffer. Grot. E. C.

Ver. 4. Foxes. Being judge of the people, he might have many to assist him to catch with nets or otherwise a number of these animals; of which there were great numbers in that country, (Ch.) as we may gather from Cant. 2:15. Lament. 5:15. M.—Hence many places received the name of Sual. Jos. 15:28 and 19:42. Pompey exhibited 600 lions at Rome, and the Emp. Probus 5000 ostriches, and as many wild boars, &c. in the theatre. Vopisc. Plin. viii. 16. A. Lap.—Is it more incredible that Samson should collect 300 foxes? By this means he cleared his country of a pernicious animal, the most proper for carrying flambeaux, and spreading fire far and wide among the fields of the enemy. By tying the foxes together, he hindered them from retiring into their holes, and gave the fire time to take hold of the corn and vineyards. C.—Ovid mentions a Roman custom of burning foxes in the theatre, with torches tied upon their backs, in the month of April; which some have imagined was in memorial of this transaction. Serar, q. 7.

“Factum abiit, monumenta manent, nam vivere captam
Nunc quoque lex vulpem Carseolana vetat.
Utque luat pænas genus hoc cerealibus ardet, Quoque modo segetes perdidit, illa perit.” Fast. iv.

—Torches. Heb. and Sept. “a torch or firebrand,” (H.) made of resinous wood, such as the pine, olive, &c. which easily catch fire, and are extinguished with difficulty. C.—Qua fugit incendit vestitos messibus agros—Damnosis vires ignibus aura dabat. Ovid.

“Where’er he flees, corn-fields in flames appear,
The fanning breeze brings devastation near.”

A hundred and fifty firebrands, in different parts of the country, destroy the farmer’s hopes. H.—And olive. The conjunction in now wanting in Heb. and some translate, “the vineyards of olive-trees.” Kimchi.—But who ever heard of such an expression? It is better therefore to supply and, with the Sept. (C.) as the Prot. also have done. H.—“The foxes signify the deceitful ensnares, and chiefly heretics.” S. Aug. in Ps. viii. D.

Ver. 6. Father. Thus they met with the fate which the woman had endeavoured to avoid, by an infidelity to her husband. Salien.—The princes of the Philistines acknowledged the wrong which had been done to Samson, and thus testify their abhorrence of adultery. C.—Some Heb. MSS. confirm the Sept. Ar. and Syr. versions; and instead of “her father with her,” read, “and her father’s house,” (Kennicott) or all his family.

Ver. 7. Of you. He intimates that they should answer for the injustice which they ought to have prevented, or punished sooner. H.—Heb. “If you had done like this,” and slain the father and daughter, I should be quiet. D.

Ver. 8. Thigh. Striking this part is often mentioned as a mark of consternation. Jer. 31:19. M.—Heb. “and he smote them thigh and leg, with a great slaughter.” H.—Vatable supposes this means an entire destruction. Chaldee, “he smote both horse and foot.” He rendered them incapable of fleeing, or of making resistance. Nah. 2:5. C.—Cavern. Heb. sahiph, signifies, “the top, branch, &c. The rock might be covered with wood, (C.) and was situated in the confines of the tribes of Simeon, Juda, and Dan. 1 Par. 4:32. M.

Ver. 9. Spread. Heb. “encamped in Juda, and spread themselves in Lechi.” H.

Ver. 12. Kill me, in a treacherous manner. He was not afraid of them. C.

Ver. 13. Cords. Heb. habothim, Sept. καλωδιοις, denote strong ropes or cables. M.—Etam is not in Heb. or the Sept. H.

Ver. 14. Bone. Heb. “Lechi,” as it was called after the slaughter made by Samson, v. 15. It is about 20 miles to the east of Ascalon. C.—Approach: lit. “the smell.” This expression is often used to denote burning. Sept. C. 16:9. Dan. 3:94.

Ver. 15. There. The Sept. Josephus, and the Vulg. agree, reading Heb. truth, instead of the present teriya, “fresh,” or raw, which seems an useless remark in this place. C.—Asses are very large in Palestine. M.

Ver. 16. Asses. He insists on this particular, as such an unusual weapon rendering his victory more astonishing, and he would not leave any room for doubt. Heb. is variously translated, “with the jaw-bone of an ass, I have made a heap, yea two heaps; with the jaw-bone of an ass, I have defeated a thousand men.” Syr. &c. Castalion and Bonfrere defend the Vulg. The Sept. have, “with the jaw-bone of an ass I have entirely taken them off, (H. defending them) with,” &c. They have explained chamorathayim, as the first person of emor, rubefecit, or Chal. destruxit, “I have covered them with blood;” and indeed to understand it of “two she asses,” is impossible. C.—This verse formed the chorus of Samson’s song. H.—He did not take the glory to himself, as Josephus (v. 10,) would insinuate, but attributed the victory to God, v. 18. Salien, A.C. 1172. This miracle of strength can no more be accounted for by reason, than many others. W.

Ver. 17. Which is, &c. This is added by the Vulg. being the interpretation of the Sept. Αναθηαις; (C.) though it also signify, “the slaughter.” S. Amb. ep. 19. H.—The Syr. and Arab. have read domoth, “the blood,” instead of ramath Lechi, “the lifting up;” or as others would have it, “the throwing down of the jaw-bone.” C.—Samson had snatched it from the ground, slew the thousand Philistines, and left it a monument of his victory. H.

Ver. 18. Thirsty. S. Ambrose (ep. 19 or 70) follows Josephus, (M.) is supposing that the arrogance of Samson, in attributing the victory to his own strength, was thus punished. But others are more favourable to the hero, (C.) and suppose that his thirst was occasioned by the extraordinary fatigue. He sufficiently testifies that he had received all from God, (M.) and he is immediately favoured with another miracle. H.—God is able to grant victory by the most feeble instruments, and he is never wanting when his presence is requisite. S. Aug. Doct. iv. 15. T.

Ver. 19. Then. Heb. “And God clave the Mactesh (H. hollow place, great tooth;” or the name of a rock, as Josephus and others understand it, perhaps on account of its resemblance with a tooth) which was at Lechi; and ... he called it the fountain of him who cries out, (C. En-hakkore. Prot.) which is in the Lechi, until this day.” The translating of some proper names has given occasion to various difficulties. See 2 K. 6:3. 1 Par. 4:22. H.—Sophonias (1:11,) mentions a place called (Mactesh, or) Machtes, in Hebrew, which seems to have been built where the fountain of Samson was. C.—It is a greater miracle to draw water out of a dry bone, than out of the earth or stones. But all things are possible to God. W.

Ver. 20. Years. Salien gathers from this remark being made here, that the Philistines still asserted their dominion over Israel, but with greater moderation than they had done before: and both nations acknowledged the judicial authority of Samson, who had now been giving them such proofs of his valour for two years, soon after he performed the feat at Gaza, A.C. 1169, being on some business. H.

JUDGES 16

Ver. 1. A harlot, or an innkeeper; for the Heb. word signifies either. Ch.—We have already noticed the ambiguity of the word zona, which occurs Josue 2:1, and is applied to Rahab. This woman seems to have been of the same profession. Gaza was one of the strongest towns of the Philistines, on the south of the country. Some have erroneously supposed, (C.) that it was so called from a Persian word, which signifies a treasury, as Cambyses there deposited his most valuable effects. Mela. i. 11.

Ver. 2. Setting. Heb. “they laid wait for him all night in the gate, ... and were quiet all night, saying, in the morning, when it is day, we shall kill him.” They hoped to seize him unawares, (H.) as they were afraid to rouse this lion, and hence probably refrained from setting fire to the house: (C.) though they might be deterred from doing this, by the fear of the conflagration spreading to other parts of the city, (H.) and by an over-ruling Providence. Salien.

Ver. 3. Bolt, (sera) which may translate, “lock.” H.—The doors of the Hebrews were fastened with bars tied in a curious manner, so as to require a sort of a key, and not to be opened but on the inside. Hebron was above thirty miles distant: but travellers mention a small hill, where they say the doors were left in the vicinity of Gaza; (C.) and the text does not assert that Samson carried them as far as Hebron. H.—He went out by that gate, contrary to the expectation of the Philistines, who supposed that he would go towards Thamnatha. If any saw him, none durst encounter the hero, as they had not yet forgotten the thousand slain with the jaw-bone. Salien.—The pagans confound their Hercules with Samson; (S. Aug. C. D. xviii. 19.) but the former durst not attack two at a time, whereas the latter engaged and slew many. W.

Ver. 4. After this. The lamentable fall of Samson took place in the last year of his administration, when Heli, of the house of Thamar, succeeded Achitob I. in the high priesthood. A.C. 1154. Salien.—Sorec was not far from Saraa, where Samson was born. It probably belonged to the Philistines, as Dalila is generally supposed to have been of that nation, and most people believe a harlot. C.—Adrichomius says the eunuch was here baptized. T.—Dalila. Some are of opinion she was married to Samson; others that she was his harlot. If the latter opinion be true, we cannot wonder that, in punishment of his lust, the Lord delivered him up by her means into the hands of his enemies. However, if he was guilty, it is not to be doubted, but that under his afflictions, he heartily repented and returned to God, and so obtained forgiveness of his sins. Ch.—Dolol means, “to be impoverished or weakened,” as Samson was in all respects by this wicked woman.

Ver. 5. Princes, (seranim;) the five satraps, who had the chief sway in the nation, either came in person or sent messengers to Cepharsorec. They were convinced that the strength of Samson was supernatural; but they wished to learn whether it depended on some magical charm, or on some religious observation, or whether he was vulnerable only in some particular part, like Achilles, who could only be slain by a wound in the heel, according to the pagans. C.—If Dalila would learn, and endeavour to remove the obstacle, these princes engaged to give her each 1100 pieces (or sicles, C.) of silver. Salien.

Ver. 7. Her, in jest. H.—Sinews; such were frequently used for strength. Vegetius 4:9. Ps. 10:2. Cato often speaks of loreos funes, (C.) or “leathern thongs.” H.—Moist. Heb. “seven bands, green and moist;” as if he were speaking of willow twigs, or bands made of the rind of trees, &c. But we need not abandon the Sept. and Vulg. to follow the moderns in this place, as yetharim unquestionably means cords of sinews, and the epithet, green, is applied to the eyes of Moses, (Deut. 24:7) to denote their shining vigour and strength; so here it may signify, that the sinews were to be fresh and in full perfection. C.—Dalila might easily think that such bands would make Samson her prisoner. She had people to assist her, in case she proved successful. But Samson probably broke the bands before they made their appearance; otherwise he would have resented the woman’s infidelity, and not exposed himself again. He supposed she only made these exclamations to see what he would do, v. 9. &c.

Ver. 9. Fire. Prot. “and he brake the withs, as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire.” H.—Thus he played with her, never suspecting that the enemy was concealed so near. C.

Ver. 13. Lace, (licio;) “the woof about the beam,” &c. Heb. “the web, (14) and she fastened it,” &c. The original text is here imperfect. H.—The Sept. have preserved eighteen words, which have been omitted in Heb. “the web, [and fastened them with a pin unto the wall, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. (14) An it came to pass, when he slept, that Dalilia took seven locks of his head, and wove them with a web] and fastened them with a pin, [unto the wall] and said,” &c. Kennicott, Diss. ii.—The Vulg. expresses the whole idea in fewer words: but the Heb. leaves the proposal of Samson imperfect. It is observable that Grabe’s edition of the Alex. Sept. has no mark of any thing being redundant; whence we might suppose, that in the days of Origen, (whose marks he endeavours to exhibit) the Hebrew agreed with the Greek version: but the 14th verse is rather different from the Vatican copy, which has been given above.—“And Dalila (so the Sept. always style her) lulled him asleep; (ἐκοιμισεν, as v. 19, (H.) perhaps by giving him some potion, with which people of her character are frequently provided; Salien) and she wove the seven curls of his head with the woof, (ἐκτασεως) and she fastened them with the pins of wood into the wall,” &c. H.—The Heb. text is liable to many difficulties, says Calmet; “If thou shalt make a tissue of seven locks of my head with the veil, which thou weavest, and shalt fasten it to a nail, I shall become weak as another man: or, If thou weave together my hair and my thread,” &c. The ancients were accustomed to weave standing. Samson was probably lying on the ground, while Dalila was acting this farce. C.

Ver. 16. Death. Heb. “and pressed him so, that his soul was straitened unto death.” It would be well if Christians would always make as stout a resistance against manifest temptations to sin, as Samson did on this occasion, when he might consider the revealing of the truth rather as an indiscretion than as a crime. It is difficult to determine in what precisely the fault consisted, which was followed by so severe a punishment. Perhaps he may have been placed as a pattern of patience, like holy Job, without incurring the divine displeasure. Yet most people suppose, that he fell by the love of women, and by disclosing the secret of his strength. But where do we read that he had received a precept from god, not to mention it even to his wife? For in this light SS. Ephrem and Chrys. Sulp Severus, Pererius, and others, represent Dalila, which removes the greatest objection to his character. We have seen (v. 1) that the harlot of Gaza might be only an innkeeper; and the first object of his love, was proposed to him by the holy spirit. C. 14:4. But even allowing that Dalila was a harlot, though the Scripture does not assert it, what harm was there in Samson’s endeavouring to reclaim her, and to make her his wife, as Osee (1:2) was commanded to do? It is only said, (v. 4) the he loved a woman; and his subsequent conduct with her, might be nothing more than what is lawful among lovers, or even commendable between married people. Isaac’s playing with Rebecca, his wife, (Gen. 26:8) was a proof of his conjugal love for her, as S. Francis de Sales observes. Generous souls are frequently prone to love, and delight to unbend their minds in the company of the fair sex, with whom they can fear no rivalry in strength. Samson, in particular, seemed unable to deny their importunate requests. He yielded at last to explain his riddle to his first wife, and though he was justly offended at her infidelity, he took occasion from it to begin the work for which he was sent by God, the destruction of the enemy. Perhaps he thought that his compliance with the repeated solicitations of Dalila would be attended with the like effect, as in reality it was, and he destroyed more in death than during the whole course of his life. Without the strongest proofs, it seems unjust to pass sentence of condemnation upon a great character, the number of the perfect being already too small. Our Saviour, laden with the sins of mankind, as with the treacherous Dalila, exclaimed, my soul is sorrowful unto death. Mat. 26:38. Yet (H.) the weakness of Samson’s heart throughout this history, is still more surprising than the strength of his body. C.—Tirin asserts that God had granted him such strength, with an order not to disclose the secret, that it was attached to the not wilfully having his hair cut.

Ver. 17. Thing. Heb. and Sept. “He told her all his heart.”—That is to say, consecrated, is added by the Vulg. H.—Men. Was the hair the physical, or only the moral, cause of his wonderful strength? It is generally believed that it was only a moral cause, or a token appointed by God, that as long as Samson retained his hair he should be endued with such force. The pagans relate, that the kingdom of Nisus and of Pterelaus depended on a fatal lock of hair, which their daughters cut off. Crinis inhærebat, magni fiducia regni. Ovid, Met. viii. Apoll. 2. C.

Ver. 18. To me. Heb. “to her.” Lah instead of li, perhaps in all the printed editions except the Complutensian, which has corrected the mistake, and is authorized by some MSS. Kennicott.

Ver. 19. Knees, by some soporiferous draught, as on the other occasions. M.—Barber. He only produced the razor, or rather a pair of scissors, such as were used to shear sheep. Barbers were unknown at Rome for 454 years; and the ancient Greeks looked with indignation upon those who introduced the custom of shaving among them. Plin. vii. 59. The Hebrews did not cut all their beard, and generally let the hair of their head grow long. Samson wore his curled, which is still the fashion among some people.—And began. Sept. “he began to be humbled, (C.) or rendered abject, and his strength,” &c. Heb. “she began to render him contemptible” H.

“But what is strength without a double share
Of wisdom? vast, unwieldy, burdensome.”—Milton’s Samson.

Ver. 20. Myself. This might insinuate that he was bound, though it may only mean that he will extricate himself from the hands of the Philistines. C.—We read of no bands on this occasion. But the loss of the sign of his being a Nazarite was Samson’s greatest misfortune, and rendered him less formidable than if he had been bound with chains of adamant. He was not sensible of his loss at first; or he himself was uninformed that his strength depended on the preservation of his hair. The cutting it off was wholly involuntary, so that, if he sinned by losing it, we must conclude that he was guilty in putting himself in the power of a woman, by revealing a secret which he ought to have kept to himself. Other Nazarites were surely under no such obligation. If a barbarous ruffian or infidel had, by violence, deprived them of their sacred ornament, or touched them with something unclean, they would have been obliged to submit to the legal purifications, but no blame could have attached to them. H.—From him, as to the gratuitous and supernatural degree of strength. M.

Ver. 21. Chains. Heb. and Sept. add, “of brass,” which were more ancient than those of iron or of steel. Brass was generally used instead of the latter, for knives, &c. C.—Gaza, the place where he had lately given such an instance of strength, v. 3. H.—Grind. Before the invention of wind or of water mills, the ancients forced their meanest slaves to grind with a hand-mill, consisting of two large stones. Many such are made in the isle of Milo. The mill was the common place for slaves, who had given an offence not deserving of death. Isai. 47:2. Lament. 5:13. Cod. Theod. de pœnit. Apuleius describes their condition as most pitiful; half naked, with their hair half cut, their feet chained, disfigured with scourges, &c. Metam. ix. Herodotus (iv. 2.) says, that the Scythians put out the eyes of their slaves, that they may not become dizzy with turning round vessels of milk, upon which these people feed. Such was the condition of Samson. S. Jerom (in Isaias 47.) mentions a foolish interpretation of the Rabbins, as if the Philistines obliged this strong man to have children by their women. See Thalmud, sutah 1, fol. 10. C. Job 31:10. H.—Samson “laboured hard, that he might not eat his bread for nothing.” Lyra.

Ver. 22. Again. Heb. adds, “as when he was shaven.” H.—He was in prison three or four months. M.—As his hair grew his strength returned, because he entered into himself and did penance, so that he was restored to the rank and privileges of a Nazarite. C. M.

Ver. 23. Dagon. Probably the derceto, whom Diodorus (3,) represents with the head of a woman, and the rest of the body like a fish, the chief object of adoration at Ascalon. C.—Dagon may signify “wheat;” and hence Eusebius (præp. 1,) styles him “the ploughing Jupiter,” or “a fish.”—Hands. For this purpose they were offering sacrifices of thanksgiving, (M.) which they did not only when they first took Samson, but probably on all their great festivals, till the hero’s death. They could not but excite the indignation and zeal of this great judge, and God resented the indignity offered to himself. They cursed Samson, (H.) as the Sichemites had done Abimelec on a similar occasion. C. 9:27. M.

God “will not connive or linger, thus provoked, but will arise and his great name assert.”—Milton, v. 466.

Ver. 25. Played. Dancing in a ridiculous manner, (Montanus) running against the walls, or falling down, so as to make the people laugh, (Lyran) or rather (H.) Serarius gathers from the Sept. that “they buffeted him,” and made a sport of him. M.—It is not at all probable that Samson would act the ape before the Philistines; but, in attempting to keep off the rabble with many a fruitless blow, against his will he might make them merry. C.—He appeared before them in the garb of a slave, covered with the dust of the mill, (Salien) like our Saviour in a fool’s garment. H.—Two pillars. The temples of Hercules, at Tyre and in Africa, had the same number. Porphy. Abst. 2.—The temple of Dagon was supported on wooden pillars standing near each other. People might see down from the roof. Serarius.—We read that the theatre of Rome rested on one pivot, and the amphitheatre on two. Ecce populus Romanus universus, says Pliny, (xxxvi. 15,) binis cardinibus sustinetur. C.—The roofs of the Philistine temples were flat, and galleries all around them, so that an immense crowd might be collected, (M.) to gaze on this terror of their country, now their prey. They had forgotten how he had formerly carried off their gates, or they concluded that his amazing strength was gone for ever. H.

Ver. 27. Play. It is not clear from the text, whether the 3000 were distinct from those who were below. It seems this is the number of all the slain, (C.) as Josephus asserts. But the Protestants insert, “the lords of the Philistines were there: and there were upon the roof,” &c. which shews that they understand it in the same sense as the Vulg. and the Sept. which distinguish these outside spectators from those who filled the house, and were in company with the princes. H.

Ver. 28. Revenge myself. This desire of revenge was out of zeal for justice against the enemies of God and his people; and not out of private rancour and malice of heart. Ch.—He was judge of his people, and concerned for their wrongs: God, by miracle, testified that he approved of his sentiments. C.—Sept. insinuates that the cry of Samson was accompanied with tears, (ekklause.) It was the cry of the heart, which is most eloquent with God. Heb. and Sept. “strengthen me yet this once, O God, and I will repay,” &c. H.

Ver. 29. Both the. Heb. adds, “middle” pillars, so that their fall occasioned that the whole temple, (C.) excepting perhaps some of the ruins, which are still shewn at Gaza. Button.

“He tugged, he shook till down they came, and drew
The whole roof after them with bursts of thunder.” Milton. H.

Ver. 30. Let me die. Literally, let my soul die. Samson did not sin on this occasion, though he was indirectly the cause of his own death. Because he was moved to what he did, by a particular inspiration of God, who also concurred with him by a miracle, in restoring his strength upon the spot, in consequence of his prayer. Samson, by dying in this manner, was a figure of Christ, who by his death overcame all his enemies. Ch. W.—S. Aug. says, “he was not under a human delusion, but divinely inspired ... Who will accuse his obedience?” De C. i. 21. and 26. &c. And S. Bern. (de præc. 3.) observes that he would have sinned, if he had not received a particular inspiration. But many think that he might have acted as he did, without it, in quality of judge, as he might intend primarily to avenge his people and the glory of God. He was willing to sacrifice his life for this purpose, though he would have preserved it, if it had been in his power. Cajet. Lessius, &c.—The Church honours many virgin martyrs, (C.) who have thrown themselves into fire or water, in similar dispositions. S. Amb. says, “it is to be presumed that their zeal came from God.” De Virg. iii. 7. He mentions S. Pelagia, and her mother and sisters, and S. Soteris, a relation of his, whose memory is honoured on the 10th of February. S. Apollonia’s feast occurs the day before. “She leapt into the fire, having her breast enkindled with a stronger flame of the holy spirit. Brev. Rom. See the fact of Razas, 2 Mac. 14:37. H.—So that the revelation of S. Mathildes doubting of his, Solomon’s, Origen’s, and Trajan’s salvation, as if God would thus keep mankind in fear, seems to be a fabrication. Baronius. A.D. 604. S. Paul ranks Samson among the saints. Heb. 11:32.—Life. Express mention is made of 1000 slain by Samson, besides the great numbers, which excited the astonishment of the Philistines. C. 15:8. But on this occasion he destroyed 3000 at once, and the death of all the princes made the slaughter more terrible, (C.) insomuch that the people being without a head, were glad to let Samson’s brethren take away his body without molestation, as they have every reason to fear that the Israelites would now fall upon them. Salien.—If 3000 perished on the outside of the temple, (H.) Serarius concludes that not less than 20,000 were destroyed in all.

Ver. 31. Twenty. “Why then, says the Thalmud of Jerusalem, does the Scripture allow him 40? That thou mightest understand the Philistines were kept in awe, by the fear of him, for 20 years after his decease.” The Hebrew copies seems to have varied. Drusius.—Some refuse the Samson the title of judge, (Masius) as they suppose (H.) that Heli filled that office at the same time. But there might be several in different parts of the country, and Heli might administer sacred things, while Samson acted in the character of a warrior. C.—Salien believes that Heli only commenced high priest and judge at the death of Samson, and continued for 40 years, though he was 58 years old when he entered upon office, A. 2900, A.C. 1153. Samson prefigured the Messias, not only in death, but also in his annunciation, birth, name, and in many particulars of his life. He was a Nazarite: Jesus receives that title even from his enemies. Samson marries a foreign woman; is delivered by his brethren of Juda into the hands of his enemies; judges and delivers his people. Christ, the sun of justice, calls the Gentiles; is betrayed by Judas, and abandoned to the fury of the Romans; is appointed Judge and Saviour of all. He embraces the cross, as Samson did the pillars, and by his humiliations redeemed the world. The pagan temple falls and crushes the idolaters. The Jews are overwhelmed in the ruins of their temple and city; and the earth trembles at the death of Christ. He is buried with honour, notwithstanding the malice of his enemies, (C.) as the body of Samson was taken from the midst of the raging inhabitants of Gaza, and interred peaceably in his father's tomb. The fabulous account of the Phœnician, or of another (H.) Hercules, who lived about this time, seems to have been chiefly taken from the history of Samson. Both encountered many difficulties, and perished by a woman's malice. Hercules never used a sword, and we do not read that Samson had any. C.—“He was possessed of an incomparable strength both of mind and body, says Josephus, (v. 10,) which he employed for the destruction of the enemy even to the last breath. His being deceived by a woman, we ought to attribute to human weakness, which is prone to such faults. In all other respects, his virtue entitles him to eternal praise.” H.

“Tax not divine disposal; wisest men
Have err'd, and by bad women been deceived;
And shall again, pretend they ne'er so wise. Sams. Agon. v. 210.

Ver. 1. At that time, is not in the Heb. or Sept. It only means that the event which is recorded took place at some time, which the sacred writer does not determine. We should conclude, that the histories which fill up the remainder of this book, ought to be placed after the death of Samson, (Serarius, &c.) if some passages did not determine us to allow that their proper order must be soon after the death of Josue and of the ancients. The grandson of Moses must, on the former supposition, have been extremely old, whereas he is said to have been a young man, v. 7. The tribe of Dan was still straitened for room. C. 18:1, &c. C.—Josephus, (v. 2,) who passed over the history of Michas. Salien, A. 2622, the 22d year of Othniel and Phinees. H.—Anarchy at that time prevailed, (v. 6,) so that we need not wonder to behold such confusion among the Israelites. M.—Ephraim. The country was mountainous for nine miles. Adrichomius.

Ver. 2. Mother. A rich (C.) old widow, since she had grandchildren, one of whom was appointed to serve her domestic chapel. M.—She had lost a sum of money, and was venting imprecations against the thief, when her son came and informed her that he had it safe, upon which she changed her curses into blessings.—Swear, may have another meaning, as if she had made a vow of this money. C. M.—

Lord. Hebrew Yehova, the title of God, which she gives to idols, (M.) or perhaps she preposterously adored both the true and false gods at the same time. C.—Many Protestants assert that her intention was good, in what she did. Monceius, Grot. &c.—So willing are they to excuse all from idolatry but Catholics! H.—Almost all interpreters condemn Michas and his mother of superstition, and of acting contrary to the express orders of God, in appointing a priest who was not of the family of Aaron, &c. C.—Their graven image was an idol. But this is no proof against the sacred images of Catholics. W.

Ver. 3. God. Hebrew pesel umaseca. The word thing, would perhaps be as well substituted, as (H.) all are not convinced that the woman was guilty of idolatry. Cajetan.—The same figure might be both graven and molten. The image was first carved, and then covered with plates of gold, &c. in the more ancient times. C.—There might be two figures made by Michas. Salien.—The Theraphim denote “images which foretel what is to happen.” Rabbins. T.—But this is not always the case. H.

Ver. 5. That ... idols is added by the Vulg. S. Jerom supposes that the ephod denotes all the sacerdotal vestments, and the theraphim whatever else was requisite for priestly functions, ep. ad Marcel. Grotius is of opinion that these theraphim, or cherubim, are styled elohim, gods, (v. 5) and that the altar, candlesticks, &c. are designated above by whatever was to be graven or molten. Michas had a mind to represent the tabernacle, with its ornaments, in miniature. By the theraphim he might imitate the urim, &c. at the expense of 200 sicles, while 900 might be set apart for the other ornaments. C.—Many think that he wished to have domestic gods, like the Lares or Penates.—Hand. That is, appointed and consecrated him to the priestly office. Ch.—He put in his hand the offerings which he had to make, as was customary. Ex. 28:41. C.—Priest, contrary to all order. M. Num. 3:10. Heb. 5:4. C.—The anointing of his hands with oil, prescribed, (Lev. 8) could give him no authority. W.

Ver. 6. Himself. Serarius thinks this took place before Heli was appointed to succeed Samson. But the opinion of Salien (M.) is more probable. For, though he places this history in the 22d year of Othoniel, yet we must remember that he attributes to him all the years of anarchy, so that this liberty was taken by an individual, when none had power or zeal enough to restrain it. How much would Phinees be mortified at this prevarication if he were still alive! H.—The title of king may be applied to the judges. But this book was probably written after the appointment of Saul. C.

Ver. 7. Another, is not in Heb. or the Sept. but it refers to the former young priest, the son of Michas, whose place he took.—Thereof. It is uncertain whether this be spoken of the city or of the man. Some think that this Levite's mother was of Juda, though his father was the son of Moses. C. 18:30. C.—He was poor, as the people neglected to pay tithes, and he imitated their irreligion, being of a fickle temper. He was yet single, (v. 10) though he married among the Danites. C. 18:30. M.—Being a Levite, he is esteemed fitter for the priesthood; so Protestants receive with joy an apostate Catholic priest. W.

Ver. 10. A father. So he styles him out of respect, as we do our directors. H.—It is a title of dignity. Est. 16:11. 2 Mac. 14:37. 2 Par. 2:13. C.—Pieces, sicles.—Double suit, one for summer and another for winter, (M.) or such as might be worn on common, or on sacred occasions, unless it rather mean a cloak and a tunic; (C.) a change of dress. C. 14:13.

Ver. 13. Good. He was in hopes that the people would come and make their offerings with more zeal, so that he would derive greater advantage: the true character of superstitious misers. 1 Tim. 6:5. C.—He foolishly flattered himself that God would be pleased with his devotion; though he had done so many things contrary to the law. M.—Thus many form a religion to themselves, and would still claim the title of Christians. But the judge will drive them away with, I never knew you. Mat. 7:23. They think that if they believe some things (which they are pleased to call fundamental, though they cannot agree what they are) they may form a “true Catholic church” out of all the contradictory heresies which have made such havoc in the world! Perhaps Michas thus deluded himself with the idea that his innovations were not fundamental. It is rather ridiculous to hear J. Wesley, and a late very weak defendant of his, (Mr. Slack,) refusing the title of Christian to Roman Catholics, while they prostitute it to almost every sectary. But heretics have, indeed, no just pretensions to it. See S. Athanas. &c.

Ver. 1. Days, after the death of Josue and the ancients. Debbora speaks of the tribe of Dan, as addicted to navigation. C. 5:17. C.—It had now conquered most of the enemies who had formerly forced some to seek fresh settlements, (H.) as it is hinted at, Jos. 19. The particulars are here given in detail. C.—Received, &c. They had their

Ver. 2. Family. Heb. “From their extremity.” Which may denote such as came to hand, (C.) or princes, (De Dieu) or people of mean appearance, (Castalion) unless we explain it “from their coasts,” with Montanus, Prot. &c. H.

Ver. 4. Voice. His pronunciation was different from that of the Ephraimites. C. 12:6.

Ver. 5. Lord (Elohim.) A title sometimes given to false gods. The Levite answered in the name of Jehova; whence it is inferred that they all adored the true God, though their worship was not clear of superstition. C.

Ver. 6. Looketh with approbation. H.—It is uncertain whether this prediction proceeded from God, from the devil, or from the crafty Levite, (C.) who might answer as he thought the messengers wished him to do. M.—Their undertaking proved successful. But the devil, who knew the valour of the Danites, and the security of the citizens of Lais, or even a man of moderate prudence and sagacity, might have told what would be the probable event of an attack in such circumstances. C.—Whether God approved or condemned the Levite’s worship, he might speak by his mouth, as he did by that of Balaam. H.—But it is generally supposed that Jonathan was the organ of the devil, (C.) who answered with a degree of obscurity, as he was accustomed, (W.) that, in any case, his credit might subsist. H.

Ver. 7. Lais, four miles from Paneas, towards Tyre. It is called Lesem Dan; (Jos. 19:47) both the ancient and the new name being joined together.—Rich, Heb. has almost as many different meanings as interpreters. De Dieu, “There was no one to put them to shame, no chief magistrate.” C.—Prot. “and there was no magistrate in the land that might put them to shame in any thing.” H.—The citizens of Lais were perhaps a colony, and followed the manners and religion of Sidon, but were at a day’s journey from their territory; (Josephus) so that the latter could not come to their assistance at a very short warning. The Danites were therefore encouraged to make the attack, (C.) particularly as this city was confident in its own strength and riches, and made no alliance with any other. H.—Sept. Alex. &c. read, Aram instead of Adam. “They had no commerce with Syria.” But the Roman edition (C.) has, “they are far off from the Sidonians, and have no (word or) commerce with man.” The edition of Grabe repeats a great part of this verse again; v. 9, with an obelus.

Ver. 9. There will, &c. is added to signify, that it will be necessary only to go to take possession. H.

Ver. 10. Secure. “No one is sooner overcome than the man who has no fear; and security is generally the forerunner of ruin.” Velleius 2. initium est calamitatis securitas.

Ver. 11. War, besides their wives, &c. v. 21.

Ver. 12. Behind, on the west. C.

Ver. 14. To do. Whether we must take them by force or by craft. H.—It seems they had a premeditated design to seize them. C.

Ver. 17. They. Heb. and Sept. “and the five men that went to spy out the land.” H.—Off. The Levite’s attention was drawn off for a while by the 600 men, till the five, who had formerly become acquainted with him, had ransacked his little temple. C.—Perceiving them as they came out, he began to complain, but was soon persuaded to follow the Danites, and to abandon his former protector. So little dependence can be had on those who are faithless to their God! H.

Ver. 19. Mouth; to signify that silence must be observed. Job 29:9. Eccli. 5:12. Angerona, among the Romans, and Harpocrates, in Egypt, were represented in this posture; digitoque silentia suadet. Ovid, Met. ix.

Ver. 22. Houses. Heb. “near the house of Michas.” The poor fellow called his neighbours, and pursued the Danites, (H.) despising as it were all his other effects, in comparison with his god. M.

Ver. 25. House. The violence and injustice of the Danites cannot be excused, particularly as they were stealing what they deemed sacred. C.

Ver. 27. And, &c. Heb. “and they took what Michas had made, and the priest, ... and came.” H.—Fire, as they could not make themselves masters of it otherwise. They were forced afterwards to rebuild it. Some Rabbins have supposed, that Sidon and its colonies were not given by God to Israel: but their proofs are unsatisfactory. Laish was inhabited by the Chanaanites; and though it was in the territory of Aser, as the people of Dan had made the conquest, they were suffered to keep quiet possession of it. See Jos. 17:10.

Ver. 28. Rohob, which stood at the foot of Libanus. The vale belonging to this city, extended for about twenty miles.

Ver. 29. Lais. Heb. Ulam Layish, as the Sept. express it. C.—But the former term is explained by the Alex. and other copies in the sense of the Vulgate, before. H.—Dan is often placed for the northern boundary of Palestine. C.

Ver. 30. Idol. Heb. pasel. W.—Grabe's Sept. "the graven thing of Michas, and Jonathan the son of Gersam, of the son of Manasses." The Roman copy omits "of Michas," but retains Manasses, as the present Hebrew reads, instead of Moses. H.—It is suspected that the Jews have inserted an n over the word Mose, that it might not be known that a grandson of their lawgiver had been guilty of such impiety. They have not dared, however, to place the letter in the same rank as the others, but have suspended it, (C.) as if it were suspected, says Michaelis. Abendana relates, that by (or on) the authority of the ancients, this nun was added from the honour of Moses, lest his grandson might appear to be the first little sacrificing priest of an idol. The Latin Vulgate reads the name of Moses; and I am convinced that Moses, and not Manasses, ought to be understood: for how could a Levite have Manasses for his ancestor? Got. Comm. 1753. The Jews pretend that this relationship to the idolatrous king of Juda was not real, but figurative, in as much as Jonathan acted like him. But thus the reproach would fall on Gersam, who is said to be the son of Manasses, while the idolatrous priest is only placed as the son of Gersam. It is surely very absurd to say that he was the son of Manasses, because Manasses acted like him 800 years afterwards; and Sol. Jarchi honestly confesses that, "for the honour of Moses nun was written, on purpose to change the name, and it was written suspended, to indicate that it was not Manasses, but Moses." See Talmud Bava. fol. 109. The letter has, however, sometimes been suspended half way, and sometimes uniformly inserted, so that it has at last supplanted the genuine word. Some copies of the Sept. agree with the Vulg. Brug.—Theodoret reads, "Jonathan, the son of Manasses, of the son (υιου) of Gersam, of the son of Moses," retaining both words, in order to be sure the right one, as the copies varied. Kennicott, Dis. 2. see Deut. 27:4. Here we have a plain proof of the liberties which the Jews have taken with their text. But the providence of God has left us means to detect their fraud, by the Vulg. &c. In other difficulties of a like nature, the collation of ancient MSS. and versions will generally remove the uncertainty, and we may pronounce that the word of God has not been adulterated, though perhaps no one copy may now represent it in all its genuine beauty and integrity. See Proëlog. in SS. Mariana, C. xxiii. T. iii. Menoch. &c. Prot. here follow the corrupted Heb. "Manasseh." H.—Captivity, under the Philistines, when many of their brethren were taken prisoners, (Ps. 77:61. T.) and when Samuel obliged all Israel to renounce idolatry. 1 K. 7:4. E.—Serarius, (q. 7.) or the sacred penman, speaks of a captivity, the particulars of which are not recorded. Salien understands it of the captivity of Nephthali, 35 years before the rest of the kingdom of Israel was destroyed: (4 K. 15:29. H.) though Lyran and Bonfrere explain it of the latter event, under Salmanaser. ib. C. 17. M.—We may allow that some interruptions took place under Samuel, David, &c. Salien.—In effect, Jonathan and his posterity might serve the idol of Michas till it was destroyed, at the same time as the ark was removed from Silo; (v. 31) and afterwards they might relapse into their wonted impiety, and act in the character of priests to the golden calves of Jeroboam; who, no doubt, would prefer such of the tribe of Levi as would come over to him, (Ezec. 44:10) though he was generally forced to select his priests from the dregs of the people. 3 K. 12. In this sense they might be priests in Dan, till Salmanaser led them captives. But substituting galoth or geloth, we might translate, “till the deliverance of the land,” which was effected by Samuel; (C.) who not only repressed the Philistines, (1 K. 7:13) but also persuaded all Israel to renounce the service of idols. ib. v. 4. H.

Ver. 31. In Silo. The ark was taken by the Philistines, (1 K. 4) after remaining at Silo 349 years, and 217 from the idolatry of Michas and of Dan. Salien. H.—In those. The Heb. here commences the following chapter, which contains an account of another instance of licentiousness, which probably took place after the two former. Phinees was high priest; but there was no civil head. C.

Ver. 1. Ephraim. Some think at Silo, to which place, he says, he was going, (v. 18,) though it might be only out of devotion. C.—A wife. Heb. “a concubine.” Sept. joins both together, “he took a harlot to wife.” H.

Ver. 2. Left him. Heb. thozne. Now tizne, (D.) “his concubine, fell into fornication against (Junius improperly translates with) him.” Chal. “She despised went from him.” Sept. “She was vexed at or she left him.” C.—Josephus, “as he was deeply in love with her on account of her beauty, he was displeased that she did not correspond with his love. Hence a quarrel ensuing, the woman would not bear his continual expostulations, and leaving her husband, after four months, returns to her parents. Hither, overcome by his love for her, he follows, and, by the mediation of her parents, he is reconciled to his wife, both agreeing to lay aside all complaints." Ant. v. 2.—It is clear that the Sept. Vulg. &c. have read the text in a different manner from what we do at present, and their explanation seems more rational than the Hebrew. For, is it probable that a Levite should go to be reconciled to an adulteress, contrary to the intention of the law (Deut. 24:2. Jer. 3:1. Prov. 18:22) and the custom of the Jews, as well as of pagan nations, who looked upon those with contempt, who kept a woman of this character? The word concubine, we have often remarked, signifies a wife without a dowry, &c. (C.) such as the Mahometans still maintain as lawful wives. Busbec. ii.—Months. Josephus explain this of the time she had remained with her husband.

Ver. 3. With him. Heb. "her husband arose and followed her to speak to her heart, to bring her back." Gen. 34:3. He shewed great condescension and love, (H.) and she received him with suitable sentiments of regard, and did not become more haughty, as women, who perceive themselves to be courted, frequently do. If she had been married to another, she could not have been received by her former husband.

Ver. 7. With him. A beautiful instance of hospitality, like that of the disciples at Emaus. Luc. 24:29. M.

Ver. 8. Advanced. Heb. "and they tarried until the evening." Sept. "rest till the day decline." H.—He wishes them to wait till the hear of the day be over. C.—When he had obtained this request, he made the late hour an excuse for detaining them longer. But unhappily, the Levite was too resolute and desirous of returning home.

Ver. 9. Depart. Heb. and Sept. add, "early," before the sun was up to render travelling incommodious. H.

Ver. 10. Jebus was about six short miles from Bethlehem, and as many from Gabaa. It had not yet fallen into the hands of Juda (C.) and Benjamin, (H.) or they had been expelled again, so that the old inhabitants held possession of it at this time, (C.) as they did of the citadel till the reign of David. See C. 1:6. 21. H.—Concubine. She was his lawful wife: but even lawful wives are frequently in Scripture called concubines. See above, chap. 8:31. Ch.—ver. 2.

degenerated from the manners of Abraham and of Lot, to imitate those of the men of Sodom! H.—There was no inn it seems at Gabaa, though we read of some at Jericho, Gaza, &c. C. 16:1. Jos. 2:1. Gen. 42:27. C.

Ver. 20. I will. Heb. “all thy wants be upon me.” I will furnish all that may be requisite. In this wicked city, there was at least, one generous soul, like Lot in Sodom. Gen. 18 and 19.

Ver. 22. That is, &c. An interpretation of the Vulg. Belial is sometimes rendered “devilish, apostate,” &c. Sept. “lawless, or transgressors.” M.—Aquila, “rebels.” Sym. “libertines,” without education or restraint. C.—Josephus lays the blame on some young men, who had been captivated with the charms of the Levite’s wife, whom they had seen in the street. But they seem to have had designs still more criminal, though they were prevailed upon to desist, when she was abandoned to them. H.—The demanded the Levite himself. C.

Ver. 24. I have, &c. A similar proposal was made by Lot; (Gen. 19:8,) and hence the old man, who was brought up to hard labour, and the young Levite might, through ignorance, suppose it lawful for them to do the like. M.—IT is lawful to advise a man, who is about to commit two crimes, to be satisfied with the less: but we cannot persuade any one to do even the smallest offence, that good may ensue. Rom. 3:8. The ignorance or good intention of these people might extenuate, but could hardly excuse their conduct, as it was unjust to the woman, whom the people of Gabaa did not ask for; and they ought rather to have encountered the utmost fury of the populace. Had the latter even come to the extremity proposed, if the Levite had made all possible resistance, his virtue could not have been injured. C.—His crown would have been doubled, as S. Lucy observed when the judge threatened to have her prostituted. Castitas mihi duplicabitur ad coronam. Dec. xiii. H.—Perhaps in the agitation of mind, caused by such a brutal proposal, the old man might have been so disturbed, as scarcely to know what he was saying, and he did not afterwards expose his daughter. C.—But the Levite, seeing him in such a dilemma, on his account (H.) took this wife by force. Heb. &c. See Tostat. Bonfrere. E. C.—Against nature. Heb. “unto this man do not so vile a thing.”

Ver. 25. And abandoned. Heb. “and they knew her and abused her.” H.—Interpreters say in the most unnatural manner. C.

Ver. 26. Lord. So wives styled their husbands. 1 Peter 3:5.—Down dead through fatigue, (M.) shame, and grief. Joseph.—She had not power to knock. C.—Though the former misconduct of this unhappy woman might call for punishment, yet, after she was reconciled to her husband, we cannot but think he used her ill, though he acted through a sort of constraint and ignorance. H.—Instances of women dying under a similar treatment, may be found in Herodotus, and in the Russian and Turkish historians. C.

Ver. 29. Israel. One part, like an epistle, written with blood, to every tribe. Salien.—Some, without reason, think that Benjamin was neglected: but they were to be summoned, to bring their guilty brethren (C.) to condign punishment, or to share in their fate, as accomplices of the crime. H.—The state of the republic authorized the Levite to take this extraordinary method of rousing all to a sense of horror for what had been done. C.—His brethren, dispersed through the country, would no doubt take part in his grief.

Ver. 30. Egypt, that is for the space of eighty years. Salien.—Indeed the annals of all past ages could hardly furnish an instance of such barbarous lust.—Done. In every city, people gathered together to consult how the crime was to be expiated; (H.) and all agreed to assemble before the Lord. C.—Grabe’s Sept. observes, that the Levite “gave order to the men, to whom he sent, saying, these things shall you speak to every Israelite. If such a word (or thing) has come to pass, from the day of the coming up of the sons of Israel out of Egypt, till the present day? Take ye advice concerning it, and speak.” H.

Ver. 1. Bersabee, from the northern to the southern extremity of the land, (C.) west of the Jordan, as Galaad denotes that on the east, belonging to Israel. Only the Benjamites and the town of Jabes declined attending. H.—Maspha, on the confines of the tribes of Juda and Benjamin. Here the people frequently assembled; and it was a place of prayer, 1 Mac. 3:46. It is thought that an altar of the Lord had been erected. C.—Maspha denotes, “a height or watch-tower,” (H.) in Silo. Mas. in Josue xviii. 26.

Ver. 2. Chiefs. Lit. “angles and corner-stones,” whose business it was to keep the people in order; or, all the different ranks of men might be designated. C.—Sept. “the climate,” or country. H.—Syr. and Arab. “the families of all the people.” 1 K. 14:38. C.

Ver. 3. Levite. Heb. and Sept. do not say that the discourse was addressed to him; but he was the most interested, and capable of giving a true account. Heb. “The said the children of Israel, Relate (Sept. ye) how this wickedness happened, (4) And the Levite,” &c. answered.

Ver. 5. Kill me. He expressed an abominable crime by another less horrible. Salien.—But he does not say that he brought out his wife. He might conclude, that if he had been exposed to their fury, he would have experienced a similar fate. H.—So determined was he to resist to the last extremity. The outrage would have been more hateful to him than death. C.—We may reasonably conclude that his wife had the same sentiments, and that she died a martyr to her conjugal fidelity, resisting even unto death, and thus making some atonement for her past misconduct.

Ver. 6. Because, &c. Heb. and Sept. “for they have wrought (zimma, a word which the Sept. (Alex. and Vat.) leave untranslated, others render dishonesty) lewdness and folly,” or a most impious act of lust. H.—They do not compare this crime with every other that had been committed, as idolatry, and other sins, which directly attack God, are greater. But this was the most atrocious injustice which could be done to a fellow creature. Salien.

Ver. 9. In common. Heb. “by lot.” C.—They chose one man out of ten to procure provisions, selecting 40,000 for that purpose, or the 10th part of the forces. H.

Ver. 11. With, &c. This is added to explain. C.—Heb. “united as one man.” H.

Ver. 12. Sent. The law of nations requires that satisfaction be demanded, (C.) before a war commence. M.—The former resolution (v. 9,) was only conditional, if the Benjamites should prefer defending their brethren of Gabaa, before punishing them, as they deserved. C.—Indeed their absenting themselves from this general assembly, implied as much, and the Israelites were determined, at any rate, to see that the guilty were duly punished. H.—Tribe. Heb. “tribes,” denoting the great families of Benjamin. Gen. 46:21. Num. 26:38.

Ver. 15. Men. This number is verified, v. 35. The Benjamites had 25,700 in all, of whom they lost 25,100; so that 600 remained. Heb. reads here 26,000; and some pretend (C.) that 1000 fell in the two victories which they obtained. Grot. &c.—But this is without proof, and the Vulg. is confirmed by Josephus, and by most of the copies of the Sept. though the Vat. copy has only 23,000. C.—Gabaa. Heb. and Sept. add, “which were numbered 700 chosen men.” Grabe repeats in the following verse with the Heb. “Among all this people, 700 chosen men,” which seems to insinuate that these expert archers were selected out of all the army. H.—But the other copies of the Sept. agree with the Vulg. that they were all of Gabaa, (C.) as if they were trained at this city with more particular care, to hit a mark how small soever.

Ver. 16. Right. Sept. “ambidextrous.” Moderns generally translate the Heb. “left-handed.” But we have seen that such a meaning is improbable. C. 3:15.—Side. The inhabitants of Palestine formerly applied themselves very much to this exercise, and by them it was propagated over other parts of the world. Plin. vii. 56. Strabo (iii.) observes that the people of the Balearic islands became famous for slinging, only after the Phœnicians had taken possession of their country, which is the present Majorca and Minorca. They could hit the mark without failing, and penetrate every sort of armour. Florus iii. Their bullets of lead were sent with such violence, as sometimes to melt in the air, according to Ovid and Seneca, q. 2. 56. The slingers commonly stood 600 paces from the mark of white, which they seldom missed. Veget. ii. 23. The stones which they used weighted a pound among the Romans. The sling would frequently carry farther than a bow. Xenophon, Anab. v. Yet the exploits of bowmen are not less extraordinary than what is here recorded. Philostorgius (ii. 12,) assures us that the Indians, after they have been drinking, will shoot at a child, and only touch the ends of his hair. Domitian would shoot from a great distance, and make the arrow pass between the extended fingers of a child, and at other times would divest himself with piercing an animal with two arrows, so that they would stick out like horns. Sueton. Soranus could send an arrow into the air, and pierce it with another as it fell. The emperor Hadrian writes of him, “Emissumque arcu dum pendet in aere telum,

Ac reedit ex alto, fixi fregique sagitta.” C.

Ver. 17. Thousand. Their numbers had decreased since they came out of Egypt, (Num. 1 and 26) when they were 600,000 fighting men. M.—But we must reflect, that some would be left to garrison the cities, &c. The Benjamites must surely have been infatuated to encounter so great a force in such a cause. H.

Ver. 18. Silo. Heb. simply “to Bethel,” which the Sept. Syr. Josephus, and others, explain of the city: but others generally understand “the house of God,” at Silo, for which Bethel is placed. C. 21:2. 9 and 12. Phinees resided near the tabernacle, and was desired to consult.—Juda is not the name of a man, but of the tribe; (C.) and probably Othoniel would have the chief command. Salien.—The Israelites do not ask whether they ought to make war on their brethren, &c. but only desire to know which tribe shall begin the attack. C. 1:1 and 10:18. They manifest a degree of presumption, which God soon chastised, (C.) as well as the idolatry of Dan, &c. which they had neglected to punish, though they had an express command to do it. Deut. 13:12. Salien.—They were full of pride, and only concerned to revenge their own wrongs. H.

Ver. 22. Trusting in their strength. The Lord suffered them to be overthrown, and many of them to be slain, though their cause was just; partly in punishment of the idolatry which they exercised or tolerated in the tribe of Dan, and elsewhere: and partly because they trusted in their own strength: and therefore, though he bid them fight, he would not give them the victory, till they were thoroughly humbled, and had learned to trust in him alone. Ch.—God’s thoughts are often different from ours; and he frequently delays to crown with success the most holy enterprises, that man may learn to be more humble, and to trust wholly in his mercy. C.

Ver. 23. And join battle. This is an explanation of Heb. “against him.” H.—The Israelites still neglected to sue for the divine protection, trusting in their numbers. God sends them again to battle, and suffers them to be routed. Did he deceive them? By no means. He wished them to learn the important lesson of self-diffidence, and he had not promised them the victory. H.—But after they had humbled themselves, He acts like a master. I will deliver, &c. v. 28. C.

Ver. 25. Sword. In each battle the Benjamites kill almost as many as their whole army, in all 40,000 Israelites, without losing a man, v. 15. H.

Ver. 26. Evening. Till then the Jews never eat on fasting days. The Turks still do the like: but they only change day into night, as they sleep till sunset, and then begin to feast and to make merry. C.

Ver. 28. Was over. Heb. “stood before it at that time,” (H.) in the camp, (C.) or perhaps at Silo, which was not so remote; but some, if not the whole army, might go thither to weep, and to consult the Lord. Phinees had formerly displayed his zeal against the impiety of Beelphegor. Num. 25:7. He was contemporary with Jonathan, the priest of Michas. Kennicott.—Hence it appears that this took place not long after the death of Eleazar. Jos. 24. W.

Ver. 31. To Gabaa, from some other city. H.—This body of men consisted of 10,000, who were designed to draw off the Benjamites from the city into the midst of the forces of Israel, at Baalthamar; while another division, in ambush, on the west of Gabaa, had to enter the city, and having set it on fire, were to prevent the inhabitants from re-entering. C.—They use a similar stratagem to that which Josue (C. 8) had employed against Hai. (Salien.

Ver. 33. Baalthamar, the plain of Jericho; (Chal.) or rather a village in the vicinity of Gabaa, which Eusebius calls Besthamar.

Ver. 34. West side. Heb. mare, “a cavern,” (C.) “a plain,” (Chal.) “the thickets.” Vat. &c. But the Sept. have read marbe, “the west,” with the Vulge. C.—The Vat. copy leave Maraagabe. M.—Gabaa was situated on a hill, and the ambuscade might be concealed in a cavern, some of which in Palestine are very spacious. C.

Ver. 35. The sword. It seems the slingers also used the sword, v. 16.

Ver. 36. Flee; some towards the city, others to the wilderness, and to Remmon, v. 45. H.—That. Heb. “because they confided in those whom they had place din ambush, near Gabaa.” Hence they were not so eager to prevent their flight, by surrounding them.

Ver. 37. Arose. Heb. “drew along (advanced or sounded the trumpet a long time,)” perhaps for a signal, (C.) though the firing of the city seems to have been designed for this purpose, v. 40. H.

Ver. 39. Saw. Heb. “retired in the battle, Benjamin began to smite and to kill ... about thirty men; for they said, surely they are destroyed before us, (or flee) as in the first battle.” It is wonderful that they should thus so easily fall into the very snare laid formerly for the men of Hai. Jos. 8:5.

Ver. 42. Them. Heb. “and those who came out of the cities, (of Benjamin) they (destroyed, (H.) or the other Israelites) destroyed them who fled in the midst of them.”

Ver. 43. Rest. Heb. “with ease, or at leisure they crushed them,” &c. Others translate, (C.) Monvee, from Nucha, Noua, (Sept. Rom. H.) Menucha,” &c. We read of a place in the tribe of Juda, called Menuchta, 1 Par. 2:52. C.—The same word may be taken as a proper name, or may signify rest. M.

Ver. 45. In that. Heb. “and they gleaned of them in the highways 5000 men, and pursued them close to Giddom,” of which the Vulg. takes no notice. The Roman Sept. reads “Gedan;” the rest have “Galaad.”

Ver. 46. War. The Scripture, and other authors of the greatest exactitude, sometimes use round numbers. C.—An odd hundred (v. 35, and 15. H.) is here neglected. C.

Ver. 47. Escape. Mercy was shewn to these, as the tribe had been already treated with sufficient severity. S. Jerom says, they were “reserved for the sake of the apostle Paul,” (epit. Paul. M.) who was descended from some of them. H.—Remmon, near Gabaa. Zac. 14:10. Eusebius places it fourteen miles north of Jerusalem. C.

Ver. 48. And villages, is not expressed in Heb. &c. But as both cities, and all the inhabitants were destroyed, the villages would share the same fate, (H.) as being under a curse. The Israelites concluded, from the exemplary vengeance which had been taken of Sodom and Gomorra, that they were authorized to treat their brethren in guilt with the utmost severity. C.

Ver. 1. Sworn, (juraverunt.) The mention of Maspha, seems to determine that this oath was taken before the battle; though it would otherwise appear, that the Israelites engaged themselves to extirpate the tribe in the heat of their fury, and after they destroyed the women of Benjamin. If they could lawfully slay their brethren indiscriminately, as connected in the same wicked cause, (H.) they might surely refuse their daughters to any of those (M.) who might chance to make their escape. H.—But they ought first to have consulted the Lord, as this was a matter of as great consequence as to know who was first to go to battle. They seem to have discovered the rashness of their proceedings, and to have repented when it was too late; and they ridiculously attempt to elude the obligation of the oath, which lay heavy on their consciences. Salien.—They think it sufficient to adhere to the letter, while they neglect the spirit of their oath. H.—The ancients had a scrupulous regard for oaths, and did not allow themselves the liberty of interpreting them away. Gen. 24:5. Jos. 9:15. 1 K. 14:24. C.—But here the Israelites wish to keep and to evade the oath at the same time. H.—Serarius, &c. declare that their oath was lawful, as they did not consider the inconveniences which would attend its execution. As soon as they perceived them, the obligation ceased; though, if their erroneous conscience dictated the contrary to them, they were obliged to follow it, (T.) if they could not receive a more certain information. H.—Tostat and others maintain that the oath was null, as being illegal, and consequently of no force. Grotius (Jur. ii. 2, 21,) lays it down as the right of nature, for people to marry with their neighbours, (C.) though an individual may refuse such connexions; (H.) and S. Aug. (de C. ii. 17.) allows, that he Romans had “a right, perhaps, to seize the Sabine women, in a war declared on account of the unjust refusal.” We can excuse the Benjamites for taking the women of Silo, by force, on no other plea, (C.) unless the consent of the parents and of the virgins intervened. H. v. 22.—If, therefore, the Israelites could not lawfully deny their daughters in marriage to the Benjamites, their oath was unjust, and nowise obligatory. C.—They had not right to punish the innocent with the guilty, as they had received no order from God; (Salien) and therefore they ought not to have slain the unoffending females of Benjamin, or of Jabes, v. 11. It is not necessary for us to defend the rash oaths or conduct of the Israelites in exterminating their fellow creatures, who were innocent; nor in the rape, &c.

Ver. 2. Silo. Heb. simply, “to Bethel,” as C. 20:18. Sept. Alex. “to Maspha and Bethel.” H.

Ver. 3. Evil. Thus they style their own cruelty, in destroying the women and children, and in taking an oath to prevent the remaining Benjamites from having any posterity, unless they married with strangers, which the law forbade, (C.) though it would hardly bind in cases of such necessity. H.—Hence the sons of Noemi are excused from entering into such marriages. Ruth 1:4. T.—Heb. and Sept. do not mention, so great an evil, but only this. The context however shews, that the people considered the extermination of a whole tribe, as a dreadful misfortune; and, as it was going to take place in consequence of their oath, unless some expedient could be discovered to prevent it, without the guilt of perjury, they were moved with repentance, and endeavoured to appease God's wrath by a multiplicity of victims. How much better would it have been not to have made a vow, than after making it, to strive to render it ineffectual! Eccle. 5:3. 4. It does not appear that God gave them any answer in all this affair; and the concluding verse seems to indicate, that their conduct was displeasing to him. Perhaps he punished this, as well as the other faults of his people, by delivering them over to Chusan for eight years, as Salien and Usher place the first year of servitude immediately after the close of this unfortunate war, which would enable the Chanaanites to gain fresh strength, and to rejoice at the civil broils of Israel. C. 3:8. Aod, who slew Eglon, about 94 years afterwards, was not yet born. H.

Ver. 4. Altar, within the tabernacle, to suffice for the number of victims as Solomon did; (3 K. 8:64. T.) or out of the court, by God's dispensation, as they were defiled with blood; (Num. 31:24. C.) though this is not certain, as four months elapsed between the battle and the reconciliation of the remaining Israelites with their brethren: (C. 20:47) so that during that interval, they might have committed the massacres in the different cities, and still have had time to be purified seven days, as the law required, before they could be allowed to enter the camp or the tabernacle. H.—Some think that one altar was prescribed only during the sojournment in the desert. See Serar. M.

Ver. 5. Slain. Why then did they deem it lawful to reserve the virgins? or if they meant only those who were fit for war, why were the married women, &c. involved in the common ruin? The people of Jabes deserved chastisement, for seeming to connive at the wickedness of Gabaa, and by separating themselves from the religious sacrifice of the rest. But it does not appear that they were legally summoned, nor had the majority of the people a right to execute such summary justice upon a few, who perhaps might not have been acquainted with their vows and new made laws. H.

Ver. 6. Say. Governors should use great discretion, and correct with justice and mercy. S. Greg. 1. ep. 24. W.

Ver. 7. In general. Heb. "by the Lord," with an imprecation, v. 18. M.

Ver. 8. Jabes was between Pella and Gerasa, upon a mountain, east of the Jordan. It was after its destruction rebuilt, (C.) and became very famous, (1 K. 11. M.) if it was indeed ever demolished. We know not what prevented the inhabitants from joining in common cause. H.

Ver. 10. Ten. Heb. Chal. Sept. and Josephus read, twelve. The refusal to serve in the national army was punished like a sort of rebellion, with death, no less than to desert. Debora cursed the inhabitants of Meros, on this account. C. 5:23.

Ver. 11. But, &c. This is not expressed in the Heb. or the Sept. though it be sufficiently implied, (C.) as the males and married women only are ordered to be slain. H.—It is doubted whether the virgins, who were not fit for marriage, were reserved or butchered. But probably all the younger children were saved (C.) of that sex, though the order was to kill the wives and children; and the reason for sparing any was, that the Benjamites might be supplied with wives immediately. H.—Heb. and Sept. insinuate, that the citizens were to be treated as those who were under an anathema: “ye shall utterly destroy;” anathematize. Yet the house and cattle were spared. M.

Ver. 13. Them, the messengers to, &c. Heb. “and to make unto them a proclamation of peace.” H.

Ver. 15. Sorry, and. Heb. “for Benjamin, because the Lord had made a breach in Israel.” C.

Ver. 17. And we, &c. Heb. “and they said: an inheritance for those Benjamites who have escaped, that a tribe,” &c. They wished to repair the breach as fast as possible, so that each of the 600 may have a wife.

Ver. 19. Counsel, among themselves. H.—Solemnity. It is not known which is meant, as all the three great festivals occurred during the time that the vines were covered with leaves; (v. 20) or this feast might be one peculiar to the city of Silo, in memory of the ark being transported thither. Vatable thinks that the description here given, regards the place where the dance was to be, as all must have known the situation of the city. Silo rather lies to the west than to the east, (C.) if we draw a line from Bethel to Sichem, but the road might be circuitous. H.—S. Jerom places Silo ten miles west of Sichem.—Lebona may be Chan Lebna, four miles to the south of it. C.

Ver. 21. To dance; not in a lascivious manner, as a certain heretical interpreter would have it, but out of a religious motive. M.—Such dances were formerly very common among all nations. The Therapeuts, who are supposed to have been the first Jewish converts to the Christian faith, in Egypt, and were remarkable for their modesty and serious deportment, danced nevertheless in their religious assemblies, first in two separate bands, and afterwards men and women together. Philo. contemplat. The women still dance round the tombs of their relatives, in Palestine, with solemn lamentations.

Roger, and Le Brun's Voyages.—Come. Josephus insinuates, that the women were to be seized as they came from different parts to the solemnity. But it hance appears that they were coming out to the city; (C.) though it is very probable that the virgins did not all belong to it, but came from all Israel: for why should the people of Silo be forced to supply wives for these surviving Benjamites, against whose character they might reasonably entertain such strong objections? But, if all the assembly agreed that the Benjamites should select from among their daughters whomsoever they could lay their hands on, they could not complain that they were treated with peculiar severity. H.—But did not the Israelites offend by giving this counsel, so contrary to the import of their vow? And were not the Benjamites equally guilty in following such advice? It is answered that, in odious matters words must be taken in all their rigour, and the person who vows not to give, does not engage himself to reclaim if the thing be taken. Those who gave the advice are not perhaps deserving of excuse, on account of the artifice which they employ to get rid of their oath; but the rest, who were not apprised of it till after the execution, were surely without blame; and the Benjamites, who followed the counsel of respectable men, in such circumstances, cannot be considered as guilty of a rape, &c. Grot. Jur. ii. 13. A. Lapide. C.—S. Ambrose (ep. 6,) seems to be of this opinion. Tostat and others cannot, however, approve of these arguments. “As they erroneously supposed that they were bound by their oath, they prudently turned aside to advise the rape.” T.—So Liran. &c.—But this was only a human prudence. H.—The ancients gave counsel to the Benjamites, to ask the people of Silo to give them their daughters in marriage, knowing they would not grant the request, that they might afterwards have recourse to the expedient of taking them by force. “No doubt they were not without blame. For as they believed that their oath was binding, they ought neither to have done nor to have advised any thing, by which it might be violated.” Salien, A. 2622.—The rape at Silo preceded that of the Sabines, at Rome, about 700 years, and both probably happened in September. T.

Ver. 22. Part. Heb. is variously translated; but the Sept. and Arab. agree with the Vulg. By your refusal, and by your oath, you have constrained them to take what you would not, (C.) or could not grant. Prot. “Be favourable to them for our sakes, because we reserved not to each man his wife, in the war; for ye did not give unto them, at that time, that ye should be guilty.” H.—You have not to answer for the infraction of the oath, since you did not give your daughters. C.—They had not objections to the Benjamites on any other head, and the young women were not very reluctant. T.—It is wonderful that the high priest, Phinees, appears so little on this occasion. If he had spoken in the name of God, the rest would have been under no perplexity.

Ver. 24. Himself. This remark has been made twice before, respecting the conduct of Michas and of Dan, both which deserved reprehension. It seems to be added here for the same purpose, that we might not be so much startled at the relation of such strange proceedings. Soon after this event, the angel came to upbraid the Israelites. C. 2:1. H.—There was not judge perhaps, but anarchy then prevailed. D.—At least the people were under more restraint when they had kings, (W.) or judges divinely appointed at their head. H.

RUTH

INTRODUCTION

This Book is called Ruth, from the name of the person whose history is here recorded; who, being a Gentile, became a convert to the true faith, and marrying Booz, the great-grandfather of David, was one of those from whom Christ sprang according to the flesh, and an illustrious figure of the Gentile church. It is thought this book was written by the prophet Samuel. Ch.—The Holy Ghost chose that the genealogy of David, and of the Messiah, should be thus more clearly ascertained. Theodoret.—Christ proceeded from the Gentiles, as well as from the Jews, and his grace is given to both. W.—Send forth, O Lord, the lamb, the ruler of the earth, from Petra. Isai. 16. This was the capital city of Arabia Petrea, where Ruth is supposed to have lived, (Tostat) being, according to the Chal. &c. the daughter of Eglon, king of Moab. The Jews also pretend that Booz was the same person as Abesan, the judge. But it is by no means certain to what period this history belongs. Usher places it under Samgar, about 120 years after Josue. C.—Salien believes that the famine, which obliged Elimelech to leave Bethlehem, happened under Abimelech, and that Noemi returned in the 7th year of Thola, A.C. 1243. This event certainly took place under some of the judges; so that we may consider this book as an appendix to the preceding, like the last chapters, (Judg. 17. &c. H.) and a preface to the history of the kings. C.

RUTH 1

Ver. 1. Of one. Heb. "And it came to pass in the days when the judges ruled." H.—The and shews the connection with the former book. C.—Land. Chal. adds, "of Israel," (M.) while the less fertile country of Moab had abundance. God thus punished the idolatry of his people. Some say the famine lasted ten years; but this is uncertain, though Noemi continued so long out of the country, v. 4. Salien.

Ver. 2. Elimlech. Josephus and others read erroneously, Abimelech. He was probably called also Jokim. 1 Par. 4:22.—Ephrathites. This title often designates people of the tribe of Ephraim; (Judg. 12:5. 1 K. 1:2,) but here it means those of Ephrata, which is also called Bethlehem of Juda, about five or six miles south of Jerusalem. Gen. 35:19. Mic. 5:2. C.

Ver. 4. Ruth was the wife of Mahalon; (C. 4:10,) and signifies one "well watered, (M.) or inebriated," &c. H.—The sons of Noemi were excused by necessity in marrying idolaters, though they ought to have done their best to convert them. The Chaldee greatly condemns their marriage, and thinks that their death was in punishment of their prevarication. Deut. 7:3 and 20:11. C.—Salien is of the same opinion. So various have always been the sentiments of people on this head! H. See Serarius, q. 11.

Ver. 8. Mothers, who had separate apartments from the men. C.—Me. They had behaved with great respect and love towards their husbands, and towards Noemi, whom they even wish to accompany. M.—The pronouns in this, and verses 9, 11, 13, and 19, are surprisingly corrupted in Heb. being masculine or feminine, where we should expect the contrary. Kennicott.

Ver. 9. Take. She proposes marriage to them, as a state more suitable to their years, (H.) and wishes that they may experience none of its solitudes, (1 Cor. 7:28,) but be constantly protected by their husbands. Widows are exposed to many difficulties. M.

Ver. 11. Of me. Hence it appears that the Rabbins are under a mistake, when they say that those children who are born after the death of their brothers, are not obliged to take their widows.

Ver. 13. Marry. Heb. "would you stay for them from having husbands!"

Ver. 14. And returned, is not expressed in Heb. But the Sept. have, "and she returned to her people." H..

Ver. 15. To her gods, &c. Noemi did not mean to persuade Ruth to return to the false gods she had formerly worshipped; but by this manner of speech, insinuated to her, that if she would go with her, she must renounce her false gods, and turn to the Lord, the God of Israel. Ch.—She wished to try her constancy. Salien.—Most infer from this passage, that Orpha was never converted, or that she relapsed.—Her gods, may indeed be rendered in the singular, “god.” But what god was peculiar to her and the Moabites, but Chamos! C.—Noemi might well fear that Orpha would give way to the superstition of her countrymen, to which she had been addicted, even though she might have made profession of serving the true God, while she lived with her. H.

Ver. 17. The Lord do so and so, &c. A form of swearing usual in the history of the Old Testament, by which the person wished such and such evils to fall upon them, if they did not do what they said. Ch.—It is not certain that they expressed what particular evils. C.—They might be willing to undergo any punishment, if they should transgress. H.—The pagans used a similar form of imprecation. 3 K. 19. 4 K. 20:10. C.

Ver. 19. That Noemi. This exclamation might proceed either from surprise, or from contempt. M.

Ver. 20. That is. The explanations are added by S. Jerom. H.—Noemi had formerly a husband and two sons, with great riches, of which she was now deprived. W.

Ver. 21. Almighty. Heb. Sadai, (“the self-sufficient”) hath afflicted.”

Ver. 22. Harvest. About the month of Nisan, or our March (C.) and April. M.

RUTH 2

Ver. 1. Booz. The Scripture does not specify how nearly they were related. R. Josue says Elimelech, Salmon, and Tob (C. 3:13,) were brothers, and Booz was the son of Salmon, which cannot be refuted, (Serar. q. 1. M.) though the authority and proofs be very weak. It is not, however, more probable that Booz was the brother of Elimelech. Some think that he was not the immediate son of Salmon, as four persons seem too few to fill up the space of 366 years, from the marriage of Rahab till the birth of David. But this is not impossible. C.

See C. 4:20.

Ver. 2. To me. It was the privilege of the poor and of strangers to glean. Deut. 24:19. Lev. 19:9. Yet Ruth asks leave, through civility. C.—This law is no longer in force, but it would be inhuman for the rich to deny this liberty to those who are in distress, and willing rather to work than to beg. T.

Ver. 4. With you. This blessing the Church still adopts in her service. W.—It was customary to bless one another during harvest. Ps. 128:5, 8. C.—Booz did, as Cato advises, Ne opera parcas visere; “See what is going forward.” The master’s eye makes the servants diligent. H.

Ver. 5. Man. Heb. nahar, a man in the prime of life. He had the care of all in the field, during the absence of his master; whence Josephus styles him agrocomos, or agronomos. M.—Homer mentions an officer or king, standing with his sceptre in the midst of the reapers, and silently rejoicing at the rich profusion of the field. Iliad.—Thus we see the taste of the ancients, while agriculture was honourable.

Ver. 7. Moment. Heb. “her tarrying in the house is but small, or till now, that she remains a little in the house.” She entered the house with the reapers, during the excessive heat of the day, and to avoid the suspicion of taking more than was allowed, during their absence. C.—Sept. “she hath not discontinued to work in the field even a little.” Her diligence and modesty attracted the notice of Booz. H.

Ver. 9. Thee. The men tied the corn after the female reapers, (C.) and Ruth was authorized to follow, close at their heels, without fear. H.—The waters. This is not expressed in Heb. but it is in the Sept. and the Chal. C.—The privilege of having water in those countries was very considerable. M.

Ver. 10. Country. S. Elizabeth was impressed with similar sentiments, when she was visited by the blessed Virgin; (H.) and so was David, when he considered the wonderful condescension of God. Ps. 8:5. 143:3. Job 7:17. C.—Frequent instances occur in Scripture of people worshipping, or shewing their gratitude to their fellow creatures, by this posture of the body. M.—Yet no suspicion of idolatry attaches to them. Gen. 23:7. &c. H.

Ver. 11. Heretofore, to embrace the same religion. M.

Ver. 12. Work. Booz doubted not but a full and eternal reward was due to good works. W.—Fled. This similitude frequently occurs, (Ps. 35:8. Mat. 23:37,) to denote protection. C.—Chal. “Thou art come to be a proselyte, and to hide thyself under the shade of the majesty of his glory." M.

Ver. 13. Heart. This has the same meaning as the former part of the sentence. C. See Ose. 2:14. H.—Maids, but more lowly and mean. M.

Ver. 14. Vinegar, or small wine, made on purpose for working people. Some think that such was presented to our Saviour. Yet vinegar was very frequently mixed with other things, and was esteemed particularly refreshing. Plin. xxiii. 1. C.—Side. Not in front, that they might not stare at her. M.—And she, &c. Heb. "and he gave her frumenty, or parched corn." A little oil might be poured upon it. See Lev. 2:14. 2 K. 17:28. H.—Travellers in Ethiopia only take parched barley with them. C.—The leavings, to Noemi. "Learn, says Seneca, (ep. 110,) to be content with a little." Sept. "and Booz heaped up food before her, and she ate and was filled, and left a part." H.—But it appears that she afterwards took it home, v. 18. M.—The vinegar and corn which were given to Ruth were very refreshing. The Spaniards still drink posca, or water and vinegar. T.

Ver. 15. Reap. Heb. "if she will glean, even among the sheaves, do not cover her with confusion," (H.) or hinder her. Ps. 43:10. C.

Ver. 17. Rod, as Gedeon had done. Judg. 6:11.—That is, &c. an explanation of the Vulg. C.—The ephi contained three pecks and three pints. Arbuthnot.—Alcazar and A. Lapide say 960 ounces. M.

Ver. 20. Dead. He hath not forgotten Elimelech, his friend, for whose sake he treats his daughter-in-law with kindness. H.—Kinsman. Heb. adds, "one of our redeemers, (C.) or next kinsmen." H.—To such the right of avenging the slain, of marrying the widow of the deceased, and entering upon his property, belonged. The best interpreters suppose that Booz was the nephew of Elimelech. C. Lev. 25:25. Deut. 25:5. M.

Ver. 23. And the wheat. Heb. Syr. and Arab. "It is good that thou keep close to the maidens of Booz, and continue to glean with them till," &c. This was the advice of Noemi: but Providence ordered that Ruth should be married to Booz before the commencement of the wheat harvest. C.—The Prot. agree with the Vulg. and Sept. "So she kept fast by, &c. unto the end of the barley harvest, and of the wheat harvest, and dwelt with her mother-in-law." These last words are expressed by the Vulg in the following chapter. H..

Ver. 1. I will. Heb. and Sept. may be read with an interrogation in the same sense. "Shall I not seek rest?" H.—By this expression she means a husband. C. 1:9. Marriage fixes the unsettled condition of women. C.—Noemi being apprised of the law, entertained hopes that she could engage Booz to marry Ruth. H.—Thus her penury would cease, and she would perhaps have children, as she earnestly desired. M.

Ver. 2. Night. In Palestine, and other maritime countries, a breeze generally arises from the sea in the evening. It was then that Booz seized the opportunity of winnowing his barley; so that, at an early hour, he gave Ruth six measures, and retired to rest, beside some of the remaining sheaves (C.) in an adjoining apartment, erected for the protection of the reapers during the great heats, and to contain the corn in case of a shower. Columella, i. 7. and ii. 51. This shade was probably in the same field where Ruth had been gleaning. C.—She might lawfully seize this opportunity (H.) to obtain an honest marriage. D.

Ver. 3. Garments. External cleanliness has many attractions. Judith 10:3. Many editions of the Heb. are very confused, by the improper insertion of i: "I will put the garments on thee, and get me down," &c. Ken.

Ver. 4. Sleepeth. People of fortune did not disdain to sleep among the corn.

Non pudor in stipula placidam cepisse quietem, Nec fœnum capiti supposuisse suo. Ovid, Fast. i. M.

—Feet. It is said that women in the East, enter their husbands' bed at the feet, to shew their submission. C.—Ruth was conducted on this occasion by a superior Being, who gave success to her undertaking, and disposed the mind of Booz (Theodoret) to grant her just claim. It was according to the law of Moses, that a widow might demand in marriage the next kinsman of her deceased husband, if she had no children by him. Ruth considered Booz in this light. H.—She was not actuated by a love of pleasure, as the latter was convinced, otherwise she would have desired to marry some young man, (C.) in her own country, v. 10. Both parties would probably have their clothes on among the straw, so that there would be less danger; though, if their virtue had not been very constant, (H.) the situation was no doubt sufficiently perilous, and in other circumstances could not have been tolerated. C.—We must also remember, that clandestine marriages were not then forbidden. Salien.—That same night they might have married, had not another's being nearer akin proved an obstacle; (T.) so that Booz could not have claimed the inheritance of Elimelech, though he might have taken Ruth to wife. By deferring another day he obtained both. H.—Lyranus thinks Ruth could be excused only by ignorance, in thus exposing herself to danger, and that Noemi was guilty of a grievous sin, in giving her such advice. But they both had the purest views, seeking only an honest marriage, by arts which were not blamable. See S. Tho. 2. 2. q. 154. and 169. and Cajet. T.—Noemi was well assured of the virtue of both parties, and followed the directions of the Holy Spirit, (C.) as the event shewed. W.—Dr. Watson justly reproves the censure of Paine, who calls Ruth, “a strolling country girl, creeping slyly to bed to her cousin,” and exclaims, “pretty stuff indeed to be called the word of God!” But in correcting this impertinent remark, he seems to allow that some things have been inserted in the Scriptures by human authority, so as not to be the word of God. This concession is more dangerous than the censure of Paine, and the quotation from S. Aug. by no means countenances it, as it barely insinuates that an express revelation was not requisite to insert some things, which the authors might know by other means. The holy father never doubted but every part of Scripture was equally inspired, and to be received without the smallest hesitation. What Dr. Law, and other such “good Christians,” might think, does not regard us. H.—“As a person imploring protection, Ruth laid herself down at the foot of an aged kinsman’s bed, and she rose up with as much innocence as she laid herself down. She was afterwards married to Booz, and reputed by all her neighbours as a virtuous woman; and they were more likely to know her character than you are. Whoever reads the Book of Ruth, bearing in mind the simplicity of ancient manners, will find it an interesting story of a poor young woman,” &c. Watson, let. 4.—Must do. She trusted to the superior wisdom of Booz, knowing perhaps that he was not absolutely the nearest relation, but being convinced, as the event proved, that the other would not consent to marry Ruth on the conditions specified by the law. Salien, A. 2810.

Ver. 7. Merry. Heb. “good,” yet by no means intoxicated. D. M.—It was formerly the custom, as it is still in many places, (H.) to conclude the harvest with a feast; (C.) on which day Cato observes, that the men and oxen did not work. De re Rust. c. 131. Hence the vacuna of Ovid. Fast. vi. T.—The pagans did this in honour of Jupiter and Ceres. But the true God had enjoined his people (H.) to offer the first-fruits to him, and to feast in his presence. Lev. 23:10. Deut. 24:19.—Sheaves, either of corn or of straw. Sept.—The Arabs and neighbouring nations still delight to rest upon the ground, with some clothes thrown over them. C.

Ver. 8. Troubled. Heb. may be rendered, “and turned himself, or felt,”

&c. C.—He perceived something at his feet, when he awoke, and was in consternation, particularly when he perceived, through the glimmering light, a woman at his feet. H..

Ver. 9. Kinsman. Heb. “a redeemer;” (C.) one bound to defend and to espouse a brother’s widow, if others more nearly akin refuse. H.—Ruth modestly admonishes him of this duty, and begs that he would take her to wife, (C.) as he might then have done without any other formality. Serar. q. vii.—We find a similar expression, Ezec. 16:8. Deut. 22:30. Some think that she only asked for protection. The custom of the husband, stretching a part of his garment over his bride, was perhaps already established among the Hebrews. C.—Heb. and Sept. “stretch thy wing over,” &c. Chal. “Let thy name be invoked upon thy handmaid, to take me to wife.” M. Is. 4:1.

Ver. 10. Thy latter kindness; viz. to thy husband deceased, in seeking to keep up his name and family, by marrying his relation according to the law, and not following after young men: for Booz, it seems, was then in years. Ch.—Salien supposes about seventy years old. H.—The affection which Ruth had all along displayed towards her husband, deserved applause. C.—Much more did her present endeavours to comply with God’s law. W.

Ver. 11. Woman. Virtuous here may denote, “strong, generous,” &c. Prov. 31:10. C.—But it includes the assemblage of all virtues. H.

Ver. 12. Than I. The Jews think that he was brother of Elimelech, while Booz was only his nephew. But they might be in the same degree; the other being only older. C.

Ver. 13. Well. Heb. tob. H.—Hence the Jews would translate, “If Tob will redeem thee, let him.” They say that Tob was the paternal uncle of Mahalon: but it is not probable that his proper name should be only here mentioned, and not C. 4. The Sept. and Chaldee are conformable to the Vulg. and the opinion of the Jews is abandoned by most interpreters; (C.) and by the Prot. “well, let him do the kinsman’s part.” H.—Liveth. Chal. “Bound by an oath, before the Lord, I say that I will fulfil my promise unto thee.”

Ver. 14. Hither. The next kinsman might otherwise allege this as a pretext for not marrying her, (Salien) as people are but too apt to suspect the worst, though nothing amiss had passed between them. H.—Booz consulted his own as well as Ruth’s reputation: for the apostle admonishes us to abstain from every appearance of evil. 1 Thess. 5:22. M.

Ver. 15. Mantle. The Syrian and Arab. ladies cover themselves all over with a large white veil, or piece of cloth, which has no hole", so that Ruth might conveniently carry the barley in it.—Measures is not in Heb. or Sept. Most people supply ephi. S. Jerom, who has translated six bushels, (allowing three to the ephi; C. 2:17,) has understood that Booz gave Ruth two ephi. If we explain it of six ephi, the burden would be great enough, consisting of 180 pints or pounds of barley. Bonfrere would supply six gomers, each of which consisted of only the tenth part of the ephi, or three pints, in all 18. But such a present seems too inconsiderable. We may therefore stick to S. Jerom, whose six measures (C.—modios, bushels; H.) make about 60 pints; (C.) or, according to others, 160 pounds, which, though heavy, a woman might carry. The Sept. insinuate, that Ruth carried the barley in her apron. M.—And. Heb. "he went." But the text is probably corrupted. C.

Ver. 16. What, &c. Heb. "Who art thou?" It was yet so dark that she did not know her. C.

RUTH 4

Ver. 1. Gate, where justice was administered.—Calling. Heb. Ploni Almoni. C.—Prot. "Ho! such a one." H.—This form of speech is used concerning a person whose name we know not, or will not mention. 1 K. 21:2. C.—The name of this man is buried in eternal oblivion, perhaps because he was so much concerned about the splendour of his family, that he would not marry the widow of his deceased relation. T.

Ver. 2. Here, as witnesses, not as judges, v. 9. C.—This number was requisite in matters of consequence. Grotius.

Ver. 3. Will sell. Some Latin copies read, "sells, or has sold." But the sequel shews that she was only now disposed to do it. But what right had Noemi or Ruth to the land, since women could not inherit? The latter might indeed retain her title, as long as she continued unmarried. But Noemi only acted in her behalf. Selden thinks that their respective husbands had made them a present of some land. Josephus (v. 11) asserts, that the person whom Booz addressed had already possession, and that he resigned his claim, as he would not take au other wife. C.—Our brother. He was his nephew, and calls him brother, as Abraham did Lot. W.

Ver. 4. This. Heb. "I thought to uncover thy ear," or to admonish thee. Virgil (frag.) uses a similar expression, Mors aurem vellens, vivite, ait, venio: “Death pulls the ear; live now, he says, I come.”—Not. Heb. printed erroneously, “But if he will not redeem it.” Ken.

Ver. 5. When. Heb. again corruptly, “On the day thou buyest the land of the hand of Noemi, I will also buy it of Ruth,” &c. It ought to be, conformably to some MSS. and the ancient versions, “thou must also take Ruth,” v. 10. Capel, p. 144, and 362. Kennicott. H.—We see here the observance of two laws, the one preserving the inheritance in the same family, and the other obliging the next of kin to marry the widow of the deceased, if he would enjoy his land. Lev. 25:10. Deut. 25:5. C.—Such widows as designed to comply with this condition, took possession of the land on the death of their husband, and conveyed it to those whom they married, till their eldest son became entitled to it. Abulensis, q. 30 to 61.—Inheritance. The son to be born, would be esteemed the heir of his legal parent. M.

Ver. 6. Family. Heb. “I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I spoil my own inheritance.” He was afraid of having too many children, and sensible that the first son that should be born of the proposed marriage, would not be counted as his. H.—The miserable Onan had the same pretext. Gen. 38:9. Chal. “Since I cannot make use of this privilege, having already a wife, and not being allowed to take another, as that might cause dissensions in my family, and spoil my inheritance, do thou redeem it, ... as thou art unmarried.”

Ver. 7. Israel. Heb. “and this was the testimony in Israel.” The ceremony here specified is very different from that which the law prescribed. Deut. 25:7. But Josephus says, that they complied with all the regulations of the law, and that Ruth was present on this occasion. C.—Perhaps the law was not executed in all its rigour, when another was found to marry the widow, (W.) and when no real brother was living. T.

Ver. 9. Chelion. As Orpha, his widow, took no care to comply with the law, all his possessions devolved on his brother’s posterity. M.—It was presumed that she would marry some Moabite. C.

Ver. 10. Moabites. The sons of Elimelech were excused in taking such women to wife, on account of necessity, and to avoid the danger of incontinence, which is a greater evil. Booz was under another sort of necessity, and was bound to comply with the law; (C.) so that he was guilty of no sin, as Beza would pretend. T.—Some also remark, that the exclusion of the people of Moab from the Church of God, regarded not the females, (S. Aug. q. 35, in Deut. Serar. T. &c.) particularly if they embraced the true religion. According to the Rabbins, Obed should have been accounted a Moabite, as they say children follow the condition of their mothers: but we need not here adopt their decisions.—People. Heb. “and from the gate of his place.” In the assemblies, the legal son of Mahalon would represent him, though he was also considered as the son of Booz, at least if the latter had no other, as was probably the case.

Ver. 11. Israel, by a numerous posterity.—That she. Heb. “mayst thou acquire riches,” &c. C.—Prot. “do thou (Booz) worthily in,” &c. H.—Ephrata: another name of Bethlehem. Ch.

Ver. 12. Phares. His family was chief among the five, descended from Juda. M.

Ver. 14. Successor. Heb. “redeemer, that his (Booz, or the Lord’s) name,” &c. C.

Ver. 15. Comfort. Heb. “to make thy soul revive.”

Ver. 17. Obed; “serving,” to comfort the old age of Noemi, (v. 15,) who gave him this’ name. (Serar. q. 14,) at the suggestion of her neighbours. M.

Ver. 18. These. Hence the design of the sacred writer becomes evident, (C.) to shew the genealogy of David, from whom Christ sprang, as it had been foretold. See Gen. 49. Mat. 1. &c. W.

Ver. 19. Aram. He is called Ram in Heb. and 1 Par. 2:9.

Ver. 20. Salmon. Heb. and Chal. Salma, (H.) though we read Salmon in the following verse. C.—This is one argument adduced by Houbigant, to shew that this genealogy is now imperfect. He concludes that Salma ought to be admitted, as well as Salmon; and, as the reason for calling the first son of Ruth, Obed, “serving or ploughing,” seems rather harsh, as we should naturally expect some more glorious title. He thinks that the immediate son of Ruth was called Jachin, “he shall establish;” and that Solomon called one of the pillars before the temple by his name, as he did the other Booz, “in strength,” in honour of his ancestors. Baz icin means, “In strength (or solidity) it (he) shall (stand or) establish.” As the son of Booz established his father’s house, (v. 10, 11,) so these pillars denoted the stability of the temple. We must thus allow that the hand of time has mutilated the genealogy of David, and that two ought to be admitted among his ancestors, who have been here omitted, as S. Matthew likewise passes them over as well as three others, who were the descendants of Joram. The same omission of Jachin occurs 1 Paral. 2:11, where we find Salma instead of Salmon. Houbigant supposes that the sacred writers, Esdras and S. Matthew, gave the genealogies as they found them, without correcting the mistakes of transcribers. Chronolog. sacra, p. 81. But there might be some reason for the omission which we do not know; and Nahasson, Booz, and Joram might be said to beget Salmon, Obed, and Jechonias, though they were not their immediate children. Salien and many others assert, that there were three of the name of Booz, succeeding each other, so that six persons instead of four fill up the space of 440 years, from the taking of Jericho till the building of the temple. Salien, A. 2741, in which year he places the birth of the third Booz, who married Ruth, seventy years afterwards. Petau allows 520 years from the coming out of Egypt till the fourth year of Solomon, so that he leaves above 420 years to the three generations of Booz, Obed, and Isai. But he prudently passes over this chronological difficulty. Usher supposes that each of these people were almost 100 years old when they had children; and he produces many examples of people who lived beyond that age, but he does not mention any, since the days of Moses, who had children at such an advanced age, much less that many in the same family, and in succession, were remarkable for such a thing. Moreover, according to Houbigant's chronology, Booz and Obed must have had children when they were almost 120, and Isai in his 107th year. But by admitting Salma and Jachin, the five persons might each have sons when they were about seventy, and thus would complete 347 years. See C. 2:1. H.

Ver. 22. David, the king, whom Samuel crowned, though he did not live to see him in the full enjoyment of his power, (H.) as he died before Saul. C.—Thus the greatest personages have people of mean condition among their ancestors, that none may be too much elated on account of their high birth. Ruth, notwithstanding her poverty, was a striking figure of the Christian Church. H.—The Gentiles were strangers to Christ, on account of their errors, but related to him in as much as they were his creatures. Their miserable condition pleaded hard for them, that Jesus would receive them under his protection, espouse and give them rest and peace. Booz would, not marry Ruth till the nearer relation had refused, and thus brought dishonour on himself; (Deut. 25) so Jesus was principally sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and did not send his apostles to the Gentiles till the Jews had rejected their ministry. C.—See S. Amb. de fide, iii. 5. D.—Ruth was also a pattern of the most perfect virtues. See Louis de Puente. T.

THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL;

otherwise called,

THE FIRST BOOK OF KINGS

INTRODUCTION

This and the following Book are called by the Hebrews, the Books of Samuel, because they contain the history of Samuel, and of the two kings, Saul and David, whom he anointed. They are more commonly named by the Fathers, the First and Second Book of Kings. As to the writer of them, it is the common opinion that Samuel composed the first book, as far as the twenty-fifth chapter; and that the prophets Nathan and Gad finished the first and wrote the second book. See 1 Par. alias 1 Chronicles, 29:19. Ch.—The authors of the Third and Fourth Books of Kings were also prophets, but we know not exactly their names. These works have nevertheless been always esteemed authentic (H.) and canonical. W.—V. Bede takes occasion to observe, from the Books of Kings (or as the Sept. read, “of kingdoms;” H.) being placed after that of Judges, that the everlasting kingdom of Christ will succeed the general judgment. The translation of the priesthood and of the regal dignity, recorded in these books, denote also that Christ would united both in his own person; as the two wives of Eleana intimated, that both Jews and Gentiles would acknowledge the same Lord. S. Jerom, S. Aug. &c.—The transactions of Heli, Samuel and Saul, and the persecutions which David sustained from the latter, form the subject of the first book, (H.) during the space of 100 years. All the four books carry down the sacred history near 600 years, from A. 2849 till the transmigration of Juda, A. 3420. C. Usher.

1 KINGS 1

Ver. 1. There. Heb. Sept. &c. “And there,” &c. The books of Scripture are thus frequently connected. The authors present us with a series of events, without prefixing any title, or their own names, that our attention may be wholly fixed on what we read. The birth of Samuel being so miraculous, deserves to be recorded, as he was the last judge of Israel, and had so much to do under the first of their kings, whose election and misconduct brought a great change into the state of the commonwealth. C.—Ramathaimsophim. Rama, or Ramatha, “a height,” and the environs were occupied by the family of Suph, a descendant of Core; (1 Par. 6:29) though the place did not properly belong to the Levites. It lay probably between Gabaa and Bethel, where Samuel spent much of his time, while he was judge, and obliged to be frequently absent from the tabernacle. C.—Ragusinus and Prince Radzivil think it was afterwards called Arimathea, the birth-place of Joseph, and now Ramula. T. C. 2:11.—Ephraimite. He was of the tribe of Levi, (1 Par. 6:34) but is called an Ephraimite from dwelling in Mount Ephraim. Ch.—So we read of Cretan Jews. Acts 2:11. T.

Ver. 2. Phenenna. She was only of inferior dignity. At that time polygamy was lawful, (M.) as Moses insinuates, if he do not expressly allow it.

Ver. 3. Days, the three great festivals. His family accompanied him, though the law only lays an express injunction upon the males to attend. We find, however, that females did not neglect to come. C.—Hosts. Heb. (Tsebaoth) of “armies,” both of angels and of Israel. God is attended by myriads of angels, and decides the fate of armies. H.—This title has not appeared in the former books. The pagans took occasion from it to form their Jupiter Sabazius. C.—Elcana might go up from the height of Ramatha to Silo, which was the highest mountain round Jerusalem of all in the holy land. Adrichom. T.

Ver. 4. Sacrificed, by the hand of the priests, (M.) who had the breast and right shoulder; the rest was given back to the person who had presented the fattened victim, that he might feast with his friends. C.

Ver. 5. With sorrow. Hebrew apayim, “of faces, indignation, (C.) sorrow;” (M.) or that was presented before him. Chal. and many others translate, “a chosen:” (C.) Prot. “a worthy portion.” H.—The shew-bread is called, “the bread of the face,” because it stood before the Lord. Joseph sent to each of his brethren, “a portion of his faces,” as the Heb. expresses it; (Gen. 43:33) or of such meat as was placed upon his table. In the East, the master of a family has all set before him, and he sends to each his portion, to the place where he is sitting. Chardin, Perse.—Thus Elcana sent some more excellent, or “double,” part to his beloved Anna, (C.) grieving inwardly that she had no children, to whom he might also send. H.—By this distinction, he wished to alleviate the sorrow of his wife. M.—Womb. Sterility was deemed a curse, and a mark of God's displeasure, with which women were often reproached. Hence Anna prays so earnestly that God would be mindful of her. v. 11–19. The power of the Almighty, in giving children to the barren, is frequently mentioned. Gen. 28:13. Ps. 112:9. C.—Luke 1:25. &c. H.

Ver. 6. Insomuch. Heb. “to make her fret, or rage; because the Lord,” &c. C.

Ver. 7. Lord. Then they could hardly avoid being together on the road, and Anna was accustomed to pray earnestly (M.) to be delivered from her reproach. H.

Ver. 9. Silo; either in some private house, or in the porch before the tabernacle. She complied with the entreaty of her husband. M.—Stool. Heb. “Heli was sitting upon a throne, near the steps, leading to the palace of the Lord.” It is also called the temple, or the house of God, though it was only a tent. Mat. 12:4. &c. Perhaps women were not allowed to go beyond the porch.

Ver. 11. A vow; rightly trusting that her husband would give his consent. Num. 30:7.—Razor. Heb. mora, “scissors.” Sept. “iron.” Some copies add, “he shall not drink wine, nor any intoxicating drink.” In quality of Levite, Samuel was bound to serve the tabernacle from 25 or 30 years of age till he was 50. Num. 4:2. Anna consecrates him to the Lord for life, and promises that he shall be a Nazarite, like Samson, and S. John Baptist. The law prescribes no rules for these perpetual Nazarites. Num. 6:3. Many of the ancients believe that Samuel always observed the prescriptions of Moses, and abstained from intoxicating liquors; though the Heb. and Vulg. are silent on this head. We find that during his administration as Judge, he was not able to continue always near the tabernacle. C.—When he came to years of discretion, he might depart if he thought proper, like other Levites. Had he been of another tribe, he must have been redeemed. W.—Esther, Elcana, or Samuel, might have annulled this vow. Salien, A. 2900.

Ver. 12. Prayers, out of fervour; not through vain superstition and ostentation, as the Pharisees and pagans did. Mat. 23:14. Christ does not condemn many, or long prayers, since he prayed whole nights for our instruction. Luc. 21:38. and 6:12. 1 Thes. 5:17.—Mouth. He tried, but could not hear what she said. C.

Ver. 14. Much. Heli's “son or servant,” (παῖδαριον, according to the Sept.) addressed these words to Anna. Her going to pray immediately after a feast, instead of taking recreation, increased the suspicion. S.

Chrys. hom. 1.—Salien (A.C. 1153) observes the many instances of patience which Anna exhibits on this occasion. H.—She teaches us not to answer the unjust reproaches of our superiors with haughtiness. D.

Ver. 15. My lord. She gives him this title, though he had called her a drunken woman. H.—Unhappy. Heb. “of a hard (or afflicted) spirit.” See Cant. 8:6. C.

Ver. 16. Belial; “without restraint;” abandoned. H.—Sept. “pestiferous.”—Sorrow. Heb. “meditation;” (C.) what preys upon my spirits. H.

Ver. 17. Peace, with all blessings. M.

Ver. 18. Eyes: that thou wouldst lay aside thy suspicions against my character, and pray (C.) that I may obtain so great a happiness.—Changed. Heb. “no more,” as it had been sad, and defaced with tears. H.—She was now full of hope and joy. M.—Sept. “her countenance fell not.” She was not moved with anger or with jealousy. Gen. 4:6. C.

Ver. 20. About, at the expiration of the year, which term the ancients frequently allowed between the conception and the nativity. Gen. 18:10.—Samuel. This name imports, asked of God. Ch.—Some letters are omitted for the easier pronounciation, as the Hebrews would now write it, Saul-meel; (C.) or it may signify, “God placed him,” sum-hal. T.—Shaal means, “to ask.” But Vatable thinks that Anna retained only the first letter. M.

Ver. 21. Vow, in consequence of his son’s nativity. The sacrifice might be of precept, such as the paschal lamb, or for his wife’s purification and the redemption of his first-born, as they could not attend in person. C.—Heb. “the victim of days and his vow,” which he had probably made in conjunction with Anna. M.

Ver. 22. Weaned. The mother of the Machabees weaned her children when they were three years old; (2 Mac. 7:27) which Gallien asserts as the proper time, though Avicenna fixes upon two years. See Gen. 21:8. Iremellius translates, “till the child be grown up.” But we must not allow any long term, since he was very young when he was presented to the Lord. v. 24.

Ver. 23. Word, by preserving the life of the child, (C.) and enabling him to serve according to our engagement. H.—Word is often put for “a thing,” in Heb. May God perfect his own work. M.

Ver. 24. Three calves. Sept. “a calf three years old,” such as Abraham sacrificed, Gen. 15:9. We only find one offered up, v. 25.—Bushels.

Heb. epha, (C.) each of which contained three bushels or measures. Ruth 2:17. H.—Bottle. Heb. nebel, a large measure containing above 87 pints. C.—The sacrifices seem to have been for thanksgiving, accompanied with an ephi for each calf, and with wine. Num. 15. Ezec. 46:7.

Ver. 26. Liveth: a strong attestation. M.—As sure as you live; or, may you enjoy a long and happy life. See C. 17:55. and 20:3. Dan. 3:9. 2 Esd. 2:3.

Ver. 28. Lent. This is equivalent to giving entirely. Anna presents her son to the Lord, to serve in his tabernacle as long as God shall think proper. He dispensed with his personal attendance, when he appointed him judge. C. 7:15. C.—As much as depended on Samuel's mother, he was consecrated for ever. But he was at liberty to ratify the vow if he pleased. M.—The expression, lent, seems to reserve the dominion of the thing, which Anna had entirely given up, so that we might translate the Heb. "Therefore I have him simply as one lent ... he is a thing lent, which belongs to the Lord." C.—They. Heb. "he worshipped the Lord there." Grabe found not these words in the Alex. copy, which by comparison of this chapter with the the Vatican edition, appears, to be more accurate. Both omit this sentence: but it is found in the Aldine edition of the Sept. Proleg. C. 4. The Targum adds, "and she prayed in the spirit of prophecy, and said." H.

Ver. 1. Rejoiced. Sept. and Chal. "been strengthened." Anna composed this canticle at the nativity of her son; or rather at his presentation in the tabernacle. She foretells the reign and glory of the Messiah, and of his church. S. Aug. de C. xvii. 4.—Horn. The horn in the Scripture signifies strength, power, and glory: so the horn is said to be exalted, when a person receives an increase of strength or glory. Ch.—So Horace (3 Ode, 21.) says, addis cornua pauperi.—Enlarged. Chal. "I have opened my mouth, to speak great things against my enemies." She has Phenenna principally in view, and compares her present glory with her former distress. C.—I may boast more on account of Samuel, than my rival can of her numerous offspring. M.

Ver. 2. Holy. This is frequently a title of God, the holy one of Israel. Isai. 1:4 and 5:19. He is essentially holy.—Strong. Heb. "no rock like," &c. The rocks of Palestine were the common fortresses of the nation, having caverns to which the people fled for refuge. Hence God is often called a rock, (C.) as non can afford such protection. H. Ps. 17:2. Deut. 32:15.

Ver. 3. Old. Heb. hathak means also, “hard things.” D.—“Let arrogance come out of your mouth,” to return no more. Yet most people supply the negation from the former member; “Let not arrogance or hard things.” Chal. “blasphemy,” &c. C.—Cease to praise idols, as you have done. W.—Use not the malevolent language to which you have been accustomed.—Knowledge. The secrets of hearts are open to him.—And to him. Heb. “and by him actions are weighed,” as in scales; (H.) or, “thoughts (and actions) are not established.” Sym. The Syr. and Arab. also read the negation, “there are not pretexts before him;” or, “are not actions founded upon him?” Will he not execute what he has wisely designed, in spite of opposition? H.—Sept. “and God prepares his thought;” C. (ἐπιτηδεύματα αὐτοῦ) or, “what is convenient for him.” H.—They have read lu, “of him,” instead of la, “not,” as they are authorized to do by the Keri, (or various readings in the margin) and by several Heb. MSS. The Prot. think rightly, and suppose that la, “not,” has been omitted, “Let not arrogancy;” because we find it in Chal. Sept. Syr. and Arab. versions. Lu is substituted for la, v. 16. When some have been pressed with the argument of variations, called Keri, they have said that they were rather explanations of obscure words in the text: but is there any obscurity in lu, “to him,” and la, “not;” or can they explain each other? Leusden answers in the affirmative, v. 16! Kennicott.

Ver. 4. Overcome. Heb. “broken.” Sept. “he has weakened the bow,” having deprived it of its elasticity.

Ver. 5. Many. Heb. “seven,” which is often used in the same sense. Anna had never more than six children; (C.) whereas Phenenna had perhaps ten. C. 1:8. and 3:21. H.—The Rabbins pretend that she lost one every time that Anna brought forth. But the text says nothing of the kind. It only insinuates at most, that she had no more. This admirably represents the state of the Synagogue, compared to the Christian Church. S. Aug. sup. C. W.—The blessed Virgin conveys the same idea in other words. Luke 1. M.

Ver. 6. Hell, (infernos,) “the lower regions.” God calls us out of this world, or restores the dead to life, as he thinks proper. H.—He easily makes the greatest prosperity succeed extreme distress, which is often denoted by death, hell, &c. So Seneca says, Mortis habet vices—Lentis cum trahitur vita gemitibus. The prodigal son is said to have come to life again, when his father received him, contrary to his expectations. Luke 15:24. Ps. 29:4. &c. C.

Ver. 7. Exalteth. The same instances of God's power and providence are related, Ps. 112:7. Luke 1:52. M.—Hesiod (op.) says, "Jupiter easily gives or takes away power," &c.

Ver. 8. World. The Hebrews represented the earth as resting on a firm basis, or on pillars, or turning on poles. Ps. 103:5. Prov. 8:25. &c. The magistrates of the earth may be also thus designated, as the world is entrusted to their care. God compares Jeremias to an iron pillar. Jer. 1:18. Apoc. 3:12. C.—The last sentence is omitted in the Sept.

Ver. 9. Saints. Heb. "kind, merciful, pious ones;" (C.) those to whom he shews mercy, and who comply with his will in assisting others. Sept. "Granting their petition to those who ask him, and he has blessed the years of the just, because man is not strong by his own strength." H.—Silent: condemned to death. Mox etiam Lemures animas dixere silentes. Ovid, Fast. v. Loca nocte silentia late. Virg. vi. Unable to act as they had done, and ashamed of themselves, (C.) they seek for the most obscure retreat, where they may not behold the glory of those whom they have despised. They will pray that the hills would fall upon them, and hide them from the indignation of the Lamb. H.

Ver. 10. Him. Sept. "The Lord will render his adversary weak. The holy Lord. Let not the prudent boast of his prudence," &c. (H. which seems to be added from Jer. 9:23. C.) "The Lord has mounted the heavens, and thundered. He judges the ends of the earth, and gives power to those who rule, as kings, over us," &c. H.—Heavens. This prediction against the Philistines was exactly verified. C. 7:10. It denotes the protection which God grants to his servants. Ps. 17:8, 14. —Christ. Chaldee, and the best interpreters, understand this of the Messias: "He will multiply the kingdom of his Messias." Jonathan.—Anna might also have David in view, who was one of his most express figures. C.—But neither he, nor Solomon, ever ruled over all the earth, as Christ will. Ps. 2:8. W.—Zachary seems to allude to this text. Luke 1:69. C.—The empire of Christ rose from the smallest beginnings. M.

Ver. 11. Ramatha. Heb. Rama. Sept. Alex. "and they left him there before the Lord, and went away to Armathaim." H.

Ver. 12. The Lord, whom they denied by their works. Tit. 1:16.

Ver. 13. Nor the office. The Vulg. repeats the negation from the preceding sentence. Others translate, "The priests' custom with the people was," &c. or, "the pretended right of the priests," &c. They neither performed their duty towards God, (C.) nor were they content with what the law authorized them to receive from the people. H.—Servant, or son; perhaps Ophni or Phinees.—Boiling. In the heroic times, the meat was never boiled, but roasted. Athen. i. 10. and Servius; though Hesiod asserts the contrary, v. 748. C.—Abulensis (q. 8.) observes that the person who offered the victim, boiled the parts which belonged to himself, as well as the priest's share. But, whereas in the peace-offerings, only the breast and the right shoulder fell to the priest, these rapacious men took whatever they pleased. M.

Ver. 14. Pan. Heb. has also four terms, but their precise meaning cannot be determined. The vessels were of different forms, or intended for various uses.

Ver. 15. Raw. Here are two other abuses. The fat ought first to have been burnt, in honour of the Lord; and the meat should have been boiled, in order that the priest might not be taken off from his sacred functions; as custom, it seems, had determined, though the law be silent on this head.

Ver. 16. Desireth. The Laic gives an example of moderation and zeal, to which the priest might well have paid some deference. The former is willing to abandon his goods, provided the honour of God be not neglected. H.

Ver. 17. Lord. People, seeing that the law was not observed, refrained from presenting victims. M.—They are but too apt to follow the bad example of their teachers. H.—Hence God punishes the smallest faults of his ministers, with great severity, since they withdraw people from his service, by their scandalous behaviour, and are guilty of a more horrid sacrilege than those who laid violent hands on the Lord of majesty. S. Bern. ser. i. Nothing brings a greater discredit on religion. C.

Ver. 18. Ephod. It was not, therefore, peculiar to priests, 2 K. 6:14.

Ver. 19. Coat. Heb. mehil, the outer garment. Hence it appears that the parents of the people consecrated to the Lord, furnished them with clothes, till they were able to serve the tabernacle, otherwise they would have been a burden to it. C.

Ver. 20. Lent. This was in reply to what Anna had said. C. 1:28. H.—God always gives back with interest. M.

Ver. 21. Lord. He behaved well in the tabernacle, (C.) notwithstanding the ill example of Heli's own sons. H.

Ver. 22. Waited, like an army of guards. Ex. 37:8. The Rabbins pretend that these priests only sent away these women who came to be purified, and allowed them to return to their husbands before the appointed time, and thus caused the latter to offend. These authors are generally very fertile in discoveries. C.—The virgins or widows gave themselves up to work for the tabernacle. M.—The sons of Heli found an opportunity in the sacred practices of religion to gratify their passions. Perhaps some false pastors in the Church of Christ may have imitated their perversity. A man of the character of Mr. Crowley, a late deserter of the Catholic faith, judging of others by the corruption of his own heart, would hence insinuate that they all take these liberties, or at least that it is “a miracle,” if they can admit females to confession, without yielding to such base temptations. If this be a miracle, we may confidently hope that wonders have not ceased, otherwise among his other malicious remarks, he would surely have adduced some proofs of his assertion, from the records of past ages. But in reality he seems to be little acquainted (though he pretends to have been converted by it, &c. and falsely asserts it is kept from laymen) either with history or with the Bible, having read perhaps little more than what his Catechism set before him; and this he boldly contradicts, as if he supposed that this “Thoughts” would have more weight than the decisions of the Fathers and of the whole Church. If he can find a professor of Maynooth, and another or two Irish priests, disposed to follow his example, (which we need not believe on his assertion) what would this prove? Yet Mr. Slack lays great stress on this man’s authority, in his late defence of Wesley. Letters to R. Campion, Esq. Whitby, 1811. So ready are the enemies of the Catholic faith to scrape together every idle remark that may tend to defame the mother Church! So eager are infidels to reject the faith, on account of the misconduct of some of its degenerate professors! H.—The best of fathers have often very profligate children, as the latter take pride in the honours of their family, and expect to obtain the same without trouble. Grot.

Ver. 23. People. They could not refrain from complaining of the iniquity of his children, how much soever they might revere him. Though he was not a witness himself of their abominations, such an uproar must have convinced him that they were guilty. H.—The Fathers in general blame the lenity of the high priest, who ought not only to have rebuked, but also to have put a stop to the crying sins of his sons, by the utmost severity. C.

Ver. 25. Who shall pray for him. By these words Heli would have his sons understand, that by their wicked abuse of sacred things, and of the very sacrifices which were appointed to appease the Lord, they deprived themselves of the ordinary means of reconciliation with God; which was by sacrifices. The more, because as they were the chief priests, whose business it was to intercede for all others, they had no other to offer sacrifice and make atonement for them. Ch.—We need not, however, consider the words of Heli as an oracle of God. Sanchez.—In human transactions, a person would find more difficulty in obtaining pardon, when the judge himself had received the injury. Sept. instead of appeased, have “and they shall pray for him.” M.—Some may be found to plead his cause, but if he offend the judge, who will undertake to be his advocate? What medicines shall be used, when those, which God has appointed, are trodden under foot? H.—By persevering in such wickedness, no redress can be expected: and indeed, the infinite distance between God and man, would place an insuperable obstacle to a reconciliation, if Jesus Christ had not undertaken the cause even of the most desperate sinner. C.—Because the Lord would slay them. In consequence of their manifold sacrileges, he would not soften their hearts with his efficacious grace, but was determined to destroy them. Ch.—They had filled up the measure of their crimes; and, though God wills not the death of a sinner, they had treasured up to themselves wrath, which he will now display. We might also translate ci, “therefore,” (Noldius. Ose. 9:15, &c.) or “that.” They would not be convinced that the threat of their father would be executed. Schmid. C.—Sins directly against God, and which hinder his service, are remitted with greater difficulty, though to all true penitents pardon is promised. Ezech. 33. God did not take away the free will of Ophni and Phinees, but left them to their own obstinacy, and justly punished them. See S. Aug. c. Jul. v. 3. W.—They had already rendered themselves unworthy of extraordinary graces. T. S. Tho. 1 p. q. 23, n. 3.

Ver. 26. And men. Thus he is, in some degree, compared with our Saviour. Luke 2:52. When one minister prevaricates, God presently raises up another, so that he never abandons his Church. H.

Ver. 27. A man. His name is unknown. Some say it was Elcana, Samuel or an angel, &c. The Rabbins suppose that Phinees performed this office. But he was long ago dead, (C.) or he would still have enjoyed the high priesthood instead of Heli.—Father’s. Aaron was the chief both of the house of Eleazar and of Ithamar, and was selected by God to be his ambassador and priest. H.—His posterity held the high priesthood till after the reign of Herod.

Ver. 28. Ephod, and all the pontifical attire. H.—The high priest wore a different sort of ephod from that of other people. C.—All the, &c. Even of the holocausts, the priests received the skin. M.

Ver. 29. Away, by scandalizing the people, and causing them to neglect offering the appointed victims. H.—To eat. Heli seems to have refrained from divesting his sons of their high office, that the riches of his family might not be impaired. C.—Avarice is the root of many evils, and those who seek to become rich fall into many snares. Poverty soon overtook the descendants of Heli, while the immediate perpetrators of the wickedness were punished with death. H.

Ver. 30. Ever. God had promised the priesthood to Aaron's seed (C.) as long as the Jewish religion should subsist. H.—He had also selected the branch of Eleazar, to recompense the zeal of Phinees; (Num. 25:13,) and yet we find that the house of Ithamar had possession for a time of the high priesthood. We know not when or by what means by obtained it. The promises of God to them were surely only conditional; and some think that they only meant, that as He had permitted them to acquire this high dignity, so it was an earnest that he would not deprive them of it, unless they proved unworthy. But it is generally supposed that God had expressed his determination of this head. Heli, Achitob, Achias, Achimelech, and Abiathar, (C.) were the only pontiffs of the family of Ithamar. The last was obliged to resign to (H.) Sadoc, under the reign of Solomon, 3 K. 2:27. Some suppose that Heli usurped this dignity, (Capel) when he entered upon the civil administration, as the people thought none more fit for the office, in a time of trouble. Bertram.—Others think that the descendants of Eleazar forfeited this honour by their crimes or indolence, or because they were not of sufficient age. But this reason would not have excluded them for ever. The Scripture, therefore, insinuates that Heli was appointed by God, and that his descendants would have enjoyed his office, if they had not offended. C.—These promises were of a conditional nature both to Phinees and to Heli, and Sadoc, v. 35. See Num. 25. &c. H.—God never changes. M.

Ver. 31. Arm, strength or children. I will slay some; others I will reduce to extreme want. Some explain it of the ark, which was the protection of Israel. C.—Old man, to govern. D.—It is often a title of dignity. But the four succeeding pontiffs did not live long. In the course of little more than 100 years, the last was deposed. C.

Ver. 32. Thy rival. A priest of another race. This was partly filled when Abiathar, of the race of Heli, was removed from the priesthood, and Sadoc, who was of another line, was substituted in his place. But it was more fully accomplished in the New Testament, when the priesthood of Aaron gave place to that of Christ. Ch.—Some suppose that this rival was Samuel, in whom this prediction was partly fulfilled, though more completely in Christ. Bede, q. M.—Heli saw not in person the exaltation of Eleazar's family. Heb. and other version are very much embarrassed here. C.—Prot. "and thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation, in all the wealth which God shall give Israel.” H.

Ver. 33. Spent. Hence we may learn to adore the depth of God’s judgments, who knows how to punish both in life and death.—Part. Sept. “the most exalted of thy house shall fall by the sword of men.”

Ver. 35. Faithful often denotes what shall continue a long time. Isai. 33:16 and 55:3. C.—But in the conduct of Sadoc, we find nothing reprehensible. M.—This faithful priest pointed out the Christian priesthood, as the sequel shews. C.—All days. He shall perform his office. H.—Anointed, king Solomon. M.—The priests of the new law ought always to have Christ in view. C.

Ver. 36. Bread; like the poorest sort of people. M.—Being degraded, they shall ask the other priests to offer sacrifice for them. Heb. “shall bend before him for a piece of silver, and for a morsel of bread.” He shall humbly intreat to be employed as a priest, in order to get a livelihood.—The piece of silver. Heb. agorath, probably denotes the gerah, the smallest coin, or what was given for a day’s wages. Agor means to hire, in Chal. Syr. &c. Hence the Greek, ἀγοράζω, “I purchase.”—Office. The priests served in their turns; (1 Par. 24) so that the descendants of Heli must have been entitled to a subsistence. But whether God punished them, by requiring that they should ask the high priest for this, as for a favour, or this was required of all the inferior priests before they could be employed, or whether, in fine, the descendants of Abiathar were reduced to the condition of Levites, or wholly degraded, we know not. See 4 K. 23:9. Ezech. 44:10. C.—They may petition for a part of the victims which fell to the share of the priests, (M.) and might be eaten by any that was not defiled. H.

Ver. 1. Before. Chal. "in the days of Heli." The young Levite slept in an adjoining chamber, to wait on the high priest, not far from the sanctuary.—Precious; that is, rare: (Ch). as such things are generally more esteemed, (H.) which are granted to few. W.—Some prophets had appeared under the former judges: but they were not so common as they were from the days of Samuel, till a little after the captivity. S. Peter ranks Samuel in the first place. Act. 3:24. C.—Vision. No prophet was publicly recognized, to whom the people might have recourse. M.

Ver. 3. Out, towards morning, (C. Ex. 27:20) when some of the lamps were to be extinguished. W.—Samuel slept. Some would transpose these words to the end of the verse, as they think it improbable that Samuel should be in the place where the high priest himself could enter only once a year. Vatab. &c.—But this change seems harsh and unnecessary, as Heli and Samuel might be in apartments contiguous to the holy place. Sanctius. M. C.—During the night none of the priests would be in the sanctuary, so that Heli might form a judgment that not of them had called Samuel. T.

Ver. 7. Him. He had not before an experimental knowledge of the manner in which God revealed his will to men. C.

Ver. 9. Heareth; ready to comply with whatever may be required. H.

Ver. 10. Times, (secundo;) a second time, or repeatedly, or mentioning the name twice, (M.) as God does sometimes in urgent cases. Gen. 22:11. H.

Ver. 11. Tingle, through astonishment and fright. Jer. 19:3. 4 K. 21:12.

Ver. 12. House, by the prophet. C. 2:27.

Ver. 13. Wickedly. Sept. "were cursing God." This is one of the places which the Jews have corrected. D.—Judge; or condemn and punish. Prov. 19:29. C.—Chastise them, not in words only, or in a soft manner, as he had done. Heb. "because his sons made themselves despicable, and he did not frown upon them." H.—Ciha denotes, to correct with a wrinkled face. M.—Aquila, "he did not look black at them," nor avert his eyes with horror. All this iniquity was done publicly, and in his presence; (C.) and he suffered his children to proceed without any restraint. It is not sufficient to reprove, when a father can correct. H.

Ver. 14. Sworn. We read not of an express oath; (C.) but the denunciation of God was equivalent. H.—Iniquity, or punishment. Nothing could withhold the indignation of the Lord, in correcting the sinner, though he would shew mercy eternally to the penitent. But he saw the obstinacy of these priests, and their unhappy end. The sacrifices of the old law always presupposed suitable internal sentiments, to grant the remission of sin; and even for the avoiding of the legal punishments, they must have been offered in a true spirit of religion, which these abandoned wretches despised and neglected. C.—God threatens that he will punish their crimes for ever, as he abominates the contempt of priest. T.

Ver. 15. Slept. Heb. and Sept. “laid himself down to sleep.” For how could he take any rest after such terrible threats? (C.) particularly as light was beginning to appear, when he was called by God, v. 3.—Doors. Some walls had probably been built, to enclose the curtains of the tabernacle. A priest would have been employed to open the sanctuary. C.

Ver. 17. And so. Lit. “May God do these things to thee, and add these also.” It is not certain that he mentioned the particular punishment, (H.) though it is most probable. The Scripture refrains from repeating them. Grot.—Ruth 1:17. C.

Ver. 18. Sight. Some of the Fathers think that these words proceeded from an habitual indifference, as he was not disposed to molest his sons any farther, let the consequences be what they might. S. Greg. S. Ephrem, &c.—But others believe, that Heli was actuated by the spirit of humanity and resignation, and saved his soul. C. See C. 4:18.—Years. The author of the Concord. between the Books of Kings and of Chronicles, thinks Samuel was then 39. D.

Ver. 19. Ground, unfulfilled. This may be understood of the words of the Lord, (C.) which Samuel had announced. His other predictions were constantly verified, so that he was justly regarded as a true prophet. H.

Ver. 20. Faithful. Hebrew Neeman, may be a title of dignity, or may signify that Samuel was confirmed and continued to be a prophet. C.—According to, or by. God revealed his will to him by word, and not by visions. Sanchez.—Israel. The whole people suffered along with their leaders. H.—They were concerned in the prediction which was denounced against the house of Heli. M.—Sept. “and Samuel was entrusted to the prophet of the Lord, to all Israel, from the ends of the earth to the ends: And Heli was very old, and his sons going went forward, and their way was wicked before the Lord.” Thus they usher in the following catastrophe. H.

1 KINGS 4

Ver. 1. And. Heb. inserts here the conclusion of the last verse, whence some would infer that Samuel told the Israelites to make war upon the Philistines. But as it turned out so ill, this would have tended to discredit him; and we find that the Philistines were the aggressors.—Days. this war took place immediately after the threats denounced to Heli; (Sararius) or according to Usher, and the best chronologists, about 27 years after that event. C.—The addition of the Sept. seems to insinuate, that the sons of Heli persevered for a long time in their wicked course. C. 3:20. H.—Josephus says that Phinees was his father’s coadjutor.—Salien observes that this must be considered as a fresh blot in the character of the latter, since he ought to have delivered the delinquents up to execution. Deut. 21:21. Tirin, on the contrary, adduces the power of his sons, and the debilitated state of Heli, to excuse his neglect. H.—Help. In Heb. Eben-ezer; so called, from the help which the Lord was pleased afterwards to give to his people, Israel, in that place, by the prayers of Samuel, C. 7:12. (Ch.) about 21 years afterwards.—Aphec, in the tribe of Juda, not far from Maspha.

Ver. 2. Here, &c. Heb. “in the field” of battle. C.—Sept. “in the ranks, in the field.” H.

Ver. 3. Ancients; the commanders of the respective tribes. Heli was not able to lead on the people to battle, on account of his blindness and great age.—Enemies. All nations attribute much to the exterior marks of religion. The Israelites had witnessed the victories which had been obtained while the ark was present. Jos. 6:4. See Num. 14:45. But they ought to have considered, that their infidelity rendered them unworthy of the divine protection; and that God was more displeased at their profanations, than at the indignity to which the sacred vessels would be exposed. He would know how to vindicate his own honour and glory. The symbols of religion were thus carried in the army, by the Persians, &c. Herod. vii.—The Romans regarded their standards as so many deities. Halicar. vi. See 2 K. 6:21. 2 Par. 13:8. C.—The confidence which the Israelites placed in the ark was commendable, but their sins deserved to be punished. W. Num. 10:35.

Ver. 4. Ark. On this extraordinary emergency they thought it lawful.

Abulensis, q. 6.—They easily obtained the consent of Heli; and his sons went to take it down, and to attend it to the army, as he was incapable of doing duty. We know not what ceremonies were used, nor whether the brothers acted as high priests alternately. C.—Cherubim. The Scripture often represents God in this manner. Ex. 25:22. Ps. 17:10. Ezech. 10:1. The commonality of the Jews attributed bodies to the angels, but to denote that they were not like those with which we are acquainted, they called them cherubim, or complex and unusual figures. C.

Ver. 7. God: “Elohim.” Sept. “these gods.” They speak of the true God according to their false ideas. C.—Sighing. Sept. “deliver us, O Lord, this day.”

Ver. 8. Joy. A few days ago the Hebrews were dismayed, now they shout for joy, as they did at the taking of Jericho. Heb. and Sept. “it was not so heretofore.” H.—Gods. Heb. may be rendered in the singular, with the Chal. and Arab. But the Sept. and most commentators, explain it in the sense of the Vulg. The title of high, (adirim) or magnificent, was given by the Philistines to Dagon, whom they styled Atergatis. C.—Sept. στερεων, means, “stable, perfect,” &c. H.—Plagues, till they were overwhelmed in the Red Sea, which is surrounded with deserts. Some supply, “and (his people) in the desert.” Sept. Syr. &c. C.

Ver. 9. Fight. To serve those whom they had lately oppressed, would be doubly afflicting. Salien.—If these people had seriously attended to the instructions, which they might have derived from the fall of others, they would surely never have exposed themselves to fight against the high God. But they looked upon him in no other light than their own contemptible idols. Homer often represents them as wounded, and conquered by mortal men.

Ver. 10. Footmen. They had no cavalry, (C.) as God seemed to discourage any. H.—Even after Solomon’s time, they had not many horsemen. C.—The Israelites had before lost 4,000: now when they were full of confidence, and fought with valour, they behold 30,000 fall. The ark proved thus fatal to them. H.

Ver. 11. Slain. Abulensis (q. 17,) thinks they were fighting in defence of the ark, when they might have saved themselves by flight; so that he does not despair of their salvation. God permitted them to lose their lives in the exercise of a holy ministry, which they had so scandalously profaned. C.

Ver. 12. Man. The Jews say that Saul carried these melancholy tidings, and that Goliath slew the sons of Heli. H.

Ver. 13. Stool. Heb. cisse; “a throne or tribunal,” where Heli sat to decide any controversies, and where he had blessed the mother of Samuel. C.—God. He had great reason to fear that this was the day when his sons would perish, and he apprehended that the ark would be in danger. H.

Ver. 17. Taken. Every sentence expresses something more distressing to the aged judge and father; the flight and slaughter of his people, the ruin of his children, and the loss of the ark, which must have filled all Israel with a mortal gloom and terror, lest God should have abandoned them. So many dismal circumstances oppressing the heart of Heli, he fainted away, and falling backwards, expired. H.—The Scripture takes notice of his great age, that we might not think that he killed himself in despair. Salien.

Ver. 18. Named the ark, &c. There is great reason, by all these circumstances, to hope that Heli died in the state of grace; and by his temporal punishments, escaped the eternal. Ch.—But many of the Fathers condemn him, and the Scripture says nothing of his conversion, or of that of his children, so that the matter is doubtful. C.—Years. Heb. “and heavy.”—Forty. Sept. “twenty,” in which they are followed by many Fathers. Euseb. Sulpit. &c.—Some reconcile the two texts by saying, that Heli and Samson judged together for twenty years. But the Sept. is probably corrupted, as the other versions agree with the original. C.

Ver. 19. Sudden, through extreme affliction. M.—Josephus says the child was only in his seventh month, but alive. Abulensis thinks he did not long survive his mother.

Ver. 21. Ichabod. That is, Where is the glory? or, there is no glory. We see how much the Israelites lamented the loss of the ark, which was but the symbol of God’s presence amongst them. How much more ought Christians lament the loss of God himself, when by sin they have drove him out of their souls? Ch.—The ark is often called the glory of Israel. Isai. 66:21. Ps. 25:8. Ichabod might remind the people that the greatest loss had been sustained by them, as well as by his family. His mother had both in view the ark, Heli, and Phinees, her husband, (H.) when she exclaimed, ichabod, “Woe! or, Alas! the glory.” Mendoza.—The Scripture does not mention Ophni’s posterity. But besides this posthumous son, Phinees had one elder, who now succeeded Heli in the pontificate, (C. 14:3. Josephus. Salien, A. 2940, A.C. 1113,) while Samuel took possession of the civil administration, and almost totally eclipsed the glory of Achitob. Many of the Fathers have even looked upon him as the high priest. But he was only a Levite, though, by dispensation, he acted sometimes as an extraordinary priest. S. Jerom c. Jov. i. and in 1 Cor. He reduced the people to a sense of their duty, and taught them to trust in the true God alone, and they would be protected, though deprived of the ark. This was also presently restored to them. H.

Ver. 1. Azotus, one of the principal cities of the Philistines. It is astonishing that God permits these infidels to touch the ark, He who resented the conduct of Oza, and of the Bethsamites, with such severity. But the law regarded the Israelites, and the pagans were ignorant of it. C.—The servant, who knows his master will, and does not obey, shall suffer many stripes; and those who have the happiness of professing the true religion, and dishonour it by their immorality, must expect to feel the heavy hand of the judge, much more than ignorant unbelievers. H.—The Philistines could not suppose that they had gained a victory over God, since they knew he might be displeased with the conduct of his people; and they soon began to perceive that they had brought the greatest misfortunes upon themselves.

Ver. 2. Dagon is the same as Derceto, Atergatis, Venus, and the moon, (C.) and was represented like a woman, (T.) as far as the waist, and a fish below. H. Judg. 16:23.—The ark was placed near the idol, out of respect; (C.) or as a trophy of the victory, which they attributed to Dagon. M.—Thus they hung up the arms of Saul in the temple of Asteroth; (C. 31:10,) and David placed the sword of Goliath in the tabernacle.

Ver. 3. Lord, as if to acknowledge his superiority. C.—No sooner was the gospel preached, than the power of the idols began to decrease. Bede. W.

Ver. 4. Threshold. The idol is treated worse the second time. M.

Ver. 5. The stump of, seems to be wanting in Heb. H.—Only the lower part, which resembled a fish, (Dag) was left on its pedestal.—Day. The Philistines themselves established this custom, which was a tacit confession of the imbecility of the idol, which they nevertheless continued to adore. The prophet Sophonias, (1:9,) is supposed to accuse the Jews of imitating this superstition. The ancient Christians, out of respect, kissed the thresholds of the churches of the apostles and martyrs. Prudentius in S. Romano.—The Persians still refrain from treading on those of certain mosques, which are covered with silver. Tavernier 1:5.

Ver. 6. Emerods. The particular disorder which attacked them, (Ps. 77:66,) is very uncertain. Some say it was the dysentery, or the fistula, or the venereal disease, &c. Eusebius believes that it was in punishment of their incontinency. It was very painful, and sometimes proved mortal, v. 12. Aristophanes assures us that the Athenians were punished with a shameful disorder, because they had not received the mysteries of Bacchus with due respect; and they were ordered, by the oracle, to make and carry aloft some obscene figures, before they could obtain a cure. Acharn. ii. 6.—And in, &c. The remainder of this verse is not found in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, &c. nor in many Greek and Latin copies. But it is conformable to the truth of history, since we read that figures of these animals were placed beside the ark, in memory of this event. C. 6:6.—Mice, or rats. Such vermin have often obliged people to abandon their country. Plin. viii. 28.—Bellon. (ii. 78,) testifies that he saw, near Gaza, such multitudes, as to depopulate whole fields; and, if Providence had not caused the birds, called boudres, to destroy them, the people could not have had no harvest.

Ver. 7. God. The ark was terrible to this idol, as the relics of S. Babyas were to Apollo. W.

Ver. 8. Lords, next in dignity to a king, like the Persian surena. Judg. 3:3 and 16:5.—About. Heb. “and they answered, let the ark ... be carried unto Geth,” in which sense the Sept. seem to have taken it. But the Vulg. is more natural. Theodoret (q. 10,) concludes, that the people imagined the mortality proceeded from some natural cause; (C.) otherwise it would have been very absurd to give such advice, as the ark would spread the contagion throughout the country, by being removed. From Geth it was sent to Accaron, when the magistrates of the city objected to its being admitted, v. 10. Josephus says, however, that it visited all the five principal cities, as if to punish them for their impiety. H.

Ver. 9. Came upon, to punish, as on other occasions, to protect. Ezech. 1:3 and 13:9. M.—Parts. Lit. “Their lower intestines coming out, rotted,” as v. 6. H.—Heb. “their malady was concealed.” Grot.—The emerods attacked them inwardly, with the most excruciating pains, for which they could find no remedy.—Skins. The ancients knew no greater luxury. Homer, Odys. i. and iii. The Heb. &c. take no notice of this particular; and there are many other omissions in the Books of Kings, which have been supplied from the Sept. C.—The skins were used instead of breeches, and to hold up the plaster and other medicines. T.

Ver. 12. Die, at the sight of the ark, as the Bethsamites did afterwards. M.

1 KINGS 6

Ver. 2. Diviners. The priests generally pretended to a knowledge of magic, among the pagans. C.

Ver. 3. If, &c. The lords were already determined to send back the ark. But the priests knew that some still would not believe that it was the cause of their affliction. To convince all, they try an experiment, which would decide the matter; and in case the ark went back, some suitable presents must accompany it, as a propitiation (H.) for the sin which they would not (M.) then doubt had been incurred. H.—Though God stands in need of nothing, all must acknowledge their dependence on him. The pagans always made some present, when they appeared before their idols or monarchs, and God requires the like testimony of submission. Ex. 23:15.

Ver. 5. Provinces. Heb. seranim, “lords.”—Emerods. Theodoret observes, that the tombs of the martyrs were adorned with figures of eyes, &c. in gratitude for their having procured redress for the afflicted.—Israel, whose ark you have treated in an improper manner. C.—You shall thus confess that He chastises, and grants health. M.—Gods. Not only Dagon, but the other idols, were humbled, (H.) though the Heb. word denotes also one god, or princes, &c.

Ver. 6. Hearts. Even these confess that obduracy proceeds from men; (W.) though Calvin would make God the author of it. H.

Ver. 7. New cart. It would have been deemed irreverent to use one that had been employed for other profane purposes, 2 K. 6:3.—Home. All these circumstances tended to prevent the ark from being conveyed home, (C.) unless Providence interfered.

Ver. 8. Box. Heb. argaz, (which the Sept. retain. H.) means also “a purse or basket.” C.—Josephus (vi. 1,) says, “the box was placed upon the ark.” H.—We do not read what became of these presents afterwards: but it is supposed that they were kept in the sanctuary till the time of the captivity. C.

Ver. 9. Way. Josephus observes, that they stationed the kine at three lane ends; (H.) and, as we may infer from the Heb. (v. 12,) rather with their heads turned from Bethsames. But, by this conduct, did they not tempt God? Some believe that He inspired them on this occasion, (E.) that even his enemies might be convinced, (H.) the grace of prophecy being frequently granted to wicked men, like Balaam: others believe that He gave success to their plan, though it was dictated by superstition. Even the devil sometimes speaks the truth. Mendoza. C.—People frequently use to pitch upon signs, to which God often assented. Prov. 16:33. M. Gen. 24:14. H.

Ver. 13. Wheat, about Pentecost, in May; so that the ark must have been taken in November. M.

Ver. 14. Bethsamite, not the renowned general. C.—Stone, which served instead of an altar. M.—Lord. Some pretend that the lords of the Philistines followed so far, and offered this holocaust, as the cart belonged to them: but the Bethsamites might suppose that they had abandoned their property, as well as the golden figures; and, as the city belonged to the priests, it is most probable that they would perform this office. Males indeed were to be offered in the tabernacle. But this was an extraordinary case; so that, if there were no priests, the sacrifice might be lawful (C.) by dispensation, as we see Samuel and Elias did the like. H.—The kine and cart being consecrated to God, it was thought that they could not be turned to a more suitable purpose. C.—The ark was also present, on account of which, sacrifices were offered in the tabernacle. The arguments of Abulensis, (q. 19,) who accuses the Bethsamites of sin on this account, are not therefore satisfactory. M.

Ver. 15. Vessels. Prot. less properly, “jewels of gold.” H.

Ver. 16. Day. It was distant about 18 miles. C.—Provinces. Heb. “lords.” Some think that only five images of each sort were inclosed in the box: others suppose that the people of each village presented a golden mouse, to satisfy their own devotion, and that they might not be infested with such vermin. Clarius thinks they also sent an equal number of the other images of the anus. C. v. H.

Ver. 18. Abel. A stone or rock, on which the Jews say Abraham had offered sacrifice; (S. Jer. Trad. T.) Heb. “or mourning,” was so called afterwards, on account of so many being slain; (M.) so the place, to which the Egyptians accompanied the remains of Jacob, was styled “Abol,” the mourning of Egypt. Gen. 50:11. H.—The Sept. read Abon, “the stone.” All the towns belonging to the Philistines, as far as this place, sent each their golden images, or contributed towards those which were presented by the five lords.—Which, ark, according to the Vulg. though some would explain it of the stone. The ark might remain here for some time, and would probably have continued longer, if the people had not been so much afflicted. In the mean time, this record may have been written, as it was afterwards inserted in this book. C.—Which, though of the feminine gender, is referred to stone, because Abol is of that description, (M.) and we find several such allusions to the Heb. in our version. Prot. “unto the great stone of Abel, whereon they set down the ark of the Lord, which stone remaineth unto this day,” &c. H. Vatab. &c.—Others think that the ark remained there till it was removed to Cariathiarim. C. 7:1. Malvenda says, the memory of the transaction was fresh till the author wrote; while others maintain, that the golden figures continued with the ark till that time. C.—The Roman Sept. omits the words till this day; and reads, “where they placed upon it (the stone) the ark ... upon the stone in the field,” &c. Then with the Alex. copy, and Procopius, &c. it subjoins 19. “And the sons of Jechonias did not approve, among the men of Bethsames, that they saw the ark of the Lord, and he slew of them 70 men, and 50,000 of the people.” Theodoret suspects that they were more impious than the rest. But we might as well say that they shewed more (C.) reverence, as we may explain slew them, to denote the two curious citizens, (H.) if any dependence could be had on this addition. C.

Ver. 19. Seen; and curiously looked into. It is likely this plague reached to all the neighbouring country, as well as the city of Bethsames. Ch.—For we need not suppose that all these deaths took place in one day. The ark seems to have continued there for some time, v. 18. Heb. “because they had looked into, or at the ark.” H.—It was unlawful, even for the Levites, to touch or to look at the ark uncovered; (T. Num. 4:15, 20,) and the Heb. expression into, is often taken in this sense. Prov. 7:15 and 11:4.—Men of rank. S. Greg. &c. “Ancients.” Chal. Some would suppose that only these 70 perished, and were of as much value as 50,000 of the common people: for they will not allow that the latter number was slain. Out of that number, 70 were made victims of the divine justice. T. Sa.—Bochart translates, “he slew 70 out of 50,000.” The Syr. and Arab. read, “5070 men.” Josephus only admits 70 who were slain, “because they dared to touch the ark with their profane hands, as they were not priests.” Heb. “and he slew of the people 70 men, 50,000 men. C.—Kennicott seems to suspect that a cipher has been added in the Heb. at the end. Prot. “50,000, and threescore and ten men.” H.—Some would insert aderant in the Vulg. and 50,000 “were present.” D.—The Chal. Sept. &c. constantly retain these numbers, and we must not judge of God severity by our feeble reason. C.—This decision is the most common.

M.—The people had indulged their curiosity, to see whether the Philistines had taken the tables of the law out of the ark, &c. Serarius. —As the ark was terrible to the infidels, so it was also to those true believers, who treated it with disrespect. W.

Ver. 20. Us. These words may denote that they thought God too severe, or else, that they judged themselves unworthy of his presence. There is no proportion between an offence of God, and what the creature can do to make him satisfaction. C.

Ver. 21. Up. This is the import of the Heb. The Vulg. reducite, “bring it back,” insinuates, that the Bethsamites desired the people of Cariathiarim to convey the ark to their city, on the road to Silo, where they probably thought it ought to be placed, in the tabernacle. But it seems God ordered it otherwise, and the ark was never restored to its former splendid station, surrounded with all the vessels and ornaments of the tabernacle. David made something similar, and place an altar before it, while the Mosaic tabernacle and altar were removed from Silo to Nob, (C. 21:1) and afterwards to Gabaon. 2 Par. 1:5. Salien (A. 3030) doubts not but they were thence translated to Solomon’s temple, during the octave of the dedication, along with those of David, from Mount Sion. 2 Par. 5:2 and 8:3. Why the ark was not placed in this most magnificent abode, but removed from the stone of Abel to the houses of Abinadab, of Obededom, of David in Sion, till all the original ornaments, prescribed by God to Moses, with a still more splendid apparatus, met to adorn the temple of Solomon, we cannot easily explain. Perhaps it might be to render that event more glorious, and to represent the troubled state of the Jewish Synagogue, immediately preceding the appearance of the great Redeemer, who would establish a church without spot or wrinkle, shining brighter than the sun, and replenished with all heavenly graces. H.—Cariathiarim is the same place as Cariathbaal, and Baala, (Jos. 15:9, 60.) Baalim Juda, (2 K. 6:2) and Sedeiarim, about ten miles from Jerusalem. Gabaon was “a hill,” (C.) belonging to the same city, where the house of Abinadab stood; (H.) and Nob was also in the vicinity, while Silo was much farther north. C.—The priests still remained, and offered sacrifice in the tabernacle, though occasionally some of them might come to offer extraordinary victims before the ark, in those private houses which were thus converted, as it were, into the holy of holies. Salien, A. 2941, where he observes from S. Jerom, that the tabernacle was removed to Nob about the same time as the ark was deposited at Cariathiarim; and no doubt both the translations were in consequence of the divine command, signified by the mouth of his prophet Samuel. H.

Ver. 1. In Gabaa. That is, on the hill, for Gabaa signifieth a hill. Ch. 1 Par. 13:6.—It was perhaps the citadel, (H.) or an elevated situation, such as were generally chosen for the temples both of the true and of false gods. C.—Abinadab was a Levite of renowned virtue. M.—The people of this city knew that the ark was a source of blessings to those who received it with respect; and, that the Bethsamites had been punished only for their irreverence. W.—Samuel was first consulted before the people, in a body, undertook to remove the ark; and here he was probably recognized for the judge of Israel, in which character he henceforward appears, exhorting all to obey the Lord with sincerity. He appoints a general assembly at Masphath, to enter into a solemn covenant with the Lord, and to adopt means for recovering their liberty. We have only a very concise account of these important transactions, owing to the modesty of the author, which the Holy Spirit would teach us to imitate. C.—Sanctified. Chal. “set over,” (M.) prepared by suitable purifications, &c. C.—Some think, that Eleazar received the priestly or the Levitical consecration, Num. 8:7. We have no proof that he was of the family of Aaron, nor does his name occur in the genealogies of the Levites, as they are perhaps too short. Josephus (vi. 2.) asserts that he was a Levite. C.—But even a laic, like Obededon of Geth, might have been the guardian of the ark, as he would not have to touch it. Salien, A.C. 1112.—Eleazar had two brothers, who acted in the same capacity when David intended to remove the ark to Sion. At that time he was perhaps dead, or decrepit, as his father might be on this occasion. H.—It is not improbable but they were of the race of Aaron. T.

Ver. 2. Year. Some would date all the subsequent events from this period. But is it credible that Samuel should neglect for twenty years to make this exhortation to the people? and how will it be true, that God humbled the Philistines during the whole time (C.) of his administration, which perhaps (H.) only lasted so many years? (v. 13.) C.—It is more probable, therefore, that the power of the enemy was broken by the destruction caused by the presence of the ark, which kept them under due restraint for along time; and when they attempted, once more, to molest the Israelites, they were entirely discomfited by a miraculous storm, at the prayer of Samuel, v. 10. Salien (A. 2960) allows, that this took place in the twentieth year since the ark came to Cariathiarim, in which year Samuel appointed his children judges at Bersabee, though he continued to act, and was judge for twenty-three years, (some say thirty-eight) and even under the reign of Saul had almost an absolute sway, as the prophet of the Lord. H.—Rested: continued steadfast, (Sanctius) “cried unto,” (Pagnin) “Looked (H.) or returned,” Sept. “Lamented after the Lord.” Heb. M.—They were not soon induced to break this solemn covenant. Isai. 7:2. T.

Ver. 3. Saying. When the ark was translated, (C.) and on many other occasions, this was the theme of his discourse to the Israelites, pressing them to cease from doing evil, and to perform good works. H. —Thus he preached every year in the different cities. v. 16. Lyran.—Astaroth. These were the principal idols of the country, (Salien, Judg. 2:11) under which all the others were included. M.—Prepare. God lays this injunction upon us, to remind us of our liberty, and we beg that he would convert us, acknowledging the necessity of his grace. C. —“God does not require impossibilities, but by his command, admonishes thee to do what thou canst, and to pray for what thou art not able to perform, and he assists thee, that thou mayst be able to perform it.” C. Trid. vi. 11. S. Aug. &c.

Ver. 5. Masphath lay south of Jerusalem, (C.) and was a convenient place for all to meet at. M. They came armed, and the Philistines (C.) suspecting their designs, proceeded to attack them. H.

Ver. 6. Lord, having purified themselves with it. Ex. 19:24. Others think that it was a kind of a protestation, that they were willing to perish if they proved faithless; (Sa.) or a symbol that they rejected every vestige of idolatry, and every sin, with true repentance. Sanctius. T.—Water was also the most ancient species of libation, before honey, and afterwards wine were adopted. Porphyrius.—Though the law did not prescribe it, there was not prohibition. On the last day of the feast of tabernacles, the people went to the pool of Silo to fetch water, and to pour it out in the temple, as a libation to the Lord; and it is thought that Jesus Christ alludes to this custom, Jo. 7:24. Lamy. Introd. See 2 K. 23:16. C.—Fasted. They confess their sins and do penance, while Samuel sits as judge, (Salien) and had been endeavouring for twenty years to excite them to repentance, and to adhere to the one true religion. T.

Ver. 8. Philistines. Those who distrust their own strength, and join true repentance with prayer, striving to interest the friends of God in their cause, may confidently hope for victory. H.

Ver. 9. Suckling lamb. Any might be used, when eight days old, except for the paschal lamb, which must be older; a yearling. Ex. 23:9. Lev. 22:27.—Offered it, either by the hands of the priests, or by dispensation, which authorized him to sacrifice out of the tabernacle. —Whole, without blemish; (Eccli. 46:19) or, not having time to divide it, according to the ritual. Lev. 1:12. He consumed even the skin. Salien.—Sept. “with all the people.”

Ver. 10. Israel. The princes of the Tyrians had come to the assistance of the enemy; (Eccli. 46:21. C.) but all in vain. The greatness of the army only increased the greatness of the carnage, when the Lord enters the lists. H.—the sacred penman speaks with great modesty of this victory, which is nevertheless one of the most important recorded in Scripture. The Philistines could not recover themselves for 20 years; they found it necessary to restore the cities which they had taken, (C.) to relinquish the tribute, and to come to such conditions as Samuel imposed upon them. He suffered them, however, to keep possession of some strong holds, such as Gabaa, from which they were expelled by Jonathan. Salien says in the 22d year of Samuel, and the last of Achitob, the high priest, A. 2961.

Ver. 11. Bethchar, “the house of the penetrator.” Cor denotes the celestial fluid, which the Philistines probably supposed was discharged by the heavens, independently of the great Creator. Hence their punishment was very appropriate. Parkhurst.—The latter heathens always represented their Jupiter armed with thunder and lightning—

“The thunder roared aloud—
Th’ affrighted hills from their foundation nod,
And blaze beneath the lightning of the God;
At one regard of his all-seeing eye,
The vanquish’d triumph, and the victors fly.”
Pope, Iliad xvii. 596.

Ver. 12. Sen, “the tooth,” a craggy rock of that appearance. Syr. Beth Jasan. C.—some take it to be the same with Bethchar. Malvenda.—It was before ignoble, (Salien) and the situation not known, till this monument was erected, with the inscription, Thus far, &c.—Help; “Aben-ezer,” mentioned before, C. 4:1. The religious monuments were not prohibited by the law. Lev. 26:1. Samuel would take every precaution that they should not become objects of idolatry, as he was under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit. C.

Ver. 13. Any more, for a long time, (M.) during Samuel’s administration; for we find them again attacking Saul. C. 13. This expression is often used to denote a cessation of some continuance. Isai. 23:12, 15. 2 K. 7:10.

Ver. 14. Geth, which two cities still continued in their possession. Others, which had fallen to the share of Dan, they gave up, which explains Judg. 18:1, 31.—Philistines. Here ended the forty years’ servitude. C.—Salien (A. 2860) rather thinks that it terminated in the death of Samson, when it was judged expedient to entrust the reins of government into the hands of an ole man, Heli, the high priest, as there was no need of an expert general, the heads of the Philistines being all destroyed. Judg. 13:1. H.—Amorrhites: the dispersed nations of Chanaan were all dept under. C.

Ver. 15. Life; as sole judge for twenty years, (Gordon. D.) and conjointly with Saul till he died, almost 100 years old, a year or two before the unfortunate king. Saul put him on a level with himself; (C. 11:7) and he continued to be regarded as the oracle of Israel ever since he was about forty years old; (C.) or he did not long survive the election of the new king, (M.) as Tirin, Sanctius, &c. reduce his reign to two years, allowing thirty-eight to Samuel, so that both filled up the space of forty years. Act. 13:20. The life of Samuel, on this supposition, will not much exceed sixty, and he must have come into power in early life. C. 12:2. H.—This verse is no proof that the present book was written long after Samuel's time. D.

Ver. 16. Places. Sept. “in all these holy places.” Some take Bethel to mean the city, where the ark was, (C.) or the holy of holies, in the tabernacle, at Silo, &c. H.—The northern tribes might meet him at Bethel; those on the east of the Jordan, at Galgala, of Benjamin; and the tribes of Juda, Simeon, and Dan, might have an opportunity of hearing the holy prophet, and decide their controversies, at Masphath. C.—Thus Samuel gave an excellent instruction to pastors and governors, to watch over their people. H.

Ver. 17. Ramatha; his native place. His high office would not allow him to remain always near the tabernacle. C. 1:11. and 28. C.—Lord, by his direction, (M.) both to satisfy his own devotion, and that he might consult the Lord when the people wanted advice. C.

1 KINGS 8

Ver. 1. Old. Houbigant would translate, “when he ws growing old,” senesceret, as he supposes he was now nearly sixty, having judged about twenty-five years, and living another twenty as partner with Saul. Prol. lxii. See C. 7:15. H.—Judges, as his delegates in the southern parts of the country. C.—Josephus says one of them was stationed at Bethel. Ant. vi. 3.

Ver. 2. In, or “as far as” Bersabee, from Dan, that is, throughout

Ver. 3. Judgment. Samuel was not to blame, and hence he was not punished like Heli. M.—However, the misconduct of the children of these two judges, in succession, (H.) gave occasion to the people to demand a king, who might not be tempted by bribes. W.—It is surprising that most of the great men who are mentioned in history, had degenerate children. C.—Such were some of David’s sons, as well as Cambyzes, the son of Cyrus, &c. H.—Was it because their fathers were too much taken up with the affairs of state, to watch over the education of their children? or rather, because these young men confided too much on the merits of their family, and took no pains to tread in the footsteps of their parents? C.—“We have here, says Josephus, a manifest proof that children do not always resemble their parents, but sometimes good men spring from the wicked; and on the contrary, the virtuous have an evil progeny.”

Ver. 5. Judge us, in a different manner from what had been hitherto done. H.—By a crying ingratitude, they reject the government of a wise old man, who had rendered them the most signal services. Perhaps the power of Naas, king of the Ammonites, might afford them some pretext for acting as they did. C.—As all, &c. They seem to prefer the dominion of kings, who ruled over the surrounding barbarous nations as they thought proper, (H.) before one who should be tied down to observe the laws, prescribed by God, (M.) in case the Israelites should wish to have a king. Deut. 17. H.—In the East, monarchy was the most ancient form of government. Tacit. Hist. iv. Just. i. “Principio, imperium penes Reges erat.”

Ver. 6. Samuel. Nothing could be more disrespectful to him, nor more ungrateful to God, who had distinguished them from all other nations, and had taken the government upon himself, and appointed the judges as his lieutenants. The foolish Israelites wished to throw off this sweet yoke, and to be ruled in an arbitrary manner, like the infidels, as if God could not otherwise protect them from their enemies.—Lord. Josephus says that he passed the night without food or sleep, and the Lord appeared to him. The will or petition “of the people, filled Samuel with great uneasiness, who on account of his innate justice, did not like the regal power, as being to exorbitant. He rather approved of an aristocracy, as more conducive to the welfare of the people.” Ant. vi. 4. He means such an aristocracy as the Israelites had been accustomed to, under the guidance of men divinely commissioned, whence he elsewhere very properly styles it a theocracy, or “the government of God.” H.

Ver. 7. Thee. “God, in anger, grants a person what he desires wrongfully.” S. Aug.—He permits the people to follow their own plans; and the Hebrews believe, that he gave them Saul to punish them, being well apprised of his proud and cruel nature. Cuneus Rep. C.—Rejected, &c. The government of Israel hitherto had been a theocracy: in which God himself immediately ruled, by laws which he had enacted, and by judges extraordinarily raised up by himself: and therefore he complains that his people rejected him, in desiring a change of government, (Ch). and wishing to appoint their own magistrates. The priests and judges had been commissioned by God. Ex. 19. Deut. 17. W.

Ver. 8. Thee. He comforts Samuel, by observing that it was not so much any fault of his, as the people’s habitual fickle temper, which made them seek for this change. M.

Ver. 9. The right. That is, the manner (mishpat) after which he shall proceed, having no one to control him, when he has the power in his hands. Ch.—He intimates that the kings will frequently act in a tyrannical manner, v. 11. M.—But the holy Fathers observe, that herein they do what is unjust, and contrary to God’s law. S. Gregory remarks, that Achab is punished for taking the vineyard of Naboth, (3 K. 21) while David will not take a piece of ground belonging to Ornan, even for an altar, without first paying a just price for it. 1 Par. 21:25. Some of these rights or customs are prohibited to the king. Deut. 17:16. It is true, kings enjoy great prerogatives above judges, but never contrary to the law. They cannot take their subjects’ goods: but the latter are bound to contribute to the maintenance of government; and, if they refuse, may be compelled. If kings should be guilty of excesses, “yet they are not to be deposed by the people, ... but must be tolerated with patience, peace, and meekness, till God, by his sovereign authority, left in his Church, dispose of them, which his divine wisdom and goodness often deferred to do, as here he expressly forewarneth, (v. 18) because he will punish the sins of the people by suffering evil princes to reign.” Job 34:30. Conc. Later. c. iii. de hæret. W. See S. Thomas, 2. 2. q. 12. a. 2.—We may here also remark, that the people petitioned for a king, yet God made the choice; and, when he proved rebellious, selected another by the hand of Samuel, though he permitted the former to enjoy his dignity till death. C. 13. and 31. H.—Grotius (Jur. i. 1. and 4.) maintains that Samuel here proposes the just rights of the king, and that the prince has a greater right to any one’s personal property, for the public good, than he has himself. In effect, the eastern kings regarded their subjects as slaves. But those who governed the Hebrews were to follow a different conduct; and Samuel is so far from approving of what some of them would do, that he mentions their tyranny, in order to dissuade the people from what they so inconsiderately requested. C.—The misconduct of rulers, is one of the most trying inconveniences to which a nation can be exposed. In such circumstances, “bear, say a pagan historian, (H.) with the luxury and avarice of those who hold dominion, as with other natural evils. There will be vices as long as men subsist, but neither will these continue for ever, and they are compensated by the intervention of better things or men.” Meliorum interventu pensantur. Tacit.—Grotius at last seems to conclude, (Sup. c. iv. p. 97) that the right of the king here specified is only apparent, in as much as it includes “the obligation of making no resistance.” H.

Ver. 11. Chariots; to be drivers, (M.) or will make them fight from them.—Footmen, or guards. Xenophon places 4000 armed with bucklers before, and 2000 with lances all round the chariot of Cyrus. See C. 22:17.

Ver. 12. Centurions, or body-guards. M.—These offices might be honourable, but at the same time disagreeable, when people were forced to accept of them, and to neglect their more pleasing agricultural employment. The multitude of officers increases the expenses of the prince, and falls heavy upon the people. C.

Ver. 14. Vineyards, as Achab did, though he first proposed to buy it.

Ver. 15. Tenth. God had already claimed one tithe, which he had abandoned to his sacred ministers. We do not read that the kings of the Hebrews ever claimed (C.) a second tithe precisely, (H.) though they might have done it by the example of other kings. Lev. 27:30. Joseph had asserted the fifth part of the revenues of Egypt for its monarchs. Gen. 47:26.—Eunuchs. Heb. saris, denotes an officer of the court. It was not lawful for the Israelites to make any eunuchs, but they might employ foreigners.

Ver. 16. Goodliest, in strength (C.) and beauty. M.—Solomon made his people work at his buildings, and David employed an officer in the fields, 1 Par. 27:26. Sept. have read in a different manner, “He will tithe ... your excellent droves of oxen.” C.—They also specify, “the tithe of asses for his work.” H.

Ver. 17. Servants, or slaves. The Hebrews enjoyed greater liberty than any of the nations in the East, yet they are styled slaves. C. 17:8. They were nearly on the same footing as the ancient Germans. “Each governed in his own place of abode. The Lord requires of them a quantity of corn, cattle, or clothing, and so far the slave obeys;” servus hactenus paret. Tacit. Germ. The Hebrews were also bound to follow the king to battle. The Egyptians, Persians, &c. were under greater oppression. Herodotus (iii. 31,) informs us, that when Cambyses designed to marry his own sister, his counsellors replied, that they found no express law to this effect; but there was another, "that the king of Persia may do whatever he please." The highest officers, and even his brothers, were styled, "slaves, Δουλοί, of the great king." Arist. Mund.

Ver. 18. The face, privately; for even groans will not be free. M.—The event justified this prediction, as most of the kings of the Hebrews ruled like tyrants, and what was worse, engaged their subjects in idolatry, and drew down the heaviest judgments upon them. C.—Hear you, so as to deliver you from oppression, though he is always willing to hear those who truly repent. W.

Ver. 19. Over us. The populace is generally inconstant, and fond of changes. M.

Ver. 20. Nations. We are neither better nor worse than the rest. What extravagance! for a people to abandon a state of happiness, and the dominion of God, and to prefer the service of a man! C.—For us. This was the pretext, as Naas threatened them with war. C. 12:12. M.

1 KINGS 9

Ver. 1. Abiel, who is also called Ner. 1 Par. 8:33. Cajetan.—Strong. Heb. "a mighty man of power," either of body, or of riches.

Ver. 2. Goodlier, better proportioned, more handsome, (H.) as the daughters of men are styled good, or fair. Gen. 6:1. People seek for corporal advantages in those who command. The poets always represent their deities and heroes as taller than the rest of men. A king of Sparta was fined for marrying a little woman. Arist. Polit. iv. The Ethiopians give their highest offices to those who have the most engaging appearance. Herod. iii. 20. C.—Little people may be elegant, but never majestic or perfectly beautiful. Arist. Ethic. iv. 3. M.—Choice, is taken in the same sense as goodly, and does not intimate that Saul was one of the elect. Carthus.

Ver. 3. Asses. The greatest noblemen rode upon such. Judges 5:10. A prince of Esau fed asses. Gen. 30:24. Agriculture, and keeping sheep, were the employment of men of the first eminence in the heroic ages, as hunting and other equally laborious exercises are now in fashion. C.

Ver. 4. Salisa, the ancient Segor, (M.) or rather a place 15 miles from Diospolis. Euseb.—Salim, or Sual, not far from Galgal. C. 13:17.

Ver. 5. Suph, where Ramatha, the birth-place of Samuel, was situated. C. 1:1. C.

Ver. 6. Famous. Chal. “honourable.” Sept. “covered with glory.” The observations of a servant may often claim attention. Saul seemed to be less acquainted with this extraordinary personage than his servant. H.

Ver. 7. What. Were they uninformed of the disinterestedness of Samuel? or did they think that he would sell his oracles? By no means. But the manners of the ancients were very different from ours, and people chose to shew their respect for God, the king, prophets, &c. by making them some presents. People still never go to visit one another in Syria without something of the kind, as it would be deemed uncivil or cruel to act otherwise. See 3 K. 14:1. Mic. 3:11.—Bread. They would have made a present of some. Saul received two loaves. C. 10:4. See C. 16:20. Hence we may form some idea of the beautiful simplicity of those ages. People were then forced to carry their own provisions, as there were no inns which supplied any. C.—Present. Sportula means a little basket. H.—But here it is taken for a present, as meat was commonly given. M.—Cyrus sent his friends geese half eaten, from his own table, for greater distinction. Xenop. H.—Heb. “what have we?” Syr. “we have none of our provisions left.” C.

Ver. 8. Silver. About seven-pence English.—Stater, (H.) is put instead of Heb. “sicle.” M.

Ver. 9. A seer. Because of his seeing, by divine light, hidden things, and things to come, (Ch). by inspiration. W.—They had the things which they foretold so clearly in view. The Sybil cries out, Bella, horrida bella.

Et Tiberim multo spumantem sanguine cerno. Virg.

The Egyptians had their “seers of the gods.” Manetho.—Balaam styles himself “the man seeing visions.” Num. 24:4, 16. Some suppose that Samuel wrote this towards the close of his life, when the title of prophet was become more common, though the former was in use many years afterwards. 1 Par. 21:9. 2 Par. 16:10. Others think that this verse was added by Esdras, &c.

Ver. 11. Water, perhaps for the sacrifice. Thus Fab. Victor says, “Rhea, according to the established custom, by which young women went to draw water for the sacrifices, proceeded to the fountain in the grove of Mars.” C.

Ver. 12. A sacrifice. The law did not allow of sacrifices in any other place, but at the tabernacle, or temple, in which the ark of the covenant was kept; but Samuel, by divine dispensation, offered sacrifices in other places. For which dispensation this reason may be alleged, that the house of God in Silo, having lost the ark, was now cast off; as a figure of the reprobation of the Jews. Psal. 77:60, 67. And in Cariathiarim, where the ark was, there was neither tabernacle, nor altar. Ch.—At least that of Moses was in the tabernacle. See C. 6:21. H.—Samuel was just come up to the city, from a place called Naiot, where he instructed some of the prophets., C. 19:19. The maids point him out to Saul; and God, at the same time, reveals to his prophet, that the person who addressed him should be king. C.—The high place. Excelsum. The excelsa, or high places, so often mentioned in Scripture, were places of worship, in which were altars for sacrifice. These were sometimes employed in the service of the true God, as in the present case: but more frequently in the service of idols, and were called Excelsa, which is commonly (though perhaps not so accurately) rendered high places; not because they were always upon hills, for the very worst of all, which was that of Topheth, or Geennom, (Jer. 19) was in a valley; but because of the high altars, and pillars, or monuments erected there, on which were set up the idols, or images of their deities; (Ch). so that they might be called “the high things.” H.—Before Solomon built the temple, from the time that the tabernacle was deprived of the honour of having the ark, people immolated on such heights, 3 K. 3:2. M.—On one of these, at Ramatha, Samuel was going to offer a peace-offering, and to feast with the heads of the city, (C.) or perhaps of the nation, who were expecting the result of his consultation of the Lord, respecting their petition of a king. H.

Ver. 13. The victim, begging the blessing, which was the office of the most honourable person at table, as he also gave thanks for all. C.

Ver. 14. Midst. That is, simply in the city, or entering the gate, where Samuel met them, v. 18.

Ver. 15. Ear, privately. C.—Thus Jonathan promised to give David private information. C. 20:13. H.

Ver. 16. Ruler. Heb. Nagid, “Leader.” Sept. “Archon.” Chal. “King.” The Israelites demanded a king, to lead them, and to fight for them; and Homer (Iliad iii.) gives this idea of the chief magistrate, “a good king and stout warrior,” which Alexander so much admired.—Philistines. They had been repressed by Samuel; but they had begun to gain the ascendancy, so as not to suffer the Israelites to have a blacksmith among them, &c. Saul gained some victories over them, and over the other enemies of his people, towards the beginning of his reign. C. 13. and 14. C.—To me. God threatened that he would not hear them, when they should grow weary (H.) of their king. C. 8:18. But he protects his people against the efforts of their foreign enemies. M.—Oppression of the innocent cries to heaven for vengeance. W.

Ver. 18. Gate. Sept. “city.” Chal. “within the gate,” where business was transacted.

Ver. 19. Place, while Samuel retired, for a while, to his own house. He sends Saul to the assembly, (C.) where he would meet him to dine. H.—Heart, or desirest to know. M.

Ver. 20. Best. The regal power, which all desired. Heb. “to or on whom is all the desire of Israel?” Any great felicity is called a desire, as the Messias, the spouse in the Canticle, 5:16. Ag. 2:8. Sept. “to whom the beautiful things of Israel?”

Ver. 21. Jemini, or Benjamin, which was always one of the smallest tribes, and, since the unfortunate war, still more reduced; so that none of the other tribes could well take umbrage, or be filled with jealousy, when they saw a king selected from it.—Last. Though all were equally noble, yet some families were more numerous, possessed greater riches, or had filled the posts of honour more frequently than others. Nothing can be more charming than the modesty of Saul on this occasion. C.—Happy would he have been, had he continued always to cherish the like sentiments. H.—He and his posterity might then have long enjoyed the regal dignity. C. 13:13. M.

Ver. 22. At the head. Sept. “among the first of those ... seventy men,” which number Josephus also has instead of 30. Saul’s servant was probably an Israelite, who had hired himself for a time. The first place, at the head of the table, was the most honourable. Luke 14:8. The king of Persia placed his most trusty friend at his left hand, and those of the highest dignity, in order at his right. Cyropæd. vii. &c. C.

Ver. 24. Shoulder. It was the left, (M.) as the right shoulder belonged to the priest, and laymen were not allowed to taste of it after it had been offered in sacrifice. Lev. 7:32. Some suppose that Samuel had this right shoulder for his portion. But he was not a priest. C.—This part was assigned to the most eminent man at table; and Josephus calls it “the royal portion.” M.—Heb. “the shoulder, and what was upon it, (or he held it up) and set it (the whole quarter) before Saul.” Aquila, &c. translate “the thigh,” left or reserved. Sept. “laid by.” It was then the fashion to place large pieces of meat before those who were to be most honoured. Gen. 18:6. Homer, &c.—People. Heb. “till now it has been ket for thee, I said, I have invited the people.” He insinuates that he knew of his coming, though it seemed so accidental, even when he invited the company. Sept. “eat, for it is placed before thee, as a memorial, by the people, cut it in pieces.” H.—As the shoulder supports a burden, so the king was reminded to maintain the interests of the commonwealth. M.

Ver. 25. House, probably giving him some instructions respecting his future dignity.—As he, &c. This seems to be a second translation of the former sentence, taken from the Sept. It is omitted in several Latin MSS. C.—Sept. “and he went down from the Bama (perhaps “the steps” or high places, where the sacrifice and feast had been celebrated) into the city; and they made a bed for Saul, on the house top; and he lay down, (26) and when the day dawned, Samuel,” &c. The roofs are flat in those countries, and such an airy situation would be most agreeable in such hot climates. H.—The common people, generally, only spread a mat on the ground, and covered themselves with a sheet; to take their rest, either under a gallery, or in the open air. Homer places his strangers, with their upon the ground under the gallery, which was erected before the house. Aristophanes (in Vespis) mentions the custom of sleeping on the house top. See 2 K. 16:22. C.—Saul had not been educated with the greatest delicacy. M.

Ver. 27. Before us, and. Heb. (“and he passed on,”) agreeably to his master’s order. H.

1 KINGS 10

Ver. 1. Vial, in the form of a lentil. Plin. xviii. 12.—Oil. This anointing seems to have been peculiar to the kings, priests, and prophets of the Hebrews, who prefigured Jesus, the great anointed of God. S. Aug. in Ps. xlv. The custom was very ancient. Judg. 9:8. It is thought that those kings, who succeeded their fathers by their birth-right, and without opposition, did not receive any unction. C.—But the silence of Scripture is no proof on this head; and the Fathers seem to be convinced that the custom subsisted till Christ appeared. S. Just. dial. &c. H.—The Rabbins pretend that the sacred ointment was used for the kings of Juda, but not for those of Israel. It is not probable that it was used for either. Ex. 30:32. 3 K. 1:39. We read that Jehu was anointed king of Israel; (4 K. 9:6,) and we may suppose that common oil was used, in his regard, as well as for the other kings. The perfume or balm of Judea, does not spot the garments on which it may fall.

Plin. xii. 25. It was poured on the head; the Rabbins say in the form of a crown, (C.) or cross. H.—But this is uncertain. The ceremony has been preserved, with respect to Christian kings, who, according to Innocent I, should be anointed on the shoulders and arms, while prelates receive the unction on the head.—Kissed him, out of respect. Ps. 2:12. C.—Behold. Heb. “Is it not because?” &c. H.—And thou ... prince. All this is wanting in the Heb. &c. But it is conformable to the Vat. Sept.; (C.) the Alex. has “to be prince over his people, over Israel? and thou shalt rule over the people of the Lord, and shalt save it from its enemies around;” as we have explained. C. 9:16. H.—Saul was anointed with a small vessel, to signify that his kingdom should not subsist long; and with oil, to remind him of mercy, light, and health to his people. S. Greg. W.

Ver. 2. Rachel, near Bethlehem. Gen. 35:16.—South. Sept. or “mid-day.” Heb. Tseltzach, is very obscure. Some take it for a proper name. C.—Prot. “at Zelzah.” Others for some musical instrument, as if these travellers were “dancing,” as the Sept. insinuate, and playing on musical instruments, like the prophets, v. 5. It does not appear how Saul would come near Bethlehem, in his journey from Ramatha to Gabaa, unless Ramatha lay more to the south than it is represented, which it could not do, being in the tribe of Ephraim; so that we might translate the Heb. “Thou wilt find two men of Zelzelach, a place near the tomb of Rachel, on the borders of Benjamin, and they,” &c.

Ver. 3. Thabor, very distant from the famous mountain (C.) in Zabulon. M.—Bethel. Where there was at that time an altar of God; it being one of the places where Samuel judged Israel, (Ch.) and which had always been considered as a place of devotion, since Jacob had his vision. Gen. 28:19. It lay to the east of Gabaa, so that Saul might easily meet these pilgrims. C.—Wine, for libations, as the other things were for a sacrifice and feast, as well as for presents to the officiating priests.

Ver. 4. Hand. They would be very acceptable to Saul, who had none. The strangers might suppose that they could purchase more at Bethel. C.

Ver. 5. The hill of God. Gabaa, in which there was also at that time, a high place or altar. Ch.—The prophets were not molested by the infidels, in performing their devotions, as people consecrated to the Lord, who do not meddle with war, are privileged by the consent of nations. Grot. Jur. iii. 11. 10. C.—Prophets. These were men whose office it was to sing hymns and praises to God; for such in holy writ are called prophets, and their singing praises to God is called prophesying. See 1 Par. alias 1 Chron. 15:22 and 25:1. Now there were in those days colleges, or schools for training up these prophets; and it seems there was one of these schools at this hill of God; and another at Naioth in Ramatha. See 1 Samuel 19:20, 21. &c. Ch.—The Jews say there were in every city of Judea congregations of this nature. They lived like monks, abstaining, for the most part, from marriage, though some had children, 4 K. 4:1. They had a superior at their head, to whom God frequently revealed future things. The rest were instructed how to explain the prophecies, to compose and sing canticles. Some of them were inspired, like Saul, only for a time. It is supposed that Samuel instituted these colleges, and this is the first time we find them mentioned. C.—They were of infinite service in preserving the true religion. H.

Ver. 6. Spirit of piety. M.—Man. Thou shalt act, and entertain sentiments worthy of a great prince, (C.) and be no longer employed in rustic works. M.—Cape regis animum et in istam fortunam, qua dignus es, istam continentiam profer. “Adopt the sentiments of a king, said the deputies of Alexander to Abdalonymus, but carry along with you this moderation, when you assume the dignity which you deserve to enjoy.” Curtius iv.

Ver. 7. Find. Undertake any enterprise, how difficult soever, which God may propose to thee. C.

Ver. 8. Galgal. Here also by dispensation was an altar of God. Ch.—To do. Saul went thither, after the victory which he had obtained over the Ammonites, when he was confirmed in his dignity. C. 11:14. But the mention of seven days, seems to indicate that Samuel is here speaking of that event, when the war against the Philistines was at hand, and Saul neglected to wait the appointed term, before he ventured to offer sacrifice. C. 13:8. C.—Some think that Samuel engages always to meet him at Galgal, on any important business, within the space of seven days. Serar.—Others translate, “I will be at Galgal with thee, and we will offer sacrifices, for seven days.” C.—Prot. “I will come down to thee to offer burnt-offerings,” &c. which is conformable to the Sept. Indeed Saul was probably blamed for offering the victims himself. H.—Obedience was enjoined him to try his humility. S. Greg. W.

Ver. 11. Prophets. This proverb received a fresh confirmation, when Saul was going to seize David, and was forced by the Spirit to join with the college of prophets, in singing God’s praises. C. 19. ult. H.—It may be applied to those who are unexpectedly raised to a high dignity, or enabled to speak or to do extraordinary things, like the apostles, when they spoke various languages &c. Delrio adag. 178. C.

Ver. 12. Their father. That is, their teacher or superior. As much as to say, Who could bring about such a wonderful change as to make Saul a prophet? (Ch.) but the Lord, whose Spirit breatheth where he will. Jo. 3:8. H.—Sept. “Who is his father? is it not Cis?” The Jews seem to have been in a like consternation, when they observed respecting Jesus, who wrought such miracles, Is not this the carpenter’s son? People are unwilling to reflect, that God can select his instruments and ministers from every profession, and make the tongues of infants eloquent. H.—The spirit of prophecy is a gift of God, not of parents. M.—But a prophet is not without honour, save in his own country. Mat. 13:57. H.

Ver. 13. Place. Returning to his father’s house, after the Spirit had ceased to inspire him, and the prophets had retired home. His relations, suspecting something more than common had been revealed to Saul by Samuel, began to ask him questions: but he had the prudence to keep (C.) his secret to himself, either in obedience to Samuel’s injunction, when he sent the servant before, (H.) or out of humility, (M.) or to prevent the dangers of envy from his own kindred. Josephus.

Ver. 17. Lord, who always presided over such assemblies. This was convened to elect a king, whom God pointed out by lots. Some assert that the ark, and the high priest, in his pontifical ornaments, were present. C.—Adrichomius says Maspha was only three hours’ walk from Cariathiarim. M.

Ver. 19. Families. Lots were first drawn to determine the tribe, then to find out which of the great families, and which house, was to give a king to Israel. H.—See Jos. 7:14. M.—God was pleased thus to convince them that the election proceeded from him. S. Greg. W.

Ver. 21. Metri. We find none of this name, 1 Par. 8:1. It is probably a title which some of the great patriarchs of Benjamin had acquired by shooting, as Metri means “an archer or bowman.” C.

Ver. 22. Home. Heb. “he hath hidden himself among the stuff,” (H.) instruments, or baggage, at Maspath. He acted thus out of modesty, judging himself unfit for the exalted dignity, (C.) and shewed that he did not seek for it. M.

Ver. 23. Upwards. God condescended to gratify the desires of the people, who chiefly regarded the stature and corporal qualifications of their king. “Many nations are accustomed to look with veneration on a majestic person, and think none are capable of great exploits except those whom nature has made very handsome.” Curtius vi. See C. 9:2.

More civilized nations rather consider the qualities of the mind. Alexander, Agesilaus, &c. were not of a majestic stature.

Ver. 24. King. Our favourite song, “God save,” &c. is an amplification of this sentiment. H.

Ver. 25. Before the Lord. It seems that the ark was therefore present. This record of Samuel is lost, so that we cannot determine what laws he prescribed on this occasion. C.—Josephus (vi. 5.) says that he wrote and read in the hearing of all, and in the presence of the king, what evils would ensue under the regal government; and deposited the writing in the tabernacle, that the truth of the prediction might be ascertained. He probably alludes to the denunciation of tyranny, which had been made C. 8. and which he says Samuel repeated on this occasion. But the prophet would also take a copy of the law of the kingdom, prescribed by Moses, (Deut. 17) and deliver it to Saul, that he might make it the rule of his conduct, and not imitate the wicked customs of tyrants. H.—The whole process of this memorable event he would also write down, (M.) as we read it at present in this chapter, placing it in the proper order, as a continuation of the sacred history which Moses and Josue had commenced; and like them, depositing the sacred volume beside the ark, or in the tabernacle. See Jos. 24:26. H.

Ver. 26. Touched; to consider the appointment of Saul, as his act. Afterwards they retired home, and the new king returned to his wonted occupations. The army here denotes part of the assembly, as the young men came with their leaders ready, if called, to march to battle. Ex. 6:26. Deut. 20:9. C.

Ver. 27. Belial; seditious men, perhaps of the tribe of Ephraim, (Judg. 12) or of Juda, to whom the regal power seemed to belong. Gen. 49. Salien.—Presents, in testimony of their submission. See Judg. 3:15. 3 K. 4:21. The eastern kings still expect that ambassadors should bring noble presents, otherwise they deem themselves insulted. P. Martyr.—Subjects dare not appear before their king, in Thrace, without some such offering. Xenophon, Anab. vii. &c. C.—Not. He knew that the throne is established by mercy. Prov. 20:28. Hence he chose to pardon these discontented people after he had obtained the victory, and was even solicited to make an example of them. Salien, A. 2962.—Severity might have alienated the minds of many, as he was hardly yet confirmed in his dignity, and the war against Ammon was threatening. M.

Ver. 1. After this. So far is omitted in the Heb. &c. but we find it in most editions of the Sept. and in Josephus. C.—Fight. He had threatened an invasion before, and had perhaps (H.) attacked some of the tribes on the east side of the Jordan, and treated them with the same cruelty as he intended for those of Jabes, which was a city of the first consequence. Josephus, vi. 5.—Naas, “a serpent.” There was a king of this country of the same name, in the days of David. The people had been quiet since Jephthe had made such havoc among them, about ninety years before. Judg. 11. C.—Covenant. They were willing to pay him tribute. But it seems they had offered him some insult, which made the king resolve to punish them more severely. They make no mention of Saul, as they did not wish to let the king know of his election; (Salien) and perhaps had no great confidence in him, (H.) as he was not yet fully confirmed in his dignity, (C.) and had let a whole month pass without taking any measures for the deliverance of his country, though it was on that pretext that he was elected. H.—They considered what had passed as of no consequence. C. 12:12.

Ver. 2. Eyes: strange proposal! He would not render them quite blind, that he might not be deprived of their service. But he wished to render them unfit for war, (C.) as the buckler covers the left eye; (Josephus) and people who shoot with bow and arrow, keep it closed. C.

Ver. 3. Days. We have examples of similar requests in history. Grot. Jur. iii. 23. See Judith 7:23.

Ver. 4. Of Saul. Sept. “to Saul,” which may remove the surprise of Abulensis, that the king is not mentioned. Salien.—Saul was absent at the time, so that they made known the threatening danger to the people.

Ver. 5. Field. So David fed sheep, even after he was anointed king. The ancients had very different sentiments of royalty from what we have. Their kings and great men did not esteem it beneath them to cultivate the earth. Several of them wrote on the subject.

Jura dabat populis, posito modo prætor aratro, Pascebatque suas ipse Senator oves. Ovid, Fast. i.

Many of the most eminent Roman generals were taken from the plough. C.—Xenophon introduces the younger Cyrus, saying, “Many of these trees were planted with my own hands.” Cicero. Senect. 17.

Ver. 6. Spirit of fortitude, prudence, and zeal. H.

Ver. 7. Oxen, with which he had been ploughing.—Pieces. Heb. does not say that he sent them; and Josephus intimates, that he only “hamstrung them, and sent messengers,” &c. H.—But such actions are far more impressive than words. See Judg. 19:29. Act. 21:10. &c. C.—Samuel. Saul adds the name of the prophet, as the people had still great confidence in him, and he always acted as God’s envoy. H.—Oxen. He does not threaten capital punishment, but insinuates that both duty and interest require the presence of all. Salien.—Of the Lord; that is, a great fear: (C.) or, God moved the people to shew a ready obedience and reverence to their king’s commands.

Ver. 8. Bezec, where Adonibezec had reigned, (Judg. 1. M.) near the place where they crossed the Jordan, a little below Scythopolis, to go to Jabes, which was about thirty miles distant. C.—Thousand. Josephus makes the army consist of 770,000, who were collected at Bala. Sept. have 600,000 of Israel; and they agree with this author, in allowing also 70,000 to Juda alone. But this is a larger army than what came out of Egypt, and exceeds the limits of probability, unless all assembled, as the preceding verse seems (H.) to insinuate; (M.) and we find far greater numbers, 2 Par. 13:3, 17, if no (H.) error have there crept in. Kennicott.

Ver. 9. Hot. Josephus says, Saul “being seized with the divine spirit, ordered them to inform the citizens of Jabes, that he would come to their assistance on the third day, and rout the enemy before the sun arose.” But the message of which the Scripture here speaks, (H.) was sent from Bezec. Saul, in effect, came upon the Ammonites unawares before it was light, gained a complete victory, (C.) and then pursued the fugitives till noon.

Ver. 10. To you, Naas, (H.) which they speak in irony, and that the enemy may be off his guard. C.—We must thus deceive our passions, that we may not be blinded (H.) or slain by them. S. Greg. v. 1. in Reg. W.

Ver. 11. Camp. It was not then customary to throw up any fortifications, but only to place sentinels in all the avenues.—Watch, which ended at sunrise. C.

Ver. 12. Them. It seems there were but few discontented persons. Salien.—They address themselves to Samuel, who they knew had not regarded their request of a king with approbation, as if to give him a little mortification. But he makes a proposal of confirming the election with still greater solemnity, if they persevered in their resolution, (H.) as he intimated they might still recede, (C.) and be content with the former mode of government, as being far better. H.

Ver. 15. They made. Sept. “and there (again the prophet; Josephus) Samuel anointed Saul king.” The same ceremonies as had been used before, except the casting of lots, were here repeated, particularly the solemn anointing, (Salien) whence, in the following chapter, (5:3) Saul is styled the anointed. M.—The Lord. His ark was probably present, and the priests to offer victims. Salien, A. 2963.

1 KINGS 12

Ver. 1. You. He speaks with the authority of a prophet, (C.) and takes this opportunity to draw from the whole people a confession of his integrity, that the kings might follow the pattern which he had set them. H.

Ver. 2. Goeth, as your leader, according to your request. I am like a private man, (C.) willing to submit to his and the people’s judgment, (H.) though it could not be required. M.—Grey-headed. This he might be at the age of sixty, which most chronologers allow him, (H.) as he had been at the head of affairs from his early years, in most difficult times. T.—With you. As soon as I heard of your complaints, I deprived them of their power, so that you cannot blame me from their misconduct. If they were guilty, they may stand their trial before the king. C.

Ver. 3. Anointed, “Christ,” as the anointing of kings prefigured that of the Messias, which, in Hebrew, has the same import as the word χριστος has in Greek. C.—Wronged. Lit. “by calumny,” or by any other mode of oppression. H.—Despise. Heb. “hide my eyes,” through confusion. C.—Prot. “to blind my eyes therewith.” H.—Sept. have read nalim, “shoes,” instead of anlim. C.—“Have I taken from the hand of any one a preset, to render me favourable, so much as a shoe? (upodema, or latchet) answer against me,” &c. H.

Ver. 6. Made, and appointed them to rule the people. Jerem. 37:15. Le Clerc.—Egypt. Sept. add, “is witness;” and some Latin copies have, “is present.” C.

Ver. 7. Stand up, like people cited to the bar. Having undergone his own trial with applause, Samuel shews that the people will not come off so well at the tribunal of God, whom they had treated with greater disrespect, injustice, and ingratitude than they had himself, as he convinced them by an astonishing and terrible storm. H.—Kindness. Sept. “justice,” as the same Heb. word implies both. God had treated his people with mercy and with justice (C.) alternately. H.

Ver. 9. Hasor. See Judg. 4:1.—Moab. Jephthe delivered the people from the hands of the Ammonites, who claimed all that country. Judg. 11:15. Eglon had been slain by Aod, before the Chanaanites enslaved Israel. C.

Ver. 11. Jerobaal and Badan. That is, Gedeon and Samson, called here Badan or Bedan, because he was of Dan. Ch. Chald. &c. W.—Others think that Jair, (Judg. 10:3. Junius, Usher,) or, according to the Sept. “Barac,” are designated. Jair was a descendant of one Bedan, 1 Par. 2:21. C.—But we do not read that Jair performed any great exploit. H.—Samuel. He speaks of himself as of any other man: as the interests of God were not to be betrayed by an unseasonable modesty. C.—Josephus only specifies Jephthe and Gedeon. H.—The Israelites thought that they could dispose things better than God had done under the judges; and hence their sin is so often repeated. S. Greg. W.

Ver. 13. Desired. S. Aug. (in Ps. li.) considers this as a kind of sarcasm. C.—You will see what advantages you will derive from your choice. M.

Ver. 14. Of the Lord, causing him to look upon you and treat you with indignation. C.—Sept. “and do not contend with the mouth,” or against the orders of the Lord, which cannot fail to excite his displeasure. M.—If you prove faithful under this new form of government, though it be less agreeable to God, he will still protect you. H.

Ver. 15. Fathers. Sept. “king,” v. 25. Superiors (W.) are often styled fathers. Syr. &c. “as upon your fathers,” (C.) which is adopted by the Prot. “as it was against,” &c. H.

Ver. 17. Wheat-harvest. At which time of the year it never thunders or rains in those countries. Ch.—The wheat-harvest is towards the end of June. The usual seasons for rain are only spring and autumn. S. Jerom in Amos iv. 7, &c.—Thunder. Lit. “voices.” Ps. 17:14. C.—See. Being fully convinced by the miracle, which declares the will of God in the clearest manner. Though God was pleased thus to manifest his displeasure, at the people’s assuming to themselves the right of changing the established form of government, by insisting so much upon having a king at this time, we cannot hence infer, as Paine and some late seditious writers have done, that the regal power is in itself an evil. It might be contrary to a theocracy, and still might suit the manners of some nations better than any other form. To determine precisely what sort of government is best, would be an arduous task. We admire our own constitution; yet our ally, the prince of the Brazils, has lately forbidden any panegyric of it to be printed in his dominions. All innovations are, generally, attended with the most serious inconveniences. H.

Ver. 19. And Samuel, at whose prayer the Lord had sent such a storm, lest he should punish them as they deserved. But the prophet alleviates their fears, and teaches them to refrain from idolatry, and he will still continue to perform his duty in praying for them, and giving them good advice. Salien.—The fear of God is increased by that which the people shew for his servants.

Ver. 20. Following, as that would imply despair. To come boldly before him would argue presumption. Therefore, S. Mary Magdalene keeps at the feet of Jesus Christ. W.

Ver. 21. Vain and wicked idols. Heb. thohu, full of “confusion” and disorder.

Ver. 22. Sake. This motive often proved the salvation of Israel. Ex. 32:12. The Scriptures wholly tend to impress upon our minds, a sense of our own weakness, and of God’s infinite glory and perfection. C.—We may all say, “Our hope to rise is all from Thee—our ruin’s all our own.” Austin.

Ver. 23. The Lord. For a pastor to neglect instruction, is not only detrimental to the people, but injurious to God. H.—Way. None contributed more than Samuel to keep the people within due bounds, during the reign of Saul. C.

Ver. 25. Together. Sept. “shall be rejected.” Saul soon experienced the effect of this prophetic menace; and the Jews were, at last, also cast away. H.

1 KINGS 13

Ver. 1. Of one year. That is, he was good, and like an innocent child, and for two years continued in that innocency. Ch. S. Greg. W.—Israel. This verse is omitted in some copies of the Sept. It is extremely difficult to explain. Some translate Heb. “Saul was a son of one year old,” &c. Sym. Others, “Saul begot a son the first year of his reign, (Raban) Isboeth, who was 40 years old when his father died, after governing all that while. Serar.—Syr. and Arab. “In the first or second year of the reign of Saul ... he chose,” &c. Hardouin supposes that the people dated their years by his reign only so long. Some think that the Heb. is imperfect; and an ancient interpreter has, “Saul was 30 years old, when he began,” &c. C.—The Rabbins and many commentators assert, that the reign of Saul lasted only two years. T.—But some of them explain this, as if he reigned alone only that term before he was rejected, when he could only be regarded as an usurper. Others, that he obtained the whole power for two years, after the death of Samuel. Usher concludes that, during the incursions of the Philistines, he could hardly be said to reign, and these commenced after he had been king two years. We might also translate, “Saul was the son of the year of his reign, (when he was confirmed at Galgal) and in the second year ... he chose,” &c. C.—Perhaps the first translation, though somewhat mystical, may be the most literal, shewing that for one year Saul continued to act with the most engaging affability and moderation. But in the second he threw off the yoke, and was, in his turn, rejected by the Lord, as we shall soon behold. H.—Scaliger seems to prefer allowing that the numeral letters have been omitted by some transcriber, and that we should read, Saul was 30 years old. This, and similar variations, he attributes to the compendious method of using numeral letters; (Kennicott) an inconvenience very frequently attending all MSS. both sacred and profane. Taylor.

Ver. 2. Dwellings, from Galgal (Salien) or from some other general assembly. C.—These 3000 were to be the king’s guards, supported at the expense of the nation, that the people might begin to feel one part of the royal prerogative. Salien, A.C. 1089.

Ver. 3. Land. As soon as the next cities had heard the alarm, they sounded the trumpet, and so the news was conveyed to the most distant parts, in a short time. Judg. 3:27.—Hebrews. Probably those “on the other side” of the Jordan, who presently came to the assistance of their brethren, v. 7. Osiander.—It might also be the usual beginning of a proclamation. See Dan. 3:4. M.—Sept. and Aquila have a instead of r, in hibrim. “Let the servants (subjects) attend.” Aq. The slaves have rebelled,” (Sept.) meaning the Philistines, who ought to have been subject to Israel. H.

Ver. 4. Courage. Heb. “and Israel was in abomination (stinking) with the Philistines.” See Ex. 6:21. C.—Sept. “despised as nothing the strangers.”—Were should be omitted, as the verb is active, clamavit, in the Vulg. and Sept. though the Prot. have “were called,” &c. They shouted with alacrity, that Saul would lead them on to battle. H.—

Osiander thinks that they “exclaimed against him,” for engaging them in this new war.

Ver. 5. Chariots. This number seems almost incredible, as the Philistines were but a contemptible nation, compared with various others which never brought so many chariots into the field. Zara, king of Ethiopia, in his army of a million men, had only 300. 2 Par. 14:9. Adarezer had 1000, and Sesac 12000 chariots, while Solomon could only boast of 1400. Hence the Syr. and Arab. read “3000;” and it is supposed that the Heb. has im, at the end of shelosh, redundant. Bochart, Capel, &c. The number of horsemen would otherwise bear no proportion with the chariots. We must also observe, that under this name the Scripture denotes those who upon the chariots. They were drawn by two horses, and one man guided the horses, while another stood on the chariot; and in battle, eight other soldiers attended it. These remarks will tend to explain many difficult passages, in which we read of chariots being slain and hamstrung, which may be understood of the men and horses, 2 K. 8:4 and 10:18. In one place we read 700, and in another 7000 chariot were slain, (1 Par. 19:18,) the latter number comprising the 10 attendants; so here, the Philistines might have 3000 chariots, which being each accompanied with ten men, might be counted as 30,000. C.—Others think that there were 30,000 men fighting on chariots. Lyran. Salien.—The Tyrians might have come to the assistance of their old friends, as C. 7:10. See 3 K. 4:26. M.—Number. Josephus specifies “300,000 infantry.” H.—Bethaven. Many copies of the Sept. read, “Bethoron,” more probably, as Bethel must have been on the east of Machmas, which lay north of Gabaa, chap 14:5. (C.) “over-against Bethoron on the south.” Grabe. H.—Heb. also, “having Bethaven on the east.” Bethel was called Bethaven after the schism of Jeroboam, so that this name seems to have been substituted by a later writer, (C.) unless it might have had both names long before. Jos. 18:12. H.—this is not contrary to C. 7:13, as the Philistines had been quiet for a long time. Heb. alom, properly denotes the term of a jubilee or 50 years. D.

Ver. 6. Straitened, the people from the northern provinces, and provisions being cut off, by the immense army of the Philistines. C.—Providence was pleased to convince the people that, though they had been able to muster so large a force against the Ammonites, at so short a warning, they must not depend on the efforts of their new king. H.—He suffered any of the army to retire, as he sent away most of Gedeon’s soldiers, that the whole glory of the victory might be attributed to him. Salien.—Dens. So the Chal. Some explain the Heb. “high places (H.) or towers.” C.—Sept. “ditches or holes.” M.—Βοθροίς. In that country there are many spacious caverns. C. 24. Jos.

Ver. 7. Hebrews. Sept. "the people, who came over, (the river) crossed the Jordan." H.—The title of Hebrews, "passengers," seems to be applied to those who lived on the east side of the river, (C.) though probably some others would seek for a retreat in that country, or even hide themselves in the regions of the Ammonites, out of which they had lately driven the inhabitants. H.—Heb. "the Hebrews passed over the Jordan, the land of," &c. C.—Afraid. Sept. in a sort of "ecstasy" of fear.

Ver. 8. Of Samuel. Yet the prophet condemns his proceedings, either because he did not wait till the expiration of the seventh day, (C. S. Ignatius, &c. Salien) or because he ventured to offer sacrifice himself. Lyra. after Sulp. Serverus, &c. H. W.—He had however the high priest with him; (C. 14:3,) so that he might have performed this sacred function, at the request of Saul: and we do not find that the latter is accused of sacrilege. Salien.—The magnitude of the punishment is no proof of the nature of the transgression, as God often punishes, with great severity, sins which to us might appear venial. H.—This is true, particularly with respect to those who first dare to transgress a positive command; (Num. 15:32. M.) as Saul seems to have done the injunction of the prophet, C. 10:8. The regal dignity was a gratuitous gift. Salien.—With a trembling heart, we must consider how he was rejected for neglecting to wait so short a time," (S. Greg.) when the circumstances seems to plead so strongly in his favour. How impenetrable are the judgments of God! and how punctually does he require his orders to be obeyed! C.

Ver. 12. Lord, by sacrifices.—Holocaust. Heb. "I forced myself therefore," &c. It is asked whether Saul offered sacrifice, or caused it to be offered by the priests. The text seems to assert that he did it himself. Samuel and David did the like; and we read that Solomon ascended to the brazen altar, at Gabaon, for the same purpose. 2 Par. 1:5. If it was lawful to erect altars out of the tabernacle, notwithstanding the divine prohibition, why might not individuals also offer sacrifice on certain solemn occasions? The Hebrew kings seem to have exercised some of the sacerdotal functions, particularly before the building of the temple; for afterwards we find one of their kings severely punished for presuming to offer incense. 4 K. 15:5. C.—Yet the proofs that they ever lawfully offered sacrifice, are not very satisfactory, as, in the Scripture language, a person is often said to do what he enjoins another to perform on his account; and if some prophets have acted in the character of priests, by divine dispensation, we need not extend the privilege to all who have dared to assume the like prerogative. The law is clear. It is the duty of all who do not regulate their conduct by it, to know that they have God's approbation. Their expressing no scruple on the occasion, proves nothing, no more than the sacred writer's omitting to stigmatize their proceedings. But here, if Saul really offered the holocaust, the words of Samuel, Thou hast done foolishly, convey a sufficient reproach: but if he did not, we must suppose that he blames the neglect of waiting the full term of days. H.

Ver. 13. Ever. He foresaw this want of obedience, and therefore promised the sceptre to Juda. Gen. 49. M.—God's foresight of sin, and preordination to punish it, does not take away free-will nor the possibility of a reward. S. Aug. W.

Ver. 14. Continue long. This seems to have been a threat, which Saul might still have escaped, if he had not proved disobedient again. S. Greg. says, "he might have been loosed from the bonds of his former disobedience;" prioris inobedientiæ nexus enodaret. The second rebellion caused him to be entirely rejected, and the prophet was ordered to go and anoint David. C. 15. Salien.

Ver. 15. Samuel. Piscator suspects that we ought to read Saul, as no mention is made of the prophet in the sequel of this war, and he is never consulted. C.—Josephus says he returned home. H.—But all the versions are conformable to the text: and Samuel went with the king and his 600 soldiers, to Gabaa, (C.) that he might not appear to retain any ill-will towards Saul, and that his followers might not be quite dispirited, as they knew that he had the thunderbolts of heaven in his hand; and if he was with them, they had nothing to fear from the myriads of their opponents. His presence was very seasonable, for they had to cut their way through the enemy. Salien.—And the ... Benjamin. All this is omitted in Heb. Chal. and in many Greek and Latin copies. C.—It is found in the Alex. and Vat. Sept.—In the hill, is a translation of Gabaa, which alone occurs in those editions. H.

Ver. 17. Plunder, seeing that the Israelites durst not come to an engagement. Jonathan took advantage of their absence. C. 14.—Land of Sual, "foxes," not far from the birth-place of Gedeon. Judges 6:11.

Ver. 18. Bethoron, the lower, to the north-west of Gabaa.—Seboim was one of the cities which perished along with Sodom. C.

Ver. 19. Smith. The Philistines had taken these precautions before Samuel gained the victory over them, and he consented that the people should employ the Philistines as before, when he made peace with them; (Salien) or they had again begun to get the upper hand at the beginning of Saul's reign, as the Israelites had been long in the enjoyment of peace, and negligent. T.—Josephus extends this species of servitude only to the neighbourhood of Gabaa, and says the major part of Saul's 600 men "was destitute of arms, because that country had neither iron nor people to make arms." The immense army which had so lately discomfited the Ammonites, was surely not without weapons. But most of them had retired, (H.) and those who accompanied the king might rely chiefly on their expertness in using the sling. Judg. 20:16. M.—The brave men who came to join David, are praised on this account, as well as for shooting with bow and arrow. 1 Par. 12:2. Furious battles have been also fought with sharpened stakes, burnt at the end, (Æn. vii.) and with various implements of husbandry, of which the Hebrews were not deprived. In the defeat of Sisara, they had not a buckler nor a lance among 40,000 (Judg. 5:8. C.) as the Philistines had already begun to deprive the Israelites of such weapons. H.—Other nations have since imitated their policy. 4 K. 24:14. Justin. i. 7.

Ver. 20. All Israel, whom the Philistines had conquered, particularly the neighbouring tribes. C.—They were obliged to go to the places where the enemy kept garrisons, (M.) as they did at Gabaa, Bethel, &c.—Share. Sept. Syr. &c. "scythe," or "sickle for corn;" $\theta\epsilon\rho\iota\sigma\tau\eta\rho\iota\omicron\nu$. H.—The original term, macharesha, may signify all sorts of implements.—Spade. Heb. is supposed to mean, "a coultter." Sept. "instrument," which the prophets often say will be turned into a sword, in times of war. Joel 3:15. Mic. 4:3.—Rake. The same generical term is used in Heb. as was before translated a plough-share. Sept. have "scythe;" $\delta\rho\epsilon\pi\alpha\nu\omicron\nu$. C.

Ver. 21. Mended, by the Philistines. H.—The Heb. is variously translated. "Their implements were like saws; or, they had a file to sharpen the," &c. C.—Sept. "and the fruits were ready to be gathered. But the vessels (instruments for labour) were three sicles for a tooth, and the same price (or station, $\upsilon\pi\omicron\sigma\tau\alpha\iota\varsigma$, a word used v. 23, in the latter sense) for an axe or a scythe;" as if the Philistines required three sicles for doing the smallest thing, when the harvest was at hand. H.

Ver. 23. Further. Heb. "went out to the passage (H.) or defile of Machmas," leading to Gabaa. C.—Sept. "and there came out of the station of the strangers, to the other side (or beyond) Machmas," where they have been fixed. C. 6:11, 16. H.

Ver. 1. Day, while it was yet dark. Josephus.—This action would seem rash, and contrary to military discipline, which requires that the general should be apprised of any hazardous enterprise. C.—But it is thought that Jonathan was directed by God, who granted him success. A. Lapide.—The Rabbins say, “every augury which is not like that of Eleazar and Jonathan, is null. If they had done ill, ... God would not have heard them.” Kimchi.

Ver. 2. Magron, a village between Gabaa and Machmas. Isai. 10:28. Heb. reads “Remmon,” which means “a pomegranate tree,” and denotes a famous impregnable rock, with extensive caverns, where an equal number of men had formerly saved themselves. Judg. 20:47. C. T. M.

Ver. 3. Ephod; or was high priest, v. 18. Achias is called Achimelech, C. 22:9. C.—He had succeeded his father, Achitob, in the beginning of Saul’s reign, after the former had held the dignity twenty-two years. Salien, A. 2962.

Ver. 6. Uncircumcised. The Hebrews looked upon the Gentiles as unclean and they, in their turn, spoke of the Jews in the most contemptuous manner. C.—It may. Lit. “if perchance.” H.—This does not express any doubt. The hero found himself impelled to undertake this work, but he knew not by what means God would crown it with success. He therefore prays to him in this manner, as Abraham’s servant had done. Gen. 24:12. He does not tempt God no more than Gedeon and Moses, who begged that the Lord would manifest his will by miracles. C.—Few. These words are often repeated, (2 Par. 14:11. 1 Mac. 3:18,) and were verified. C. 17:47. Judg. 7:4. M.

Ver. 10. This shall be a sign. It is likely Jonathan was instructed by divine inspiration, to make choice of this sign; otherwise, the observation of omens is superstitious and sinful. Ch. M. W.

Ver. 11. Philistines, probably on the northern rock, as they afterwards climbed up that on the south, (C.) where they had not been discovered. Salien.

Ver. 12. A thing, making you pay dear for this temerity. Herodotus (v.) mentions, that the Peonians were commanded by the oracle not to attack the Perinthians, unless they were challenged. They did so, and gained a complete victory.

Ver. 14. Day. Varro, &c. allow 120 feet, Columella only 70, for a day’s work, so that these twenty men were slain in the space of 60 or 35 feet. Louis de Dieu rejects all the other versions, and would translate the Heb. “in almost the half of the length of a furrow, and in the breadth which is between two furrows in a field,” so that the enemy would be very close together. Lit. “almost in the half of a furrow of a yoke of the field,” which seems rather to be understood of the length, (C.) if indeed it have any meaning. Prot. are forced to help out the text: “within as it were a half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough.” H.—But a whole acre was the usual allowance. M.—Hallet observes, “the Sept. read the Heb. in a different manner, and have rendered the verse thus, ‘That first slaughter was ... of about twenty men, with darts, and stones, and flints of the field:’ I suppose the read, Betsim ubomauth.” Kennicott adds, and ubgomri, as the Arabs still use gomer, to denote “a small flint.” Golius. H.

Ver. 15. Miracle. Heb. charada, “consternation or trembling,” a panic fear, as the Philistines imagined that all the army of Israel had got into the camp. “In the terrors sent by demons, (or superior beings) even the sons of the gods flee away.” Pindar. Nem. The earth quaked (C.) to increase the enemies’ apprehensions, so that those who had gone out to plunder, hearing of the disaster, which report had greatly magnified, and all the people feeling this unusual and alarming motion of the earth, perceiving that God was fighting against them, and trembled. H.

Ver. 16. Gabaa, where they were stationed to observe the enemies’ motions, and to give notice of them to Saul, at Remmon, v. 2. C.—Overthrown. Heb. “melted down, (without courage) and they went crushing” one another in the narrow passes, (H.) and turning their arms against all they met. Josephus.

Ver. 17. Were not. Heb. “when they had numbered, behold Jonathan, &c. not” in the number. H.

Ver. 18. Ark. Sept. “the ephod.” Kimchi, &c.—Spencer follows the sentiment of the Rabbins, and explains it of a little box, in which the ephod and pectoral were placed, when they were brought to the army. But what need of this explication? C.—How the oracle was given is uncertain. M.

Ver. 19. Hand. He prayed with his hands extended. Saul believed that God had sufficiently intimated his will, by affording such a favourable opportunity. “The best of omens is to revenge our country’s wrongs.” Hector. Iliad. M.—Optimis auspiciis ea geri, quæ pro Reip. salute fierent, was the observation of Q. F. Maximus. Senect. C.—Saul did not wait for God’s answer, and therefore had nearly lost his son by a rash vow, and by too eager zeal. W.

Ver. 21. Before; that is, for some time, as slaves. M.—Having retired to their camp, to avoid the plunderers, (C.) they rose upon their oppressors, as Christian slaves have often done upon the Turks, when a galley has been engaged, and fallen into the hands of their friends. M.—Camp. Heb. adds, “round about,” as if they guarded the baggage, (Piscator) or had retreated thither from the environs. C.

Ver. 22. And there, &c. This is not found in Heb. &c. nor in many Latin copies. The Sept. specify the number, (v. 24) where it is not in the original. C.

Ver. 23. Bethaven. They pursued the stragglers thither, as well as to Aialon, v. 31. H.

Ver. 24. Together. Which interpretation is more natural (C.) than the Prot. “where distressed, ... for Saul had adjured,” &c. H.—Sept. “And all the people was with Saul, about 10,000, and the war was spread through all the city in Mount Ephraim, and Saul was guilty of great ignorance that day, and he adjures (H. or cursed) the people,” &c. He saw not that he was acting against his own interest. The sequel does not evince that God approved of his conduct. But the people were to be taught not to make light of oaths, nor to neglect the curses which their rulers should denounce. C.—Food. Lit. “bread,” which comprises all sorts of food, honey, &c. (v. 25. H.) but not drink, which might lawfully have been taken, as thirst is more difficult to bear. M.—Salien (A. 2964) defends the conduct of Saul, and condemns Jonathan.

Ver. 25. Ground. Even still travellers perceived the smell of honey very frequently in that country. Maundrell.—The people use honey almost in every sauce and in every repast. Virgil assures us, that “bees dwell in holes under ground, in hollow stones, and trees.” Georg. iv. The Scripture frequently mentions honey flowing. Ex. 2:8. Ps. 70:17. Job 20:17.

Mella fluant illi, ferat & rubus asper amomum. Virg. Ec. iii.

Sanctius says, that in Spain, streams of honey may be seen on the ground; and Maldonet observes, that the countrymen get a livelihood by gathering it from the trees in Betica, or Andalusia.

Ver. 27. Enlightened. Extreme hunger and fatigue hurt the eyes. Jer. 14:6. Sanctius saw a man who through fasting lost his sight, and recovered it again as soon as he had eaten. This is conformable to the observations of Hippocrates, and to nature. C.—Tenebræ oboriuntur, genua inedia succedunt. Perii, prospicio parum. “Through hunger ... I see but little.” Plautus. H.

Ver. 29. Land. Chal. “the people of the land.” M.—He speaks his sentiments freely. But we ought not to find fault, in public, with the conduct of the prince. C.—The people might have eaten a little without stopping the pursuit, as they generally carried provisions with them, or might find some easily on the road, so as to run with fresh vigour, (See Jos. 10) and make ample amends for the time that they were delayed. H.

Ver. 31. Aialon, in the tribe of Dan. It might be about ten miles from Machmas.

Ver. 32. Blood, contrary to a two-fold law. Gen. 9:4. Lev. 17:14. The blood ought to have been carefully extracted and buried. C.—This was another bad effect of Saul’s rash oath. W.

Ver. 34. With the blood, as you have done. M.

Ver. 35. First. Saul begins to exercise himself in acts of religion, which only belonged to a prophet, &c. He thought he might do so in quality of king, thus consecrating a monument of his victory to the God of armies. It was perhaps the very stone on which the oxen had been just before killed for the people. C.

Ver. 36. God, to consult him, whether the enterprise met with his approbation. Saul is too eager to follow his own prudence. H.—He would not before wait for God’s answer; (v. 19) now he can get none. W.

Ver. 38. Corners, to the very last; or all the princes. Judg. 18:9.

Ver. 39. Gainsayed him, out of respect. Saul gives another proof of his precipitation, in swearing; and the people, by this silence, acquiesce, not suspecting that Jonathan could have offended in what he had done. C.—One of them, at least, knew that he had transgressed the order of his father, v. 28. But extreme necessity might plead his excuse. H.—They might be silent through fear, or reverence, without giving their consent. Salien.

Ver. 41. A sign, (judicium;) “pass sentence;” declare why, &c. H.—Heb. “give purity.” Shew who is innocent. C.—Sept. “give the proofs” by the Thummim, which they seem to have read. C.

Ver. 42. Jonathan was taken. Though Jonathan was excused from sin, through ignorance of the prohibition, yet God was pleased on this occasion to let the lot fall upon him, to shew to all, the great obligation of obedience to princes and parents, (Ch.) the sacred nature of an oath, and at the same time to give Saul a warning not to swear rashly. C.—How must he have been afflicted, when he saw that he had brought his beloved son into such danger! M.

Ver. 44. Die. We may here admire the respect which the ancients had for an oath, without seeking for any modification; and the blindness of Saul, who condemns his son with as much haste as he had pronounced the curse, thinking thus to honour God. The thing surely required some deliberation, and he ought to have consulted the Lord about it. The action of Jonathan was not criminal, and the former silence of God did not prove that he deserved death. C.—If it had, the people would never have been able to have rescued him, no more than the unhappy Achan. Jos. 7. H.—If Saul had been more enlightened, and more humble, he would have concluded that God was displeased at him, and not at Jonathan. C.—Yet Cajetan and Serarius find fault with the latter. M.

Ver. 45. The people, directed probably by the high priest, who pronounced the oath null. Salien.—Ground. He shall not be hurt. M.—With God. He has been visibly “the minister of God’s mercy.” Sept.—Die. They obtained his pardon. They ought not to have permitted the king’s oath to be put in execution, as it was so horribly unjust. Grot. Jur. ii. 13. 6. C.

Ver. 47. Soba, in the north. M.—Rohab was the capital of another part of Coelosyria. 1 Par. 18:3. 2 K. 10:6.—Overcame. We are not to judge of the virtue of a man from his success in the world. C.—Under the reign of Saul, the tribe of Ruben overcame the Agarites. 1 Par. 5:10, 18. Salien, A. 2965.

Ver. 48. Amalec. The particulars of this war will be given C. 15. as it explains the cause of Saul’s rejection, and David’s advancement to the throne. Salien.

Ver. 49. Sons, who accompanied Saul in his wars. Isboseth was too young.—Jessui is called Abinadab, 1 Par. 8:33. C.

Ver. 50. Achinoam. After he came to the throne, he had Respha. 2 K. 3:7. M.

1 KINGS 15

Ver. 1. Lord, in gratitude for so great an honour. H.

Ver. 2. Reckoned up. God speaks in a human manner, as if he had been reading the history of ancient times. Ex. 17:14. M.—The Amalecites had treated Israel with inhumanity, above 400 years before. God's vengeance is often slow, but only so much the more terrible. C.—Heb. pakadti, I have visited, or will punish and remember.

Ver. 3. Destroy, as a thing accursed. H.—Child. The great master of life and death (who cuts off one half of mankind whilst they are children) has been pleased sometimes to ordain that children should be put to the sword, in detestation of the crimes of their parents, and that they might not live to follow the same wicked ways. But without such ordinance of God, it is not allowable in any wars, how just soever, to kill children. Ch.—The Israelites were now to execute God's orders with blind obedience, as he cannot be guilty of injustice.—Nor covet ... his, is omitted in Heb. &c. C.—Amalec is stricken when the flesh is chastised—He is destroyed when we repress evil thoughts. S. Greg. W.

Ver. 4. As lambs. This comparison is very common. Isai. 40:11. Ezec. 34:2. But many translate the Heb. “in Telaim.” S. Jerom reads Heb. c, as, instead of b, in, with greater propriety. Sept. and Josephus, “in Galgal,” which in effect would have been the most proper place for rendezvous. C.—Footmen. Vat. Sept. “400,000 ranks or standards, (Josephus, men) and Juda 30,000.”

Ver. 5. Amelac. The people dwelt in tents, and removed from one place to another. So in Ethiopia there are properly no cities, the place where the prince encamps is deemed the capital. C.—Torrent. Heb. or “valley.”

Ver. 6. Egypt. See Judg. 1:16. Ex. 18:12. Num. 10:31 and 24:21. Saul gave private instructions to the Cinite, who had been settled at Arad, and had mixed with Amalec, to depart. C.

Ver. 7. Sur. See Gen. 2:11 and 16:7 and 25:18. Ex. 15:22. M.—These people had occupied a great part of the country, from the Persian Gulf to Egypt. H.

Ver. 9. Garments. Heb. is commonly rendered, “fatlings.” Sept. “eatables.” C.—Avarice seems to have actuated Saul, (Lyran) or a false pity, (Josephus) or a desire to grace his triumph, v. 12. Glossa. M.

Ver. 11. Repenteth. God cannot change: but he often acts exteriorly as one who repents. He alters his conduct when men prove rebellious. S. Justin. p. 22.—Grieved. Heb. “indignant.” C.—He was sorry to think that Saul would now lose his temporal, and perhaps his eternal crown. Salien.—“The choice of Judas and of Saul, do not prove that God is ignorant of future events, but rather that he is a Judge of the present.” S. Jer. in Ezech. ii.

Ver. 12. Arch. Here we behold what a change prosperity makes in the manners of those who before shewed the greatest humility. Saul erects a monument to his own vanity. Heb. “he has set him up a hand,” (as Absalom did, 2 K. 18:18) or “a place” to divide the booty, (Jonathan) or “a garrison,” to keep the country in subjection. C.—Perhaps he erected the figure of “a hand,” as an emblem of strength, and in honour of Benjamin, “the son of the right hand,” of whose tribe he was. H.

Ver. 14. Hear, and which manifestly prove, that God’s order has not been put in execution. M.

Ver. 15. Thy God. This was probably a falsehood, like the rest. Salien.

Ver. 17. Eyes. God rejects the proud, and gives his grace to the humble. See Luke 1:52. H.

Ver. 20. Lord. Sept. “of the people.”

Ver. 21. First-fruits, or the best.—Slain. Heb. “of the anathema.”

Ver. 22. Rams. Can God be pleased with victims which he has cursed? H.

Ver. 23. Obey. Heb. “Rebellion is the sin of divination or witchcraft, and resistance is iniquity, and the Theraphim.” Sym. “the injustice of idols.” Theraphim here designate idolatrous representations. Gen. 31:19. They were probably of Chaldee origin, in honour of the sun and fire, (C.) and were venerated like the Penates, and supposed to be the sources of prosperity, from the Arab. Taraph, “to give abundance.” Hence Laban was so solicitous to recover what Rachel had taken away. Louis de Dieu—By sacrifices we give our goods, or another’s flesh is immolated; (Mor. xxxiii. 10. D.) by obedience, we give ourselves to God. S. Greg. W.

Ver. 24. Voice: miserable excuse for a king, who ought to prevent the sins of his people! C.—Saul’s transgression seems less than David’s; but the one repents, and the other proudly defends what he had done. D.

Ver. 25. Bear, or take away. Pardon my fault. Do not expose me in public.—The Lord, by offering sacrifices, v. 31. C.

Ver. 27. Rent: a dreadful prognostic that Saul was cast away. H.

Ver. 29. Triumpher. Some suppose that he speaks ironically of Saul. A prince, like you, will not repent. C.—But it more probably refers to God, who would not fail to execute his threats against the king. H.—Heb. “the victor in Israel will not lie, he will not repent.” Sept. “and Israel shall be split in two, and the holy one of Israel shall not turn nor repent.” Saul’s rejection became now inevitable.

Ver. 30. Israel. He is wholly solicitous to shun disgrace in this world. H.—His confession was not actuated by such contrition as that he might deserve to hear, the Lord has removed thy sin. He begins by falsehood; continues making idle excuses, and throwing the blame on others, and concludes, by shewing that he is more concerned for what his subjects may think and do against him, than for the displeasure of God. He boldly ventures to offer victims. But Samuel joins not with him in prayer, looking upon him as a person excommunicated; and he only attends that he may see the word of the Lord fulfilled, and Agag treated as he deserved. Salien, A. 2965.

Ver. 32. Trembling. Heb. “and Agag came to him delicately.” Sept. “trembling,” (H.) or walking with a soft step, or “with bands or chains;” mahadannoth. See Pagnin. M.—Some think that he presented himself boldly, like a king, fearing nothing. Vatab.—Manner. Heb. “Surely the bitterness of death is past.” I have obtained pardon from Saul. But the sense of the Vulg. seems preferable, as he must have perceived, from the looks of the prophet, that death was hanging over him. Hence others translate, “is pouring upon me,” instead of, is past. Sept. “Is death thus bitter?” Chal. “I pray my Lord: the bitterness of death.” H.—O death! how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that hath peace in his possessions, &c. Eccli. 41:1. So Aristotle (Nicom. iii. 6.) says, “Death is most terrible, (περὰς γὰρ) for it is a passage,” or separation, from all the things which could attach a man to this world. C.—This catastrophe of Agag and Saul, had been long before predicted. Num. 24:7. H.

Ver. 33. Pieces. Josephus adds, by the hand of others. M.—But zeal put the sword into his own hand; and he imitated the Levites and Phinees, (Ex. 32:27) to shew Saul how preposterous had been his pity, when the Lord had spoken plainly. C.—Lord, as a sort of victim. Isai.

Ver. 35. Saw Saul no more till the day of his death. That is, he went no more to see him: he visited him no more. Ch.—He looked upon him as one who had lost the right to the kingdom, though he was suffered for a time to hold the reins of government, as a lieutenant to David. He might afterwards see Saul passing, but never to visit him, (Salien) or to consult with him about the affairs of state; (M.) nor perhaps did he even see him, when Saul came to Najoth. C. 19:19, 24. His spirit came to announce destruction to Saul, the night preceding the death of that unfortunate king. C. 28. H.—Repented. God is said, improperly, to repent when he alters what he had appointed. S. Amb. de Noe, c. iv. W.

Ver. 1. How long. It seems his tears were not soon dried up, as he lamented the fall of one whom he had formerly so much admired, and perceived what evils would ensue. Salien.—He had hoped that the decree might have been revokable. But God now convinces him of the contrary, by ordering him to go and anoint a successor.—Horn. Such vessels were formerly very common, and were used to contain liquor, and instead of cups. 3 K. 1:39. Horace ii. Sat. 2. The ancient silver cups, at Athens, resembled horns. Athen. xi. 7. But the northern nations, particularly Denmark, &c. used horns to drink, as the Georgians still do. The rims are ornamented with silver, &c. Plin. xi. 37. Chardin. C.—A fragile vile was not used, but a horn, to denote the duration and abundance of David's reign. Rupert. M.

Ver. 2. Of the herd. Heb. “a heifer in thy hand.” H.—Females might be employed as peace-offerings. Lev. 3:1.—Lord. This was one, though not the principal reason. No one doubted but that he might lawfully offer sacrifice, at a distance from the tabernacle, as he was guided by God. The Jews allow that prophets have this privilege, and may dispense with the ceremonial law, (Grot.) when they act by God's authority, as we ought to believe they do, as long as there is no proof to the contrary. H.

Ver. 3. Sacrifice, to partake of the feast, (M.) which must be consumed in two days, or thrown into the fire. Lev. 7:16. C.

Ver. 4. Wondered. Heb. “trembled,” being full of consternation, (H.) as the prophet did not now stir much from home; and fearing lest he had some bad news to impart, or had incurred the king's displeasure, (C.) unless he came to punish some of the people at Bethlehem. M.

Ver. 5. Sanctified, prepared by aspersions, washing, and continence. Ex. 19:14. What sorts of uncleanness excluded from the feast, are specific, Lev. 22. M.—Samuel arrived in the evening, and announced that sacrifice would be offered the ensuing morning. T.

Ver. 6. Him. Heb. “surely the Lord's anointed is in his presence.” This he spoke by his own spirit, judging from the comeliness of Eliab. C.—But the beauty of Saul's body had concealed a deformed soul. H.

Ver. 7. Rejected, or not chosen. M.—God had positively rejected this eldest son, as his pride seems to have been the greatest. C. 17:28. H.—Heart. This is one of God's perfections. Glorified saints see man's heart in his light, for their own and our advantage, (S. Greg. Mor. xii. 11. S. Aug.) as the prophets have sometimes done. 3 K. 14. W.

Ver. 10. Seven. David was absent. Isai had eight sons. C. 17:12. Yet only seven are mentioned, 1 Par. 2:13. Perhaps one of those whom he produced on this occasion, might be a grandson, or one is omitted in Chronicles. C.

Ver. 11. Young son, (parvulus,) “a little one;” (H.) or the youngest, who might be about 15, (C.) or 28. Seder. olam. iii. M.

Ver. 12. Ruddy, like the spouse, Cant. 5:10. Some explain it of his hair. So Alexander is said to have had reddish or golden locks.—Behold. Heb. “with the beauty of the eyes.”

Ver. 13. Brethren. Some say, without informing him, (C.) or them, (M.) what the unction meant. If he told the brothers, he would no doubt take the necessary precautions to keep it secret, as the whole family would have been in imminent danger, if the transaction had come to the ears of Saul, v. 2. Josephus says, that Samuel only informed Isai in private: and David's brothers treated him with no peculiar distinction. Whence it is inferred, that they had not been present when he was anointed. Some witnesses seem, however, to have been requisite, as the title of David to the regal dignity depended on this ceremony, and none were more interested than his own family to assert his pretensions. He now had a right to the kingdom, but not the possession; being like a son expecting his father's estate as his future right, of which, as yet, he cannot dispose. C.—Came upon, to make him prosper. M.—Heb. “came with prosperity; (Sept.) impetuosity.” God endued him with all those graces which might render him fit to command. C.—So David prays himself, “with a princely spirit confirm me;" (Ps. 50:14) or, strengthen me with a perfect spirit. Salien observes, that he did not now receive the spirit of charity, as if he had hitherto been in enmity with God, (C. 13:14) but he began to advance in virtue with more rapid strides, while Saul became every day more criminal and abandoned to the devil. H.—David received the spirit of fortitude and of prophecy, of which Saul had formerly had some experience, when he was first elevated to that high dignity. C. 10. He was changed into a new man, and adorned with all that could render a king most glorious. Though he returned to his wonted occupations, the spirit of the Lord enabled him to destroy wild beasts, as in play, (Eccli. 47:3) and to compose and sing many of those divine canticles which we still admire. Salien, A. 2969.—Whether he composed all the Psalms, as S. Chrysostom endeavours to prove, (præf.) we shall examine hereafter. H.

Ver. 14. From the Lord. An evil spirit, by divine permission, and for his punishment, either possessed or obsessed him. Ch.—We no longer behold in Saul any generous sentiments. He falls a prey to melancholy, anger, suspicion, and cruelty. "He was seized with an illness, inflicted by the devil, says Josephus, (vi. 9.) so that he seemed to be choking; nor could the physicians discover any other means to alleviating his distress, except by employing some person skilled in music ... David alone could bring the king to his right senses, by singing hymns with the sound of the harp. Wherefore Jesse consented that his son should remain with the king, since he was so much delighted with his company." H.—The Jews, and many Christians, suppose that Saul's illness was melancholy, or "madness," as S. Chrysostom calls it. It was inflicted by an evil, or even by a good angel, as the minister of God's vengeance, (Ex. 11:4. C.) who punished his former pride and rebellion, by reducing him to so mean a condition. H.—S. Aug. and V. Bede suppose, that the evil spirit troubled him by God's permission. W.

Ver. 16. Easily. The effects which have been produced by music are truly surprising, if we may believe what the ancients have related. Our music may not at present be so striking, or we may keep a greater restraint upon our passions, and moderate the exterior demonstrations of our sentiments more than they did. C.—But, in the present case, there was probably some miraculous interference. H.—The disciples of Pythagoras lay a great stress on music, to calm the passions, (Quintil. ix. 4. M.) or to rouse them. p. 439. H.—It may also frequently contribute to restore health. Gallien, &c. See C. 10:10. 4 K. 3:15. C.—but God made it so efficacious here, to shew the virtue of David, and the injustice of Saul. W.—Thus, by the prayers of the Church, the devil is expelled. Theodoret. T.

Ver. 18. Him. Some think that this took place before David's victory over Goliath; others believe, that David was only made armour-bearer to Saul, after that event. We must not disturb the order of the sacred historian without some cogent reason: and the courtiers might already have heard of David's prowess and virtue, of which he gave such evident proofs, after he was confirmed by the Holy Spirit, v. 13. C.

Ver. 20. Laden. So Chal. M.—Lit. plenum, "full of." H.—Sept. "a gomor," which they seem to have read instead of the Hebrew chamor, "an ass of bread," as Sosibius says, "he eats three asses' of panniers of loaves." C.—Prot. supply, "laden."

Ver. 21. Bearer. This was an honourable office. H.—Cyrus had been employed by his grandfather Astyages in the same capacity, before he came to the empire. Athen. xiv. C.

Ver. 22. Sight. He had sent him back, as people of a melancholy temper are often hard to please; (M.) and before David married Michol, he did not remain with the king, but only came when his presence was deemed necessary. C.

Ver. 23. Departed from him. Chased away by David's devotion. Ch.—The melody of David's harp, as some of the Fathers remark, represent that sweet and engaging demeanour, which should distinguish the peaceful ministers of the gospel, ... whether they strive to allay the rage, or dispel the fears of a troubled mind." Reeves.—Nothing can equal the divine harmony of those sublime truths which are contained in the Psalms of David, and nothing can so powerfully contribute to drive away the spirit of pride from our hearts, and awaken them to the voice of heaven. S. Aug.—Some of these truths might make some passing impression even on the mind of Saul; and the devil could not bear to hear the praises of God. H.

1 KINGS 17

Ver. 1. Battle. They perhaps had heard of Saul's malady, (Salien) and bore a constant hatred to the Israelites during his reign. C. 14:52.—Azeca, about 15 miles south of Jerusalem.—Dommim, or Phesdommim, 1 Par. 11:13.

Ver. 2. Terebinth. Heb. ela, "the oak." Aquila.

Ver. 3. Valley of the Terebinth, which S. Jerom seems to call Magala, v. 20.

Ver. 4. Base-born. Heb. “of two sons,” or of obscure origin. A. Lapide. —His parents are no where specified, as Arapha is not, as some pretend, the name of his mother, but denotes that he was of the race of the Raphaim. 2 K. 21:16. Some translate, a man who challenges to fight a duel, or one who comes into the midst as “a champion,” to decide the cause of all the rest. Thus the Gaul defied the most valiant of the Romans, but was slain by M. Torquatus, Livy vii. Sept. “A strong man went out from the station,” &c. Chal. “There came out from them, out of the camp of the Philistines, a man named Goliath.” But many able interpreters adhere to the Vulg.—Span, about 12½ feet, so that he was taller than two common men. Those who call in question the existence of giants, will surely have nothing to object to this formal proof from Scripture. C.—The Vat. Sept. and Josephus read, however, “four cubits and a span,” or near eight feet. Ken.—Some reduce his height to 11 feet 3 inches, or even to 9 feet 9 inches, English. H.—His helmet weighed 15 pounds, avoirdupois; his collar, or buckler, about 30; the head of his spear (26 feet long) weighed about 38 pounds; his sword 4; his greaves on his legs 30; and his coat of mail 156: total, 273 pounds. Button. H.—Goliath was a figure of the devil, or of any arch-heretic, who provoketh the Church of God, but is slain by the humble with his own weapons. W.

Ver. 5. Scales, like those of fishes. Sept. insinuate, that it was armed with things resembling fish-hooks; αλισιδωντον, hamata.—Brass, which was used for the armour of the ancients. Plutarch (in Demetrio) speaks of a coat of mail weighing forty pounds: the usual weight was twenty pounds. Lipsius.—The strength of the giant must have borne proportion with his size. C.

Ver. 6. Legs, on the forepart, from the knee to the ankle. Vegetius observes, that the infantry wore such greaves of iron, only on one leg. C.—Shoulders, when he marched. M.—Some understand a dart, &c. but without any proof. C.

Ver. 7. Beam, which was of a very different construction from ours. Hostius concludes, that all the armour of Goliath must have weighed 272 pounds and 13 ounces, including the buckler and spear which his armour-bearer carried before him. Plutarch allows a talent, or 60 pounds, for the usual weight of a soldier’s armour. Alcimus was remarked in the army of Demetrius, for having double that weight.—Bearer. Heb. “one bearing a shield,” or whose office it was to carry it, or any other part of the armour, when required. It would appear singular that the giant should have two bucklers, though David seems to specify two sorts. Ps. 34:2. This attendant might carry a large one, which would cover most part of the body, and was of service when a person had not to remove far from his place of battle. The buckler of Ajax was like a tower, and consisted of seven hides, covered with a plate of brass. Homer, Iliad Z. C.

Ver. 8. Out; exulting. Eccli. 47:5. M.—Servants; I am free. H.—Hand. Such combats were very common in ancient times. Paris and Menelaus, Hector and Ajax. The Horatii and Curiatii fought to decide the fate of contending nations. Iliad γ, and H.—Livy i. 23. C.

Ver. 9. Us. It does not appear that this proposal was accepted or ratified by either party. The Israelites had still to pursue the enemy. E.

Ver. 12. Now, &c. to v. 32. And when, is omitted in the Vatican Sept. which begins the latter verse thus, “And David said,” as the Alex. copy does now the 12th, which leads Kennicott to suspect that the intermediate verses are an interpolation, formerly unknown to the Greek version. Houbigant includes these verses between crotchets, “that it may be understood that these are not of the same author as the rest, and that the sacred writer may not be accused of making useless repetitions.” It has been observed in the last chapter, that David was the son of Isai, &c. “If, says he, this be omitted, there will be no vacuum in the context,” as there is none in the Roman edition: (11) “they were greatly afraid. (32.) And David said to Saul,” &c. As he had been appointed Saul’s armour-bearer, it was very natural to suppose that he would be near the king’s person on such an occasion, rather than feeding sheep. We find also, that he had a tent of his own, (v. 54) which he could not have had, if he had only come to bring provisions to his brethren. The unaccountable conduct of Eliab, the timidity of all Israel for forty days, &c. will thus be avoided. Josephus is supposed to have given occasion to this embellishment, though he takes no notice of many of those particulars which excite the surprise of Pilkington, Kennicott, &c. Dis. ii. p. 421. These verses were, however, in the Heb. before the days of Aquila, &c. and Origen received them from the Jews as genuine. A Hebrew Bible, (1661) with marginal criticisms, by a Jew, includes these verses within parentheses, as interpolated, as well as from v. 55 to C. 18:6, observing that “the history consists at present of different and inconsistent accounts.” The Syriac MS. of Masius generally confirms the Vatican Sept. (Morin) so that we conclude, that these verses are there asterisked on the authority of Origen, as not being in the original Greek, nor consequently in Hebrew. ib. p. 575.—Mentioned. Heb. “Juda, whose name ... and the man went among men, an old man in the days of Saul.” We have already observed that the Alex. Sept. seems to promise a speech, but defers till v. 32, thus, “And David said, the son of an Ephrathite. He was from,” &c. H.—Men. Chal. “He was an old man, whom they ranked among the young," as still vigorous. Jam senior, sed cruda seni viridisque senectus. C.

Ver. 13. Battle. In these wars, all attended as much as possible. C. 16:10.

Ver. 15. Bethlehem, the king being relieved from his malady. "The greatest men formerly kept sheep." Ex antiquis illustrissimus quisque pastor erat. Varro ii. 1. In this profession, David found many opportunities of signalizing his courage against wild beasts. C.

Ver. 17. Loaves. The soldiers at that time, and perhaps always among the Hebrews, lived at their own expense, as the tribute which was paid to the king was not sufficient to support large armies, v. 25. C.—S. Paul insinuates, however, that soldiers were paid. 1 Cor. 9:7. H.

Ver. 18. Cheeses. Heb. "of milk." Sept. "pieces of soft cheese:" erts is no where else used to denote cheese. This was a present (C.) for (Heb.) "the Chiliarch."—Placed, who is their immediate officer. H.—Heb. "how they are mixed:" their company. Sept. &c. "what they stand in need of." Sym. "Thou shalt receive their pay." Syr. and Arab. "what news." Others would translate, "their pledge," or bill of divorce to their wives, that, in case they be made prisoners for three years, the latter may be allowed to marry. Trad. Heb. C.

Ver. 19. Fighting, or ready to engage. H.

Ver. 20. Magala signifies, "the circle, or chariots." The Arabs still place their waggons and baggage round the camp, or in a circle. C.—It may also be a proper name. M.

Ver. 22. Brethren. This inquiry seems rather unseasonable, when all were shouting for battle. Ken.

Ver. 23. Up, or proceeding into the vale. M.—Camp. Heb. "ranks, or armies."

Ver. 24. Exceedingly, though they had now heard him twice a-day for so long a time, (Ken.) and came purposely to engage him and all the Philistine army. Perhaps he proceeded farther than usual. H.

Ver. 25. Tribute, and all public charges, which may be burdensome. C.—It does not appear that these words are addressed to any one in particular, nor that the king had authorized such a declaration. H.—Yet the people all persisted in the same declaration, so that a promise must have been made. M.—It was never at least fulfilled. H.—Christ having overcome the devil, receives the Church for his spouse. W.

Ver. 28. Battle. This speech is too insulting, even though David might seem to have given vent to the sentiments of his soul with too much ardour; particularly as Eliab knew that he had received the royal unction, (C.) if that were not kept a secret from him. C. 16:13.

Ver. 29. Sepak. Lit. “is it not a word” (H.) of no farther consequences? May I not speak my sentiments? (C.) as all others do. M.—Is not the thing enough to excite the indignation even of the coldest person, to hear this monster insulting God’s armies? The repeated inquiries of David, made people conclude that he was ready to fight the giant, (H.) though as yet he had made no such proposal, whence it seems more improbable that his words would be reported to the king. Kennicott.—Prot. “Is there not a cause?” H.—Have I not an order from my father to come? M.

Ver. 32. Saul. Lit. “to him.” But Heb. and Sept. have, “And David said to Saul,” which makes the connection between this and v. 11, more clear. H.—In him, or on account of Goliath. M.

Ver. 33. Boy, compared with the giant, (H.) or Saul, though David might be about 22 years old, (Salien) or near 30. T.—S. Aug. and Theodoret say only 14 or 16. M.—He had not yet been in the wars. C.

Ver. 35. Them. He refers to two events, shewing his fortitude (C.) and generous disposition, which rendered him fit for command, as he was not afraid to expose his life to protect his charge. H.—The pastoral care is an apprenticeship for the throne to him who is designed to be at the head of the mild flock of men, as hunting with dogs conducts to martial exploits. Philo in Vita Mosis.—He who has overcome the spirit of pride and of carnal pleasures, signified by the lion and the bear, is able also to gain a victory over the devil. W.

Ver. 36. I will ... Philistine. This is not in Heb. or the Sept. and it is marked as an addition in the ancient MSS. C.—Single combats, to prevent the spilling of more blood, may sometimes be authorized by public authority. Grotius.

Ver. 39. Armour. Heb. “he tried to go.” Sym. “he went lame.” Sept. “he laboured in walking once and twice.” C.—Salien supposes that the armour was not made for Saul, as he was much more bulky than young David. Yet we find that the latter could use the sword of the giant without difficulty. S. Chrys. &c. H.

Ver. 40. Smooth. Louis de Dieu translates broken “pieces of stones,” as he pretends, contrary to the common opinion, that rough stones are more suitable for the sling. C.—The learned Jew, whom we have cited above, (v. 12,) and several others, have inferred from this verse, that David seems to have just come from the flock. But Kennicott justly observes, that slingers were of great service in the army; and the “vessel of shepherds,” the bag or scrip, might well be used to obtain the stones; as the staff, makel, denotes a military weapon. (Taylor, Conc.) Diss. ii. p. 555. David was very expert in using these weapons, and the ordinary armour was encumbering to him. H.—“Valour depends more on its own efforts than on armour,” tegumentis. S. Amb. Off. i.

Ver. 43. Gods. Dagon or Baalim. M.—Sept. Alex. has, “idols.” The beauty and accoutrements of David, made the rough warrior suppose that he was not coming to fight, but only to laugh at him and run away. H.

Ver. 44. Earth. The heroes of modern days refrain from such compliments. Homer frequently describes his champions making long speeches in praise of their former exploits. David displays his piety and confidence in God. C.

Ver. 47. Battle, whose armies thou hast defied, (v. 45. H.) or in general, He is the God of war, who grants victory to whom He pleases. C.

Ver. 48. Arose. The Roman Triarii and the Gauls expected the hour of battle sitting. C.

Ver. 49. Forehead. “The soul ... more probably resides in the callous body of the brain,” (Eyre, Thesis 1797,) between the eyes. H.—Earth, quite lifeless, (Salien) or unable to resist. M.—The Balearic slingers scarcely ever missed their mark. Livy, viii. 4. The Chaldee supposes that David hit the eye, which was not covered with brass: but the stone might penetrate or kill Goliath through his helmet. Even a buckler is not capable of withstanding their violence. Diodorus, v. 207. See Judg. 20:16. C.—Pride sits on the forehead, and manifests itself by impudent behaviour. We must destroy it by humility, and by the cross of Christ. S. Aug. W.

Ver. 54. Tent, or tabernacle of the Lord, which David erected in his honour, at Jerusalem, many years afterwards. Jun. Piscator, &c. The lower part of Jerusalem was already in the hands of the Israelites. He might place the armour for the present in the tent of his brethren. We find that the sword was deposited in the tabernacle, at Nobe. C. See v. 12. H.—The head was carried about to various cities. It would serve to strike terror into the Jebusites, at Jerusalem, and others. M.—The Vat. Sept. &c. immediately subjoin, C. 18:6. Now, &c. Lit. “And the women dancing, came to meet David.” H.—These three last verses occur only in the Alex. MS. though Theodoret (q. 43,) seems to have read them. In some other Greek copies, there is a long addition respecting David’s combat. See the New Hexapla. These verses are found, however, in Heb. Chal. &c. It is astonishing that Saul should not have known David. He was now more interested to be acquainted with his family, as he had engaged to give him his daughter in marriage. We must reflect that his malady might have impaired his memory, and David was still growing, so that a few months absence might produce a wonderful alteration, &c. C.—Know not. Lit. “if I know.” The different dress, in which David now appeared, gave rise to this ignorance. M.—Abner was not surely affected with the same malady as the king, who was obliged to ask David who was his father. But courtiers easily forget those from whom they have no expectations. H.—These strange proceedings make others conclude that this history is interpolated. Kennicott.—Huet maintains the contrary. D.—Saul only enquires about David’s parentage. Mariana. T.

1 KINGS 18

Ver. 1. Soul. Pythagoras said, “that friendship is an equality, and one soul, and that the friend is another self.” It would be difficult to find two souls more tender and generous than those of David and Jonathan. C.—Josephus speaks of their friendship on another occasion, as these five verses are omitted in the Rom. Sept. &c. Ken.

Ver. 3. For he, Jonathan. H.—Soul. “Friends have one soul.” Arist. Mor. ix. 8.

Ver. 4. Girdle, which perhaps was of great value. Job 12:18. He wished that David should lay aside his shepherd’s dress, and appear like himself at court, that all might know how much he loved him. M.

Ver. 5. Prudently, or with success. C.—Epecially. Heb. “also,” which enhances his praise, as courtiers are but too apt to envy those who are taken from a low condition and set over them in the king’s favour. David must have displayed great wisdom and moderation. H.

Ver. 6. Philistine. Some explain this of some fresh achievement against that nation, (Malvenda. W.) but without reason.—Dancing. Heb. also playing on the flute, or on some such instrument of music. C.—So Mary sung after the Israelites had crossed the Red Sea. Ex. 15:20. 2 K. 1:20. Judg. 11:34.

Ver. 7. Sung. The chorus of their song is given. C.—“The women sung, Saul slew his thousands; and the virgins answered, And David,” &c. Josephus.—The death of Goliath was equivalent to the slaughter of thousands, as he had filled the whole army of Israel with dismay. H.

Ver. 8. A thousand. These women were guilty of an indiscretion, through excess of zeal, as it is always displeasing for the sovereign to hear any of his subjects preferred before him. S. Chrys. hom. i. de Saul.—The jealousy of Saul was the more excited, as he had been threatened with the loss of his kingdom, and perceived in David all the qualifications of a king. A malo principe tanquam successor timetur quisquis est dignior. Pliny in Traj.—But was David responsible for what was spoken in his praise? C.—The Vat. Sept. omit what follows till v. 12. “And Saul feared David, (13) and he removed,” &c. The Alex. copy agrees with the Vulg. H.—Those who are proud, cannot bear the praises of others. W.

Ver. 9. Eye. Sept. “and Saul suspected.” H.—Chal. “laid snares for David.” C.

Ver. 10. Prophesied. Acted the prophet in a mad manner, (Ch). like an enthusiast, (C. 2 K. 9:11) or one possessed by the devil, as the Sybil was agitated by Apollo. Et rabie fera corda tument. Æneid vi. To alleviate his distress, David took up his harp. H.—Spear. With this weapon he was generally armed. C. 19:10. and 26:7. “It was used as a diadem formerly, and the ancients adored spears as gods.” Justin. xliii.

Ver. 13. People, as their leader. Saul gave him an honourable, but dangerous office, to procure his destruction. This is frequently the manner in which men of superior talents have been treated, (C.) as Corbulo, Germanicus, and Agricola were by three Roman emperors. Tacit. Ann. ii. &c.

Ver. 15. Began. Sept. “he was filled with awe in his presence.” Heb. “he was afraid of him,” as he perceived that God protected him in all perils.

Ver. 17. And Saul. This an the two following verses are omitted in the Rom. Sept. which subjoins, “and Michol, the daughter of Saul, loved David,” &c. H.—Wife. He had promised her already, (M.) if the verses in the preceding chapter be genuine. But why then had he delayed so long, and why does he require other conditions? The comparison made by the women, (v. 7,) and the inconstant temper of Saul, might account for this. H.—The Lord defends his people. As long as the Israelites followed the orders of God, their wars might justly be attributed to him; but not when they were waged to satisfy the cravings of ambition. C.

Ver. 18. Life. What exploits have I performed deserving such an honour? or what offices have my relations yet enjoyed? C.—David considers only his abject condition, and forgets his victories. H.

Ver. 19. Wife. If this were the case, the character of Saul is rendered more despicable and perfidious. David never reclaims Merob, as he did Michol. H.—All the children of the former were gibbeted, 2 K. 21:9. The latter was given to David for his destruction, like Cleopatra (Dan. 11:17,) to Ptolemy. T.

Ver. 20. Other, is not found in the Heb. Sept. &c. H.—Some Latin copies read, “David loved Michol,” (C.) as the Douay Bible translates; the authors living before the Popes had published their authentic editions. H.—Both might be true. Drus.

Ver. 21. Days. Heb. “In two thou shalt,” &c. C.—Prot. “in the one of the twain,” Merob or Michol. H.—Saul had deceived him with respect to the first; but he promises that he shall have “the second,” (C.) or two motives induced the king to make him this offer, the victory over Goliath, and the slaughter of 100 Philistines. M. T.—The Sept. omit this sentence, and read, “And the hand of the Philistines was upon Saul, and Saul commended,” &c.

Ver. 23. Ability, or riches. Sept. “without glory.” H. See v. 18.

Ver. 25. Dowry. Among the Hebrews, the man had to purchase his wife.—Philistines. They were the nearest nation of those who were not circumcised; and thus Saul would prove that David had attacked them, which would greatly irritate them against him. C.—Josephus specifies six hundred heads, (H.) falsely, (Horn) as he frequently disguises what might give his readers offence, as being either mean or incredible. C.—Hundred is not specified in the original Heb. copies, (Capel, iii. 17,) and David gives 200, v. 27. But Saul only stipulated for 100. See 2 K. 3:14. C.—Wife, “thinking it mean to be guilty of an untruth,” &c. says Josephus; “yet his disposition was not altered. He resolved, therefore, to take away his life, and wished Jonathan and his most trusty servants to put his designs in execution.” He then mentions the friendship of these two. But he takes no notice of the proffered marriage of Merob, and he seems not to have known that she was ever promised. See v. 17 and 19 and C. 17:12. H.

Ver. 28. David. Of the subsequent verses, the Rom. Sept. has only the following words. “And all Israel lived him; (29) and Saul still continued to be in awe of him.” The Alex. MS. agrees with the Heb.

only, instead of Michol, &c. it reads, "all Israel." If the contested passages were omitted, the history would be less perplexed. But we must wait for the decision of the Church in matters of this nature, and never decide to peremptorily. H.

Ver. 30. Forth, probably to revenge the recent insult. C.

1 KINGS 19

Ver. 1. Jonathan. He was most interested, as David might be feared as a competitor; (M.) and, under the cloak of friendship, he might more easily destroy him. Saul was a stranger to the generous sentiments of his son, or he would never have made the proposal. H.—Grotius compares him with Germanicus. C.

Ver. 2. Morning. Sept. add, "to-morrow." M.

Ver. 3. Field. Saul would come thither, or Jonathan would sound his father's disposition, and give David information in the place appointed. C.

Ver. 3. Hand, in danger. M.

Ver. 6. Slain. His inconstant temper might cause him to be moved with the expostulation of his son; but he presently relapsed, if he were ever sincere. C.—The Scripture seems to insinuate that he was. M.

Ver. 9. Saul. His jealousy was again enkindled by the success of David. C.—Hand, on music, to assuage the paroxysms of the king's fury. H.

Ver. 11. Morning, fearing lest they might miss him in the night, (Salien) and perhaps desiring to see his execution, after he had been tried. Joseph.—The Philistines would not attack Samson at night. See Judg. 16:2. Ex. 14:20. The Parthians and Mahometans will do nothing at that time; moved perhaps by some superstitious notion. C.

Ver. 13. Image. Heb. Teraphim. Aquila, "figures." Sym. "idols." Some believe that David had idols in his house, as ornaments, or to treat them with ignominy. Mercer.—But others cannot persuade themselves that he would keep such dangerous things. What Michol took, might therefore be some sacred representation, or a statue of some great man. Genebrard. (Kimchi. Maim.) Or it might be some piece of wood, or clothes folded up, so as to make the guards believe that David was in bed. Bochart, Anim. i. 2. 51. See Gen. 31:19. C.—They would not examine very narrowly. H.—The Taraphim denote both idolatrous and sacred things. Ose. 3:4. M.—Skin. Vat. and Alex. Sept. “liver,” still warm and in motion. T.—But they have followed a false reading, as well as Josephus and Aquila. C.—Some have inferred that the hair of goats in that country is reddish, because it was designed to resemble David’s hair, of the same colour. T.—This is, however, uncertain. The skin might form his pillow or coverlet. C.

Ver. 14. Sick. This is an officious lie. She tells another to excuse herself, v. 17. The children of Saul strive to prevent their father’s cruelty, by taking part with the innocent David. H.—It is thought that David composed the 68th Psalm, Eripe, &c. on this occasion. C.

Ver. 19. Najoth. It was probably a school or college or prophets, in or near Ramatha, under the direction of Samuel. Ch.—Chal. “in the house of doctrine.” See C. 10:5. M.

Ver. 20. Prophesying. That is, singing praises to God by a divine impulse. God was pleased on this occasion that both Saul’s messengers and himself should experience the like impulse, that he might understand, by this instance of the divine power, how vain are the designs of man against him whom God protects. Ch.—The messengers did not return. M.—They were seized by the spirit only when they arrived at Najoth. But Saul felt the impression even at Socho, threw aside his garments, and began to act and to speak as one inspired. C.

Ver. 24. Naked. Divested of his regal ornaments, (T.) though not in an indecent posture. People are said to be undressed, when they have not such clothes on as might be expected. Hesiod and Virgil say, Nudus ara, sere nudus; hiems ignava colono. “Plough and sow naked; choose a fine season for work, and rest in winter.” H. See Mic. 1:8. 2 K. 6:20.—Yet some assert (C.) that Saul was entirely undressed, as some pretended prophets and slaves go in the hot countries. Isai. 20:1. We are not to judge of the indecency of such behaviour from our own manners. Some copies read cecinit, (C.) and the Douay Bible has “and sang naked.” H.—Saul had not the gift of prophecy, like holy men, but only like Balaam’s ass, for a time. S. Aug. ad Simp. ii. 1. W.—Prophets. This is something wonderful. M.—The proverb was now confirmed. C. 10:11. C.

Ver. 1. To Jonathan, at Gabaa. He thought it no longer safe to remain at Najoth.

Ver. 2. Be. The recent machinations and orders of Saul had been concealed from his son, with whom he used to consult on all important matters. C.—Perceiving, however, that Jonathan was unwilling to come into his measures, Saul, in his phrenzy, tried to destroy David. H.—But Jonathan, forming his judgment of others by his own upright heart, relied on the oath of his father, (C.) and on the information he had lately communicated to him, when he desired David to be slain. M.—Abulensis believes that the particulars of a preceding reconciliation have been lost, which Salien supplies, A. 2973.

Ver. 3. As I may say, is not in Heb. Sept. “the space between me and thy father is filled up, unto death.” We can never more have any union, nor dwell together in safety. H.

Ver. 4. Soul, is often put for desire. Ps. 26:12. C.

Ver. 5. To-morrow is the new moon. The neomenia, or first day of the moon, kept according to the law, as a festival; and therefore Saul feasted on that day; and expected the attendance of his family. Ch. Num. 10:10.—Moon. Lit. “calends,” a Greek word, intimating that the people were informed, or “called” together, on that occasion; as many nations follow the lunar system in the regulation of the year. H.—The Rabbins say that people were stationed on the highest hills to observe the first appearance of the moon, and to give notice of it. But for fear of a mistake, two days were observed, as here we see that Saul gave a feast for such a length of time. This, however, is very uncertain. David speaks without any reference to the watchmen, as of a thing well known to all. The reason of Saul’s feasting two days, was because one of them was the sabbath. The following work-day David came to Nob, (v. 19,) and partook of the loaves which had been changed on the sabbath day. C. 21:6. Lev. 24:8.—Sit. The custom of sitting at table seems to have been more ancient than that of lying. The Persians chiefly introduced the latter. They had very low tables, so that one of them placed under the feet of Alexander, when he sat upon the throne of Darius, which was too high for him. Curt. v. Both customs frequently prevailed at the same time. Eccli. 9:12 and 31:12. Women probably always sat, as the Chaldee says Esther did. Est. 7:8. See Athen. i. 14. V. Max. ii. 1.—Day. The second of the month, after the sabbath was ended. C.—Pezron thinks that both the last and first days of the month were festivals. D.

Ver. 6. Tribe. It might seem an effect of pride, not to accept of such invitations of the king, without some good excuse. Ovid speaks of feasts instituted for relations alone. Fast. ii.

Proxima cognati dixere Charistia cari Et venit ad socios turba propinqua Deos. M.

—Saul might pretend that his throwing his spear at David, was an effect of his distemper; and as the latter had returned to his palace after the first attempt, he might judge that he would do the like now, though he had so lately sought his life. David probably retired to Bethlehem, and returned the third day, when he bid adieu to Jonathan and to the court of Saul for ever, (v. 21. C.) though he saw Jonathan once more at Ziph. C. 23:16.

Ver. 7. Height. Heb. “the evil is completed (or resolved upon) by him.” H.

Ver. 8. Lord, the most durable and sacred, confirmed by the name of God. C.—Kill. So Moses besought God to take away his life. A friend would put him to as little torture as possible. M.—But David only means strongly to assert his own innocence. H.

Ver. 9. Thee. Heb. “then, should I not tell thee?” C.—Sept. “and if it reach not thy cities, I will inform thee.”

Ver. 12. After. Sept. “The Lord ... has known that I will sift my father, as opportunity shall serve, thrice,” or repeatedly. H.

Ver. 13. Father, at the beginning of his reign. Jonathan foresees that David will be his father’s successor. C.—Hence he commends himself and family to his protection. M.

Ver. 14. Die. Heb. lit. “If I live, thou shalt not shew me, &c ... and if I die, (15) thou shalt not,” &c. It seems there is a negation too much. Jonathan requests that David would shew mercy to him and to his family; or he is willing that neither should partake of his kindness, if he prove a traitor to his friend. C.—Prot. “And thou shalt not only, while yet I live, shew me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not: (15) But also thou shalt not cut off they kindness from my house for ever, no not when the Lord hath cut off,” &c. H.

Ver. 15. May he. It is a curse upon himself, if he should not be faithful to his promise.—It. That is, revenge it upon David’s enemies, and upon me, if I shall fail of my word given to him. Ch.—The Heb. and several Latin MSS. stop at earth; and what follows, is not found in some Greek and Latin editions. C.—Enemies. May God punish David’s enemies, and me among the rest. M.

Ver. 16. Enemies. This seems to be a second translation of the former sentence, with a small variation.—Required may be expressed in the future, as an imprecation made by the two friends against those who should attempt to break the covenant, or to oppose David's reign. Sept. omit this verse entirely, and translate the following, (17) "and Jonathan continued to swear to David, inasmuch as he loved him, because he loved the soul of the man who loved him." He had such an affection for David, that he extended his love to all his friends. Prot. "so Jonathan made a covenant with ... David, saying: Let the Lord even require it at," &c. H.—He did so in due time, and the covenant between these two had its effect. C.

Ver. 19. Morrow. Heb. "and after three days (H. or, on the third day) thou shalt," &c. Syr. and Arab. "Thou wilt be called for at table, at the third hour." C.—Sept. use the same word, τρισσευσεις, as in the following verse: "I will shoot thrice at wild beasts, with arrows, sending as far as Laarmattarai," so here they may insinuate that David must "wait three days," (H.) or come on each of these days, that he may not slip an opportunity. Cajet.—Work. Le Clerc translates, "in the day of the business." Prot. "where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand, and shalt remain by the stone Ezel." Sept. Alex. "by this affair." Vat. "Ergab," a word which Grabe admits instead of εργον, in his edition. H.—Other copies, with the Syr. and Arab. have simply, "near this stone," which Junius styles speculam, as if it were a butt or landmark, (C.) or a stone to shew the road, (Lyran) or milestone, (T.) which latter supposition is not probable, as David desired to be concealed. M.—He would therefore choose some cavern, so as to be able to hear what Jonathan said, without being seen. H.—This precaution was necessary for the safety of both. M.

Ver. 23. Ever. Let us always inviolably adhere to our covenant. H.

Ver. 24. Field, on the third day, having gone in the mean time to Bethlehem, v. 6.

Ver. 25. Arose, out of respect. Sept. "he had the precedence over Jonathan" alone, as the latter sat "on the king's right hand, and Abner on the left." Arab. C.—David's place was after Abner. M.

Ver. 26. Purified, having perhaps touched some dead body, &c. Lev. 11:24.

Ver. 27. To-day, which was the sabbath. C.—On the new moons people did not travel far. M.

Ver. 29. Sacrifice. Heb. "my family hath a sacrifice," &c. v. 5. H.

Ver. 30. A man. Heb. “of an unjust revolt.” Thou hast taken part against thy father. C.—Prot. “son of the perverse rebellious woman.” Sept. “of the fugitive, (H.) or of those girls who go in quest of men.” We must not suppose that Jonathan’s mother was really of this description. Saul, in rage, wishes to affront his son, (C.) as some frantic parents call their children bastards, not reflecting that the reproach would fall upon themselves.—Isai, as he styles him out of contempt, v. 27.—Mother. Heb. &c. “of thy mother’s nakedness or shame.” M.—Instead of a crown, thou must expect to be reduced to a private station, to the disgrace of my family. H.

Ver. 31. The son of death. That is, one that deserveth death, and shall surely be put to death. Ch.—So people are often styled sons of perdition, of hell, of light, &c. (C.) when they are worthy of such things. H.—All the crime of David, was his too exalted merit, which, under a jealous prince, is often fatal. Nec minus periculum ex magna fama, quam ex mala. Tacit. Agricola.

Ver. 34. Great. Lit. “in the anger of fury.” H.—Him, either David or Jonathan. C.—Indeed the crime of rebellion had been imputed to both. H.—Jonathan was grieved on account of the affront and danger (M.) to which he had been publicly exposed, as well as for his friend, upon whose destruction he perceived that his father was now deliberately bent, and not merely during his fits of madness.—Confusion. Sept. “because his father had completed his malice against him;” (H.) or, “had resolved to make an end of him.” C.

Ver. 36. Another. The Heb. &c. do not express this distinctly; (C.) but we find, v. 38, “the lad gathered up the arrows.”

Ver. 40. Arms. Prot. “artillery:” but the bow and arrow, &c. are meant. The boy was sent away under this pretext.

Ver. 41. Place. Prot. “out of a place towards,” &c. H.—Chal. “from the side of the rock Asha;” (or Ezel, v. 19,) though the name is written rather differently in Hebrew. But this was the place appointed. C.—Sept. “from sleep, ... and adored him, ... and each bewailed his neighbour, to great perfection.” H.—More. Jonathan strove to comfort him, as he was leaving wife, friends, and all. M.

Ver. 42. Stand. This is not expressed in the text, which is left imperfect, (H.) to denote the anguish of the parting friends, (M.) very beautifully. Salien.—David did not exactly comply with this covenant, and his grandson lost half the kingdom. 2 K. 19. T.

1 KINGS 21

Ver. 1. Nobe. A city in the tribe of Benjamin, to which the tabernacle of the Lord had been translated from Silo. Ch.—It was about 12 miles south-west of Gabaa. Tudelensis.—There was another Nobe on the east side of the Jordan, to which Serarius thinks David was three days in travelling. But when David made that assertion, he wished to conceal the real state of his affairs, as he had not seen Saul since he was at Najoth, v. 5. Nobe was afterwards accounted a sacerdotal city, v. 15. 2 Esd. 11:32.—Achimelech, who is perhaps the same with Achia (C. 14:3,) and Abiathar. Mark 2:26.—With thee. He would not expose his men to the resentment of Saul, (C.) though he afterwards gave the priest to understand that he had some attendants, (v. 2) as the gospel relates. Mat. 12:3. He dismissed them before he entered Geth. C.

Ver. 2. The king, &c. This was an untruth, which David, like many other great men, might think lawful in such an emergency. But it is essentially evil. C.—And such, which he deems it unnecessary to specify. Sept. retains the Heb. words, “Phelanni almoni.” See Ruth 4:1.

Ver. 4. If the young men be clean, &c. If this cleanness was required of them that were to eat that bread, which was but a figure of the bread of life which we receive in the blessed sacrament; how clean ought Christians be when they approach to our tremendous mysteries? And what reason hath the Church of God to admit none to be her ministers, to consecrate and daily receive this most pure sacrament, but such as devote themselves to a life of perpetual purity. Ch.—Women. God required this on many occasions. Ex. 19:15. Urgent necessity determined Achimelech to grant the loaves, as our Saviour intimates, though it is probable that he first consulted the Lord. C. 22:16. C.—David perhaps went to Nobe on purpose to ask advice. M.—We have here an example of a dispensation, and of the distinction between lay, or common, and holy bread. W.

Ver. 5. Vessels, i.e. the bodies, have been holy; that is, have been kept from impurity: (Ch). in which sense S. Paul uses the word. 1 Thess. 4:4. It also includes garments, arms, &c. All was to be clean. Sept. “my men are all purified.” C.—Defiled. Is liable to expose us to dangers of uncleanness, (Ch). as we shall perhaps have to fight. H.—Sanctified. That is, we shall take care, notwithstanding these dangerous circumstances, to keep our vessels holy; that is, keep our bodies from every thing that may defile us. Ch.—The text is very obscure. Heb. “the way is impure, because to-day it shall be purified in the vessel.” C.—Prot. “and the bread is in a manner common, yea though it were sanctified this day in the vessel." We might eat of it in a case of such necessity. H.—Though laics be commonly debarred from tasting of it, we will partake of it with all due respect. C.—Sept. "the journey is (of a disagreeable nature, or) impure, therefore it will be rendered holy by my vessels," or arms, in the king's cause. H.—He seems to be going towards the infidel nations. M.

Ver. 7. Within. Heb. mehtsar, "detained, or assembles before the Lord." Theodoret thinks he was possessed; others believe he had made a vow, &c.—Edomite. Some Greek copies read, a Syrian, as also C. 22:9. C.—He had embraced the Jewish religion. M.

Ver. 9. This. Chaldee observes, he gave this sword "after he had consulted the Lord with the ephod." In a just war, the ornaments of the temples may be used. Pro republic i plerumque templa nudantur. Seneca. Grot. Jur. iii. 5. 2. C.—Tostatus believes that David would restore this sword, as soon as he had procured other arms.

Ver. 10. Achis. He is elsewhere called Achimelech. This bold step was taken by God's order, (Salien) or secret impulse, as the high priest and Doeg knew not whither David had directed his course. H.—Sanchez thinks David received no express declaration, as the event was not very prosperous. M.—Many great men have taken refuge among their greatest enemies, as Themistocles, Alcibiades, and Coriolanus fled respectively to the Persians, Lacedæmonians, and Volscians, and were received with great respect. Indeed the acquisition of such men is equivalent to a victory. C.—Though David might expect that his name would be hateful at Geth, as he had slain their great champion, &c. yet he had done it in an open manner, and had displayed the most heroic courage, so that the king and nobility might raise their thoughts above the vulgar sentiments of jealousy and revenge. Salien.—David only retired from the court of this king, to avoid the hatred of the courtiers; he returned again, and was kindly received. C. 27:1. C.

Ver. 11. Land, equal to a king in glory. M.—Perhaps they had heard of the rejection of Saul, and reflected that their own country belonged to him, according to the terms proposed by Goliath. C.

Ver. 13. Countenance. Heb. "sentiment, (C.) or, behaviour." H.—Chal. "reason." He no longer acted as a prudent man, but like a fool.—Down; not fainting, (C.) but like one in an epileptic fit. H.—Heb. "he feigned himself mad." Chal. "stupid."—Stumbled. Heb. "wrote, or made figures upon." Sept. "beat the drum upon the gates of the city, and he was carried about, or acted the fool, in his hands, (παρεφερετο εν ταις χερσιν, αυτου: Amama would have, αυτων, their) and he fell against the doors of the gate," &c. They seem to give a double translation. S. Aug. says, "we cannot understand how David could be carried in his own hands. But we understand how it was verified in Christ. For Christ was carried in his own hands at his last supper, when he gave, or commending, his own body, he said, This, &c. for he then carried his own body in his own hands." In Ps. xxxiii. conc. i.) Ferebat enim illud corpus in manibus suis. Amama may laugh at S. Augustine's ignorance of Hebrew, but the holy doctor was at least a sincere Catholic. H.—Beard. We find some wretched objects doing the same. Mar. 9:17. The spittle was deemed infectious. Et illic isti qui sputatur, morbus interdum venit. Plautus in Captivis.

Ver. 15. House. David had not rushed into the palace of his own accord, but wished to remain concealed. Some of the people however knew him, and would have him to enlist as one of the soldiers of Achis; (M.) or even designed to get him put to death, which made him have recourse to this expedient. Some of the saints have imitated him, to avoid worldly honours and dignities of the Church. H.—Thus the conduct of Jesus Christ himself, was accounted foolishness by worldlings. Mark 3:21. Luke 23:11. 1 Corinthians 1:23. V. Bede. W.

Ver. 1. Odollam, about two days' journey from Geth, (Salien) nine miles east of Eleutheropolis, in the tribe of Juda. Euseb. C.—Jos. 12:15. 2 Mac. 12:38. M.—Thither, to avoid the fury of Saul, which fell so heavy upon the priests, v. 16. The most warlike sons of Gad came hither also, to join David. 1 Par. 12:8. Abul. Salien, A. 2973.

Ver. 2. Men. His title to the crown was incontestable, so that he might justly make war, particularly in his own defence, and receive those who flocked to him to screen themselves from the persecution of Saul, and from their debtors, whom they would thus enable themselves to repay in time, by the plunder which they would take from the enemy. David maintained the strictest discipline, and withheld his men from making any disturbance, always manifesting the greatest respect for the person of the king. C.—The soldiers of Jephthe were of the same description as these of David. Judg. 11:3. H.

Ver. 3. Of Moab, to distinguish it from the city of Benjamin, where Samuel had assembled the people; (M.) and perhaps also from the birth-place of Jephthe, unless the Moabites had taken possession again of that part of Galaad. C.—Saul had made war upon this king, so that he was more ready to protect David, who departing soon after, by the admonition of Gad, (v. 5. C.) left those who could not follow him under his care. In the mean time he lived on plunder, taken from the surrounding enemies, (Tostat) and was joined by 200 men from the tribes of Benjamin and of Juda, (1 Par. 12:16,) with Amasai, his nephew, by his sister Abigail, at their head. Salien, A.C. 1079.

Ver. 4. The hold. The strong hold, or fortress of Maspha. Ch.—It signifies “a watch-tower.” H.—In this place the parents of David probably finished their days, as we find no farther mention of them. Salien.

Ver. 5. Haret, west of Jerusalem. Sept. read “the town of Haret,” (Euseb.) or “Sarec.” M.—Rama, “the height,” in Gabaa. C.—God would not suffer David and his followers to continue long among the infidels, for fear of danger. M.—The hero shews his ready obedience to the word of the unknown prophet, and is willing again to expose himself in the midst of Saul’s dominions. Salien.

Ver. 7. Jemini. Benjamites, my countrymen. Saul approaches them with being too little concerned about his interests, and falsely accuses his own son, who, it seems, had retired from court, after his father had attempted to kill him. But he shewed no signs of disloyalty. C.—The king mentions the league between Jonathan and David, on suspicion. C. 20:23. M.

Ver. 9. Servants, or herdsmen. C. 21:7. Sept. “the Syrian, who was set over the mules of Saul.” H.—Informers are a set of men destructive to the public,” says Tacitus, Hist. i. 4.

Ver. 10. Consulted. Some think this was a falsehood, as it is not mentioned before. Hugo.—But Achimelech does not deny the fact, v. 15. C.

Ver. 12. Achitob. He gives him no honourable title, no more than David, (v. 7, &c.) out of disrespect. M.

Ver. 14. Faithful ... and honourable, are titles given to people of great distinction at court. C. 9:6. Num. 12:7. Gen. 34:19.

Ver. 15. For him? We might read without an interrogation, “I have to-day begun ...” (Chald.) never suspecting that it would be disagreeable to the king. C.—His character and his declarations, led me to conclude quite the contrary, so that I cannot lawfully be accused of any conspiracy. H.

Ver. 17. Messengers. Heb. “runners.” These officers remained at court and were people of great account, (C.) like the king’s guards, 2 K.

15:1. 3 K. 1:5. H.—Lord, out of reverence, and being convinced of their innocence. M.—The obedience which we owe to superiors is subordinate to that which we must always shew towards God and justice. C.—Saul unjustly condemned them as the abettors of his competitor. W.

Ver. 18. Five. Josephus reads “385.” Sept. “305.”—Ephod. They all appeared in this dress, as they were priests. C.—It was different from the sacred ephod. Abulensis.—Thus the posterity of Heli was almost entirely cut off, as God had threatened. C. 2. D. T.

Ver. 19. Sword. Saul, now abandoned God, acts against all law. He probably, on this occasion, destroyed the inhabitants of Gabaon, to make place for the tabernacle, which was removed hither. C. See C. 27:12.—He might also appoint Achitob high priest, the father of Sadoc, who supplanted Abiathar, 1 Par. 12 and 16:29. T.

Ver. 20. Escaped. He had perhaps remained at Nob, to do duty. M.—God was pleased to reserve him, (C.) to convey the sacred ornaments of the high priest to David. H.—S. Bachiarus looks upon the slaughtered priests as martyrs. T.

Ver. 22. House. Lit. “I am guilty,” &c. H.—“Good people acknowledge a fault, where there is none.” S. Greg.—David was aware of the malicious temper of Doeg, but he could not prevent its evil effects, as he had applied to the high priest without perceiving that he was there. H.—He received Abiathar at Ceila, which he had protected against the Philistines. C. 22.

Ver. 23. Saved. We will be as one soul. On this occasion David composed the 51st Psalm, Quid gloriaris, to reprobate the conduct of Doeg. Salien.—We may consider David as the fourth in order of the sacred writers, as he appears after Moses, Josue, and Samuel. H.

1 KINGS 23

Ver. 1. Barns. The floors were composed of earth and the dregs of oil, made into a sort of mortar, so that rain, mice, &c. could not hurt them. Cato 91 and 129.—Hither the people of Ceila had gathered their corn, and the enemy came to plunder, or to spoil, according to custom. Judg. 5:4 and 15:5. C.—Ceila was about seven miles from Hebron, and as many from Eleutheropolis. S. Jerom.

Ver. 2. Lord, by the prophet Gad, (Salien. v. 6. M.) or by Abiathar, who brought the ephod along with him. David undertakes nothing without his advice.

Ver. 3. Judea, in the midst of the country, remote from the Philistines; and in a forest, where Saul cannot so easily attack us, as in a city.

Ver. 4. Again, in the presence of his soldiers. C.—Thus Gedeon requested a double miracle of the Lord, to encourage his men. M.

Ver. 6. An ephod, or the ephod. That is, the vestment of the high priest, with the Urim and Thummim, by which the Lord gave his oracles.

Ver. 7. Bars. This was what David's men apprehended. Saul thinks this is a fit opportunity for taking them all prisoners; and he supposes that God was on his side, though, after his repeated crimes, he had little reason to flatter himself with hopes of this nature. The wicked, however, easily delude themselves. H.

Ver. 8. People, in the neighbourhood. It is hardly probable that all Israel should be put in motion to take a few men. C.

Ver. 9. Secretly. He might have pretended that the armament was against the Philistines. M.—Ephod. Some say that David put it on. But this was the privilege of the high priest, who gave the answer to David's consultation, which he might perhaps repeat after him. C.—He put on the rational to consult God. Ex. 28. Lev. 8. W.

Ver. 12. Up. God had only answered the first question before. He now informs David, that it is the intention of the men of Ceila to deliver him into the hands of Saul, who was preparing to attack their city, and that he would inevitably fall into his hands, (C.) if he did not retire. W.—God sees contingent events with the same certainty as those which will really take place. H.—The people of Ceila could not have justly delivered up the innocent David, but they might have insisted that he should quit their city, to save it from destruction; or they might have forced him. Scholastic. T.

Ver. 14. Zipf, eight miles east of Hebron, (S. Jer.) towards the southern Carmel. Euseb.—Abdias (v. 3) takes notice of the clefts of the rocks of Edom. S. Jerom says, this mountain was “dark and cloudy.” M.

Ver. 16. In God exceedingly, reminding him of God's promises. C.—He hoped to see David king, and himself next to him in power. H.

Ver. 17. Next, in dignity; thy helper and associate. See Eccli. 4:8, 11. —This, our league, (C.) or the decree appointing David to be king. M.

Ver. 18. Lord, Gad or Abiathar being present. S. Jer.—This is the third time they had confirmed their alliance, to satisfy their love. M.

Ver. 19. Hand, to the south. D.

Ver. 22. Him, and therefore will be upon his guard. H.—Syriac, “because I am told he is crafty.” C.—Sept. “because Saul said, lest this crafty man should exert all his art;” or, “lest he should be very cunning.” H.—Saul foreboded that he would again elude his pursuit. Vatable.

Ver. 23. And if. Heb. “if he be in the land, I will.”—Thousands; the cities, or with all the troops. D.

Ver. 24. Maon, in Arabia Petrea, not far from Bersabee. C.

Ver. 26. Other side, to the south.—Despaired, without the divine assistance. Salien.—Heb. nechpaz, “feared, or (D.) made haste to flee.” Sept. “David was screened to depart.” He used all possible precautions not to fall into Saul’s hands, though he knew he should succeed him. He might still experience some fear of ill treatment. H.

Ver. 28. Division, as it alone had been between the two rivals. Saul was obliged to leave the place, though he and his men were in suspense what to do. C.

1 KINGS 24

Ver. 1. Engaddi, below Jericho, on the west side of the Dead Sea. It was famous for rocks and caverns. C.

Ver. 3. Goats; an hyperbole. M.—Heb. “upon the rocks of the wild goats.” H.

Ver. 4. Cotes. These were probably no other than the caverns, in which shepherds there secure themselves and their flocks, in the night, and from storms. T.—Some of them, in Syria, are so capacious as to contain 4,000 men, (Strabo xvi.) so that David might well remain unperceived by Saul, who did not enter so far. Polyphemus and Cacus dwelt in caverns, with their flocks. Virg. Æneid viii.—Nature. Heb. “to cover his feet,” which has the same import. Syr. and Arab. “to rest, or sleep.”

Ver. 5. Eyes. This might have been spoken by Gad, or Samuel; (M.) or they only mean that this is a most favourable opportunity. Some think that David ought to have embraced it, and put an end to these troubles, by the death of the usurper. But this was not the opinion of David; and God, who had promised him the throne, had not authorized him to lay violent hands on Saul. He might act on the defensive, but not be the aggressor. T.—Arose, with an intention to kill his unjust persecutor, v. 11.—Robe, to convince him how easily he might have taken away his life. S. Aug. de C. xii. 6.—The noise of Saul's attendants hindered him from being perceived. Perhaps Saul might have put off his robe. M.—S. Chrysostom observes, the David obtained more glory by sparing Saul than by killing Goliath. T.—Clemency makes a man like God. Cicero.

Ver. 6. Heart struck him; viz. with remorse, as fearing he had done amiss. Ch.—A tender conscience is uneasy about things which are not sinful, while some stick at nothing. W.—The action of David seemed disrespectful. C.—“The subjects of kings adore the royal name as a divinity.” Curtius vii. Regium nomen ... pro deo colunt.

Ver. 7. Anointed. He was chosen by God, and to be judge by him. C.—Reges in ipsos imperium est Jovis. Hor.—David was not to mount the throne, till Saul was removed, by God's ordinance. W.

Ver. 11. A thought to kill thee. That is, a suggestion, to which I did not consent. Ch.—Heb. “and he spoke to kill thee, and he has pardoned thee; and he said, I will not,” &c. C.—Prot. “and some bade me kill thee, but mine eye spared thee, and I said.” Sept. “and I would not kill thee, and I spared thee, and said,” &c. H.

Ver. 12. Father. He had married Saul's daughter; (M.) and the king ought to be the common father of his people. H.

Ver. 13. Revenge me of thee; or, as it is in the Hebrew, will revenge me. The meaning is, that he refers his whole cause to God, to judge and punish according to his justice; yet so as to keep himself, in the mean time, from all personal hatred to Saul, or desire of gratifying his own passion, by seeking revenge. So far from it, that when Saul was afterwards slain, we find that, instead of rejoicing at his death, he mourned most bitterly for him. Ch.—If it be lawful to seek redress from a magistrate, much more may we appeal to the Sovereign Judge! M.

Ver. 14. Thee: the tree is known by its fruit. If therefore I have behaved in this manner, no longer trust the reports of others against me. C.—The wicked, if left to themselves, will be their own tormentors. He may thus indirectly threaten Saul, as iniquity is often put for punishment. M.—The wicked shall at last open thier eyes, and be reclaimed. Rabbins ap. Munster.—David entertained hopes that even Saul would now be convinced of his innocence. H.

Ver. 15. Dog. This expression is still used to denote a contemptible person. 2 K. 16:9. What honour can so great a king derive, from gaining the victory over a man unarmed? &c. C.

Ver. 17. Voice. He was at such a distance, as not to be able to distinguish his features.—Wept. The greatest reprobates may sometimes feel sentiments of compunction, so that we need not here doubt of Saul's sincerity. C.—He might otherwise have turned upon David with his 3,000, and easily have seized his prey. H.

Ver. 22. Father. David complied with this request as far as he was able: but, as God was resolved to punish the posterity of Saul, for the injury done to the Gabaonites, he was forced to give them all up, except Miphiboseh, the son of Jonathan. C.—He could not promise to defend them, if they proved guilty.

Ver. 23. Places, knowing that no dependence was to be had on Saul. M.—How blind and ungrateful must this king have been, thus to fight against the known designs of Providence, instead of endeavouring to reward and to make a friend of so great a person! H.

Ver. 1. Samuel died. The Rabbins say four months before Saul. Seder, olam 13. T.—Others believe about two years; and suppose that he was 98 years old, twenty of which he had been judge: (C.) Salien says 38, and that he lived seventy-seven years. M.—On all these points the learned are divided. C. 7:15. They are more unanimous in praising (H.) the conduct of this most holy statesman. Grotius compares him with Aristides. C.—But he Holy Ghost gives Samuel a far more glorious character. Eccli. 46:16. &c. H.—Both he and his mother are figures of the two testaments. Anna becomes fruitful—Samuel is substituted in the place of Heli. The sterility of Anna represents the incapacity of the Synagogue, to produce living and virtuous children. She bears Samuel, the figure of Jesus Christ, who reunites in his person the royal and the sacerdotal dignity. But under another point of view, Samuel, how perfect soever, must give place to the more perfect David, the glorious type of Jesus Christ, and thus the Synagogue, notwithstanding all her prerogatives, must yield to the Church. See S. Aug. de C. xvii. 1, 4. Many of the ancients have looked upon Samuel as the high priest: but the generality have acknowledged that he was only a Levite, (C.) or an extraordinary priest, like Moses. H.—All Israel, or many from every tribe, assembled to attend his funeral; (T.) and all mourned for him, as they had done for Moses and Aaron. Salien.—House, or among his kindred, (T.) in a place which he had chosen for his tomb. This is called the house of the wicked for ever; but the just raise their hopes much higher, and await a more splendid palace above, and a glorious resurrection. H.—The would not bury Samuel in his dwelling-house, as it could not then be entered without incurring an uncleanness. C.—His bones were translated with great respect to Constantinople, and a noble mausoleum was built for them by the emperor Justinian. Procopius v. S. Jer. c. Vigil. T.

Ver. 2. Maon. Vat. Sept. has the same word in the preceding verse, instead of Pharan. H.—Possessions. Heb. “work.” Cattle then formed the chief source of riches. Carmel and Maon were not far from Pharan, in Arabia. C.

Ver. 3. Caleb, the famous companion of Josue. His name means, “a dog;” whence the Sept. “he was a Cynic.” Josephus, “he followed the manners of the Cynics,” who were remarkable for their impudence, like dogs. Caleb was of the same tribe as David, and ought to have been more favourable to him on that account, v. 6. H.

Ver. 7. Molested them. This deserved some acknowledgment, as they might have done it with impunity. But David had also been of service to Nabal’s men, as one of them told Abigail, v. 16–21.

Ver. 8. Good day, set aside for rejoicing, w hen the sheep were shorn. 2 K. 13:24.

Ver. 10. Masters. As if he had said, you and David are but fugitive slaves. C.—He might also insinuate, that David encouraged such practices. C. 22:2. H.

Ver. 11. Water, under which name all sorts of drinks are included. Nabal had plenty of wine, and was much intoxicated, v. 36. Sept. translate, “wine.” Syr. and Arab. “drink.”—Cattle. Heb. “victims,” which is a term used both for sacred and profane feasts.

Ver. 14. Rejected them. Heb. “flew against them.” Chal. “saw them with disgust.”

Ver. 17. Determined, and as if it had already taken place. C. 20:7.

Ver. 18. Raisins. Hebrew tsimmukim, “dried raisins,” or clusters of an extraordinary size. Roger speaks of some gathered in the vale of Sorec, which weighed 25½ pounds. A.D. 1634. Sept. “a gomer of dry raisins.” Syr. and Arab. “a hundred cheeses.”—Cakes. Chal. “pounds.” Heb. is imperfect, two hundred ... of figs. We must supply (C.) cakes, with the Prot. &c. or pounds, with the Chaldee, (H.) as each of the cakes perhaps weighed so much. M.

Ver. 19. Nabal. Knowing his churlish temper, and that he was drunk at this time, (v. 36. H.) she might be well excused from the ordinary laws which forbid a wife to dispose of her husband’s property, without his consent. The emergency left no time for consultation. She gave a part to save the whole. C.

Ver. 20. Foot. Heb. “in the obscurity,” or road covered with trees. Sept. “in the shade.” Chal. “on the side.” David was descending from the mountains of Pharan, at the same time.

Ver. 22. The enemies, is left out in some editions of the Sept. But David wishes all evils to himself, though, to avoid the ominous expression, he specifies his enemies, if he do not punish Nabal.—Leave. David certainly sinned in his designs against Nabal and his family, as he himself was afterwards sensible, when he blessed God for hindering him from executing the revenge he had proposed. Ch.—All. Chal. “any one who is come to the use of reason.” Syr. and Arab. “the least thing hanging upon the wall.” I will destroy the guilty, and plunder all the valuable effects. C.—But the Heb. Sept. &c. agree with the Vulg. and the meaning is, either that every man, or that every dog, and even the meanest things, should be enveloped in the general ruin. H.—The manners of men vary, but those of dogs are always the same. Hence, it is more generally supposed that this expression (C.) denotes that even dogs shall be exterminated, and consequently other things for which Nabal would have a greater affection. H.—Aurelian being irritated against the inhabitants of Thiane, swore, “I will not leave a dog in this town;” which all people explained as if he meant to leave nothing alive in it. But being afterwards moved with compassion at the distress of the people, he executed his threat literally, and killed all the dogs. Vopisc. See 3 K. 14:10 and 15:29. and 21:21. and 4 K. 5:6. Bochart, Anim. ii. 55. Delrio, adag. 184. C.—The unhappy Geddes translates, “a dog,” to avoid the indelicate allusion. It would have been well if he had allowed himself no greater liberties! H.—The Heb. mashtin, may denote a shepherd’s or a mastiff dog. M.

Ver. 24. Iniquity, or the punishment of this fault, v. 28. C.—She wishes to divest the mind of David from the consideration of her husband’s incivility; and, after condemning it herself, insinuates that it would be unbecoming for a great king to mind so insignificant an enemy, v. 28. H.—Thus the emperor Adrian, and Louis XII. would not resent the affronts which they had received before they were raised to that high dignity. T.

Ver. 25. The king, is not in Heb. Sept. &c. David's title was not yet publicly acknowledged. C.—But Abigail plainly alludes to it, v. 28. H.—Name. Nabal, in Hebrew, signifies a fool. C.—Thus she extenuates his fault, by attributing it to a deficiency in understanding.

Ver. 26. To thee. She felicitates David on not having put his design in execution. C.—Theodoret thinks he might lawfully have done it; but others believe that the fault bore no proportion with the intended punishment. T.—As Nabal, devoid of sense. Abigail displays the eloquence of nature. C.

Ver. 27. Blessing, or present. M. See 2 Cor. 9:5. C.

Ver. 28. House. Thy family shall long continue in the enjoyment of the royal power. Chal. “an established kingdom.” H.—Lord, as his general. —Evil. Do no manner of injustice. Heb. “and evil hast not been found,” &c. Hitherto thy life has been irreproachable. C.

Ver. 29. Bundle. Such things are more secure than those which are loose. W.—Of the living, or predestinate, over whom Providence watches in a particular manner. She seems to allude to the method of carrying pieces of silver in bundles. Prov. 7:20. Chal. “the soul of my lord shall be in the treasury of the lives of the age, before the Lord God.” C.—It shall be preserved for length of days, like something most precious, (H.) while the wicked shall be in continual danger and anxiety, like a stone in a sling. Zac. 9:15. By substituting c for b in Heb. the sense may be still more striking: “the soul of my lord shall be preserved like a living (precious, serviceable,) stone. But the soul of thy enemies shall be whirled in a sling.” The Hebrews had a great esteem for slingers, so that this comparison would be sufficiently noble. A living stone is often mentioned both is sacred and in profane authors. 1 Pet. 2:4. Virgil Æneid i. 171. Vivoque sedilia saxo.

Ver. 30. Israel, a thing which all expected, and even Saul himself. C. 24:21.

Ver. 31. Scruple. Heb. “scandal,” or sin, for David might defend himself, but ought not to attack or take revenge, like a king. Grot.—Innocent. Many of Nabal's family were such, and even his fault did not deserve death. Heb. “shed blood without cause.” C.—Handmaid, who has suggested this good advice. M.—David was so much pleased with her prudence and beauty, that he afterwards married her.

Ver. 32. Speech. Heb. "advice, or wisdom." Sept. "conduct." C.

Ver. 35. Face. I have been pleased with thy coming, and granted thy request. H.—David had sworn with too much haste. C.—"It is sometimes wrong to perform what has been promised, and to keep an oath." S. Amb. Off. i. C. ult.

Ver. 36. Morning. Admirable pattern of discretion, and how reprimands may be made with advantage. C.—A medicine given at an improper time often does harm. Plin. xvii. 27. When a person said to Cleostratus, "Are you not ashamed to get drunk?" he replied, "Are you not ashamed to rebuke a drunken man?"

Ver. 37. Stone. Stupified at the thought of the imminent danger to which he had foolishly exposed himself. So the poets represent Niobe as metamorphosed into a stone, at the hearing of her children's death. T.—Josephus intimates that Nabal was killed by the malignant influence of the stars, sideratus. Ant. vi. 14. Thus, says he, David "learnt that no wicked person can escape the vengeance of God, and that Providence does not neglect human affairs, and abandon them to chance."

Ver. 39. Blessed be, &c. David praises God on this occasion, not out of joy for the death of Nabal, (which would have argued a rancour of heart) but because he saw that God had so visibly taken his cause in hand, in punishing the injury done to him; whilst, by a merciful providence, he kept him from revenging himself. Ch. Ps. 57:10.

Ver. 41. Thy servant. She speaks to David's representatives, as if he had been present. H.—The marriage was proposed probably a month or two after the death of Nabal; and Abigail followed the messengers, in a short time. M.

Ver. 43. Took, or "had taken before," according to Josephus. Hence she is placed first, (C.) as the mother of David's first-born, Amnon. 2 K. 3:2. M.—Michol, whom he married first, had no children. H.—Jezrahel, a city of Juda. M. Jos. 15:56.—There was another more famous place of this name is Issachar.

Ver. 44. Phalti, or Phaltiel, 2 K. 3:15. Saul violated all laws by so doing, and David took her back when he came to the throne, which he could not have done if he had given her a bill of divorce. Deut. 24:4. C.—Michol was not blameless in living thus with another man. M.—The Rabbins say that a sword hindered Phalti from approaching her. Horn in Sulp.—Gallim, a city of Benjamin. Isai. 10:30. C.

1 KINGS 26

Ver. 1. Ziph. Having declared themselves so decidedly against David, they apprehended the utmost danger if he should ascend the throne.—Hill. Heb. “Gabaa,” as the Vulg. leaves it, v. 3. It lay to the right hand of Ziph, (C. 23:19,) or “of Jesimon.” Sept.

Ver. 4. Certainly, or in a place strongly secured by nature. Sept. “well armed.”

Ver. 5. Tent, or covered chariot, such as the Scythians use in their marches. Justin i. or in a “royal tent.” Sept. λαμπηνη, (Pollux. M.) “richly ornamented,” (Lucifer of Cagliari) “in the midst” (Aquila) of his troops. C.—David might see all was quiet from an eminence, or he might be informed by his spies. M.

Ver. 6. Hethite. He had probably embraced the Jewish religion.—Abisai was the son of Sarvia, David’s sister, and made a great figure at court. C.—David was directed by God to manifest his clemency (M.) and reverence for Saul in this perilous attempt. H.

Ver. 8. My. Heb. “the spear,” which was fixed in the ground at Saul’s pillow. Prot. “let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear, even to the earth, at once, and I will not smite him a second time.” H.

Ver. 9. Guiltless. Saul was still his king, how wicked soever, and this title rendered his person inviolable. The eastern nations are very seldom guilty of rebellion, or of murdering their kings; a thing of which we find so many examples in the Roman, English, and French histories. C.—A private man could not lay violent hands upon the king without a crime; and therefore David represses Abisai, and commits his cause to God. C. 24:13. M.—He will not permit any one to destroy the life of the king, though he was already anointed to succeed him. W.

Ver. 10. To die a natural death. Thus those who are slain, are said to die before their day. Ps. 54:2–8. Jesus was not taken, because his hour was not yet come. John 2:4 and 7:30. C.—David waits with patience, that God might take off his adversary by sickness, old age, or the sword. M.—He will not ascend the throne before the time appointed, and he will not kill Saul, except it be in battle, in his own defence. H.

Ver. 12. Water, for refreshment, or for purifications.—Lord. It is not necessary to have recourse to a miracle, (C.) though it must have been by a special providence that all continued in such a deep sleep, (H.) to give David an opportunity of manifesting his innocence. W.

Ver. 15. Israel. This was a cutting irony. C.—Salien attributes to it the enmity which Abner bore to David for above seven years. M.

Ver. 16. Death; i.e. you deserve to die. Such negligence was punishable with death, according to the Roman laws; & qui excubias. Grot.

Ver. 19. Sacrifice, that he may be appeased; (Jonathan. Vatab.) or rather, I am willing to fall a victim, (M.) and pray that thy sacrifice may be acceptable, and all thy designs against me succeed. Ps. 19:4.—They are. The opposition of this sentence to the preceding seems to require “let them be,” &c. What in effect did not those deserve who wished to make David adore false gods? C.—Lord in the land of Israel. —Gods. They said so, at least by their actions. M.—All other countries were in a manner abandoned to idol-worship, so that a person could not dwell in them, without the most imminent danger. See 2 K. 14:16. Ps. 83:12. C.

Ver. 20. Before, the contrary to the decrees of the Lord, (H.) who will be my avenger.—Hunted, (persequitur) is here used in a passive sense; (C.) or it may be rendered, “as a partridge pursues” what it feeds upon. H.

Ver. 21. Precious, and treated as such, with care and respect. See 4 K. 1:14. Ps. 48:9. Isai. 43:4.—Ignorant. Yet Saul was inexcusable. 2 K. 24:10, &c.

Ver. 22. It. He would not keep the spear, lest it might seem disrespectful.

Ver. 24. Set by. Lit. “magnified,” or deemed very precious. H.—Distress. These were the last words which David addressed to Saul; and they seem to have made a deep impression upon him. But as no dependance could be placed on Saul’s most solemn promises, David resolved, by God’s advice, to retire to the country of Geth. Salien. A. 2978.

Ver. 25. Prevail, and mount the throne.—Place, Gabaa. M.

Ver. 1. Hands. God requires that we should act with prudence. D.—David probably consulted the Lord, and sent ambassadors to Achis, before he went into his dominions, (M.) where he had been in such danger before. D.

Ver. 2. Maach, or Maacha. 3 K. 2:29. This king had perhaps seen David, when he counterfeited madness. But now he was convinced that, by granting him protection, he would greatly annoy Saul, and draw many brave men out of his dominions.

Ver. 3. Household. They were aware of the cruelty of Saul. The names of these valiant men are specified, 1 Par. 12:1. &c.

Ver. 5. Country, less peopled, and more remote from the sea.—With thee. David was attended like a king, so that he wished to avoid giving umbrage to Achis, and, at the same time, keep his own men at a greater distance from the contagious morals of the idolaters.

Ver. 6. Day. This was written some time after the death of Samuel.—Siceleg belonged at first to Juda, and was afterwards given to the tribe of Simeon, till it fell into the hands of the Philistines, and being restored by them to David, was considered afterwards as the property of the kings of Juda. It lay not far from Horma. Jos. 19:4.

Ver. 7. Months. Heb. “days and four months.” The former expression denotes a year; though some would have it, that David remained “four months and a few days” in the country. He probably continued so many months at Geth, (v. 9, 11,) and about a year at Siceleg. C.—Sept. have “days, four months;” and Salien adopts that term. H. See C. 29:3. D.
